Browning

Although passionately interested in the revolutionary social, political, and religious issues of the nineteenth century, Robert Browning remained philosophically less disturbed than any other major English literary figure of his time. Two chief tenets of his consistently optimistic philosophy permeate his poetry: that the proof of the existence of a benevolent God and of the immortal value of man is expressed in love; and that "man's reach should exceed his grasp."

Browning seems never to have been haunted by Tennyson's fear that the collapse of Victorian idealism would mean the destruction of value. On the contrary, he could join Hopkins in the praise of undealized reality, "All things counter, spare, strange," as evidence of the power of God and the fertility of His universe.

Believing that the highest truth is to be found in the individual, Browning was led to the study of man's soul and mind; and in his dramatic monologues, he attempted to reveal the innermost selves of the persons he portrayed. He possessed an alertness, an exuberance, an intellectual subtlety, that made every object with which he came in contact a possible subject for his fertile, dramatic imagination.

PUBLISHERS' NOTE

THE Riverside Edition of the Poetic and Dramatic Works of Robert Browning was published first in 1887. It included all the writings which the American publishers had from time to time brought out by arrangement with Mr. Browning or his representatives. A year later the English publishers issued a new and revised edition, whereupon the Riverside Edition was carefully compared with the author's latest revision and made to agree with it. There had grown up, moreover, about the writings a considerable body of comment and interpretation, and to facilitate the study and enjoyment of the poems, the American publishers engaged Mr. George Willis Cooke to prepare a Guide-Book which served as a very desirable accompaniment to the Riverside Edition of the works. They added also to the series, by arrangement with the English publishers, the authorized Life of the poet by Mrs. Sutherland Orr.

The ten volumes thus brought together furnish a complete Browning collection, but it has long been apparent that students and lovers of Browning would find it very convenient to have the complete works of their author in a single portable volume, and the plan of the Cambridge Edition so successfully applied to the poems of Longfellow and Whittier was adopted for this purpose. By a careful study of condensation with every regard for legibility it has been found possible to bring the entire body of Browning's work into a single volume, and to equip the edition with the requisite apparatus. The order of arrangement is chronological, with one or two obvious divergences. As in the other volumes of the Cambridge Edition, a biographical sketch introduces the work, brief head-notes chiefly pertaining to the origin of the respective poems have been supplied, drawn largely from Mr. Cooke's admirable volume, and a small body of pertinent notes of an explanatory character added, though the reader will readily see that the exigencies of the volume have compelled the editor to be very frugal in this respect. The appendix also contains the one notable piece of Browning's prose, a chronological list of his writings, and indexes of titles and first lines.

If one sought to build any genealogical structure to account for Robert Browning's genius, he would find but slight foundation in fact, though what he found would be substantial so far as it went. Browning's father was a bank clerk in London; his father again was a bank clerk. Both of these Brownings were christened Robert. The father of the poet's grandfather was Thomas Browning, an innkeeper and small proprietor in Dorsetshire, and his stock apparently was west-country English. Browning himself liked to believe that an earlier ancestor was a certain Captain Micaiah Browning who raised the siege of Derry in 1689 by an act of personal bravery which cost him his life. It is most to the point that Browning was London born with two generations of city Londoners behind him. His mother was Sarah Anne — a name which became Sarianna in the poet's sister — Wiedemann, the Scottish daughter of a Hamburg German, a shipowner in Dundee.

The characters of the poet's parents are clearly defined. Robert Browning, senior, was a man of business who performed his business duties punctiliously, and by frugality acquired a tolerably comfortable fortune, but he was not a money-making man; his real life was in his books and in the gratification of literary and æsthetic tastes. He was a voracious reader, and in a prudent way a book and print collector. "It was his habit," says Mrs. Orr, "when he bought a book — which was generally an old one allowing of this addition — to have some pages of blank paper bound into it. These he filled with notes, chronological tables, or such other supplementary matter as would enhance the interest, or assist the mastering, of its contents: all written in a clear and firm, though by no means formal, handwriting." He had a talent for versifying which he used for his entertainment; he had a cheerful nature and that genuine sociability which made him a delightful companion in the small circle which satisfied his simple, ingenuous nature. He was born and bred in the Church of England, but in middle life became by choice a Dissenter, though never an exclusive one.

Mrs. Browning, the poet's mother, was once described by Carlyle as "the true type of a Scottish gentlewoman." She inherited from her father a love for music and drawing which in him was manifested in execution, in her in good taste and appreciation. She was a woman of serene, gentle and affectionate nature, and of simple, earnest religious belief. She was brought up in the kirk of Scotland, but, like her husband, connected herself in middle life with the Congregationalists. She communicated of her own religious conviction to her children; it is said that she handed down also a nervous organization.

Of these parents Robert Browning was born in the parish of St. Giles, Camberwell, London, May 7, 1812. He was the oldest of the small family, having two sisters, one, Clara, who died in childhood, and Sarianna, two years younger than himself, who outlived him. The country in which he was born and where he spent his childhood has been delightfully described by his great contemporary, Ruskin, whose Herne Hill was in the immediate neighborhood. Camberwell at that time was a suburb of London, with rural spaces and near access to the open country, though the stony foot of the metropolis was already stepping outward upon the pleasant lanes and fields. There was room for gardening and the keeping of pets, while the country gave opportunity for forays into nature's fastnesses. The boy kept owls and monkeys, magpies and hedgehogs, an eagle, snakes even, and was touched with the collector's pride, as when he started a collection of rare creatures with a couple of lady-birds brought home one winter day and placed in a box lined with cotton wool and labelled, "Animals found surviving in the depths of a severe winter." It is easy for a reader of his poems to detect the close, sympathetic observation which he disclosed for all lower life.

Indeed the characteristics of his mind as seen in his writings afterward were readily disclosed in the evidence which remains to us of his boyhood. He was insatiably curious and he was imaginatively dramatic, and he had from the first the sane and generous aid of his parents in both these particulars. His father was passionately fond of children, and gave his own that best of gifts, appreciative companionship. "He was fond," says Mr. Sharp in his Life of Browning, "of taking the little Robert in his arms and walking to and fro with him in the dusk in 'the library,' soothing the child to sleep by singing to him snatches of Anacreon in the original to a favorite old tune of his, 'A Cottage in a Wood ;'" and again the same biographer says : "One of his own [Robert's] recollections was that of sitting on his father's knees in the library, and listening with enthralled attention to the Tale of Troy, with marvellous illustrations among the glowing coals in the fireplace ; with, below all, the vaguely heard accompaniment — from the neighboring room, where Mrs. Browning sat 'in her chief happiness, her hour of darkness and solitude and music' — of a wild Gaelic lament, with its insistent falling cadences."

The boy had an indifferent experience of formal schooling in his youth. The more fertilizing influence of his intellectual taste was found in his father's books. As has been said, his father had an intelligent and cultivated love of books, and eagerly shared his knowledge and his treasures with his boy. A seventeenth century edition of Quarles's Emblems, the first edition of Robinson Crusoe, an early edition of Milton, bought for him by his father, old Bibles, a wide range of Elizabethan literature — these were pastures in which the boy browsed. Besides, he knew the eighteenth century writers, Walpole, Junius, and even Voltaire being included by the catholic minded father. The special acquaintance with Greek came later, but Latin he began early.

His attendance at school ceased when he was fourteen, then came four years of private tutors, and at eighteen he was matriculated at London University, where he spent two years. In this period of private and public tuition, his scope was widening with systematic intent. He learned dancing, riding, boxing and fencing. He became versed in French. He visited galleries, and made some progress in drawing, especially from casts. He studied music with able teachers. He had a strong interest in the stage, and displayed on occasions a good deal of histrionic ability himself.

It is said that in this growing, restless period, when indeed he had the wilfulness and aggressiveness of the young man who has the consciousness of inner power, but not yet the mastery either of art or of himself, it was an open question with him whether he should be poet, painter, sculptor or musician ; an artist at any rate he knew he must be. To that all his being moved, and in his youth he manifested that temperament, by alternation dreamy and dramatic, which under favoring conditions is the background from which artistic possibilities are projected. From the vantage ground of a wooded spot near his home he could look out on the distant city lying on the western horizon, and fretting the evening sky with its spires and towers and ragged lines. The sight for him had a great fascination. Here would he lie for hours, looking and dreaming, and he has told how one night of his boyhood he stole out to these elms and saw the great city glimmering through the darkness. After all, the vision was more to him than that which brought woods and fields beneath his ken. It was the world of men and women, toward which his gaze was directed all his life.

In Browning's case, as in that of more than one recent poet, it is possible to see a very distinct passing of the torch into his hand from that of a great predecessor. He had versified from childhood. He would scarcely have been his father's child had he not. His sister remembers that when he was a very little child he would walk round and round the dining-room table, spanning the table with his palm as he marked off the scansion of the verses he had composed. Even before this rhyme had been put into his hands as an instrument, for his father had taught him words by their rhymes, and aided his memorizing of Latin declensions in the same way. So the boy lisped in numbers, for the numbers came, and by the time he was twelve had accumulated a formidable amount of matter, chiefly Byronic in manner. With the confidence of the very youthful poet, he tried to find a publisher who would venture on the issue. He could not find one who would put his verses into print, but he found one of another sort in his mother, who read them with pride and showed them to her friends. Thus they fell into the hands of Miss Flower, who showed them to her sister, Sarah Flower Adams, whose name is firmly held in hymnologies, and with her appreciation showed them also to the Rev. William Johnson Fox, who as preacher, editor, and man of letters had a tolerably distinct position which has not yet been forgotten. Mr. Fox read and was emphatic in his recognition of promise, but with good sense advised against any attempt to get the book into print. Book it was in manuscript, and this was the publication it received. Like other first ventures, its audience was fit though few, and as will be seen later, Browning gained the best thing that first ventures are likely to bring, a generous critic.

But shortly after this came the real fructifying of the poetic germ which lay in this youthful nature. "Passing a bookstall one day," says Mr. Sharp, "he saw, in a box of second-hand volumes, a little book advertised as 'Mr. Shelley's Atheistical Poem: very scarce.' He had never heard of Shelley, nor did he learn for a long time that the Dæmon of the World and the miscellaneous poems appended thereto constituted a literary piracy. Badly printed, shamefully mutilated, these discarded blossoms touched him to a new emotion. Pope became further removed than ever: Byron, even, lost his magnetic supremacy. From vague remarks in reply to his inquiries, and from one or two casual allusions, he learned that there really was a poet called Shelley; that he had written several volumes; that he was dead." His mother set herself to search for more of Shelley for her son, and after recourse to Mr. Fox, made her way to the Olliers in Vere Street, and brought back not only a collection of Shelley's volumes, but of Keats's also, and thus these two poets fell into Browning's hands.

It was on a May night, Browning told a friend, he entered upon this hitherto unknown world. In a laburnum near by, and in a great copper beech not far away, two nightingales sang together. So he sat and listened to them, and read by turns from these two poets. It was his initiation into the same society. He did not at once join them, but when he made his first appearance in public, at the age of twenty, it was with a poem, Pauline, which not only held a glowing apostrophe to Shelley but was throughout colored by his ardent devotion to the poet. Twenty years later he wrote a prose apologia for Shelley in the form of an introduction to a collection of letters purporting to come from Shelley, but which were discovered to be spurious immediately upon publication. Both Pauline and an Essay on Percy Bysshe Shelley will be found in this volume, with introductions explaining the circumstances of publication, but the reader of Browning's poetry is likely to carry longest in his mind the short lyric Memorabilia, beginning: — in which as in a parable one may read how the sudden acquaintance with this poet was to Browning the one memorable moment in his period of youthful dreaming.

"Ah, did you once see Shelley plain,"

The publication anonymously of Pauline, in January, 1833, was followed by a period of travel. He went to Russia nominally as secretary to the Russian consul-general, and became so enamored of diplomatic life that he essayed to enter it, but failed; so strong a hold did it take on him that he would have been glad in later life if his son had chosen this career.

The life of a poet who is not also a man of action is told mainly in the succession of his writings. Two or three sonnets followed Pauline, but the first poem to which Browning attached his name was Paracelsus, the dedication to which is dated March 15, 1835. The dedication — and the succession of these graceful compliments discloses many of Browning's friendships — was to Count de Ripert-Monclar, a young French royalist, who was a private agent of the royal family, and had become intimate with the poet, who was four years his junior. The count suggested the life of Paracelsus to his friend as a subject for a poem, but on second thought advised against it as offering insufficient materials for the treatment of love. A young poet, however, who would prefix a quotation from Cornelius Agrippa to his first publication was one easily to be enticed by such a subject, and Browning fell upon the literature relating to Paracelsus which he found in the British Museum, and quickly mastered the facts, which became fused by his ardent imagination and eager speculation into a consistent whole. But though he sought his material among books, as he needs must, he found his constructive power in the silence of nature in the night. He had a great love for walking in the dark. "There was in particular," says Mr. Sharp, "a wood near Dulwich, whither he was wont to go. There he would walk swiftly and eagerly along the solitary and lightless byways, finding a potent stimulus to imaginative thought in the happy isolation thus enjoyed. . . . At this time, too, he composed much in the open air. This he rarely, if ever, did in later life. Not only many portions of Paracelsus but several scenes in Strafford were enacted first in these midnight silences of the Dulwich woodland. Here, too, as the poet once declared, he came to know the serene beauty of dawn: for every now and again, after having read late, or written long, he would steal quietly from the house, and walk till the morning twilight graded to the pearl and amber of the new day."

Poetry, it may be, more than any other form of literature, clears the way for friendship. At any rate, Paracelsus introduced Browning to John Forster, and it was at this time also that Dickens, Talfourd and Macready, Leigh Hunt, Barry Cornwall, Wordsworth and Landor were more than names to the young poet. There was doubtless something in the man as well as in his work which won him recognition. Macready says he looked more the poet than any man he had ever met. His head was crowned with wavy dark brown hair. He had singularly expressive eyes, a sensitive, mobile mouth, a musical voice, and an alertness of manner, so that he was like a quivering, high bred animal. How marked he was by his companions, and singled out to be, as Macready says, "a leading spirit of his time," is instanced by a notable occurrence at Talfourd's house after the first performance of Ion, when Talfourd included Browning with Wordsworth and Landor, who were present, in a toast to the poets of England.

It was on this occasion that Macready, whom Browning already knew well, proposed to the poet that he should write him a play as narrated in the Introduction to Strafford. The play was produced at the Covent Garden Theatre in May, 1837, and Macready and Miss Helen Faucit, afterward Lady Martin, gave distinction to its representation. It came, however, at an unfortunate time in the management, and though it gave promise of a long run, certain difficulties in the theatre compelled its withdrawal. It was published at once by Longmans, but like Browning's former book, was a failure with the public.

The monologue of Pauline had been succeeded by what may be called the conversational drama of Paracelsus, and that by the dramatic Strafford. The form now experimented with was to be the dominant one for the next ten years, though his next attempt was in form almost a reversion to Pauline. During the remainder of 1837 and until Easter, 1838, Browning was engaged on Sordello, but interrupted this poem for a couple of years which have a special interest as the years when he first visited Italy, and when he entered upon an order of production which was to be very significant of his poetic choice of subject and treatment. Browning himself recognized the importance to him of his acquaintance with Italy. "It was my university," he was wont to say, when asked if he had been a student at Oxford or Cambridge. The companion poems, The Englishman in Italy and The Italian in England, illustrate that double nationality in Browning's mind by which the two countries were, so to speak, married for him. The latter of these two poems was one which Mazzini used to read to his countrymen when he would demonstrate how generously an Englishman could enter into the Italian's patriotic aspirations. The journey was a rapid one. "I went," Browning says, "to Trieste, then Venice — then through Treviso and Bassano to the mountains, delicious Asolo, all my places and castles, you will see. Then to Vicenza, Padua, and Venice again. Then to Verona, Trent, Innspruck, Munich, Salzburg in Franconia, Frankfurt and Mayence; down the Rhine to Cologne, then to Aix-la-Chapelle, Siège and Antwerp; then home."

It would seem as if he had begun Sordello with a bookish knowledge only of Italy, and later charged it with a more informing spirit of love for that country and embroidered it with descriptive scenes drawn from his personal observation. The poem was published in 1840, but the result of the journey in Italy and of the poet's more complete finding of himself — a process by the bye which may almost be taken as having its analogue in Sordello — were made most evident by the next publication, the story of which is told in the Introduction to Pippa Passes. The very form chosen for Bells and Pomegranates was a challenge to the public not so fantastically arrogant as Horne's famous publication of Orion at a farthing, but noticeable as an earnest of Browning's appeal to his generation and not to a select circle of admiring friends. In this series of writings, extending from 1841 through 1846, Browning struck the note again and again, in drama, lyric, and romance, which was to be the dominant note of his poetry, that disclosure of the soul of man in all manner of circumstances, as if the world were to the poet a great laboratory of souls, and he was forever to be engaged in solving, dissolving, and resolving the elements.

It is noticeable also that with this series closed Browning's serious attempts at dramatic composition for the stage. It would almost seem as if he finally parted company with theatrical managers, partly because of the constant difficulty he had in making them subordinate to his purpose, partly and no doubt more profoundly because his own genius, bent as it was upon the interpretation of spiritual phenomena, could ill brook the demands of the acted drama that all this interpretation should stop with visible, intelligible, and satisfactory action, capable of histrionic expression. Browning's eager penetration of the arcana of life was too absorbing to permit him to call a halt when the actor on the stage could go no farther.

An example of the practical difficulties he encountered with managers will be found in the vicissitudes of A Blot in the 'Scutcheon, which was put on the stage in 1843 and formed the fifth in the series of Bells and Pomegranates. Browning has himself told the story of his misfortunes so fully and so graphically in a letter to Mr. Frank Hill, editor of the London Daily News, forty years after the event, that it seems worth while to introduce it here. The letter, from which the following passage is taken, was dated 19, Warwick Crescent, December 15, 1884; and was written in consequence of a paragraph concerning the revival of the play, which Mr. Hill had sent in proof to Browning, from a doubt he felt of its accuracy:—

"Macready received and accepted the play, while he was engaged at the Haymarket, and retained it for Drury Lane, of which I was ignorant that he was about to become the manager; he accepted it 'at the instigation' of nobody,—and Charles Dickens was not in England when he did so: it was read to him after his return by Forster—and the glowing letter which contains his opinion of it, although directed by him to be shown to myself, was never heard of nor seen by me till printed in Forster's book some thirty years after. When the Drury Lane season began, Macready informed me that he should act the play when he had brought out two others—The Patrician's Daughter, and Plighted Troth. Having done so, he wrote to me that the former had been unsuccessful in money-drawing, and the latter had 'smashed his arrangements altogether,' but he would still produce my play. I had—in my ignorance of certain symptoms better understood by Macready's professional acquaintances—no notion that it was a proper thing, in such a case, to 'release him from his promise;' on the contrary, I should have fancied that such a proposal was offensive. Soon after, Macready begged that I would call on him; he said the play had been read to the actors the day before, and 'laughed at from beginning to end;' on my speaking my mind about this, he explained that the reading had been done by the prompter, a grotesque person with a red nose and wooden leg, ill at ease in the love scenes, and that he would himself make amends by reading the play next morning—which he did, and very adequately—but apprised me that, in consequence of the state of his mind, harassed by business and various trouble, the principal character must be taken by Mr. Phelps; and again I failed to understand—what Forster subsequently assured me was plain as the sun at noonday—that to allow at Macready's theatre any other than Macready to play the principal part in a new piece was suicidal,—and really believed I was meeting his exigencies by accepting the substitution. At the rehearsal, Macready announced that Mr. Phelps was ill, and that he himself would read the part; on the third rehearsal, Mr. Phelps appeared for the first time, and sat in a chair while Macready more than read—rehearsed the part. The next morning Mr. Phelps waylaid me at the stage-floor to say, with much emotion, that it never was intended that he should be instrumental in the success of a new tragedy, and that Macready would play Tresham on the ground that himself, Phelps, was unable to do so. He added that he could not expect me to waive such an advantage, but that, if I were prepared to waive it, 'he would take ether, sit up all night, and have the words in his memory by next day.' I bade him follow me to the green-room, and hear what I decided upon—which was that as Macready had given him the part, he should keep it: this was on a Thursday; he rehearsed on Friday and Saturday,—the play being acted the same evening,—of the fifth day after the 'reading' by Macready. Macready at once wished to reduce the importance of the 'play'—as he styled it in the bills,—tried to leave out so much of the text that I baffled him by getting it printed in four-and-twenty hours, by Moxon's assistance. He wanted me to call it The Sister! and I have before me, while I write, the stage-acting copy, with two lines of his own insertion to avoid the tragical ending — Tresham was to announce his intention of going into a monastery! all this, to keep up the belief that Macready, and Macready alone, could produce a veritable 'tragedy,' unproduced before. Not a shilling was spent on scenery or dresses, and a striking scene which had been used for The Patrician's Daughter did duty a second time. If your critic considers this treatment of the play an instance of 'the failure of powerful and experienced actors' to ensure its success, I can only say that my own opinion was shown by at once breaking off a friendship of many years — a friendship which had a right to be plainly and simply told that the play I had contributed as a proof of it would, through a change of circumstances, no longer be to my friend's advantage — all I could possibly care for. Only recently, when by the publication of Macready's journals the extent of his pecuniary embarrassments at that time was made known, could I in a measure understand his motives for such conduct, and less than ever understand why he so strangely disguised and disfigured them. If 'applause' meant success, the play thus maimed and maltreated was successful enough; it 'made way' for Macready's own Benefit, and the theatre closed a fortnight after."

Of the more profound separation between Browning and the theatre, due to the inherent impossibility of his arresting his thought before it got beyond the actor's use, Luria and The Return of the Druses afford good examples, and an illustration might fairly be taken from Colombe's Birthday, which was put on the stage in 1853, but scarcely held its own, though Helen Faucit took the heroine's part, and, when revived forty years after, was so cut and slashed that though the splendid idea of Valence was retained in situation, the delicate, subtle shadows which passed and passed before the reader's mind were wanting.

The period when Browning was writing his dramas was one of spendthrift enjoyment of life. For it was a time not only of work in the British Museum and of excursions into all sorts of remote fields of literature, but of long rambles, half gypsy experiences, hours when, stretched at full length beneath the sky, he made familiar and minute acquaintance with bird and leaf, insect and snail, the wind in the trees, the search for the northwest passage of argosies of clouds. He pursued all manner of interests which absorbed him for the moment; he was living, in short, that abundant life which was reflected later in multitudinous dramatic assumptions.

Then all at once there came a concentration of his passion and a sudden revelation to him which never lost its wondrous light. Elizabeth Barrett and Robert Browning, knowing each other through their writings, then by a common service to a common friend, then by an intermittent correspondence, finally were brought together by John Kenyon, already a dear friend of each. The fragile creature, scarce able to leave her couch, and the robust, exuberantly vital man, were as far separate in external, superficial agreement as could well be, but each knew the other with an instantaneousness of knowledge and need. Again and again, not only in verses directed openly to his wife, but in those which like By the Fireside thinly veil personal feeling, the passionate constancy of this experimenting, daringly inquisitive poet towards his poet wife is splendidly disclosed, with a certain glory of frank confession which is the vehement sincerity of one who is in this one feeling genuine poet and genuine man.

Miss Barrett was an invalid, guarded with the greatest care, and Browning, in urging marriage upon her, met with all the obstacles which the circumstances raised. He confronted indeed the indomitable refusal of Miss Barrett's father. A physician had held out hopes that a removal to Italy would give the invalid a chance to regain some degree of health, but Mr. Barrett, for some not very clear reason, refused his consent to her taking the journey with her brother. It was then that Browning, who can readily be conceived of as a masterful man, won Miss Barrett's consent to a sudden and clandestine marriage, and a journey to Italy as his wife. "When she had finally assented to this course," writes Mrs. Orr, "she took a preparatory step which, in so far as it was known, must itself have been sufficiently startling to those about her; she drove to Regent's Park, and when there, stepped out of the carriage and on to the grass. I do not know how long she stood — probably only for a moment; but I well remember hearing that when, after so long an interval, she felt earth under her feet and air about her, the sensation was almost bewilderingly strange."

They were married September 12, 1846. She would not entangle Mr. Kenyon or any of her friends by announcing even her engagement; she preferred marrying without her father's knowledge, to marrying against his prohibition. For a week the husband and wife did not see each other. Then they met by agreement and went to Paris. Mr. Barrett never forgave his daughter, but the consternation with which the Browning family heard of the event quickly turned to affectionate regard for the frail wife. So far as Mrs. Browning's physical well-being was concerned, it is clear that the marriage gave her a new lease of life; and what seemed at the moment an audacious taking of fate into their own hands proved to be a case where nature obtained her best of both.

From Paris, by slow stages, they passed through France into Italy, and made their first long halt in Pisa. It was here, we are told, that Mrs. Browning showed to her husband in manuscript those Sonnets from the Portuguese which were her offering to him out of the darkness of her chamber. From Pisa they went to Florence, to Ancona, and again back to Florence, where at last they obtained a foothold in the old palace called Casa Guidi, a name to be endeared to the readers of Mrs. Browning's poetry. Mr. George S. Hillard, in his Six Months in Italy, gives a pleasant account of the Brownings when he met them in Florence in 1847.

"It is well for the traveller to be chary of names. It is an ungrateful return for hospitable attentions to print the conversation of your host, or describe his person, or give an inventory of his furniture, or proclaim how his wife and daughters were dressed. But I trust I may be pardoned if I state that one of my most delightful associations with Florence arises from the fact that here I made the acquaintance of Robert and Elizabeth Browning. These are even more familiar names in America than in England, and their poetry is probably more read, and better understood with us than among their own countrymen. A happier home and a more perfect union than theirs it is not easy to imagine; and this completeness arises not only from the rare qualities which each possesses, but from their adaptation to each other. Browning's conversation is like the poetry of Chaucer, or like his own, simplified and made transparent. His countenance is so full of vigor, freshness, and refined power, that it seems impossible to think that he can ever grow old. His poetry is subtle, passionate, and profound; but he himself is simple, natural, and playful. He has the repose of a man who has lived much in the open air; with no nervous uneasiness and no unhealthy self-consciousness. Mrs. Browning is in many respects the correlative of her husband. As he is full of manly power, so she is a type of the most sensitive and delicate womanhood. She has been a great sufferer from ill-health, and the marks of pain are stamped upon her person and manner. Her figure is slight, her countenance expressive of genius and sensibility, shaded by a veil of long brown locks; and her tremulous voice often flutters over her words, like the flame of a dying candle over the wick. I have never seen a human frame which seemed so nearly a transparent veil for a celestial and immortal spirit. She is a soul of fire enclosed in a shell of pearl. Her rare and fine genius needs no setting forth at my hands. She is also, what is not so generally known, a woman of uncommon, nay, profound learning, even measured by a masculine standard. Nor is she more remarkable for genius and learning, than for sweetness of temper, tenderness of heart, depth of feeling, and purity of spirit. It is a privilege to know such beings singly and separately, but to see their powers quickened, and their happiness rounded, by the sacred tie of marriage, is a cause for peculiar and lasting gratitude. A union so complete as theirs — in which the mind has nothing to crave nor the heart to sigh for — is cordial to behold and something to remember."

During the fifteen years of their married life the Brownings lived for the most part in Italy, with occasional summers in England and long sojourns in Paris. The record of Browning's productions during this period is meagre, if one regards the fulness of his poetic activity both before and after. The explanation is made that these new responsibilities, — for two sons were born to them, one of whom died, — carried also great anxieties, for the frailty of Mrs. Browning's health was a constant factor in the movements of the household. But though the record is meagre as to quantity, lovers of Browning's poetry would be likely to regard this as not only a central period, chronologically, but the period when he reached his highest expression. The first collected edition of his poems appeared in 1849, to be followed the next year by Christmas-Eve and Easter-Day, and then, five years after that, in 1855, by Men and Women, a group of poems which still remains the flower of Browning's genius.

The great range taken by these poems is a witness to the fecundity and versatility of Browning's genius. It is possible, also, that to the circumstances of his life, especially its beautiful distractions, we owe the fact of a multitude of short poems rather than longer-sustained efforts. While Mrs. Browning, sheltered by the constant care exerted by her husband and stimulated by his companionship, composed her longest work, Aurora Leigh, he, never long freed from anxious thought, broke into more fragmentary production. A very good illustration of the alacrity of his mind and the instantaneous power of seizing upon opportunity is given in a passage in Mr. Gosse's Personalia :—

"In recounting a story of some Tuscan noblemen who had shown him two exquisite miniature-paintings, the work of a young artist who should have received for them the prize in some local contest, and who, being unjustly defrauded, broke his ivories, burned his brushes, and indignantly foreswore the thankless art forever, Mr. Browning suddenly reflected that there was, as he said, 'stuff for a poem' in that story, and immediately with extreme vivacity began to sketch the form it should take, the suppression of what features and the substitution of what others were needful; and finally suggested the non-obvious or inverted moral of the whole, in which the act of spirited defiance was shown to be, really, an act of tame renunciation, the poverty of the artist's spirit being proved in his eagerness to snatch, even though it was by honest merit, a benefit simply material. The poet said, distinctly, that he had never before reflected on this incident as one proper to be versified; the speed, therefore, with which the creative architect laid the foundations, built the main fabric, and even put on the domes and pinnacles of his poem was, no doubt, of uncommon interest. He left it, in five minutes, needing nothing but the mere outward crust of the versification."

It was an incident in Browning's life that when he was producing his most glorious work and receiving the admiration and intelligent appreciation of his poetical wife, he was a very insignificant figure in English literature of the day. Mrs. Browning was indignant over the neglect her husband suffered, and in her letters drew sharp comparison between the attention paid Browning in America and the neglect he received in England. Meanwhile, whether living in Florence or sojourning in Paris or London, a choice company was always to be found welcoming and honoring the two poets. Mr. and Mrs. Story, the Hawthornes, Cardinal Manning, Massimo d'Azeglio, Sir Frederick Leighton, Mr. Odo Russell, Rossetti, Val Prinsep, Forster, Landor, Fanny Kemble,—these are some of the names closely associated with that of the Brownings in this period.

The death of Mrs. Browning, June 29, 1861, closed this most beautiful human companionship. It made also a great change in Browning's habit of life, and no doubt affected in important ways his poetical productiveness. He left Italy for England. He became absorbed, so far as personal responsibilities went, in the education of his son. By some strange caprice, he chose to make his home in an ugly part of London, and he approached it through a region of disorder and squalor. But he also, with his robust nature, denied himself the luxury of a persistent solitariness, and little by little returned to society, especially grateful for the friendship of women like Miss Isa Blagden, who stepped in at the moment of his descent into the valley of grief with their gentle ministrations.

The months that followed Mrs. Browning's death were in a way given to taking up again dropped threads of work, and to intellectual occupations, which both satisfied and stimulated his nature. He read Euripides again, perhaps in part because of the association in his mind with his wife's scholarly interests. He resumed the poems on which he had been engaged in the last months at Casa Guidi, and he pondered over his magnum opus, the germ of which had been in his mind for many months. But first, in 1863, he saw through the press a new and complete collection of his poetical works in three volumes. Then, the year following, he gathered the poems which immediately preceded and followed Mrs. Browning's death into the volume of Dramatis Personæ. The reissue of his older poems and this new accession were accompanied by a clear reinforcement of his position as an English poet. He had come, too, to the point where volumes of selections from his work were in demand, a pretty good sign of a widening of his audience. Other signs followed. In 1867 he received the honorary degree of M. A. from the University of Oxford, and a few months later was made honorary fellow of Balliol College. In the year following he was asked to stand for the Lord Rectorship of the University of St. Andrews, rendered vacant by the death of J. S. Mill.

His mother had died in 1849, and in 1866 his father, who had been one of his most constant companions since his wife's death, died also. Thereafter, he and his sister Sarianna, who had passed a life of devotion to their parents, became inseparable. Though England was their home, they spent many summers in Brittany, as his poems indicate, and now and then returned to Italy, where his son was established finally as a painter.

In 1868 appeared the six volume uniform edition of his poems, and immediately afterward began the publication, to be completed in four volumes, of The Ring and the Book. Mrs. Orr traces, in an ingenious manner, the influence which Mrs. Browning's personality had in the conception of Pompilia in this poem. However much a single character may have been affected, it is easy to believe that this elaborate construction building in Browning's mind during the closing years of his wife's life and actually brought into existence in the years immediately following was, more than any single work, a great monument which the poet raised to the memory of that companion whose own poetic achievement always seemed to him of a higher worth than his own. "The simple truth is," he wrote to a common friend, "that she was the poet and I the clever person by comparison: remember her limited experience of all kinds, and what she made of it. Remember, on the other hand, how my uninterrupted health and strength and practice with the world have helped me."

After The Ring and the Book the only new departure, so to speak, of Browning's genius was in the group of poems which were built upon the foundation of Greek poetry. In 1871 appeared Balaustion's Adventure, in 1875 Aristophanes' Apology, and in 1877 The Agamemnon of Æschylus. They have their value as expressive of Browning's catholicity, and more particularly as his one great literary feat. With all his interest in Italy, and his delving in Renaissance literature, there can scarcely be said to be any criticism of Italian literature in the form of his own poetry. In like manner his dramatic works are not, except in a very remote or general sense, criticism of the Elizabethan drama. But his three poems above named do represent the thought and criticism of a Gothic mind confronting and admiring the Greek art and thought. Browning in these works is not a reproducer in his own terms of Greek life; he is a poet of varied experience, who, coming in contact with a great and distinct manifestation of human life, is moved to strike in here also with his thought and fancy, and because of the very elemental nature of the material, to find the keenest delight in exercising his genius upon it.

Meanwhile the facility which his long and varied practice with the English language had brought him made every new subject that appealed to him a plaything for his fertile imagination; and the speculative temper which grew upon him as the maturity of experience enlarged and enriched his material for thought, led him into long and tortuous ways. The Ring and the Book stands about midway in the bulk of his work, but whereas all the poetry and drama before that work represent thirty-five years of his life, that which follows, nearly as great in amount, represents but twenty years.

In these last years of his life, when fame had come to him and his versatility made him a ready companion, he led a semi-public life. He was in demand in all directions. As Mr. Sharp has rapidly summed it up: "Everybody wished him to come and dine; and he did his utmost to gratify everybody. He said everything; read all the notable books; kept himself acquainted with the leading contents of the journals and magazines; conducted a large correspondence; read new French, German, and Italian books of mark; read and translated Euripides and Æschylus; knew all the gossip of the literary clubs, salons, and the studios; was a frequenter of afternoon-tea parties; and then, over and above it, he was Browning: the most profoundly subtle mind that has exercised itself in poetry since Shakespeare."

In 1881 was founded the English Browning Society, one of the most singular testimonials to the interest awakened by a contemporaneous poet known in literary history. The great mass of his writings, the recordite nature of some of the material which he had used, but more than all, the astounding variety of problems in human life and character which he had presented and either solved or opened the way to solve, made Browning an object of the greatest interest to the curious, the sympathetic, and the restless of his day. Any such movement has on its edge a frayed sort of membership, but no one can note the names of members or read the communications which appear in the society's proceedings without recognizing the intellectual ability that carried the movement along. Browning's own attitude toward the society is pretty clearly expressed in the following words which he wrote to Mr. Edmund Yates at the time of the society's foundation :—

"The Browning Society, I need not say, as well as Browning himself, are fair game for criticism. I had no more to do with the founding it than the babe unborn; and, as Wilkes was no Wilkesite, I am quite other than a Browningite. But I cannot wish harm to a society of, with a few exceptions, names unknown to me, who are busied about my books so disinterestedly. The exaggerations probably come of the fifty-years'-long charge of unintelligibility against my books; such reactions are possible, though I never looked for the beginning of one so soon. That there is a grotesque side to the thing is certain; but I have been surprised and touched by what cannot but have been well intentioned, I think. Anyhow, as I never felt inconvenienced by hard words, you will not expect me to wax bumptious because of undue compliment: so enough of 'Browning'—except that he is yours very truly 'while the machine is to him.'"

In 1887 Browning removed to a more agreeable quarter in De Vere Gardens in the west end of London, and with his affection for Asolo, he set about purchasing a residence there in 1889, and it was while engaged in negotiations for the purchase that he was taken ill with bronchial troubles, and died at his son's home in Venice, December 12, 1889. He was buried in Poet's Corner, Westminster Abbey, on the last day of the year. Italy rightly divided honors with England, and on the outer wall of the Rezzonico Palace in Venice is a memorial tablet with the inscription :—

PAULINE: THE FRAGMENT OF A CONFESSION

THE history of the earliest printed of Browning's writings is so curious that it seems worth while to give it at greater length than its intrinsic merit would require. As a boy Browning wrote an inordinate amount of verse, imitative largely of Byron, and some of it written when he was twelve struck his father as good enough to deserve printing, but no publisher could be found ready to confirm this faith. Then Browning fell into a Shelleyan mood, and when he was twenty projected a great work of which the introduction only was written. This introduction was Pauline, which to be precise was completed October 22, 1832. Browning's aunt volunteered to pay the expenses of publication, and it was published anonymously early in 1833 by Saunders & Otley. The most authoritative person on literary matters in the young poet's circle of friends was the Rev. William Johnson Fox, a Unitarian clergyman and editor of the Monthly Repository. He had a few years before given emphatic commendation to the boy's verse, and now reviewed the poem with great warmth in his own magazine, so winning the poet's gratitude as to draw from him the extravagant expression: "I shall never write a line without thinking of the source of my first praise, be assured." The poem missed what would have been from its writer a more notable review. Mr. John Stuart Mill, six years Browning's senior, was so delighted with Pauline that he wrote to the editor of Tait's Magazine, the only periodical in which he could write freely, asking leave to review the poem. The editor replied that he had just printed a curt, contemptuous notice, and could not at once take the other track. When Mill died his copy of Pauline, crowded with annotations, fell into Browning's hands and may now be seen in the South Kensington Museum.

In spite of such hopeful promise the poem was still-born from the press. Five years later, Browning wrote in a copy "the only remaining crab of the shapely Tree of Life in my Fool's Paradise." He appears never to have spoken of it until a striking circumstance brought it again into light. Many years after it was printed Dante Gabriel Rossetti was browsing among the volumes of forgotten poetry in the British Museum. He came upon a book in which a number of pamphlet poems were bound in a heterogeneous collection. Among these was Pauline. He read it, and from its internal evidence was convinced that it was an unacknowledged poem of Browning's. The book was wholly out of print, and he made a copy of it. He wrote to Browning afterwards taxing the poet with the production, and Browning, greatly surprised at Rossetti's discovery, acknowledged the authorship. In 1865, the editor of this Cambridge edition, meeting Rossetti in London, mentioned the fact that he had been copying at the British Museum Browning's prose introduction to the suppressed spurious collection of Shelley's Letters, whereupon Rossetti told him of this other rare book. Afterwards on learning that he had copied Pauline also he said: "I suppose you will print it when you go back to America." "By no means," replied the editor; "that would be a breach of faith. I copied it as a student of Browning. I never would make it public without Browning's consent." A year or two later therefore when a new edition of the collected poems was published, he thought himself not unlikely the unwitting occasion of the inclusion of Pauline, for in the introduction Browning wrote as follows:

"The first piece in the series (Pauline), I acknowledge and retain with extreme repugnance, indeed purely of necessity; for not long ago I inspected one, and am certified of the existence of other transcripts, intended sooner or later to be published abroad: by forestalling these, I can at least correct some misprints (no syllable is changed) and introduce a boyish work by an exculpatory word. The thing was my earliest attempt at "poetry always dramatic in principle, and so many utterances of so many imaginary persons, not mine," which I have since written according to a scheme less extravagant and scale less impracticable than were ventured upon in this crude preliminary sketch, — a sketch that, on reviewal, appears not altogether wide of some hint of the characteristic features of that particular dramatis persona it would fain have reproduced: good draughtsmanship, however, and right handling were far beyond the artist at that time.

LONDON, December 25, 1867.

R. B."

Twenty years later, upon sending out his final collective edition, Browning added to the preface just quoted the following sentences: —

"I preserve, in order to supplement it, the foregoing preface. I had thought, when compelled to include in my collected works the poem to which it refers, that the honest course would be to reprint, and leave mere literary errors unaltered. Twenty years' endurance of an eyesore seems more than sufficient: my faults remain duly recorded against me, and I claim permission to somewhat diminish these, so far Marot.

Non dubito, quin titulus libri nostri raritate sua quamplurimos alliciat ad legendum: inter quos nonnulli obliquæ opinionis, mente languidi, multi etiam maligni, et in ingenium nostrum ingrati accedent, qui temeraria sua ignorantia, vix conspecto titulo clamabunt. Nos vetita docere, hæresium semina jacere: piis auribus offendiculo, præclaris ingeniis scandalo esse: . . . adeo conscientiæ suæ consulentes, ut nec Apollo, nec Musæ omnes, neque Angelus de cælo me ab illorum execratione vindicare queant: quibus et ego nunc consulo, ne scripta nostra legant, nec intelligant, nec meminerint: nam noxia sunt, venenosa sunt: Acherontis ostium est in hoc libro, lapides loquitur, caveant, ne cerebrum illis exeat. Vos autem, qui æqua mente ad legendum venitis, si tantam prudentiæ discretionem adhibueritis, quantam in melle legendo apes, jam securi legite. Puto namque vos et utilitatis hand parum et voluptatis plurimum accepturos. Quod si qua repereritis, quæ vobis non placeant, mittite illa, nec utimini. NAM ET EGO VOBIS ILLA NON PROBO, SED NARRO. Cætera tamen propterea non respicite . . . Ideo, si quid liberius dictum sit, ignorescite adolescentiæ nostræ, qui minor quam adolescens hoc opus composui. — *Hen. Corn. Agrippa, De Occult. as style is concerned, in the present and final edition, where Pauline must needs, first of my performances, confront the reader. I have simply removed solecisms, mended the metre a little and endeavored to strengthen the phraseology — experience helping, in some degree, the helplessness of juvenile haste and heat in their untried adventure long ago."

LONDON, February 27, 1888.

The text here given, as throughout this volume, is that of Mr. Browning's latest revision. The text of the first revision, i. e. 1867, may be found at the close of volume i. of the Riverside edition.

The quotations from Marot and Cornelius Agrippa which follow were prefixed to the original edition of the poem. The note enclosed in brackets was Browning's comment on reprinting the poem the last time.

[This introduction would appear less absurdly pretentious did it apply, as was intended, to a completed structure of which the poem was meant for only a beginning and remains a fragment.]

PAULINE, mine own, bend o'er me — thy soft breast
Shall pant to mine — bend o'er me — thy sweet
eyes,
And loosened hair and breathing lips, and arms
Drawing me to thee — these build up a screen
To shut me in with thee, and from all fear;
So that I might unlock the sleepless brood
Of fancies from my soul, their lurking-place,
Nor doubt that each would pass, ne'er to return
To one so watched, so loved and so secured.
But what can guard thee but thy naked love?
Ah dearest, whoso sucks a poisoned wound
Envenoms his own veins! Thou art so good,
So calm — if thou shouldst wear a brow less light
For some wild thought which, but for me, were kept
From out thy soul as from a sacred star!
Yet till I have unlocked them it were vain
To hope to sing; some woe would light on me;
Nature would point at one whose quivering lip
Was bathed in her enchantments, whose brow burned
Beneath the crown to which her secrets knelt,
Who learned the spell which can call up the dead,
And then departed smiling like a fiend
Who has deceived God, — if such one should seek
Again her altars and stand robed and crowned
Amid the faithful! Sad confession first,
Remorse and pardon and old claims renewed.
Ere I can be — as I shall be no more.

I have been spared this shame if I had sat
By thee forever from the first, in place
Of my wild dreams of beauty and of good,
Or with them, as an earnest of their truth :
No thought nor hope having been shut from thee,
No vague wish unexplained, no wandering aim
Sent back to bind on fancy's wings and seek
Some strange fair world where it might be a law ;

But, doubting nothing, had been led by thee,
Through youth, and saved, as one at length
awaked

Who has slept through a peril. Ah vain, vain !

Thou lovest me ; the past is in its grave
Though its ghost haunts us ; still this much is ours,

To cast away restraint, lest a worse thing
Wait for us in the dark. Thou lovest me ;
And thou art to receive not love but faith,
For which thou wilt be mine, and smile and take

All shapes and shames, and veil without a fear
That form which music follows like a slave :
And I look to thee and I trust in thee,
As in a Northern night one looks away
Unto the East for morn and spring and joy.
Thou seest then my aimless, hopeless state,
And, resting on some few old feelings won
Back by thy beauty, wouldst that I essay
The task which was to me what now thou art :
And why should I conceal one weakness more ?

Thou wilt remember one warm morn when winter

Crept aged from the earth, and spring's first breath

Blew soft from the moist hills ; the black-thorn boughs,

So dark in the bare wood, when glistening
In the sunshine were white with coming buds,
Like the bright side of a sorrow, and the banks
Had violets opening from sleep like eyes.
I walked with thee who knew'st not a deep shame

Lurked beneath smiles and careless words which sought

To hide it till they wandered and were mute,
As we stood listening on a sunny mound
To the wind murmuring in the damp copse,
Like heavy breathings of some hidden thing
Betrayed by sleep ; until the feeling rushed
That I was low indeed, yet not so low

As to endure the calmness of thine eyes.
And so I told thee all, while the cool breast

I leaned on altered not its quiet beating :

And long ere words like a hurt bird's complaint
Bade me look up and be what I had been,

I felt despair could never live by thee :

Thou wilt remember. Thou art not more dear
Than song was once to me ; and I ne'er sung

But as one entering bright halls where all
Will rise and shout for him : sure I must own
That I am fallen, having chosen gifts

Distinct from theirs — that I am sad and fain
Would give up all to be but where I was,

Not high as I had been if faithful found,
But low and weak yet full of hope, and sure

Of goodness as of life — that I would lose
All this gay mastery of mind, to sit
Once more with them, trusting in truth and love
And with an aim — not being what I am.

O Pauline, I am ruined who believed That though my soul had floated from its sphere

Of wild dominion into the dim orb
Of self — that it was strong and free as ever !
It has conformed itself to that dim orb,
Reflecting all its shades and shapes, and now
Must stay where it alone can be adored.
I have felt this in dreams — in dreams in which I seemed the fate from which I fled ; I felt
A strange delight in causing my decay.
I was a fiend in darkness chained forever
Within some ocean-cave ; and ages rolled,
Till through the cleft rock, like a moonbeam,
came

A white swan to remain with me ; and ages
Rolled, yet I tired not of my first free joy
In gazing on the peace of its pure wings :
And then I said, " It is most fair to me,
Yet its soft wings must sure have suffered change

From the thick darkness, sure its eyes are dim.
Its silver pinions must be cramped and numbed
With sleeping ages here ; it cannot leave me,
For it would seem, in light beside its kind,
Withered, though here to me most beautiful."
And then I was a young witch whose blue eyes,
As she stood naked by the river springs,
Drew down a god : I watched his radiant form
Growing less radiant, and it gladdened me ;
Till one morn, as he sat in the sunshine
Upon my knees, singing to me of heaven,
He turned to look at me, ere I could lose
The grin with which I viewed his perishing :
And he shrieked and departed and sat long
By his deserted throne, but sunk at last
Murmuring, as I kissed his lips and curled
Around him, " I am still a god — to thee."

Still I can lay my soul bare in its fall,
Since all the wandering and all the weakness
Will be a saddest comment on the song :
And if, that done, I can be young again,
I will give up all gained, as willingly
As one gives up a charm which shuts him out
From hope or part or care in human kind.
As life wanes, all its care and strife and toil
Seem strangely valueless, while the old trees
Which grew by our youth's home, the waving
mass

Of climbing plants heavy with bloom and dew,
The morning swallows with their songs like
words,

All these seem clear and only worth our thoughts :

So, aught connected with my early life,
My rude songs or my wild imaginings,
How I look on them — most distinct amid
The fever and the stir of after years !

I ne'er had ventured e'en to hope for this,
Had not the glow I felt at His award,
Assured me all was not extinct within :

His whom all honor, whose renown springs up
Like sunlight which will visit all the world,
So that e'en they who sneered at him at first,
Come out to it, as some dark spider crawls
From his foul nets which some lit torch invades,
Yet spinning still new films for his retreat.
Thou didst smile, poet, but can we forgive ?

Sun-treader, life and light be thine forever !
Thou art gone from us ; years go by and spring
Gladdens and the young earth is beautiful,
Yet thy songs come not, other bards arise,
But none like thee : they stand, thy majesties,
Like mighty works which tell some spirit there
Hath sat regardless of neglect and scorn,
Till, its long task completed, it hath risen
And left us, never to return, and all
Rush in to peer and praise when all in vain.
The air seems bright with thy past presence yet,
But thou art still for me as thou hast been
When I have stood with thee as on a throne
With all thy dim creations gathered round
Like mountains, and I felt of mould like them,
And with them creatures of my own were mixed,

Like things half-lived, catching and giving life.
But thou art still for me who have adored
Though single, panting but to hear thy name
Which I believed a spell to me alone,
Scarce deeming thou wast as a star to men !
As one should worship long a sacred spring
Scarce worth a moth's flitting, which long grasses cross,

And one small tree embowers droopingly —
Joying to see some wandering insect won
To live in its few rushes, or some locust
To pasture on its boughs, or some wild bird
Stoop for its freshness from the trackless air :
And then should find it but the fountain-head,
Long lost, of some great river washing towns
And towers, and seeing old woods which will live
But by its banks untrod of human foot,
Which, when the great sun sinks, lie quivering
In light as some thing lieth half of life
Before God's foot, waiting a wondrous change ;
Then girt with rocks which seek to turn or stay
Its course in vain, for it does ever spread
Like a sea's arm as it goes rolling on,
Being the pulse of some great country — so
Wast thou to me, and art thou to the world !
And I, perchance, half feel a strange regret
That I am not what I have been to thee :
Like a girl one has silently loved long
In her first loneliness in some retreat,
When, late emerged, all gaze and glow to view
Her fresh eyes and soft hair and lips which bloom

Like a mountain berry : doubtless it is sweet
To see her thus adored, but there have been
Moments when all the world was in our praise,
Sweeter than any pride of after hours.
Yet, sun-treader, all hail ! From my heart's heart

I bid thee hail ! E'en in my wildest dreams,
I proudly feel I would have thrown to dust
The wreaths of fame which seemed o'erhanging
me,
To see thee for a moment as thou art.

And if thou livest, if thou lovest, spirit !
Remember me who set this final seal
To wandering thought — that one so pure as thou
Could never die. Remember me who flung
All honor from my soul, yet paused and said,
" There is one spark of love remaining yet,
For I have naught in common with him, shapes
Which followed him avoid me, and foul forms
Seek me, which ne'er could fasten on his mind ;
And though I feel how low I am to him,
Yet I aim not even to catch a tone
Of harmonies he called profusely up ;
So, one gleam still remains, although the last."
Remember me who praise thee e'en with tears,
For never more shall I walk calm with thee ;
Thy sweet imaginings are as an air,
A melody some wondrous singer sings,
Which, though it haunt men oft in the still eve,
They dream not to essay ; yet it no less
But more is honored. I was thine in shame,
And now when all thy proud renown is out,
I am a watcher whose eyes have grown dim
With looking for some star which breaks on him
Altered and worn and weak and full of tears.

Autumn has come like spring returned to us,
Won from her girlishness ; like one returned
A friend that was a lover, nor forgets
The first warm love, but full of sober thoughts
Of fading years ; whose soft mouth quivers yet
With the old smile, but yet so changed and still !
And here am I the scoffer, who have probed
Life's vanity, won by a word again
Into my own life — by one little word
Of this sweet friend who lives in loving me,
Lives strangely on my thoughts and looks and
words,

As fathoms down some nameless ocean thing
Its silent course of quietness and joy.
O dearest, if indeed I tell the past,
May'st thou forget it as a sad sick dream !
Or if it linger — my lost soul too soon
Sinks to itself and whispers we shall be
But closer linked, two creatures whom the earth
Bears singly, with strange feelings unrevealed
Save to each other ; or two lonely things
Created by some power whose reign is done,
Having no part in God or his bright world.
I am to sing whilst ebbing day dies soft,
As a lean scholar dies worn o'er his book,
And in the heaven stars steal out one by one
As hunted men steal to their mountain watch.
I must not think, lest this new impulse die
In which I trust ; I have no confidence :
So, I will sing on fast as fancies come ;
Rudely, the verse being as the mood it paints.

I strip my mind bare, whose first elements
I shall unveil — not as they struggle forth
In infancy, nor as they now exist,
When I am grown above them and can rule —
But in that middle stage when they were full Yet ere I had disposed them to my will ;
And then I shall show how these elements
Produced my present state, and what it is.

I am made up of an intensest life,
Of a most clear idea of consciousness

Of self, distinct from all its qualities,
 From all affections, passions, feelings, powers ;
 And thus far it exists, if tracked, in all :
 But linked, in me, to self-supremacy,
 Existing as a centre to all things,
 Most potent to create and rule and call
 Upon all things to minister to it ;
 And to a principle of restlessness
 Which would be all, have, see, know, taste, feel, all —
 This is myself ; and I should thus have been Though gifted lower than the meanest soul.

And of my powers, one springs up to save
 From utter death a soul with such desire
 Confined to clay — of powers the only one
 Which marks me — an imagination which Has been a very angel, coming not
 In fitful visions, but beside me ever
 And never failing me ; so, though my mind
 Forgets not, not a shred of life forgets,
 Yet I can take a secret pride in calling
 The dark past up to quell it regally.

A mind like this must dissipate itself,
 But I have always had one lode-star ; now,
 As I look back, I see that I have halted
 Or hastened as I looked towards that star —
 A need, a trust, a yearning after God :
 A feeling I have analyzed but late,
 But it existed, and was reconciled
 With a neglect of all I deemed his laws,
 Which yet, when seen in others, I abhorred.
 I felt as one beloved, and so shut in
 From fear : and thence I date my trust in signs
 And omens, for I saw God everywhere ;
 And I can only lay it to the fruit
 Of a sad after-time that I could doubt
 Even his being — e'en the while I felt
 His presence, never acted from myself,
 Still trusted in a hand to lead me through
 All danger ; and this feeling ever fought
 Against my weakest reason and resolve.

And I can love nothing — and this dull truth
 Has come the last : but sense supplies a love
 Encircling me and mingling with my life.

These make myself : I have long sought in vain
 To trace how they were formed by circumstance,
 Yet ever found them mould my wildest youth
 Where they alone displayed themselves, converted
 All objects to their use : now see their course !

They came to me in my first dawn of life
 Which passed alone with wisest ancient books
 All halo-girt with fancies of my own ;
 And I myself went with the tale — a god
 Wandering after beauty, or a giant
 Standing vast in the sunset — an old hunter
 Talking with gods, or a high-crested chief
 Sailing with troops of friends to Tenedos.
 I tell you, naught has ever been so clear
 As the place, the time, the fashion of those lives :
 I had not seen a work of lofty art,
 Nor woman's beauty nor sweet nature's face,

Yet, I say, never morn broke clear as those
 On the dim clustered isles in the blue sea,
 The deep groves and white temples and wet caves :
 And nothing ever will surprise me now —
 Who stood beside the naked Swift-footed,
 Who bound my forehead with Proserpine's hair.

And strange it is that I who could so dream Should e'er have stooped to aim at aught beneath —

Aught low or painful ; but I never doubted :
 So, as I grew, I rudely shaped my life
 To my immediate wants ; yet strong beneath
 Was a vague sense of power though folded up —
 A sense that, though those shades and times were past,
 Their spirit dwelt in me, with them should rule.

Then came a pause, and long restraint chained
 down

My soul till it was changed. I lost myself,
 And were it not that I so loathe that loss,
 I could recall how first I learned to turn
 My mind against itself ; and the effects
 In deeds for which remorse were vain as for
 The wanderings of delirious dream ; yet thence Came cunning, envy, falsehood, all world's wrong

That spotted me : at length I cleansed my soul.
 Yet long world's influence remained ; and naught

But the still life I led, apart once more,
 Which left me free to seek soul's old delights.
 Could e'er have brought me thus far back to peace.

As peace returned, I sought out some pursuit ;
 And song rose, no new impulse but the one
 With which all others best could be combined.
 My life has not been that of those whose heaven
 Was lampless save where poesy shone out ;
 But as a clime where glittering mountain-tops
 And glancing sea and forests steeped in light
 Give back reflected the far-flashing sun ;
 For music (which is earnest of a heaven,
 Seeing we know emotions strange by it,
 Not else to be revealed,) is like a voice,
 A low voice calling fancy, as a friend,
 To the green woods in the gay summer time :
 And she fills all the way with dancing shapes
 Which have made painters pale, and they go on Till stars look at them and winds call to them
 As they leave life's path for the twilight world
 Where the dead gather. This was not at first,
 For I scarce knew what I would do. I had
 An impulse but no yearning — only sang.

And first I sang as I in dream have seen
 Music wait on a lyrist for some thought,
 Yet singing to herself until it came.
 I turned to those old times and scenes where all
 That's beautiful had birth for me, and made
 Rude verses on them all ; and then I paused —
 I had done nothing, so I sought to know
 What other minds achieved. No fear outbroke
 As on the works of mighty bards I gazed,
 In the first joy at finding my own thoughts

Recorded, my own fancies justified,
And their aspirings but my very own.
With them I first explored passion and mind, —
All to begin afresh! I rather sought
To rival what I wondered at than form
Creations of my own; if much was light
Lent by the others, much was yet my own.

I paused again: a change was coming — came:
I was no more a boy, the past was breaking
Before the future and like fever worked.
I thought on my new self, and all my powers Burst out. I dreamed not of restraint, but gazed

On all things: schemes and systems went and
came,

And I was proud (being vainest of the weak)
In wandering o'er thought's world to seek some one

To be my prize, as if you wandered o'er
The White Way for a star.

And my choice fell

Not so much on a system as a man —
On one, whom praise of mine shall not offend,
Who was as calm as beauty, being such Unto mankind as thou to me, Pauline, —
Believing in them and devoting all His soul's strength to their winning back to
peace;

Who sent forth hopes and longings for their sake,
Clothed in all passion's melodies: such first
Caught me and set me, slave of a sweet task,
To disentangle, gather sense from song:
Since, song-inwoven, lurked there words which seemed

A key to a new world, the muttering
Of angels, something yet unguessed by man.
How my heart leapt as still I sought and found
Much there, I felt my own soul had conceived,
But there living and burning! Soon the orb
Of his conceptions dawned on me; its praise
Lives in the tongues of men, men's brows are high

When his name means a triumph and a pride,
So, my weak voice may well forbear to shame
What seemed decreed my fate: I threw myself
To meet it, I was vowed to liberty,
Men were to be as gods and earth as heaven,
And I — ah, what a life was mine to prove!
My whole soul rose to meet it. Now, Pauline,
I shall go mad, if I recall that time!

Oh let me look back ere I leave forever
The time which was an hour one fondly waits
For a fair girl that comes a withered hag!
And I was lonely, far from woods and fields,
And amid dullest sights, who should be loose
As a stag; yet I was full of bliss, who lived
With Plato and who had the key to life;
And I had dimly shaped my first attempt,
And many a thought did I build up on thought,
As the wild bee hangs cell to cell; in vain,
For I must still advance, no rest for mind.

'T was in my plan to look on real life,
The life all new to me: my theories
Were firm, so then I left, to look and learn

Mankind, its cares, hopes, fears, its woes and joys;
And, as I pondered on their ways, I sought
How best life's end might be attained — an end
Comprising every joy. I deeply mused.

And suddenly without heart-wreck I awoke
As from a dream: I said, "'T was beautiful,
Yet but a dream, and so adieu to it!"
As some world-wanderer sees in a far meadow Strange towers and high-walled gardens thick with trees,

Where song takes shelter and delicious mirth
From laughing fairy creatures peeping over,
And on the morrow when he comes to lie
Forever 'neath those garden-crests fruit-flushed
Sung round by fairies, all his search is vain.
First went my hopes of perfecting mankind,
Next — faith in them, and then in freedom's self
And virtue's self, then my own motives, ends
And aims and loves, and human love went last.
I felt this no decay, because new powers
Rose as old feelings left — wit, mockery,
Light-heartedness; for I had oft been sad,
Mistrusting my resolves, but now I cast
Hope joyously away: I laughed and said,
"No more of this!" I must not think: at length

I looked again to see if all went well.

My powers were greater: as some temple seemed
My soul, where naught is changed and incense rolls

Around the altar, only God is gone
And some dark spirit sitteth in his seat.
So, I passed through the temple and to me
Knelt troops of shadows, and they cried, "Hail,
king!

We serve thee now and thou shalt serve no
more!

Call on us, prove us, let us worship thee!"
And I said, "Are ye strong? Let fancy bear me Far from the past!" And I was borne away,
As Arab birds float sleeping in the wind,
O'er deserts, towers and forests, I being calm.
And I said, "I have nursed up energies,
They will prey on me." And a band knelt low
And cried, "Lord, we are here and we will make

Safe way for thee in thine appointed life!
But look on us!" And I said, "Ye will worship Me; should my heart not worship too?" They shouted,

"Thyself, thou art our king!" So, I stood
there

Smiling — oh, vanity of vanities!
For buoyant and rejoicing was the spirit
With which I looked out how to end my course;
I felt once more myself, my powers — all mine;
I knew while youth and health so lifted me
That, spite of all life's nothingness, no grief
Came nigh me, I must ever be light-hearted;
And that this knowledge was the only veil
Betwixt joy and despair: so, if age came,
I should be left — a wreck linked to a soul
Yet fluttering, or mind-broken and aware
Of my decay. So a long summer morn
Found me; and ere noon came, I had resolved
No age should come on me ere youth was spent

For I would wear myself out, like that morn
Which wasted not a sunbeam ; every hour
I would make mine, and die.

And thus I sought
To chain my spirit down which erst I freed
For flights to fame : I said, " The troubled life
Of genius, seen so gay when working forth
Some trusted end, grows sad when all proves vain —
How sad when men have parted with truth's
peace

For falsest fancy's sake, which waited first
As an obedient spirit when delight
Came without fancy's call : but alters soon,
Comes darkened, seldom, hastens to depart,
Leaving a heavy darkness and warm tears.
But I shall never lose her ; she will live
Dearer for such seclusion. I but catch
A hue, a glance of what I sing : so, pain
Is linked with pleasure, for I ne'er may tell Half the bright sights which dazzle me ; but
now

Mine shall be all the radiance : let them fade
Untold — others shall rise as fair, as fast !
And when all's done, the few dim gleams transferred," —

(For a new thought sprang up how well it were,
Discarding shadowy hope, to weave such lays
As straight encircle men with praise and love,
So, I should not die utterly, — should bring
One branch from the gold forest, like the knight
Of old tales, witnessing I had been there) —
" And when all's done, how vain seems e'en success —

The vaunted influence poets have o'er men !
'T is a fine thing that one weak as myself
Should sit in his lone room, knowing the words
He utters in his solitude shall move Men like a swift wind — that though dead and gone,
New eyes shall glisten when his beauteous dreams

Of love come true in happier frames than his.
Ay, the still night brings thoughts like these,
but morn

Comes and the mockery again laughs out
At hollow praises, smiles allied to sneers ;
And my soul's idol ever whispers me
To dwell with him and his unhonored song :
And I foreknow my spirit, that would press
First in the struggle, fail again to make
All bow enslaved, and I again should sink.

" And then know that this curse will come on us,
To see our idols perish ; we may wither,
No marvel, we are clay, but our low fate
Should not extend to those whom trustingly
We sent before into time's yawning gulf
To face what dread may lurk in darkness there.
To find the painter's glory pass, and feel
Music can move us not as once, or, worst,
To weep decaying wits ere the frail body Decays ! Naught makes me trust some love is true,
But the delight of the contented lowness
With which I gaze on him I keep forever
Above me ; I to rise and rival him ?

Feed his fame rather from my heart's best blood.
Wither unseen that he may flourish still."

Pauline, my soul's friend, thou dost pity yet
How this mood swayed me when that soul found thine,

When I had set myself to live this life,
Defying all past glory. Ere thou earnest
I seemed defiant, sweet, for old delights
Had flocked like birds again ; music, my life,
Nourished me more than ever ; then the lore
Loved for itself and all it shows — that king
Treading the purple calmly to his death,
While round him, like the clouds of eve, all dusk,

The giant shades of fate, silently flitting,
Pile the dim outline of the coming doom ;
And him sitting alone in blood while friends
Are hunting far in the sunshine ; and the boy
With his white breast and brow and clustering curls

Streaked with his mother's blood, but striving hard

To tell his story ere his reason goes.
And when I loved thee as love seemed so oft,
Thou lovedst me indeed : I wondering searched
My heart to find some feeling like such love,
Believing I was still much I had been.
Too soon I found all faith had gone from me,
And the late glow of life, like change on clouds,
Proved not the morn-blush widening into day,
But eve faint-colored by the dying sun
While darkness hastens quickly. I will tell My state as though 'twere none of mine — despair

Cannot come near us — this it is, my state.

Souls alter not, and mine must still advance ;
Strange that I knew not, when I flung away
My youth's chief aims, their loss might lead to loss

Of what few I retained, and no resource
Be left me : for behold how changed is all !
I cannot chain my soul : it will not rest
In its clay prison, this most narrow sphere :
It has strange impulse, tendency, desire,
Which nowise I account for nor explain,
But cannot stifle, being bound to trust
All feelings equally, to hear all sides :
How can my life indulge them ? yet they live,
Referring to some state of life unknown.

My selfishness is satiated not,
It wears me like a flame ; my hunger for
All pleasure, howsoe'er minute, grows pain ;
I envy — how I envy him whose soul
Turns its whole energies to some one end,
To elevate an aim, pursue success
However mean ! So, my still baffled hope
Seeks out abstractions ; I would have one joy,
But one in life, so it were wholly mine,
One rapture all my soul could fill : and this Wild feeling places me in dream afar
In some vast country where the eye can see
No end to the far hills and dales bestrewn
With shining towers and towns, till I grow mad

Well-nigh, to know not one abode but holds

Some pleasure, while my soul could grasp the world,

But must remain this vile form's slave. I look
With hope to age at last, which quenching much,
May let me concentrate what sparks it spares.

This restlessness of passion meets in me
A craving after knowledge: the sole power
Of yet commanding will is in that power
Repressed; for I beheld it in its dawn,
The sleepless harpy with just-budding wings,
And I considered whether to forego
All happy ignorant hopes and fears, to live,
Finding a recompense in its wild eyes.
And when I found that I should perish so,
I bade its wild eyes close from me forever,
And I am left alone with old delights;
See! it lies in a chained thing, still prompt
To serve me if I loose its slightest bond:
I cannot but be proud of my bright slave.

How should this earth's life prove my only sphere?

Can I so narrow sense but that in life
Soul itself exceeds it? In their elements
My love outsoars my reason; but since love
Perforce receives its object from this earth
While reason wanders chainless, the few truths Caught from its wanderings have sufficed to quell

Love chained below; then what were love, set
free,

Which, with the object it demands, would pass
Reason companioning the seraphim?

No, what I feel may pass all human love
Yet fall far short of what my love should be.
And yet I seem more warped in this than aught,
Myself stands out more hideously: of old
I could forget myself in friendship, fame,
Liberty, nay, in love of mightier souls;
But I begin to know what thing hate is—
To sicken and to quiver and grow white—
And I myself have furnished its first prey.
Hate of the weak and ever-wavering will,
The selfishness, the still-decaying frame . . .
But I must never grieve whom wing can waft
Far from such thoughts—as now. Andromeda!
And she is with me: years roll, I shall change,
But change can touch her not—so beautiful
With her fixed eyes, earnest and still, and hair
Lifted and spread by the salt-sweeping breeze,
And one red beam, all the storm leaves in heaven,

Resting upon her eyes and hair, such hair,
As she awaits the snake on the wet beach
By the dark rock and the white wave just breaking

At her feet; quite naked and alone; a thing
I doubt not, nor fear for, secure some god
To save will come in thunder from the stars.
Let it pass! Soul requires another change.
I will be gifted with a wondrous mind,
Yet sunk by error to men's sympathy,
And in the wane of life, yet only so
As to call up their fears; and there shall come
A time requiring youth's best energies;
And lo, I fling age, sorrow, sickness off,
And rise triumphant, triumph through decay.

And thus it is that I supply the chasm
'Twixt what I am and all I fain would be;
But then to know nothing, to hope for nothing.
To seize on life's dull joys from a strange fear
Lest, losing them, all's lost and naught remains!

There's some vile juggle with my reason here;
I feel I but explain to my own loss
These impulses: they live no less the same.
Liberty! what though I despair? my blood
Rose never at a slave's name proud as now.
Oh sympathies, obscured by sophistries!—
Why else have I sought refuge in myself,
But from the woes I saw and could not stay?
Love! is not this to love thee, my Pauline?
I cherish prejudice, lest I be left
Utterly loveless? witness my belief
In poets, though sad change has come there too;
No more I leave myself to follow them—
Unconsciously I measure me by them—
Let me forget it: and I cherish most
My love of England—how her name, a word
Of hers in a strange tongue makes my heart beat!

Pauline, could I but break the spell! Not
now—

All's fever—but when calm shall come again,
I am prepared: I have made life my own.
I would not be content with all the change
One frame should feel, but I have gone in thought

Through all conjuncture, I have lived all life
When it is most alive, where strangest fate
New-shapes it past surmise—the throes of men
Bit by some curse or in the grasps of doom
Half-visible and still-increasing round,
Or crowning their wide being's general aim.

These are wild fancies, but I feel, sweet friend,
As one breathing his weakness to the ear
Of pitying angel—dear as a winter flower,
A slight flower growing alone, and offering
Its frail cup of three leaves to the cold sun,
Yet joyous and confiding like the triumph
Of a child: and why am I not worthy thee?
I can live all the life of plants, and gaze
Drowsily on the bees that flit and play,
Or bare my breast for sunbeams which will kill,

Or open in the night of sounds, to look
For the dim stars; I can mount with the bird
Leaping airily his pyramid of leaves
And twisted boughs of some tall mountain tree.
Or rise cheerfully springing to the heavens;
Or like a fish breathe deep the morning air
In the misty sun-warm water; or with flower
And tree can smile in light at the sinking sun
Just as the storm comes, as a girl would look
On a departing lover—most serene.

Pauline, come with me, see how I could build
A home for us, out of the world, in thought!
I am uplifted: fly with me, Pauline!

Night, and one single ridge of narrow path
Between the sullen river and the woods
Waving and muttering, for the moonless night

Has shaped them into images of life,
Like the uprising of the giant-ghosts,
Looking on earth to know how their sons fare :
Thou art so close by me, the roughest swell
Of wind in the tree-tops hides not the panting
Of thy soft breasts. No, we will pass to morning —

Morning, the rocks and valleys and old woods.
How the sun brightens in the mist, and here,
Half in the air, like creatures of the place,
Trusting the element, living on high boughs
That swing in the wind — look at the silver spray

Flung from the foam-sheet of the cataract
Amid the broken rocks ! Shall we stay here
With the wild hawks ? No, ere the hot noon
come,

Dive we down — safe ! See this our new retreat
Walled in with a sloped mound of matted shrubs,

Dark, tangled, old and green, still sloping down
To a small pool whose waters lie asleep
Amid the trailing boughs turned water-plants :
And tall trees overarch to keep us in,
Breaking the sunbeams into emerald shafts,
And in the dreamy water one small group
Of two or three strange trees are got together
Wondering at all around, as strange beasts herd
Together far from their own land : all wildness,
No turf nor moss, for boughs and plants pave all,
And tongues of bank go shelving in the lymph,
Where the pale-throated snake reclines his head,
And old gray stones lie making eddies there,
The wild-mice cross them dry-shod. Deeper in !
Shut thy soft eyes — now look — still deeper in !
This is the very heart of the woods all round
Mountain-like heaped above us ; yet even here
One pond of water gleams ; far off the river Sweeps like a sea, barred out from land ; but
one —

One thin clear sheet has overleaped and wound
Into this silent depth, which gained, it lies
Still, as but let by suffrance ; the trees bend
O'er it as wild men watch a sleeping girl,
And through their roots long creeping plants out-stretch

Their twined hair, steeped and sparkling ; farther on,

Tall rushes and thick flag-knots have combined
To narrow it ; so, at length, a silver thread,
It winds, all noiselessly through the deep wood Till through a cleft-way, through the moss and stone,

It joins its parent-river with a shout.

Up for the glowing day, leave the old woods !
See, they part like a ruined arch : the sky !
Nothing but sky appears, so close the roots
And grass of the hill-top level with the air —
Blue sunny air, where a great cloud floats laden
With light, like a dead whale that white birds pick,

Floating away in the sun in some north sea.
Air, air, fresh life-blood, thin and searching air,
The clear, dear breath of God that loveth us,
Where small birds reel and winds take their delight !

Water is beautiful, but not like air :

See, where the solid azure waters lie
Made as of thickened air, and down below,
The fern-ranks like a forest spread themselves
As though each pore could feel the element ;
Where the quick glancing serpent winds his
way,

Float with me there, Pauline ! — but not like air.

Down the hill ! Stop — a clump of trees, see, set
On a heap of rock, which look o'er the far plain :
So, envious climbing shrubs would mount to rest
And peer from their spread boughs ; wide they wave, looking

At the muleteers who whistle on their way,
To the merry chime of morning bells, past all
The little smoking cots, mid fields and banks
And copses bright in the sun. My spirit wanders :

Hedgerows for me — those living hedgerows where

The bushes close and clasp above and keep Thought in — I am concentrated — I feel ;
But my soul saddens when it looks beyond :
I cannot be immortal, taste all joy.

O God, where do they tend — these struggling aims ?

What would I have ? What is this "sleep" which seems

To bound all ? can there be a "waking" point
Of crowning life ? The soul would never rule ;
It would be first in all things, it would have
Its utmost pleasure filled, but, that complete,
Commanding, for commanding, sickens it.
The last point I can trace is — rest beneath
Some better essence than itself, in weakness ;
This is "myself," not what I think should be :
And what is that I hunger for but God ?

My God, my God, let me for once look on thee
As though naught else existed, we alone !
And as creation crumbles, my soul's spark
Expands till I can say, — Even from myself
I need thee and I feel thee and I love thee.
I do not plead my rapture in thy works
For love of thee, nor that I feel as one
Who cannot die : but there is that in me
Which turns to thee, which loves or which should love.

Why have I girt myself with this hell-dress ?
Why have I labored to put out my life ?
Is it not in my nature to adore,
And e'en for all my reason do I not Feel him, and thank him, and pray to him —
now ?

Can I forego the trust that he loves me ?
Do I not feel a love which only ONE . . .
O thou pale form, so dimly seen, deep-eyed !
I have denied thee calmly — do I not
Pant when I read of thy consummate power,
And burn to see thy calm pure truths out-flash
The brightest gleams of earth's philosophy ?
Do I not shake to hear aught question thee ?
If I am erring save me, madden me,
Take from me powers and pleasures, let me die
Ages, so I see thee ! I am knit round
As with a charm by sin and lust and pride,

Yet though my wandering dreams have seen all shapes
 Of strange delight, oft have I stood by thee —
 Have I been keeping lonely watch with thee
 In the damp night by weeping Olivet,
 Or leaning on thy bosom, proudly less,
 Or dying with thee on the lonely cross,
 Or witnessing thine outburst from the tomb.

A mortal, sin's familiar friend, doth here
 Avow that he will give all earth's reward,
 But to believe and humbly teach the faith,
 In suffering and poverty and shame,
 Only believing he is not unloved.

And now, my Pauline, I am thine forever!
 I feel the spirit which has buoyed me up
 Desert me, and old shades are gathering fast;
 Yet while the last light waits, I would say much,
 This chiefly, it is gain that I have said
 Somewhat of love I ever felt for thee
 But seldom told; our hearts so beat together
 That speech seemed mockery; but when dark hours come,
 And joy departs, and thou, sweet, deem'st it strange

A sorrow moves me, thou canst not remove,
 Look on this lay I dedicate to thee,
 Which through thee I began, which thus I end,
 Collecting the last gleams to strive to tell
 How I am thine, and more than ever now
 That I sink fast: yet though I deeper sink,
 No less song proves one word has brought me
 bliss,

Another still may win bliss surely back.
 Thou knowest, dear, I could not think all calm,
 For fancies followed thought and bore me off,
 And left all indistinct; ere one was caught
 Another glanced; so, dazzled by my wealth,
 I knew not which to leave nor which to choose,
 For all so floated, naught was fixed and firm.
 And then thou said'st a perfect bard was one
 Who chronicled the stages of all life,
 And so thou bad'st me shadow this first stage.
 'Tis done, and even now I recognize
 The shift, the change from last to past — discern Faintly how life is truth and truth is good.
 And why thou must be mine is, that e'en now
 In the dim hush of night, that I have done,
 Despite the sad forebodings, love looks through —

Whispers, — E'en at the last I have her still,
 With her delicious eyes as clear as heaven
 When rain in a quick shower has beat down mist,
 And clouds float white above like broods of swans.

How the blood lies upon her cheek, outspread
 As thinned by kisses! only in her lips
 It wells and pulses like a living thing,
 And her neck looks like marble misted o'er
 With love-breath, — a Pauline from heights
 above,

Stooping beneath me, looking up — one look
 As I might kill her and be loved the more.

So, love me — me, Pauline, and naught but me,
 Never leave loving! Words are wild and weak,

Believe them not, Pauline! I stained myself
 But to behold thee purer by my side,
 To show thou art my breath, my life, a last
 Resource, an extreme want: never believe Aught better could so look on thee; nor seek Again the world of good thoughts left for mine!
 There were bright troops of undiscovered suns,
 Each equal in their radiant course; there were Clusters of far fair isles which ocean kept
 For his own joy, and his waves broke on them
 Without a choice; and there was a dim crowd
 Of visions, each a part of some grand whole;
 And one star left his peers and came with peace
 Upon a storm, and all eyes pined for him;
 And one isle harbored a sea-beaten ship,
 And the crew wandered in its bowers and plucked

Its fruits and gave up all their hopes of home;
 And one dream came to a pale poet's sleep,
 And he said, "I am singled out by God,
 No sin must touch me." Words are wild and weak,

But what they would express is, — Leave me
 not,

Still sit by me with beating breast and hair
 Loosened, be watching earnest by my side,
 Turning my books or kissing me when I
 Look up — like summer wind! Be still to me
 A help to music's mystery which mind fails
 To fathom, its solution, no mere clue!
 O reason's pedantry, life's rule prescribed!
 I hopeless, I the loveless, hope and love.
 Wiser and better, know me now, not when You loved me as I was. Smile not! I have Much yet to dawn on you, to gladden you.
 No more of the past! I'll look within no more,
 I have too trusted my own lawless wants,
 Too trusted my vain self, vague intuition —
 Draining soul's wine alone in the still night,
 And seeing how, as gathering films arose,
 As by an inspiration life seemed bare
 And griming in its vanity, while ends
 Foul to be dreamed of, smiled at me as fixed
 And fair, while others changed from fair to foul
 As a young witch turns an old hag at night.
 No more of this! We will go hand in hand,
 I with thee, even as a child — love's slave,
 Looking no farther than his liege commands.

And thou hast chosen where this life shall be:
 The land which gave me thee shall be our home,
 Where nature lies all wild amid her lakes
 And snow-swathed mountains and vast pines begirt

With ropes of snow — where nature lies all bare,
 Suffering none to view her but a race
 Or stunted or deformed, like the mute dwarfs
 Which wait upon a naked Indian queen.
 And there (the time being when the heavens are thick

With storm) I'll sit with thee while thou dost sing

Thy native songs, gay as a desert bird
 Which crieth as it flies for perfect joy,
 Or telling me old stories of dead knights;
 Or I will read great lays to thee — how she,
 The fair pale sister, went to her chill grave
 With power to love and to be loved and live:

Or we will go together, like twin gods
Of the infernal world, with scented lamp
Over the dead, to call and to awake,
Over the unshaped images which lie
Within my mind's cave : only leaving all,
That tells of the past doubt. So, when spring comes

With sunshine back again like an old smile,
And the fresh waters and awakened birds
And budding woods await us, I shall be Prepared, and we will question life once more,
Till its old sense shall come renewed by change,
Like some clear thought which harsh words
veiled before ;

Feeling God loves us, and that all which errs
Is but a dream which death will dissipate.
And then what need of longer exile ? Seek
My England, and, again there, calm approach
All I once fled from, calmly look on those
The works of my past weakness, as one views
Some scene where danger met him long before.
Ah that such pleasant life should be but dreamed !

But whate'er come of it, and though it fade,
And though ere the cold morning all be gone,
As it may be ; — though music wait to wile,
And strange eyes and bright wine lure, laugh
like sin

Which steals back softly on a soul half saved,
And I the first deny, deary, despise,
With this avowal, these intents so fair, —
Still be it all my own, this moment's pride !
No less I make an end in perfect joy.
E'en in my brightest time, a lurking fear
Possessed me : I well knew my weak resolves,
I felt the witchery that makes mind sleep
Over its treasure, as one half afraid
To make his riches definite : but now
These feelings shall not utterly be lost,
I shall not know again that nameless care
Lest, leaving all undone in youth, some new
And undreamed end reveal itself too late :
For this song shall remain to tell forever
That when I lost all hope of such a change,
Suddenly beauty rose on me again.
No less I make an end in perfect joy,
For I, who thus again was visited,
Shall doubt not many another bliss awaits,
And, though this weak soul sink and darkness
whelm,
Some little word shall light it, raise aloft,

To where I clearer see and better love,
As I again go o'er the tracts of thought
Like one who has a right, and I shall live
With poets, calmer, purer still each time,
And beauteous shapes will come for me to seize,
And unknown secrets will be trusted me
Which were denied the waverer once ; but now
I shall be priest and prophet as of old.

Sun-treader, I believe in God and truth
And love ; and as one just escaped from death
Would bind himself in bands of friends to feel
He lives indeed, so, I would lean on thee !
Thou must be ever with me, most in gloom
If such must come, but chiefly when I die,
For I seem, dying, as one going in the dark
To fight a giant : but live thou forever,
And be to all what thou hast been to me !
All in whom this wakes pleasant thoughts of me
Know my last state is happy, free from doubt
Or touch of fear. Love me and wish me well.

SONNET.

Mr. Gosse in his Personalia copies from the Monthly Repository the following sonnet. Three other pieces first printed in the same periodical will be found as afterward grouped in Bells and Pomegranates.

EYES, calm beside thee (Lady, couldst thou
know !)
May turn away thick with fast gathering
tears :

I glance not where all gaze : thrilling and low
Their passionate praises reach thee — my cheek wears

Alone no wonder when thou passest by ;
Thy tremulous lids, bent and suffused, reply
To the irrepressible homage which doth glow
On every lip but mine : if in thine ears
Their accents linger — and thou dost recall

Me as I stood, still, guarded, very pale,
Beside each votarist whose lighted brow
Wore worship like an aureole, "O'er them all
My beauty," thou wilt murmur, "did prevail

Save that one only : " — Lady, couldst thou
know !

PARACELSUS

INSCRIBED TO

AMÉDÉE DE RIPERT-MONCLAR

BY HIS AFFECTIONATE FRIEND

LONDON, March 15, 1835.

R. B.

THE dedication of Paracelsus was, in a degree, the payment of a debt, for it was the young count, four years older than Browning, and at the time a private agent in England between the Duchesse de Berri and her royalist friends in France, who suggested the subject to the poet. When first published Paracelsus had the following Preface: "I am anxious that the reader should not, at the very outset, — mistaking my performance for one of a class with which it has nothing in common, — judge it by principles on which it was never moulded, and subject it to a standard to which it was never meant to conform. I therefore anticipate his discovery, that it is an attempt, probably more novel than happy, to reverse the method usually adopted by writers whose aim it is to set forth any phenomena of the mind or the passions, by the operation of persons and events; and that, instead of having recourse to an external machinery of incidents to create and evolve the crisis I desire to produce, I have ventured to display somewhat minutely the mood itself in its rise and progress, and have suffered the agency by which it is influenced and determined, to be generally discernible in its effects alone, and subordinate throughout, if not altogether excluded: and this for a reason. I have endeavored to write a poem, not a drama: the canons of the drama are well known, and I cannot but think that, inasmuch as they have immediate regard to stage representation, the peculiar advantages they hold out are really such only so long as the purpose for which they were at first instituted is kept in view. I do not very well understand what is called a Dramatic Poem, wherein all those restrictions only submitted to on account of compensating good in the original scheme are scrupulously retained, as though for some special fitness in themselves — and all new facilities placed at an author's disposal by the vehicle he selects, as pertinaciously rejected. It is certain, however, that a work like mine depends on the intelligence and sympathy of the reader for its success, — indeed were my scenes stars, it must be his coöperating fancy which, supplying all chasms, shall collect the scattered lights into one constellation — a Lyre or a Crown. I trust for his indulgence towards a poem which had not been imagined six months ago; and that even should he think slightly of the present (an experiment I am in no case likely to repeat) he will not be prejudiced against other productions which may follow in a more popular, and perhaps less difficult form."

Mr. Browning, senior, paid for the publication of Paracelsus. In its final form, as here given, it is greatly changed, not in structure but in phrase. Mr. Cooke states that the change affects nearly a third of the lines.

I. PARACELSUS ASPIRES

SCENE, Würzburg: a garden in the environs. 1512.

FESTUS, PARACELSUS, MICHAL.

Paracelsus. Come close to me, dear friends; still closer; thus!

Close to the heart which, though long time roll by
Ere it again beat quicker, pressed to yours,
As now it beats — perchance a long, long time —
At least henceforth your memories shall make
Quiet and fragrant as befits their home.
Nor shall my memory want a home in yours —
Alas, that it requires too well such free
Forgiving love as shall embalm it there!

For if you would remember me aright,
As I was born to be, you must forget
All fitful, strange and moody waywardness
Which e'er confused my better spirit, to dwell
Only on moments such as these, dear friends!
— My heart no truer, but my words and ways
More true to it: as Michal, some months
hence,

Will say, "this autumn was a pleasant time,"
For some few sunny days; and overlook
Its bleak wind, hankering after pining leaves.
Autumn would fain be sunny; I would look
Liker my nature's truth: and both are frail,
And both beloved, for all our frailty.

Aureole!

Par. Drop by drop! she is weeping like a child!

Not so! I am content — more than content;
Nay, autumn wins you best by this its mute
Appeal to sympathy for its decay:
Look up, sweet Michal, nor esteem the less

Your stained and drooping vines their grapes
bow down,
Nor blame those creaking trees bent with their
fruit,

That apple-tree with a rare after-birth
Of peeping blooms sprinkled its wealth among !
Then for the winds — what wind that ever raved
Shall vex that ash which overlooks you both,
So proud it wears its berries ? Ah, at length,
The old smile meet for her, the lady of this
Sequestered nest ! — this kingdom, limited
Along by one old populous green wall
Tenanted by the ever-busy flies,
Gray crickets and shy lizards and quick spiders,
Each family of the silver-threaded moss —
Which, look through near, this way, and it appears

A stubble-field or a cane-brake, a marsh
Of bulrush whitening in the sun : laugh now !
Fancy the crickets, each one in his house,
Looking out, wondering at the world — or best,
Yon painted snail with his gay shell of dew,
Travelling to see the glossy balls high up
Hung by the caterpillar, like gold lamps.

Mich. In truth we have lived carelessly and
well.

Par. And shall, my perfect pair ! — each,
trust me, born

For the other ; nay, your very hair, when mixed,
Is of one hue. For where save in this nook
Shall you two walk, when I am far away,
And wish me prosperous fortune ? Stay : that plant

Shall never wave its tangles lightly and softly,
As a queen's languid and imperial arm
Which scatters crowns among her lovers, but you
Shall be reminded to predict to me
Some great success ! Ah see, the sun sinks broad Behind Saint Saviour's : wholly gone, at last !

Festus. Now, Aureole, stay those wandering eyes awhile !

You are ours to-night, at least ; and while you spoke

Of Michal and her tears, I thought that none
Could willing leave what he so seemed to love :
But that last look destroys my dream — that look

As if, where'er you gazed, there stood a star !
How far was Würzburg with its church and spire
And garden-walls and all things they contain,
From that look's far alighting ?

Par. I but spoke

And looked alike from simple joy to see
The beings I love best, shut in so well
From all rude chances like to be my lot,
That, when afar, my weary spirit, — disposed
To lose awhile its care in soothing thoughts
Of them, their pleasant features, looks and
words, —

Needs never hesitate, nor apprehend Encroaching trouble may have reached them
too,

Nor have recourse to fancy's busy aid
And fashion even a wish in their behalf
Beyond what they possess already here ;
But, unobstructed, may at once forget
Itself in them, assured how well they fare.
Beside, this Festus knows he holds me one

Whom quiet and its charms arrest in vain,
One scarce aware of all the joys I quit,
Too filled with airy hopes to make account
Of soft delights his own heart garners up :
Whereas behold how much our sense of all
That's beautiful proves alike ! When Festus learns

That every common pleasure of the world
Affects me as himself ; that I have just
As varied appetite for joy derived
From common things ; a stake in life, in short,
Like his ; a stake which rash pursuit of aims
That life affords not, would as soon destroy ; —
He may convince himself that, this in view,
I shall act well advised. And last, because,
Though heaven and earth and all things were
at stake,

Sweet Michal must not weep, our parting eve.

Fest. True : and the eve is deepening, and we sit

As little anxious to begin our talk
As though to-morrow I could hint of it
As we paced arm-in-arm the cheerful town
At sun-dawn ; or could whisper it by fits (Trithemius busied with his class the while)
In that dim chamber where the noon-streaks peer
Half-frightened by the awful tomes around ;
Or in some grassy lane unbosom all
From even-blush to midnight : but, to-morrow !
Have I full leave to tell my inmost mind ?
We have been brothers, and henceforth the
world

Will rise between us : — all my freest mind ?

'Tis the last night, dear Aureole !

Par. Oh, say on !

Devise some test of love, some arduous feat
To be performed for you : say on ! If night
Be spent the while, the better ! Recall how oft My wondrous plans and dreams and hopes and fears

Have — never wearied you, oh no ! — as I
Recall, and never vividly as now,
Your true affection, born when Einsiedeln
And its green hills were all the world to us ;
And still increasing to this night which ends
My further stay at Würzburg. Oh, one day
You shall be very proud ! Say on, dear friends !

Fest. In truth ? 'Tis for my proper peace, indeed,

Rather than yours ; for vain all projects seem
To stay your course : I said my latest hope
Is fading even now. A story tells
Of some far embassy despatched to win
The favor of an eastern king, and how
The gifts they offered proved but dazzling dust
Shed from the ore-beds native to his clime.
Just so, the value of repose and love,
I meant should tempt you, better far than I
You seem to comprehend ; and yet desist
No whit from projects where repose nor love
Has part.

Par. Once more ? Alas ! As I foretold.

Fest. A solitary brier the bank puts forth
To save our swan's nest floating out to sea.

Par. Dear Festus, hear me. What is it you wish ?

That I should lay aside my heart's pursuit,
Abandon the sole ends for which I live,

Reject God's great commission, and so die !
 You bid me listen for your true love's sake :
 Yet how has grown that love ? Even in a long
 And patient cherishing of the self-same spirit
 It now would quell ; as though a mother hoped
 To stay the lusty manhood of the child
 Once weak upon her knees. I was not born
 Informed and fearless from the first, but shrank
 From aught which marked me out apart from
 men :

I would have lived their life, and died their death,

Lost in their ranks, eluding destiny :
 But you first guided me through doubt and fear,
 Taught me to know mankind and know myself ;
 And now that I am strong and full of hope,
 That, from my soul, I can reject all aims
 Save those your earnest words made plain to me,
 Now that I touch the brink of my design,
 When I would have a triumph in their eyes,
 A glad cheer in their voices — Michal weeps,
 And Festus ponders gravely !

Fest. When you deign
 To hear my purpose . . .

Par. Hear it ? I can say
 Beforehand all this evening's conference !
 'Tis this way, Michal, that he uses : first,
 Or he declares, or I, the leading points
 Of our best scheme of life, what is man's end
 And what God's will ; no two faiths e'er agreed
 As his with mine. Next, each of us allows Faith should be acted on as best we may ;
 Accordingly, I venture to submit
 My plan, in lack of better, for pursuing
 The path which God's will seems to authorize.
 Well, he discerns much good in it, avows
 This motive worthy, that hope plausible,
 A danger here to be avoided, there
 An oversight to be repaired : in fine,
 Our two minds go together — all the good
 Approved by him, I gladly recognize,
 All he counts bad, I thankfully discard,
 And naught forbids my looking up at last
 For some stray comfort in his cautious brow.
 When lo ! I learn that, spite of all, there lurks
 Some innate and inexplicable germ
 Of failure in my scheme ; so that at last
 It all amounts to this — the sovereign proof
 That we devote ourselves to God, is seen
 In living just as though no God there were ;
 A life which, prompted by the sad and blind
 Folly of man, Festus abhors the most ;
 But which these tenets sanctify at once,
 Though to less subtle wits it seems the same,
 Consider it how they may.

Mich. Is it so, Festus ?
 He speaks so calmly and kindly : is it so ?

Par. Reject those glorious visions of God's love
 And man's design ; laugh loud that God should send

Vast longings to direct us ; say how soon
 Power satiates these, or lust, or gold ; I know
 The world's cry well, and how to answer it.
 But this ambiguous warfare . . .

Fest. . . . Wearies so
 That you will grant no last leave to your friend
 To urge it ? — for his sake, not yours ? I wish

To send my soul in good hopes after you ;
 Never to sorrow that uncertain words
 Erringly apprehended, a new creed
 Ill understood, begot rash trust in you,
 Had share in your undoing.

Par. Choose your side,
 Hold or renounce : but meanwhile blame me not
 Because I dare to act on your own views,
 Nor shrink when they point onward, nor espy
 A peril where they most ensure success.

Fest. Prove that to me — but that ! Prove you abide

Within their warrant, nor presumptuous boast
 God's labor laid on you ; prove, all you covet,
 A mortal may expect ; and, most of all,
 Prove the strange course you now affect, will lead

To its attainment — and I bid you speed,
 Nay, count the minutes till you venture forth !
 You smile ; but I had gathered from slow
 thought —

Much musing on the fortunes of my friend —
 Matter I deemed could not be urged in vain ;
 But it all leaves me at my need : in shreds
 And fragments I must venture what remains.

Mich. Ask at once, Festus, wherefore he should scorn. . . .

Fest. Stay, Michal : Aureole, I speak guardedly

And gravely, knowing well, whate'er your error,
 This is no ill-considered choice of yours,
 No sudden fancy of an ardent boy.
 Not from your own confiding words alone
 Am I aware your passionate heart long since
 Gave birth to, nourished and at length matures
 This scheme. I will not speak of Einsiedeln,
 Where I was born your elder by some years
 Only to watch you fully from the first :
 In all beside, our mutual tasks were fixed
 Even then — 't was mine to have you in my view
 As you had your own soul and those intents
 Which filled it when, to crown your dearest
 wish,

With a tumultuous heart, you left with me
 Our childhood's home to join the favored few Whom, here, Trithemius condescends to teach
 A portion of his lore : and not one youth
 Of those so favored, whom you now despise,
 Came earnest as you came, resolved, like you,
 To grasp all, and retain all, and deserve
 By patient toil a wide renown like his.
 Now, this new ardor which supplants the old
 I watched, too ; 't was significant and strange,
 In one matched to his soul's content at length
 With rivals in the search for wisdom's prize,
 To see the sudden pause, the total change ;
 From contest, the transition to repose —
 From pressing onward as his fellows pressed,
 To a blank idleness, yet most unlike
 The dull stagnation of a soul, content,
 Once foiled, to leave betimes a thriveless quest.
 That careless bearing, free from all pretence
 Even of contempt for what it ceased to seek —
 Smiling humility, praising much, yet waiving
 What it professed to praise — though not so well Maintained but that rare outbreaks, fierce and brief,

Revealed the hidden scorn, as quickly curbed.

That ostentatious show of past defeat,
That ready acquiescence in contempt,
I deemed no other than the letting go
His shivered sword, of one about to spring
Upon his foe's throat; but it was not thus:
Not that way looked your brooding purpose
then,

For after-signs disclosed, what you confirmed,
That you prepared to task to the uttermost
Your strength, in furtherance of a certain aim
Which — while it bore the name your rivals gave
Their own most puny efforts — was so vast
In scope that it included their best flights,
Combined them, and desired to gain one prize
In place of many, — the secret of the world,
Of man, and man's true purpose, path and fate.
— That you, not nursing as a mere vague dream
This purpose, with the sages of the past,
Have struck upon a way to this, if all
You trust be true, which following, heart and
soul,

You, if a man may, dare aspire to know:
And that this aim shall differ from a host
Of aims alike in character and kind,
Mostly in this, — that in itself alone
Shall its reward be, not an alien end
Blending therewith; no hope nor fear nor joy
Nor woe, to elsewhere move you, but this pure
Devotion to sustain you or betray:
Thus you aspire.

Par. You shall not state it thus:
I should not differ from the dreamy crew
You speak of. I profess no other share
In the selection of my lot, than this
My ready answer to the will of God
Who summons me to be his organ. All Whose innate strength supports them shall succeed

No better than the sages.

Fest. Such the aim, then,
God sets before you; and 'tis doubtless need
That he appoint no less the way of praise
Than the desire to praise; for, though I hold,
With you, the setting forth such praise to be
The natural end and service of a man,
And hold such praise is best attained when man
Attains the general welfare of his kind —
Yet this, the end, is not the instrument.
Presume not to serve God apart from such Appointed channel as he wills shall gather Imperfect tributes, for that sole obedience
Valued perchance! He seeks not that his altars
Blaze, careless how, so that they do but blaze.
Suppose this, then; that God selected you
To know (heed well your answers, for my faith Shall meet implicitly what they affirm),
I cannot think you dare annex to such Selection aught beyond a steadfast will,
An intense hope; nor let your gifts create
Scorn or neglect of ordinary means
Conducive to success, make destiny Dispense with man's endeavor. Now, dare you search

Your inmost heart, and candidly avow
Whether you have not rather wild desire
For this distinction than security
Of its existence? whether you discern
The path to the fulfilment of your purpose

Clear as that purpose — and again, that purpose
Clear as your yearning to be singled out
For its pursuer. Dare you answer this?

Par. (after a pause). No, I have naught to fear! Who will may know
The secret'st workings of my soul. What though

It be so? — if indeed the strong desire
Eclipse the aim in me? — if splendor break
Upon the outset of my path alone,
And duskest shade succeed? What fairer seal
Shall I require to my authentic mission
Than this fierce energy? — this instinct striving Because its nature is to strive? — enticed
By the security of no broad course,
Without success forever in its eyes!
How know I else such glorious fate my own,
But in the restless irresistible force
That works within me? Is it for human will
To institute such impulses? — still less,
To disregard their promptings! What should I
Do, kept among you all; your loves, your cares,
Your life — all to be mine? Be sure that God Ne'er dooms to waste the strength he deigns impart!

Ask the geier-eagle why she stoops at once
Into the vast and unexplored abyss,
What full-grown power informs her from the
first,

Why she not marvels, strenuously beating
The silent boundless regions of the sky!
Be sure they sleep not whom God needs! Nor fear

Their holding light his charge, when every hour
That finds that charge delayed, is a new death.
This for the faith in which I trust; and hence
I can abjure so well the idle arts
These pedants strive to learn and teach; Black Arts,

Great Works, the Secret and Sublime, forsooth —
Let others prize: too intimate a tie
Connects me with our God! A sullen fiend
To do my bidding, fallen and hateful sprites
To help me — what are these, at best, beside
God helping, God directing everywhere,
So that the earth shall yield her secrets up,
And every object there be charged to strike,
Teach, gratify her master God appoints?
And I am young, my Festus, happy and free!
I can devote myself; I have a life
To give; I, singled out for this, the One!
Think, think! the wide East, where all Wisdom sprung;

The bright South, where she dwelt; the hopeful
North,

All are passed o'er — it lights on me! 'Tis time
New hopes should animate the world, new light
Should dawn from new revealings to a race Weighed down so long, forgotten so long; thus shall

The heaven reserved for us at last receive
Creatures whom no unwonted splendors blind,
But ardent to confront the unclouded blaze,
Whose beams not seldom blessed their pilgrimage,

Not seldom glorified their life below.

Fest. My words have their old fate and make faint stand

Against your glowing periods. Call this, truth —
 Why not pursue it in a fast retreat,
 Some one of Learning's many palaces,
 After approved example? — seeking there
 Calm converse with the great dead, soul to soul,
 Who laid up treasure with the like intent
 — So lift yourself into their airy place,
 And fill out full their unfulfilled careers,
 Unravelling the knots their baffled skill
 Pronounced inextricable, true! — but left
 Far less confused. A fresh eye, a fresh hand,
 Might do much at their vigor's waning-point;
 Succeeding with new-breathed new-hearted
 force,

As at old games the runner snatched the torch
 From runner still: this way success might be.
 But you have coupled with your enterprise
 An arbitrary self-repugnant scheme
 Of seeking it in strange and untried paths.
 What books are in the desert? Writes the sea
 The secret of her yearning in vast caves
 Where yours will fall the first of human feet?
 Has wisdom sat there and recorded aught
 You press to read? Why turn aside from her
 To visit, where her vesture never glanced,
 Now — solitudes consigned to barrenness
 By God's decree, which who shall dare impugn?
 Now — ruins where she paused but would not stay,

Old ravaged cities that, renouncing her,
 She called an endless curse on, so it came:
 Or worst of all, now — men you visit, men,
 Ignoblest troops who never heard her voice
 Or hate it, men without one gift from Rome
 Or Athens, — these shall Aureole's teachers be!
 Rejecting past example, practice, precept.
 Aidless 'mid these he thinks to stand alone:
 Thick like a glory round the Stagirite
 Your rivals throng, the sages: here stand you!
 Whatever you may protest, knowledge is not
 Paramount in your love; or for her sake
 You would collect all help from every source —
 Rival, assistant, friend, foe, all would merge
 In the broad class of those who showed her haunts,
 And those who showed them not.

Par. What shall I say?
 Festus, from childhood I have been possessed
 By a fire — by a true fire, or faint or fierce.
 As from without some master, so it seemed,
 Repressed or urged its current: this but ill
 Expresses what I would convey: but rather
 I will believe an angel ruled me thus,
 Than that my soul's own workings, own high nature,

So became manifest. I knew not then
 What whispered in the evening, and spoke out
 At midnight. If some mortal, born too soon,
 Were laid away in some great trance — the ages
 Coming and going all the while — till dawned
 His true time's advent; and could then record
 The words they spoke who kept watch by his bed, —

Then I might tell more of the breath so light
 Upon my eyelids, and the fingers light
 Among my hair. Youth is confused; yet never
 So dull was I but, when that spirit passed,
 I turned to him, scarce consciously, as turns

A water-snake when fairies cross his sleep.
 And having this within me and about me
 While Einsiedeln, its mountains, lakes and woods

Confined me — what oppressive joy was mine
 When life grew plain, and I first viewed the thronged,

The everlasting concourse of mankind!
 Believe that ere I joined them, ere I knew
 The purpose of the pageant, or the place
 Consigned me in its ranks — while, just awake,
 Wonder was freshest and delight most pure —
 'T was then that least supportable appeared
 A station with the brightest of the crowd,
 A portion with the proudest of them all.
 And from the tumult in my breast, this only
 Could I collect, that I must thenceforth die
 Or elevate myself far, far above
 The gorgeous spectacle. I seemed to long
 At once to trample on, yet save mankind,
 To make some unexampled sacrifice
 In their behalf, to wring some wondrous good
 From heaven or earth for them, to perish, winning

Eternal weal in the act: as who should dare
 Pluck out the angry thunder from its cloud.
 That, all its gathered flame discharged on him,
 No storm might threaten summer's azure sleep:
 Yet never to be mixed with men so much
 As to have part even in my own work, share
 In my own largess. Once the feat achieved,
 I would withdraw from their officious praise,
 Would gently put aside their profuse thanks.
 Like some knight traversing a wilderness,
 Who, on his way, may chance to free a tribe
 Of desert-people from their dragon-foe;
 When all the swarthy race press round to kiss
 His feet, and choose him for their king, and yield
 Their poor tents, pitched among the sand-hills, for

His realm: and he points, smiling, to his scarf
 Heavy with riveled gold, his burgenet
 Gay set with twinkling stones — and to the East,
 Where these must be displayed!

Fest. Good: let us hear
 No more about your nature, "which first shrank
 From all that marked you out apart from men!"

Par. I touch on that; these words but analyze
 The first mad impulse: 't was as brief as fond,
 For as I gazed again upon the show,
 I soon distinguished here and there a shape
 Palm-wreathed and radiant, forehead and full eye.

Well pleased was I their state should thus at once Interpret my own thoughts: — "Behold the clue
 To all," I rashly said, "and what I pine
 To do, these have accomplished: we are peers.
 They know and therefore rule: I, too, will
 know!"

You were beside me, Festus, as you say;
 You saw me plunge in their pursuits whom fame
 Is lavish to attest the lords of mind,
 Not pausing to make sure the prize in view
 Would satiate my cravings when obtained,
 But since they strove I strove. Then came a slow

And strangling failure. We aspired alike,
 Yet not the meanest plodder, Tritheim counts

A marvel, but was all-sufficient, strong
Or staggered only at his own vast wits ;
While I was restless, nothing satisfied,
Distrustful, most perplexed. I would slur over
That struggle ; suffice it, that I loathed myself
As weak compared with them, yet felt somehow
A mighty power was brooding, taking shape
Within me ; and this lasted till one night
When, as I sat revolving it and more,
A still voice from without said — " Seest thou
not,
Desponding child, whence spring defeat and
loss ?
Even from thy strength. Consider : hast thou gazed

Presumptuously on wisdom's countenance,
No veil between ; and can thy faltering hands,
Unguided by the brain the sight absorbs,
Pursue their task as earnest blinkers do
Whom radiance ne'er distracted ? Live their life
If thou wouldst share their fortune, choose their
eyes

Unfed by splendor. Let each task present
Its petty good to thee. Waste not thy gifts
In profitless waiting for the gods' descent,
But have some idol of thine own to dress
With their array. Know, not for knowing's sake,
But to become a star to men forever ;
Know, for the gain it gets, the praise it brings,
The wonder it inspires, the love it breeds :
Look one step onward, and secure that step ! "
And I smiled as one never smiles but once,
Then first discovering my own aim's extent,
Which sought to comprehend the works of God,
And God himself, and all God's intercourse
With the human mind ; I understood, no less,
My fellows' studies, whose true worth I saw,
But smiled not, well aware who stood by me.
And softer came the voice — " There is a way :
'Tis hard for flesh to tread therein, imbued
With frailty — hopeless, if indulgence first
Have ripened inborn germs of sin to strength :
Wilt thou adventure for my sake and man's,
Apart from all reward ? " And last it breathed —
" Be happy, my good soldier ; I am by thee,
Be sure, even to the end ! " — I answered not,
Knowing him. As he spoke, I was endued
With comprehension and a steadfast will ;
And when he ceased, my brow was sealed his
own.

If there took place no special change in me,
How comes it all things wore a different hue
Thenceforward ? — pregnant with vast consequence,
Teeming with grand result, loaded with fate ?
So that when, quailing at the mighty range
Of secret truths which yearn for birth, I haste
To contemplate undazzled some one truth,
Its bearings and effects alone — at once
What was a speck expands into a star,
Asking a life to pass exploring thus,
Till I near craze. I go to prove my soul !
I see my way as birds their trackless way.
I shall arrive ! what time, what circuit first,
I ask not : but unless God send his hail
Or blinding fireballs, sleet or stifling snow,
In some time, his good time, I shall arrive :
He guides me and the bird. In his good time !

Mich. Vex him no further, Festus ; it is so !
Fest. Just thus you help me ever. This would hold

Were it the trackless air, and not a path
Inviting you, distinct with footprints yet
Of many a mighty marcher gone that way.
You may have purer views than theirs, perhaps,
But they were famous in their day — the proofs
Remain. At least accept the light they lend.

Par. Their light ! the sum of all is briefly
this :

They labored and grew famous, and the fruits
Are best seen in a dark and groaning earth
Given over to a blind and endless strife
With evils, what of all their lore abates ?
No ; I reject and spurn them utterly
And all they teach. Shall I still sit beside Their dry wells, with a white lip and filmed eye,
While in the distance heaven is blue above
Mountains where sleep the unsunned tarns ?

Fest. And yet
As strong delusions have prevailed ere now.

Men have set out as gallantly to seek
Their ruin. I have heard of such : yourself
Avow all hitherto have failed and fallen.

Mich. Nay, Festus, when but as the pilgrims faint

Through the drear way, do you expect to see
Their city dawn amid the clouds afar ?

Par. Ay, sounds it not like some old well-known tale ?

For me, I estimate their works and them
So rightly, that at times I almost dream
I too have spent a life the sages' way,
And tread once more familiar paths. Perchance
I perished in an arrogant self-reliance
Ages ago ; and in that act, a prayer
For one more chance went up so earnest, so
Instinct with better light let in by death,
That life was blotted out — not so completely
But scattered wrecks enough of it remain,
Dim memories, as now, when once more seems
The goal in sight again. All which, indeed,
Is foolish, and only means — the flesh I wear,
The earth I tread, are not more clear to me
Than my belief, explained to you or no.

Fest. And who am I, to challenge and dispute

That clear belief ? I will divest all fear.

Mich. Then Aureole is God's commissary !
he shall

Be great and grand — and all for us !

Par. No, sweet !
Not great and grand. If I can serve mankind
'T is well ; but there our intercourse must end :
I never will be served by those I serve.

Fest. Look well to this ; here is a plague-spot, here,

Disguise it how you may ! 'T is true, you utter
This scorn while by our side and loving us ;

'T is but a spot as yet : but it will break
Into a hideous blotch if overlooked.

How can that course be safe which from the first
Produces carelessness to human love ?

It seems you have abjured the helps which men
Who overpass their kind, as you would do,
Have humbly sought ; I dare not thoroughly probe

This matter, lest I learn too much. Let be
That popular praise would little instigate
Your efforts, nor particular approval
Reward you; put reward aside; alone
You shall go forth upon your arduous task,
None shall assist you, none partake your toil,
None share your triumph: still you must retain
Some one to cast your glory on, to share
Your rapture with. Were I elect like you,
I would encircle me with love, and raise
A rampart of my fellows; it should seem Impossible for me to fail, so watched
By gentle friends who made my cause their
own.

They should ward off fate's envy — the great
gift,

Extravagant when claimed by me alone,
Being so a gift to them as well as me.
If danger daunted me or ease seduced,
How calmly their sad eyes should gaze reproach!

Mich. O Aureole, can I sing when all alone,
Without first calling, in my fancy, both
To listen by my side — even I! And you?
Do you not feel this? Say that you feel this!

Par. I feel 't is pleasant that my aims, at length
Allowed their weight, should be supposed to need

A further strengthening in these goodly helps!
My course allures for its own sake, its sole
Intrinsic worth; and ne'er shall boat of mine
Adventure forth for gold and apes at once.

Your sages say, "if human, therefore weak;"
If weak, more need to give myself entire
To my pursuit; and by its side, all else . . .
No matter! I deny myself but little

In waiving all assistance save its own.
Would there were some real sacrifice to make!
Your friends the sages threw their joys away,
While I must be content with keeping mine.

Fest. But do not cut yourself from human weal!

You cannot thrive — a man that dares effect
To spend his life in service to his kind
For no reward of theirs, unbound to them
By any tie; nor do so, Aureole! No —
There are strange punishments for such. Give up

(Although no visible good flow thence) some part

Of the glory to another; hiding thus,
Even from yourself, that all is for yourself.
Say, say almost to God — "I have done all
For her, not for myself!"

Par. And who but lately
Was to rejoice in my success like you?
Whom should I love but both of you?

Fest. I know not:
But know this, you, that 't is no will of mine
You should abjure the lofty claims you make;
And this the cause — I can no longer seek
To overlook the truth, that there would be
A monstrous spectacle upon the earth,
Beneath the pleasant sun, among the trees:
— A being knowing not what love is. Hear
me!
You are endowed with faculties which bear

Annexed to them as 't were a dispensation
To summon meaner spirits to do their will
And gather round them at their need; inspiring
Such with a love themselves can never feel.
Passionless 'mid their passionate votaries.

I know not if you joy in this or no,
Or ever dream that common men can live
On objects you prize lightly, but which make Their heart's sole treasure: the affections seem Beauteous at most to you, which we must taste
Or die: and this strange quality accords,
I know not how, with you; sits well upon
That luminous brow, though in another it scowls

An eating brand, a shame. I dare not judge
you.

The rules of right and wrong thus set aside,
There's no alternative — I own you one
Of higher order, under other laws
Than bind us; therefore, curb not one bold glance!

'T is best aspire. Once mingled with us all . . .
Mich. Stay with us, Aureole! cast those hopes away,

And stay with us! An angel warns me, too,
Man should be humble; you are very proud:
And God, dethroned, has doleful plagues for such!

— Warns me to have in dread no quick repulse.
No slow defeat, but a complete success:
You will find all you seek, and perish so!

Par. (after a pause). Are these the barren first-fruits of my quest?

Is love like this the natural lot of all?
How many years of pain might one such hour
O'erbalance? Dearest Michal, dearest Festus,
What shall I say, if not that I desire

To justify your love; and will, dear friends,
In swerving nothing from my first resolves.
See, the great moon! and ere the mottled owls
Were wide awake, I was to go. It seems

You acquiesce at last in all save this —
If I am like to compass what I seek
By the untried career I choose; and then,
If that career, making but small account
Of much of life's delight, will yet retain Sufficient to sustain my soul: for thus
I understand these fond fears just expressed.

And first; the lore you praise and I neglect,
The labors and the precepts of old time,
I have not lightly disesteemed. But, friends,
Truth is within ourselves; it takes no rise
From outward things, whate'er you may believe.

There is an inmost centre in us all,
Where truth abides in fulness; and around,
Wall upon wall, the gross flesh hems it in,
This perfect, clear perception — which is truth.
A baffling and perverting carnal mesh
Binds it, and makes all error: and, to know,
Rather consists in opening out a way
Whence the imprisoned splendor may escape,
Than in effecting entry for a light
Supposed to be without. Watch narrowly
The demonstration of a truth, its birth,
And you trace back the effluence to its spring
And source within us; where broods radiance vast,

To be elicited ray by ray, as chance
Shall favor : chance — for hitherto, your sage Even as he knows not how those beams are born,

As little knows he what unlocks their fount :
And men have oft grown old among their books
To die case-hardened in their ignorance,
Whose careless youth had promised what long years

Of unremitted labor ne'er performed :
While, contrary, it has chanced some idle day,
To autumn loiterers just as fancy-free
As the midges in the sun, gives birth at last
To truth — produced mysteriously as cape
Of cloud grown out of the invisible air.
Hence, may not truth be lodged alike in all,
The lowest as the highest ? some slight film
The interposing bar which binds a soul
And makes the idiot, just as makes the sage
Some film removed, the happy outlet whence Truth issues proudly ? See this soul of ours !
How it strives weakly in the child, is loosed
In manhood, clogged by sickness, back compelled

By age and waste, set free at last by death :
Why is it, flesh enthalls it or enthrones ?
What is this flesh we have to penetrate ?
Oh, not alone when life flows still, do truth
And power emerge, but also when strange
chance

Ruffles its current ; in unused conjuncture,
When sickness breaks the body — hunger,
watching,

Excess or languor — oftenest death's approach,
Peril, deep joy or woe. One man shall crawl
Through life surrounded with all stirring things, Unmoved ; and he goes mad : and from the wreck

Of what he was, by his wild talk alone,
You first collect how great a spirit he hid.
Therefore, set free the soul alike in all,
Discovering the true laws by which the flesh
Accloys the spirit ! We may not be doomed
To cope with seraphs, but at least the rest
Shall cope with us. Make no more giants, God,
But elevate the race at once ! We ask
To put forth just our strength, our human strength,

All starting fairly, all equipped alike,
Gifted alike, all eagle-eyed, true-hearted —
See if we cannot beat thine angels yet !
Such is my task. I go to gather this
The sacred knowledge, here and there dispersed
About the world, long lost or never found.
And why should I be sad or lorn of hope ?
Why ever make man's good distinct from God's,
Or, finding they are one, why dare mistrust ?
Who shall succeed if not one pledged like me ?
Mine is no mad attempt to build a world
Apart from his, like those who set themselves
To find the nature of the spirit they bore,
And, taught betimes that all their gorgeous dreams

Were only born to vanish in this life,
Refused to fit them to its narrow sphere,
But chose to figure forth another world
And other frames meet for their vast desires, —
And all a dream ! Thus was life scorned ; but life

Shall yet be crowned : twine amaranth ! I am priest !

And all for yielding with a lively spirit
A poor existence, parting with a youth
Like those who squander every energy
Convertible to good, on painted toys, Breath-bubbles, gilded dust ! And though I
spurn

All adventitious aims, from empty praise
To love's award, yet whoso deems such helps
Important, and concerns himself for me,
May know even these will follow with the rest —
As in the steady rolling Mayne, asleep
Yonder, is mixed its mass of schistous ore.
My own affections, laid to rest awhile,
Will waken purified, subdued alone
By all I have achieved. Till then — till then . . .
Ah, the time-wiling loitering of a page
Through bower and over lawn, till eve shall bring

The stately lady's presence whom he loves —
The broken sleep of the fisher whose rough coat
Enwraps the queenly pearl — these are faint types !

See, see, they look on me : I triumph now !
But one thing, Festus, Michal ! I have told
All I shall e'er disclose to mortal : say —
Do you believe I shall accomplish this ?

Fest. I do believe !

Mich. I ever did believe !

Par. Those words shall never fade from out my brain !

This earnest of the end shall never fade !
Are there not, Festus, are there not, dear
Michal,

Two points in the adventure of the diver,
One — when, a beggar, he prepares to plunge,
One — when, a prince, he rises with his pearl ?
Festus, I plunge !

Fest. We wait you when you rise !

II. PARACELSUS ATTAINS

SCENE, Constantinople : the house of a Greek conjurer.
1521.

PARACELSUS.

Over the waters in the vaporous West
The sun goes down as in a sphere of gold
Behind the arm of the city, which between,
With all that length of domes and minarets,
Athwart the splendor, black and crooked runs
Like a Turk verse along a scimitar.
There lie, sullen memorial, and no more
Possess my aching sight ! 'Tis done at last.
Strange — and the juggles of a sallow cheat
Have won me to this act ! 'Tis as yon cloud
Should voyage unwrecked o'er many a mountain-top

And break upon a molehill. I have dared
Come to a pause with knowledge ; scan for once
The heights already reached, without regard
To the extent above ; fairly compute
All I have clearly gained ; for once excluding
A brilliant future to supply and perfect
All half-gains and conjectures and crude hopes :
And all because a fortune-teller wills

His credulous seekers should inscribe thus much

Their previous life's attainment, in his roll,
Before his promised secret, as he vaunts,
Make up the sum: and here, amid the scrawled
Uncouth recordings of the dupes of this
Old arch-genethliac, lie my life's results!

A few blurred characters suffice to note
A stranger wandered long through many lands
And reaped the fruit he coveted in a few
Discoveries, as appended here and there,
The fragmentary produce of much toil,
In a dim heap, fact and surmise together
Confusedly massed as when acquired; he was
Intent on gain to come too much to stay
And scrutinize the little gained: the whole
Slit in the blank space 'twixt an idiot's gibber
And a mad lover's ditty — there it lies.

And yet those blottings chronicle a life —
A whole life, and my life! Nothing to do,
No problem for the fancy, but a life
Spent and decided, wasted past retrieve
Or worthy beyond peer. Stay, what does this Remembrancer set down concerning "life"?
"Time fleets, youth fades, life is an empty
dream,"

It is the echo of time; and he whose heart
Beat first beneath a human heart, whose speech
Was copied from a human tongue, can never Recall when he was living yet knew not this.
Nevertheless long seasons pass o'er him
Till some one hour's experience shows what nothing,
It seemed, could clearer show; and ever after,
An altered brow and eye and gait and speech
Attest that now he knows the adage true,
"Time fleets, youth fades, life is an empty
dream."

Ay, my brave chronicler, and this same hour
As well as any: now, let my time be!

Now! I can go no farther; well or ill,
'Tis done. I must desist and take my chance.
I cannot keep on the stretch: 'tis no back-shrinking —

For let but some assurance beam, some close
To my toil grow visible, and I proceed
At any price, though closing it, I die.
Else, here I pause. The old Greek's prophecy
Is like to turn out true: "I shall not quit
His chamber till I know what I desire!"
Was it the light wind sang it o'er the sea?

An end, a rest! strange how the notion, once
Encountered, gathers strength by moments!
Rest!

Where has it kept so long? this throbbing brow
To cease, this beating heart to cease, all cruel
And gnawing thoughts to cease! To dare let down

My strung, so high-strung brain, to dare unnerve
My harassed o'ertasked frame, to know my
place,

My portion, my reward, even my failure,
Assigned, made sure forever! To lose myself

Among the common creatures of the world,
To draw some gain from having been a man,
Neither to hope nor fear, to live at length!
Even in failure, rest! But rest in truth
And power and recompense . . . I hoped that once!

What, sunk insensibly so deep? Has all
Been undergone for this? This the request
My labor qualified me to present
With no fear of refusal? Had I gone
Slightly through my task, and so judged fit
To moderate my hopes; nay, were it now
My sole concern to exculpate myself,
End things or mend them, — why, I could not choose

A humbler mood to wait for the event!
No, no, there needs not this; no, after all,
At worst I have performed my share of the task:

The rest is God's concern; mine, merely this,
To know that I have obstinately held
By my own work. The mortal whose brave foot
Has trod, unscathed, the temple-court so far
That he deserves at length the shrine of shrines,
Must let no sneering of the demons' eyes,
Whom he could pass unquailing, fasten now
Upon him, fairly past their power; no, no —
He must not stagger, faint, fall down at last,
Having a charm to baffle them; behold,
He bares his front: a mortal ventures thus
Serene amid the echoes, beams and glooms!
If he be priest henceforth, if he wake up
The god of the place to ban and blast him there,
Both well! What's failure or success to me?
I have subdued my life to the one purpose
Whereto I ordained it; there alone I spy,
No doubt, that way I may be satisfied.

Yes, well have I subdued my life! beyond
The obligation of my strictest vow,
The contemplation of my wildest bond,
Which gave my nature freely up, in truth,
But in its actual state, consenting fully
All passionate impulses its soil was formed
To rear, should wither; but foreseeing not
The tract, doomed to perpetual barrenness,
Would seem one day, remembered as it was,
Beside the parched sand-waste which now it is,
Already strewn with faint blooms, viewless then,
I ne'er engaged to root up loves so frail
I felt them not; yet now, 'tis very plain
Some soft spots had their birth in me at first,
If not love, say, like love: there was a time
When yet this wolfish hunger after knowledge
Set not remorselessly love's claims aside.
This heart was human once, or why recall Einsiedeln, now, and Würzburg which the Mayne

Forsakes her course to fold as with an arm?

And Festus — my poor Festus, with his praise
And counsel and grave fears — where is he now
With the sweet maiden, long ago his bride?
I surely loved them — that last night, at least.
When we . . . gone! gone! the better. I am saved

The sad review of an ambitious youth

Choked by vile lusts, unnoticed in their birth,
 But let grow up and wind around a will Till action was destroyed. No, I have gone
 Purging my path successively of aught
 Wearing the distinct likeness of such lusts.
 I have made life consist of one idea :
 Ere that was master, up till that was born,
 I bear a memory of a pleasant life
 Whose small events I treasure ; till one morn
 I ran o'er the seven little grassy fields,
 Startling the flocks of nameless birds, to tell
 Poor Festus, leaping all the while for joy,
 To leave all trouble for my future plans,
 Since I had just determined to become
 The greatest and most glorious man on earth.
 And since that morn all life has been forgotten :
 All is one day, one only step between
 The outset and the end : one tyrant all-
 Absorbing aim fills up the interspace,
 One vast unbroken chain of thought, kept up
 Through a career apparently adverse
 To its existence : life, death, light and shadow,
 The shows of the world, were bare receptacles
 Or indices of truth to be wrung thence,
 Not ministers of sorrow or delight :
 A wondrous natural robe in which she went.
 For some one truth would dimly beacon me
 From mountains rough with pines, and flit and wink

O'er dazzling wastes of frozen snow, and tremble
 Into assured light in some branching mine
 Where ripens, swathed in fire, the liquid gold —
 And all the beauty, all the wonder fell
 On either side the truth, as its mere robe ;
 I see the robe now — then I saw the form.
 So far, then, I have voyaged with success,
 So much is good, then, in this working sea
 Which parts me from that happy strip of land :
 But o'er that happy strip a sun shone, too !
 And fainter gleams it as the waves grow rough,
 And still more faint as the sea widens ; last
 I sicken on a dead gulf streaked with light
 From its own putrefying depths alone.
 Then, God was pledged to take me by the hand ;
 Now, any miserable juggle can bid
 My pride depart. All is alike at length :
 God may take pleasure in confounding pride
 By hiding secrets with the scorned and base —
 I am here, in short : so little have I paused Throughout ! I never glanced behind to know
 If I had kept my primal light from wane,
 And thus insensibly am — what I am !

Oh, bitter ; very bitter !

And more bitter,
 To fear a deeper curse, an inner ruin,
 Plague beneath plague, the last turning the first
 To light beside its darkness. Let me weep
 My youth and its brave hopes, all dead and gone,
 In tears which burn ! Would I were sure to win
 Some startling secret in their stead, a tincture
 Of force to flush old age with youth, or breed
 Gold, or imprison moonbeams till they change
 To opal shafts ! — only that, hurling it
 Indignant back, I might convince myself
 My aims remained supreme and pure as ever !
 Even now, why not desire, for mankind's sake,
 That if I fail, some fault may be the cause,

That, though I sink, another may succeed ?
 O God, the despicable heart of us !
 Shut out this hideous mockery from my heart !

'T was politic in you, Aureole, to reject
 Single rewards, and ask them in the lump ;
 At all events, once launched, to hold straight on :
 For now 't is all or nothing. Mighty profit
 Your gains will bring if they stop short of such Full consummation ! As a man, you had
 A certain share of strength ; and that is gone
 Already in the getting these you boast.
 Do not they seem to laugh, as who should say —
 " Great master, we are here indeed, dragged forth

To light ; this hast thou done : be glad ! Now, seek
 The strength to use which thou hast spent in getting ! "

And yet 't is much, surely 't is very much,
 Thus to have emptied youth of all its gifts,
 To feed a fire meant to hold out till morn
 Arrived with inexhaustible light ; and lo,
 I have heaped up my last, and day dawns not !
 And I am left with gray hair, faded hands,
 And furrowed brow. Ha, have I, after all,
 Mistaken the wild nursing of my breast ?
 Knowledge it seemed, and power, and recompense !

Was she who glided through my room of nights,
 Who laid my head on her soft knees and smoothed
 The damp locks, — whose sly soothings just began
 When my sick spirit craved repose awhile —
 God ! was I fighting sleep off for death's sake ?

God ! Thou art mind ! Unto the master-mind
 Mind should be precious. Spare my mind alone !
 All else I will endure ; if, as I stand
 Here, with my gains, thy thunder smite me
 down,

I bow me ; 't is thy will, thy righteous will ;
 I o'erpass life's restrictions, and I die ;
 And if no trace of my career remain
 Save a thin corpse at pleasure of the wind
 In these bright chambers level with the air,
 See thou to it ! But if my spirit fail,
 My once proud spirit forsake me at the last,
 Hast thou done well by me ? So do not thou !
 Crush not my mind, dear God, though I be crushed !

Hold me before the frequency of thy seraphs
 And say, — " I crushed him, lest he should disturb

My law. Men must not know their strength :
 behold,
 Weak and alone, how he had raised himself ! "

But if delusions trouble me, and thou,
 Not seldom felt with rapture in thy help
 Throughout my toils and wanderings, dost intend

To work man's welfare through my weak endeavor,

To crown my mortal forehead with a beam
 From thine own blinding crown, to smile, and guide

This puny hand and let the work so wrought
Be styled my work, — hear me! I covet not
An influx of new power, an angel's soul:
It were no marvel then — but I have reached
Thus far, a man; let me conclude, a man!
Give but one hour of my first energy,
Of that invincible faith, but only one!
That I may cover with an eagle-glance
The truths I have, and spy some certain way
To mould them, and completing them, possess!

Yet God is good: I started sure of that,
And why dispute it now? I'll not believe
But some undoubted warning long ere this
Had reached me: a fire-labour was not deemed
Too much for the old founder of these walls.
Then, if my life has not been natural,
It has been monstrous: yet, till late, my course
So ardently engrossed me, that delight,
A pausing and reflecting joy, 't is plain,
Could find no place in it. True, I am worn;
But who clothes summer, who is life itself?
God, that created all things, can renew!
And then, though after-life to please me now
Must have no likeness to the past, what hinders
Reward from springing out of toil, as changed
As bursts the flower from earth and root and stalk?

What use were punishment, unless some sin
Be first detected? let me know that first!
No man could ever offend as I have done . . .

(A voice from within.)

I hear a voice, perchance I heard
Long ago, but all too low,
So that scarce a care it stirred
If the voice were real or no:
I heard it in my youth when first
The waters of my life outburst:
But, now their stream ebbs faint, I hear
That voice, still low, but fatal-clear —
As if all poets, God ever meant
Should save the world, and therefore lent
Great gifts to, but who, proud, refused
To do his work, or lightly used
Those gifts, or failed through weak endeavor,
So, mourn cast off by him forever, —
As if these leaned in airy ring
To take me; this the song they sing.

“Lost, lost! yet come,
With our wan troop make thy home.
Come, come! for we
Will not breathe, so much as breathe
Reproach to thee,
Knowing what thou sink'st beneath.
So sank we in those old years,
We who bid thee, come! thou lost
Who, living yet, hast life o'erpast.
And altogether we, thy peers,
Will pardon crave for thee, the last
Whose trial is done, whose lot is cast
With those who watch but work no more,
Who gaze on life but live no more.
Yet we trusted thou shouldst speak
The message which our lips, too weak,
Refused to utter, — shouldst redeem
Our fault: such trust, and all a dream!
Yet we chose thee a birthplace

Where the richness ran to flowers:
Couldst not sing one song for grace?
Not make one blossom man's and ours?
Must one more recreant to his race
Die with unexerted powers,
And join us, leaving as he found
The world, he was to loosen, bound?
Anguish! ever and forever;
Still beginning, ending never!
Yet, lost and last one, come!
How couldst understand, alas,
What our pale ghosts strove to say,
As their shades did glance and pass
Before thee night and day?
Thou wast blind as we were dumb:
Once more, therefore, come, O come!
How should we clothe, how arm the spirit
Shall next thy post of life inherit —
How guard him from thy speedy ruin?
Tell us of thy sad undoing
Here, where we sit, ever pursuing
Our weary task, ever renewing
Sharp sorrow, far from God who gave
Our powers, and man they could not save!”

(APRILE enters.)

Ha, ha! our king that wouldst be, here at last?
Art thou the poet who shall save the world?
Thy hand to mine! Stay, fix thine eyes on
mine!

Thou wouldst be king? Still fix thine eyes on
mine!

Par. Ha, ha! why crouchest not? Am I not king?

So torture is not wholly unavailing!
Have my fierce spasms compelled thee from thy lair?

Art thou the sage I only seemed to be,
Myself of after-time, my very self
With sight a little clearer, strength more firm,
Who robes him in my robe and grasps my crown

For just a fault, a weakness, a neglect?
I scarcely trusted God with the surmise
That such might come, and thou didst hear the while!

Aprile. Thine eyes are lustreless to mine:
my hair

Is soft, nay silken soft: to talk with thee
Flushes my cheek, and thou art ashy-pale.
Truly, thou hast labored, hast withstood her
lips,

The siren's! Yes, 't is like thou hast attained!
Tell me, dear master, wherefore now thou comest?

I thought thy solemn songs would have their need

In after-time; that I should hear the earth
Exult in thee and echo with thy praise,
While I was laid forgotten in my grave.

Par. Ah fiend, I know thee, I am not thy dupe!

Thou art ordained to follow in my track,
Reaping my sowing, as I scorned to reap
The harvest sown by sages passed away.
Thou art the sober searcher, cautious striver,
As if, except through me, thou hast searched or striven!

Ay, tell the world! Degrade me after all,

To an aspirant after fame, not truth —

To all but envy of thy fate, be sure!

Apr. Nay, sing them to me; I shall envy not:

Thou shalt be king! Sing thou, and I will sit Beside, and call deep silence for thy songs,
And worship thee, as I had ne'er been meant
To fill thy throne: but none shall ever know!
Sing to me; for already thy wild eyes
Unlock my heart-strings, as some crystal-shaft
Reveals by some chance blaze its parent fount
After long time: so thou reveal'st my soul.
All will flash forth at last, with thee to hear!

Par. (His secret! I shall get his secret — fool!)

I am he that aspired to know: and thou?

Apr. I would LOVE infinitely, and be loved!

Par. Poor slave! I am thy king indeed.

Apr. Thou deem'st

That — born a spirit, dowered even as thou,
Born for thy fate — because I could not curb
My yearnings to possess at once the full Enjoyment, but neglected all the means
Of realizing even the frailest joy,
Gathering no fragments to appease my want,
Yet nursing up that want till thus I die —
Thou deem'st I cannot trace thy safe sure march

O'er perils that o'erwhelm me, triumphing,
Neglecting naught below for aught above,
Despising nothing and ensuring all —
Nor that I could (my time to come again)
Lead thus my spirit securely as thine own.
Listen, and thou shalt see I know thee well.
I would love infinitely . . .

Ah, lost! lost!

Oh ye who armed me at such cost,

How shall I look on all of ye

With your gifts even yet on me?

Par. (Ah, 'tis some moonstruck creature after all!

Such fond fools are like to haunt this den:
They spread contagion, doubtless: yet he seemed

To echo one foreboding of my heart
So truly, that . . . no matter! How he stands
With eve's last sunbeam staying on his hair
Which turns to it as if they were akin:
And those clear smiling eyes of saddest blue
Nearly set free, so far they rise above
The painful fruitless striving of the brow
And enforced knowledge of the lips, firm-set
In slow despondency's eternal sigh!
Has he, too, missed life's end, and learned the cause?)

I charge thee, by thy fealty, be calm!

Tell me what thou wouldst be, and what I am.

Apr. I would love infinitely, and be loved.

First: I would carve in stone, or cast in brass,
The forms of earth. No ancient hunter lifted
Up to the gods by his renown, no nymph
Supposed the sweet soul of a woodland tree
Or sapphire spirit of a twilight star,
Regal be too hard for me; no shepherd-king
Regal for his white locks; no youth who stands

Silent and very calm amid the throng,
His right hand ever hid beneath his robe

Until the tyrant pass; no lawgiver,
No swan-soft woman rubbed with lucid oils
Given by a god for love of her — too hard!
Every passion sprung from man, conceived by
man,

Would I express and clothe it in its right form,
Or blend with others struggling in one form,
Or show repressed by an ungainly form.

Oh, if you marvelled at some mighty spirit
With a fit frame to execute its will — Even unconsciously to work its will —

You should be moved no less beside some strong
Rare spirit, fettered to a stubborn body,
Endeavoring to subdue it and inform it
With its own splendor! All this I would do:

And I would say, this done, "His sprites created,

God grants to each a sphere to be its world,
Appointed with the various objects needed
To satisfy its own peculiar want;

So, I create a world for these my shapes
Fit to sustain their beauty and their strength!"

And, at the word, I would contrive and paint Woods, valleys, rocks and plains, dells, sands and wastes,

Lakes which, when morn breaks on their quivering bed,

Blaze like a wyvern flying round the sun,
And ocean isles so small, the dog-fish tracking
A dead whale, who should find them, would swim thrice

Around them, and fare onward — all to hold
The offspring of my brain. Nor these alone:
Bronze labyrinth, palace, pyramid and crypt,
Baths, galleries, courts, temples and terraces, Marts, theatres, and wharfs — all filled with
men,

Men everywhere! And this performed in turn,
When those who looked on, pined to hear the hopes

And fears and hates and loves which moved the crowd,

I would throw down the pencil as the chisel,
And I would speak; no thought which ever stirred

A human breast should be untold; all passions,
All soft emotions, from the turbulent stir
Within a heart fed with desires like mine.

To the last comfort shutting the tired lids
Of him who sleeps the sultry noon away
Beneath the tent-tree by the wayside well:

And this in language as the need should be,
Now poured at once forth in a burning flow,
Now piled up in a grand array of words.

This done, to perfect and consummate all,
Even as a luminous haze links star to star,
I would supply all chasms with music, breathing
Mysterious motions of the soul, no way

To be defined save in strange melodies.
Last, having thus revealed all I could love,
Having received all love bestowed on it,

I would die: preserving so throughout my course
God full on me, as I was full on men:

He would approve my prayer, "I have gone
through

The loveliness of life; create for me
If not for men, or take me to thyself,
Eternal, infinite love!"

If thou hast ne'er
Conceived this mighty aim, this full desire,
Thou hast not passed my trial, and thou art
No king of mine.

Par. Ah me!

Apr. But thou art here!
Thou didst not gaze like me upon that end
Till thine own powers for compassing the bliss
Were blind with glory; nor grow mad to grasp
At once the prize long patient toil should claim,
Nor spurn all granted short of that. And I
Would do as thou, a second time: nay, listen!
Knowing ourselves, our world, our task so great,
Our time so brief, 't is clear if we refuse
The means so limited, the tools so rude
To execute our purpose, life will fleet,
And we shall fade, and leave our task undone.
We will be wise in time: what though our work
Be fashioned in despite of their ill-service,
Be crippled every way? 'T were little praise
Did full resources wait on our goodwill
At every turn. Let all be as it is.
Some say the earth is even so contrived
That tree and flower, a vesture gay, conceal
A bare and skeleton framework. Had we means Answering to our mind! But now I seem Wrecked on a savage isle: how rear thereon
My palace? Branching palms the props shall be,
Fruit glossy mingling; gems are for the East;
Who heeds them? I can pass them. Serpents' scales,

And painted birds' down, furs and fishes' skins
Must help me; and a little here and there
Is all I can aspire to: still my art
Shall show its birth was in a gentler clime.
"Had I green jars of malachite, this way
I'd range them: where those sea-shells glisten
above,

Cressets should hang, by right: this way we set
The purple carpets, as these mats are laid,
Woven of fern and rush and blossoming flag."
Or if, by fortune, some completer grace
Be spared to me, some fragment, some slight sample

Of the prouder workmanship my own home boasts,

Some trifle little heeded there, but here
The place's one perfection — with what joy
Would I enshrine the relic, cheerfully
Foregoing all the marvels out of reach!
Could I retain one strain of all the psalm
Of the angels, one word of the fiat of God,
To let my followers know what such things are!
I would adventure nobly for their sakes:
When nights were still, and still the moaning sea,
And far away I could descry the land
Whence I departed, whither I return,
I would dispart the waves, and stand once more
At home, and load my bark, and hasten back,
And fling my gains to them, worthless or true.
"Friends," I would say, "I went far, far for
them,

Past the high rocks the haunt of doves, the mounds

Of red earth from whose sides strange trees
grow out,

Past tracts of milk-white minute blinding sand,
Till, by a mighty moon, I tremblingly

Gathered these magic herbs, berry and bud,
In haste, not pausing to reject the weeds,
But happy plucking them at any price.
To me, who have seen them bloom in their own soil,

They are scarce lovely: plait and wear them,
you!

And guess, from what they are, the springs that fed them,

The stars that sparkled o'er them, night by
night,

The snakes that travelled far to sip their dew!"
Thus for my higher loves; and thus even weakness

Would win me honor. But not these alone
Should claim my care; for common life, its wants
And ways, would I set forth in beauteous hues:
The lowest hind should not possess a hope,
A fear, but I'd be by him, saying better
Than he his own heart's language. I would live
Forever in the thoughts I thus explored,
As a discoverer's memory is attached
To all he finds; they should be mine henceforth,
Imbued with me, though free to all before:
For clay, once cast into my soul's rich mine,
Should come up crusted o'er with gems. Nor
this

Would need a meaner spirit than the first:
Nay, 't would be but the selfsame spirit, clothed
In humbler guise, but still the selfsame spirit:
As one spring wind unbinds the mountain snow
And comforts violets in their hermitage.

But, master, poet, who hast done all this,
How didst thou 'scape the ruin whelming me?
Didst thou, when nerving thee to this attempt,
Ne'er range thy mind's extent, as some wide hall,

Dazzled by shapes that filled its length with
light,

Shapes clustered there to rule thee, not obey,
That will not wait thy summons, will not rise
Singly, nor when thy practised eye and hand
Can well transfer their loveliness, but crowd
By thee forever, bright to thy despair?

Didst thou ne'er gaze on each by turns, and ne'er
Resolve to single out one, though the rest
Should vanish, and to give that one, entire
In beauty, to the world; forgetting, so,
Its peers, whose number baffles mortal power?
And, this determined, wast thou ne'er seduced
By memories and regrets and passionate love,
To glance once more farewell? and did their
eyes

Fasten thee, brighter and more bright, until
Thou couldst but stagger back unto their feet,
And laugh that man's applause or welfare ever Could tempt thee to forsake them? Or when years

Had passed and still their love possessed thee wholly,

When from without some murmur startled thee
Of darkling mortals famished for one ray
Of thy so-hoarded luxury of light,
Didst thou ne'er strive even yet to break those spells

And prove thou couldst recover and fulfil
Thy early mission, long ago renounced,

And to that end, select some shape once more ?
And did not mist-like influences, thick films,
Faint memories of the rest that charmed so long Thine eyes, float fast, confuse thee, bear thee
off,

As whirling snow-drifts blind a man who treads
A mountain ridge, with guiding spear, through storm ?

Say, though I fell, I had excuse to fall ;
Say, I was tempted sorely : say but this,
Dear lord, Aprile's lord !

Par. Clasp me not thus,
Aprile ! That the truth should reach me thus !
We are weak dust. Nay, clasp not or I faint !

Apr. My king ! and envious thoughts could outrage thee ?

Lo, I forget my ruin, and rejoice
In thy success, as thou ! Let our God's praise Go bravely through the world at last ! What care

Through me or thee ? I feel thy breath. Why,
tears ?

Tears in the darkness, and from thee to me ?

Par. Love me henceforth, Aprile, while I learn

To love ; and, merciful God, forgive us both !
We wake at length from weary dreams ; but both

Have slept in fairy-land : though dark and drear
Appears the world before us, we no less
Wake with our wrists and ankles jewelled still.
I too have sought to KNOW as thou to LOVE —
Excluding love as thou refusedst knowledge.
Still thou hast beauty and I, power. We wake :
What penance canst devise for both of us ?

Apr. I hear thee faintly. The thick darkness ! Even

Thine eyes are hid. 'Tis as I knew : I speak,
And now I die. But I have seen thy face !
O poet, think of me, and sing of me !
But to have seen thee and to die so soon !

Par. Die not, Aprile ! We must never part.
Are we not halves of one dissevered world,
Whom this strange chance unites once more ?
Part ? never !

Till thou the lover, know ; and I, the knower,
Love — until both are saved. Aprile, hear !
We will accept our gains, and use them — now !
God, he will die upon my breast ! Aprile !

Apr. To speak but once, and die ! yet by his side.

Hush ! hush !

Ha ! go you ever girt about
With phantoms, powers ? I have created such,
But these seem real as I.

Par. Whom can you see
Through the accursed darkness ?

Apr. Stay ; I know,
I know them : who should know them well as I ?
White brows, lit up with glory ; poets all !

Par. Let him but live, and I have my reward !

Apr. Yes ; I see now. God is the perfect poet.

Who in his person acts his own creations.
Had you but told me this at first ! Hush ! hush !

Par. Live ! for my sake, because of my great sin,

To help my brain, oppressed by these wild words
And their deep import. Live ! 't is not too late.

I have a quiet home for us, and friends.
Michal shall smile on you. Hear you ? Lean
thus,

And breathe my breath. I shall not lose one
word

Of all your speech, one little word, Aprile !

Apr. No, no. Crown me ? I am not one of
you !

'T is he, the king, you seek. I am not one.

Par. Thy spirit, at least, Aprile ! Let me
love.

I have attained, and now I may depart.

III. PARACELSUS

SCENE, Basel : a chamber in the house of PARACELSUS.
1526.

PARACELSUS, FESTUS.

Par. Heap logs and let the blaze laugh out !
Fest. True, true !

'T is very fit all, time and chance and change
Have wrought since last we sat thus, face to face

And soul to soul — all cares, far-looking fears,
Vague apprehensions, all vain fancies bred
By your long absence, should be cast away,
Forgotten in this glad unhopd renewal
Of our affections.

Par. Oh, omit not aught
Which witnesses your own and Michal's own
Affection : spare not that ! Only forget
The honors and the glories and what not,
It pleases you to tell profusely out.

Fest. Nay, even your honors, in a sense, I waive :

The wondrous Paracelsus, life's dispenser,
Fate's commissary, idol of the schools
And courts, shall be no more than Aureole still,
Still Aureole and my friend as when we parted
Some twenty years ago, and I restrained
As best I could the promptings of my spirit
Which secretly advanced you, from the first,
To the pre-eminent rank which, since, your own Adventurous ardor nobly triumphing,
Has won for you.

Par. Yes, yes. And Michal's face
Still wears that quiet and peculiar light
Like the dim circlet floating round a pearl ?

Fest. Just so.

Par. And yet her calm sweet countenance,
Though saintly, was not sad ; for she would sing
Alone. Does she still sing alone, bird-like,
Not dreaming you are near ? Her carols dropt
In flakes through that old leafy bower built under

The sunny wall at Würzburg, from her lattice
Among the trees above, while I, unseen,
Sat conning some rare scroll from Tritheim's shelves,

Much wondering notes so simple could divert
My mind from study. Those were happy days.
Respect all such as sing when all alone !

Fest. Scarcely alone : her children, you may guess,

Are well beside her.

Par. Ah, those children quite Unsettle the pure picture in my mind : A girl, she was so perfect, so distinct : No change, no change ! Not but this added

grace
May blend and harmonize with its compeers,
And Michal may become her motherhood ;
And 't is a change, and I detest all change,
And most a change in aught I loved long since.
So, Michal — you have said she thinks of me ?

Fest. O very proud will Michal be of you !
Imagine how we sat, long winter-nights,
Schening and wondering, shaping your presented

Adventure, or devising its reward ;
Shutting out fear with all the strength of hope.
For it was strange how, even when most secure
In our domestic peace, a certain dim
And fitting shade could sadden all ; it seemed
A restlessness of heart, a silent yearning,
A sense of something wanting, incomplete —
Not to be put in words, perhaps avoided
By mute consent — but, said or unsaid, felt
To point to one so loved and so long lost.
And then the hopes rose and shut out the fears —
How you would laugh should I recount them
now !

I still predicted your return at last
With gifts beyond the greatest of them all,
All Trithem's wondrous troop ; did one of which Attain renown by any chance, I smiled,
As well aware of who would prove his peer.
Michal was sure some woman, long ere this,
As beautiful as you were sage, had loved . . .

Par. Far-seeing, truly, to discern so much
In the fantastic projects and day-dreams
Of a raw restless boy !

Fest. Oh, no : the sunrise
Well warranted our faith in this full noon !
Can I forget the anxious voice which said,
" Festus, have thoughts like these e'er shaped themselves

In other brains than mine ? have their possessors
Existed in like circumstance ? were they weak
As I, or ever constant from the first,
Despising youth's allurements and rejecting
As spider-films the shackles I endure ?
Is there hope for me ?" — and I answered gravely
As an acknowledged elder, calmer, wiser,
More gifted mortal. O you must remember,
For all your glorious . . .

Par. Glorious ? ay, this hair,
These hands — nay, touch them, they are mine !
Recall

With all the said recallings, times when thus
To lay them by your own ne'er turned you pale
As now. Most glorious, are they not ?

Fest. Why — why —
Something must be subtracted from success
So wide, no doubt. He would be scrupulous, truly,
Who should object such drawbacks. Still, still,
Aureole,
You are changed, very changed ! 'T were losing nothing

To look well to it : you must not be stolen
From the enjoyment of your well-won meed.

Par. My friend ! you seek my pleasure, past a doubt :

You will best gain your point, by talking, not
Of me, but of yourself.

Fest. Have I not said
All touching Michal and my children ? Sure
You know, by this, full well how Aennchen looks Gravely, while one disparts her thick brown hair ;
And Aureole's glee when some stray gannet builds

Amid the birch-trees by the lake. Small hope
Have I that he will honor (the wild imp)
His namesake. Sigh not ! 't is too much to ask
That all we love should reach the same proud fate.

But you are very kind to humor me
By showing interest in my quiet life ;
You, who of old could never tame yourself
To tranquil pleasures, must at heart despise . .

Par. Festus, strange secrets are let out by death

Who blabs so oft the follies of this world :
And I am death's familiar, as you know.
I helped a man to die, some few weeks since,
Warped even from his go-cart to one end —
The living on princes' smiles, reflected from
A mighty herd of favorites. No mean trick
He left untried, and truly well-nigh wormed
All traces of God's finger out of him :
Then died, grown old. And just an hour before,
Having lain long with blank and soulless eyes,
He sat up suddenly, and with natural voice
Said that in spite of thick air and closed doors
God told him it was June ; and he knew well,
Without such telling, harebells grew in June ;
And all that kings could ever give or take
Would not be precious as those blooms to him.
Just so, allowing I am passing sage,
It seems to me much worthier argument
Why pannies,<sup>1</sup> eyes that laugh, bear beauty's prize
From violets, eyes that dream — (your Michal's choice) —

Than all fools find to wonder at in me
Or in my fortunes. And be very sure
I say this from no prurient restlessness,
No self-complacency, itching to turn,
Vary and view its pleasure from all points.
And, in this instance, willing other men
May be at pains, demonstrate to itself
The realness of the very joy it tastes.
What should delight me like the news of friends
Whose memories were a solace to me oft,
As mountain-baths to wild fowls in their flight ?
Ofter than you had wasted thought on me
Had you been wise, and rightly valued bliss.
But there 's no taming nor repressing hearts :
God knows I need such ! — So, you heard me
speak ?

Fest. Speak ? when ?

Par. When but this morning at my class ?
There was noise and crowd enough. I saw you
not.

Surely you know I am engaged to fill

<sup>1</sup> Citrulina (flammula) herba Paracelsi multum familiaris. — DORN.

The chair here? — that 't is part of my proud fate

To lecture to as many thick-skulled youths
As please, each day, to throng the theatre,
To my great reputation, and no small
Danger of Basel's benches long unused
To crack beneath such honor?

Fest. I was there ;
I mingled with the throng: shall I avow
Small care was mine to listen? — too intent
On gathering from the murmurs of the crowd
A full corroboration of my hopes!
What can I learn about your powers? but they Know, care for naught beyond your actual state,
Your actual value; yet they worship you,
Those various natures whom you sway as one!
But ere I go, be sure I shall attend . . .

Par. Stop, o' God's name: the thing 's by no means yet

Past remedy! Shall I read this morning's labor — At least in substance? Naught so worth the gaining

As an apt scholar! Thus then, with all due Precision and emphasis — you, beside, are clearly
Guiltless of understanding more, a whit,
The subject than your stool — allowed to be
A notable advantage.

Fest. Surely, Aureole,

You laugh at me!

Par. I laugh? Ha, ha! thank heaven,
I charge you, if 't be so! for I forget
Much, and what laughter should be like. No less,

However, I forego that luxury
Since it alarms the friend who brings it back.
True, laughter like my own must echo strangely
To thinking men; a smile were better far;
So, make me smile! If the exulting look
You wore but now be smiling, 't is so long Since I have smiled! Alas, such smiles are born

Alone of hearts like yours, or herdsmen's flocks
Of ancient time, whose eyes, calm as their souls,
Saw in the stars mere garnishry of heaven,
And in the earth a stage for altars only.

Never change, Festus: I say, never change!

Fest. My God, if he be wretched after all!

Par. When last we parted, Festus, you declared,

— Or Michal, yes, her soft lips whispered words
I have preserved. She told me she believed
I should succeed (meaning, that in the search
I then engaged in, I should meet success)

And yet be wretched: now, she augured false.

Fest. Thank heaven! but you spoke strangely: could I venture

To think bare apprehension lest your friend,
Dazzled by your resplendent course, might find
Henceforth less sweetness in his own, could move
Such earnest mood in you? Fear not, dear friend,

That I shall leave you, inwardly repining
Your lot was not my own!

Par. And this forever!

Forever! gull who may, they will be gulled!
They will not look nor think; 't is nothing new
In them: but surely he is not of them!

My Festus, do you know, I reckoned, you —

Though all beside were sand-blind — you, my friend,

Would look at me, once close, with piercing eye
Untroubled by the false glare that confounds
A weaker vision: would remain serene,
Though singular amid a gaping throng.
I feared you, or I had come, sure, long ere this,
To Einsiedeln. Well, error has no end,
And Rhasis is a sage, and Basel boasts
A tribe of wits, and I am wise and blest
Past all dispute! 'T is vain to fret at it.

I have vowed long ago my worshippers
Shall owe to their own deep sagacity
All further information, good or bad.
Small risk indeed my reputation runs,
Unless perchance the glance now searching me
Be fixed much longer; for it seems to spell
Dimly the characters a simpler man
Might read distinct enough. Old eastern books
Say, the fallen prince of morning some short space

Remained unchanged in semblance; nay, his brow

Was hued with triumph: every spirit then
Praising, his heart on flame the while: — a tale!
Well, Festus, what discover you, I pray?

Fest. Some foul deed sullies then a life which else

Were raised supreme?

Par. Good: I do well, most well!

Why strive to make men hear, feel, fret themselves

With what is past their power to comprehend?
I should not strive now: only, having nursed
The faint surmise that one yet walked the earth,
One, at least, not the utter fool of show,
Not absolutely formed to be the dupe
Of shallow plausibilities alone:

One who, in youth, found wise enough to choose
The happiness his riper years approve,
Was yet so anxious for another's sake,
That, ere his friend could rush upon a mad
And ruinous course, the converse of his own,
His gentle spirit essayed, prejudged for him
The perilous path, foresaw its destiny,

And warned the weak one in such tender words,
Such accents — his whole heart in every tone —
That oft their memory comforted that friend

When it by right should have increased despair:
— Having believed, I say, that this one man Could never lose the light thus from the first
His portion — how should I refuse to grieve
At even my gain if it disturb our old
Relation, if it make me out more wise?

Therefore, once more reminding him how well
He prophesied, I note the single flaw
That spoils his prophet's title. In plain words,
You were deceived, and thus were you deceived —

I have not been successful, and yet am
Most miserable; 't is said at last; nor you
Give credit, lest you force me to concede
That common sense yet lives upon the world!

Fest. You surely do not mean to banter me?
Par. You know, or — if you have been wise enough

To cleanse your memory of such matters — knew,

As far as words of mine could make it clear,
That 't was my purpose to find joy or grief
Solely in the fulfilment of my plan
Or plot or whatsoe'er it was; rejoicing
Alone as it proceeded prosperously,
Sorrowing then only when mischance retarded
Its progress. That was in those Würzburg days!
Not to prolong a theme I thoroughly hate,
I have pursued this plan with all my strength;
And having failed therein most signally,
Cannot object to ruin utter and drear
As all-excelling would have been the prize
Had fortune favored me. I scarce have right
To vex your frank good spirit late so glad
In my supposed prosperity, I know,
And, were I lucky in a glut of friends,
Would well agree to let your error live,
Nay, strengthen it with fables of success.
But mine is no condition to refuse
The transient solace of so rare a godsend,
My solitary luxury, my one friend:
Accordingly I venture to put off
The wearisome vest of falsehood galling me,
Secure when he is by. I lay me bare,
Prone at his mercy — but he is my friend!
Not that he needs retain his aspect grave;
That answers not my purpose; for 't is like,
Some sunny morning — Basel being drained
Of its wise population, every corner
Of the amphitheatre crammed with learned clerks,

Here Cicolampadius, looking worlds of wit,
Here Castellanus, as profound as he,
Munsterus here, Frobenius there, all squeezed
And staring, — that the zany of the show,
Even Paracelsus, shall put off before them
His trappings with a grace but seldom judged
Expedient in such cases: — the grim smile
That will go round! Is it not therefore best
To venture a rehearsal like the present
In a small way? Where are the signs I seek,
The first-fruits and fair sample of the scorn
Due to all quacks? Why, this will never do!

Fest. These are foul vapors, Aureole; naught beside!

The effect of watching, study, weariness.
Were there a spark of truth in the confusion
Of these wild words, you would not outrage thus
Your youth's companion. I shall ne'er regard These wanderings, bred of faintness and much study.

'T is not thus you would trust a trouble to me,
To Michal's friend.

Par. I have said it, dearest Festus!
For the manner, 't is ungracious probably;
You may have it told in broken sobs, one day,
And scalding tears, ere long: but I thought best
To keep that off as long as possible.
Do you wonder still?

Fest. No; it must oft fall out
That one whose labor perfects any work,
Shall rise from it with eye so worn that he
Of all men least can measure the extent
Of what he has accomplished. He alone
Who, nothing tasked, is nothing weary too,
May clearly scan the little he effects:
But we, the bystanders, untouched by toil,
Estimate each aright.

Par. This worthy Festus
Is one of them, at last! 'T is so with all!
First, they set down all progress as a dream;
And next, when he whose quick discomfiture
Was counted on, accomplishes some few
And doubtful steps in his career, — behold,
They look for every inch of ground to vanish
Beneath his tread, so sure they spy success!
Fest. Few doubtful steps? when death retires before

Your presence — when the noblest of mankind,
Broken in body or subdued in soul,
May through your skill renew their vigor, raise
The shattered frame to pristine stateliness?
When men in racking pain may purchase dreams
Of what delights them most, swooning at once
Into a sea of bliss or rapt along
As in a flying sphere of turbulent light?
When we may look to you as one ordained
To free the flesh from fell disease, as frees
Our Luther's burning tongue the fettered soul?

Par. When and where, the devil, did you get
This notable news?

Fest. Even from the common voice;
From those whose envy, daring not dispute
The wonders it decries, attributes them
To magic and such folly.

Par. Folly? Why not
To magic, pray? You find a comfort doubtless
In holding, God ne'er troubles him about
Us or our doings: once we were judged worth
The devil's tempting . . . I offend: forgive me,
And rest content. Your prophecy on the whole
Was fair enough as prophesying; go;
At fault a little in detail, but quite
Precise enough in the main; and hereupon
I pay due homage: you guessed long ago
(The prophet!) I should fail — and I have failed.

Fest. You mean to tell me, then, the hopes which fed

Your youth have not been realized as yet?
Some obstacle has barred them hitherto?
Or that their innate . . .

Par. As I said but now,
You have a very decent prophet's fame,
So you but shun details here. Little matter Whether those hopes were mad, — the aims they sought,

Safe and secure from all ambitious fools;
Or whether my weak wits are overcome
By what a better spirit would scorn: I fail.
And now methinks 'twere best to change a theme

I am a sad fool to have stumbled on.
I say confusedly what comes uppermost;
But there are times when patience proves at fault,

As now: this morning's strange encounter — you
Beside me once again! you, whom I guessed
Alive, since hitherto (with Luther's leave)
No friend have I among the saints at peace,
To judge by any good their prayers effect.
I knew you would have helped me — why not he,
My strange competitor in enterprise,
Bound for the same end by another path,
Arrived, or ill or well, before the time,
At our disastrous journey's doubtful close?

How goes it with April? Ah, they miss
Your lone sad sunny idleness of heaven,
Our martyrs for the world's sake; heaven shuts fast:

The poor mad poet is howling by this time!
Since you are my sole friend then, here or there,
I could not quite repress the varied feelings
This meeting wakens; they have had their vent,
And now forget them. Do the rear-mice still Hang like a fretwork on the gate (or what
In my time was a gate) fronting the road
From Einsiedeln to Lachen?

Fest. Trifle not:
Answer me, for my sake alone! You smiled
Just now, when I supposed some deed, unworthy
Yourself, might blot the else so bright result;
Yet if your motives have continued pure,
Your will unfaltering, and in spite of this,
You have experienced a defeat, why then
I say not you would cheerfully withdraw
From contest — mortal hearts are not so fashioned —

But surely you would ne'ertheless withdraw.
You sought not fame nor gain nor even love,
No end distinct from knowledge, — I repeat
Your very words: once satisfied that knowledge
Is a mere dream, you would announce as much,
Yourself the first. But how is the event?
You are defeated — and I find you here!

Par. As though "here" did not signify defeat!

I spoke not of my little labors here,
But of the break-down of my general aims:
For you, aware of their extent and scope,
To look on these sage lecturings, approved
By beardless boys, and bearded dotards worse,
As a fit consummation of such aims,
Is worthy notice. A professorship
At Basel! Since you see so much in it,
And think my life was reasonably drained
Of life's delights to render me a match
For duties arduous as such post demands, —
Be it far from me to deny my power
To fill the petty circle allotted out
Of infinite space, or justify the host
Of honors thence accruing. So, take notice,
This jewel dangling from my neck preserves
The features of a prince, my skill restored
To plague his people some few years to come:
And all through a pure whim. He had eased
the earth

For me, but that the droll despair which seized
The vermin of his household, tickled me.
I came to see. Here drivelled the physician,
Whose most infallible nostrum was at fault;
There quaked the astrologer, whose horoscope
Had promised him interminable years;
Here a monk fumbled at the sick man's mouth
With some undoubted relic — a sudary
Of the Virgin; while another piebald knave
Of the same brotherhood (he loved them ever)
Was actively preparing 'neath his nose
Such a suffumigation as, once fired,
Had stunk the patient dead ere he could groan.
I cursed the doctor and upset the brother,
Brushed past the conjurer, vowed that the first gust

Of stench from the ingredients just alight

Would raise a cross-grained devil in my sword,
Not easily laid: and ere an hour the prince
Slept as he never slept since prince he was.
A day — and I was posting for my life,
Placarded through the town as one whose spite
Had near availed to stop the blessed effects
Of the doctor's nostrum which, well seconded
By the sudary, and most by the costly smoke —
Not leaving out the strenuous prayers sent up
Hard by in the abbey — raised the prince to life:
To the great reputation of the seer
Who, confident, expected all along
The glad event — the doctor's recompense —
Much largess from his highness to the monks —
And the vast solace of his loving people,
Whose general satisfaction to increase,
The prince was pleased no longer to defer
The burning of some dozen heretics
Remanded till God's mercy should be shown Touching his sickness: last of all were joined Ample directions to all loyal folk
To swell the complement by seizing me
Who — doubtless some rank sorcerer — endeavor-ored

To thwart these pious offices, obstruct
The prince's cure, and frustrate heaven by help
Of certain devils dwelling in his sword.
By luck, the prince in his first fit of thanks
Had forced this bauble on me as an earnest
Of further favors. This one case may serve
To give sufficient taste of many such,
So, let them pass. Those shelves support a pile
Of patents, licenses, diplomas, titles
From Germany, France, Spain, and Italy;
They authorize some honor; ne'ertheless,
I set more store by this Erasmus sent;
He trusts me; our Frobenius is his friend,
And him "I raised" (nay, read it) "from the dead."

I weary you, I see. I merely sought
To show, there's no great wonder after all
That, while I fill the class-room and attract
A crowd to Basel, I get leave to stay,
And therefore need not scruple to accept
The utmost they can offer, if I please:
For 't is but right the world should be prepared
To treat with favor e'en fantastic wants
Of one like me, used up in serving her.
Just as the mortal, whom the gods in part
Devooured, received in place of his lost limb
Some virtue or other — cured disease, I think;
You mind the fables we have read together.

Fest. You do not think I comprehend a word.
The time was, Aureole, you were apt enough
To clothe the airiest thoughts in specious
breath;

But surely you must feel how vague and strange
These speeches sound.

Par. Well, then: you know my hopes;
I am assured, at length, those hopes were vain;
That truth is just as far from me as ever;
That I have thrown my life away; that sorrow
On that account is idle, and further effort
To mend and patch what's marred beyond repairing,

As useless: and all this was taught your friend
By the convincing good old-fashioned method
Of force — by sheer compulsion. Is that plain?

Fest. Dear Aureole, can it be my fears were just ?

God wills not . . .

Par. Now, 't is this I most admire —
The constant talk men of your stamp keep up
Of God's will, as they style it ; one would swear
Man had but merely to uplift his eye,
And see the will in question characterized
On the heaven's vault. 'T is hardly wise to moot
Such topics : doubts are many and faith is weak.
I know as much of any will of God
As knows some dumb and tortured brute what
Man,

His stern lord, wills from the perplexing blows
That plague him every way ; but there, of course,

Where least he suffers, longest he remains —
My case ; and for such reasons I plod on,
Subdued but not convinced. I know as little Why I deserve to fail, as why I hoped Better things in my youth. I simply know
I am no master here, but trained and beaten
Into the path I tread ; and here I stay,
Until some further intimation reach me,
Like an obedient drudge. Though I prefer
To view the whole thing as a task imposed
Which, whether dull or pleasant, must be done —
Yet, I deny not, there is made provision
Of joys which tastes less jaded might affect ;
Nay, some which please me too, for all my pride —

Pleasures that once were pains : the iron ring
Festering about a slave's neck grows at length
Into the flesh it eats. I hate no longer
A host of petty vile delights, undreamed of
Or spurned before ; such now supply the place
Of my dead aims : as in the autumn woods
Where tall trees used to flourish, from their roots

Springs up a fungous brood sickly and pale,
Chill mushrooms colored like a corpse's cheek.

Fest. If I interpret well your words, I own
It troubles me but little that your aims,
Vast in their dawning and most likely grown
Extravagantly since, have baffled you.
Perchance I am glad ; you merit greater praise ;
Because they are too glorious to be gained,
You do not blindly cling to them and die ;
You fell, but have not sullenly refused
To rise, because an angel worsted you
In wrestling, though the world holds not your peer ;

And though too harsh and sudden is the change
To yield content as yet, still you pursue
The ungracious path as though 't were rosy-strewn.

'T is well : and your reward, or soon or late,
Will come from him whom no man serves in vain.

Par. Ah, very fine ! For my part, I conceive
The very pausing from all further toil,
Which you find heinous, would become a seal
To the sincerity of all my deeds.
To be consistent I should die at once ;
I calculated on no after-life ;
Yet (how crept in, how fostered, I know not)
Here am I with as passionate regret
For youth and health and love so vainly lavished,

As if their preservation had been first
And foremost in my thoughts ; and this strange fact

Humbled me wondrously, and had due force
In rendering me the less averse to follow
A certain counsel, a mysterious warning —
You will not understand — but 't was a man
With aims not mine and yet pursued like mine
With the same fervor and no more success,
Perishing in my sight ; who summoned me,
As I would shun the ghastly fate I saw,
To serve my race at once ; to wait no longer
That God should interfere in my behalf,
But to distrust myself, put pride away,
And give my gains, imperfect as they were,
To men. I have no leisure to explain
How, since, a singular series of events
Has raised me to the station you behold,
Wherein I seem to turn to most account
The mere wreck of the past, — perhaps receive
Some feeble glimmering token that God views
And may approve my penance : therefore here
You find me, doing most good or least harm.
And if folks wonder much and profit little
'T is not my fault ; only, I shall rejoice
When my part in the farce is shuffled through,
And the curtain falls : I must hold out till then.

Fest. Till when, dear Aureole ?

Par. Till I'm fairly thrust
From my proud eminence. Fortune is fickle
And even professors fall : should that arrive,
I see no sin in ceding to my bent.
You little fancy what rude shocks apprise us
We sin ; God's intimations rather fail
In clearness than in energy : 't were well
Did they but indicate the course to take
Like that to be forsaken. I would fain
Be spared a further sample. Here I stand,
And here I stay, be sure, till forced to flit.

Fest. Be you but firm on that head ! long ere then

All I expect will come to pass, I trust :
The cloud that wraps you will have disappeared.
Meantime, I see small chance of such event :
They praise you here as one whose lore, already Divulged, eclipses all the past can show,
But whose achievements, marvellous as they be,
Are faint anticipations of a glory
About to be revealed. When Basel's crowds
Dismiss their teacher, I shall be content
That he depart.

Par. This favor at their hands
I look for earlier than your view of things
Would warrant. Of the crowd you saw to-day,
Remove the full half sheer amazement draws,
Mere novelty, naught else ; and next, the tribe
Whose innate blockish dulness just perceives
That unless miracles (as seem my works)
Be wrought in their behalf, their chance is slight

To puzzle the devil ; next, the numerous set
Who bitterly hate established schools, and help
The teacher that oppugns them, till he once
Have planted his own doctrine, when the teacher

May reckon on their rancor in his turn ;
Take, too, the sprinkling of sagacious knaves
Whose cunning runs not counter to the vogue

But seeks, by flattery and crafty nursing,
To force my system to a premature
Short-lived development. Why swell the list?
Each has his end to serve, and his best way
Of serving it: remove all these, remain
A scantling, a poor dozen at the best,
Worthy to look for sympathy and service,
And likely to draw profit from my pains.

Fest. 'Tis no encouraging picture: still these few Redeem their fellows. Once the germ implanted,
Its growth, if slow, is sure.

Par. God grant it so!
I would make some amends; but if I fail,
The luckless rogues have this excuse to urge,
That much is in my method and my manner,
My uncouth habits, my impatient spirit,
Which hinders of reception and result
My doctrine: much to say, small skill to speak!
These old aims suffered not a looking-off
Though for an instant; therefore, only when
I thus renounce them and resolved to reap
Some present fruit — to teach mankind some
truth

So dearly purchased — only then I found
Such teaching was an art requiring cares
And qualities peculiar to itself:
That to possess was one thing — to display
Another. With renown first in my thoughts,
Or popular praise, I had soon discovered it:
One grows but little apt to learn these things.

Fest. If it be so, which nowise I believe,
There needs no waiting fuller dispensation
To leave a labor of so little use.

Why not throw up the irksome charge at once?
Par. A task, a task!

But wherefore hide the whole
Extent of degradation once engaged
In the confessing vein? Despite of all
My fine talk of obedience and repugnance,
Docility and what not, 't is yet to learn
If when the task shall really be performed,
My inclination free to choose once more,
I shall do aught but slightly modify
The nature of the hated task I quit.
In plain words, I am spoiled; my life still tends
As first it tended; I am broken and trained
To my old habits: they are part of me.
I know, and none so well, my darling ends
Are proved impossible: no less, no less,
Even now what humors me, fond fool, as when
Their faint ghosts sit with me and flatter me
And send me back content to my dull round?
How can I change this soul? — this apparatus
Constructed solely for their purposes,
So well adapted to their every want,
To search out and discover, prove and perfect;
This intricate machine whose most minute
And meanest motions have their charm to me
Though to none else — an aptitude I seize,
An object I perceive, a use, a meaning,
A property, a fitness, I explain
And I alone: — how can I change my soul?
And this wronged body, worthless save when tasked

Under that soul's dominion — used to care
For its bright master's cares and quite subdue

Its proper cravings — not to ail nor pine
So he but prosper — whither drag this poor
Tried patient body? God! how I essayed
To live like that mad poet, for a while,
To love alone; and how I felt too warped
And twisted and deformed! What should I do,
Even though released from drudgery, but return

Faint, as you see, and halting, blind and sore,
To my old life and die as I began?
I cannot feed on beauty for the sake
Of beauty only, nor can drink in balm
From lovely objects for their loveliness;
My nature cannot lose her first imprint;
I still must hoard and heap and class all truths
With one ulterior purpose: I must know!
Would God translate me to his throne, believe
That I should only listen to his word
To further my own aim! For other men,
Beauty is prodigally strewn around,
And I were happy could I quench as they
This mad and thriveless longing, and content
me

With beauty for itself alone: alas,
I have addressed a frock of heavy mail
Yet may not join the troop of sacred knights;
And now the forest-creatures fly from me,
The grass-banks cool, the sunbeams warm no
more.

Best follow, dreaming that ere night arrive,
I shall o'ertake the company and ride
Glittering as they!

Fest. I think I apprehend
What you would say: if you, in truth, design
To enter once more on the life thus left,
Seek not to hide that all this consciousness
Of failure is assumed!

Par. My friend, my friend,
I toil, you listen; I explain, perhaps
You understand: there our communion ends.
Have you learnt nothing from to-day's discourse?

When we would thoroughly know the sick man's state

We feel awhile the fluttering pulse, press soft
The hot brow, look upon the languid eye,
And thence divine the rest. Must I lay bare
My heart, hideous and beating, or tear up
My vitals for your gaze, ere you will deem Enough made known? You! who are you,
forsooth?

That is the crowning operation claimed
By the arch-demonstrator — heaven the hall,
And earth the audience. Let April and you Secure good places: 't will be worth the while.

Fest. Are you mad, Aureole? What can I have said

To call for this? I judged from your own
words.

Par. Oh, doubtless! A sick wretch describes the ape
That mocks him from the bed-foot, and all gravely

You thither turn at once: or he recounts
The perilous journey he has late performed,
And you are puzzled much how that could be!
You find me here, half stupid and half mad;
It makes no part of my delight to search

Into these matters, much less undergo Another's scrutiny ; but so it chances
That I am led to trust my state to you :
And the event is, you combine, contrast
And ponder on my foolish words as though
They thoroughly conveyed all hidden here —
Here, loathsome with despair and hate and rage !

Is there no fear, no shrinking and no shame ?
Will you guess nothing ? will you spare me nothing ?

Must I go deeper ? Ay or no ?

Fest. Dear friend . . .

Par. True : I am brutal — 't is a part of it ;
The plague's sign — you are not a lazar-haunter,
How should you know ? Well then, you think it strange

I should profess to have failed utterly,
And yet propose an ultimate return
To courses void of hope : and this, because
You know not what temptation is, nor how
'T is like to ply men in the sickliest part.
You are to understand that we who make
Sport for the gods, are hunted to the end :
There is not one sharp volley shot at us,
Which 'scaped with life, though hurt, we slacken pace

And gather by the wayside herbs and roots
To stanch our wounds, secure from further harm :

We are assailed to life's extremest verge.
It will be well indeed if I return,
A harmless busy fool, to my old ways !
I would forget hints of another fate,
Significant enough, which silent hours
Have lately scared me with.

Fest. Another ! and what ?

Par. After all, Festus, you say well : I am
A man yet : I need never humble me.
I would have been — something, I know not what ;

But though I cannot soar, I do not crawl.
There are worse portions than this one of mine.
You say well !

Fest. Ah !

Par. And deeper degradation !
If the mean stimulants of vulgar praise,
If vanity should become the chosen food
Of a sunk mind, should stifle even the wish
To find its early aspirations true,
Should teach it to breathe falsehood like life-
breath —

An atmosphere of craft and trick and lies ;
Should make it proud to emulate, surpass
Base natures in the practices which woke
Its most indignant loathing once . . . No, no !
Utter damnation is reserved for hell !
I had immortal feelings ; such shall never
Be wholly quenched : no, no !

My friend, you wear
A melancholy face, and certain 't is
There 's little cheer in all this dismal work.
But was it my desire to set abroad
Such memories and forebodings ? I foresaw Where they would drive. 'T were better we discuss

News from Lucerne or Zurich ; ask and tell
Of Egypt's flaring sky or Spain's cork-groves.

Fest. I have thought : trust me, this mood will pass away !

I know you and the lofty spirit you bear,
And easily ravel out a clue to all.
These are the trials meet for such as you,
Nor must you hope exemption : to be mortal
Is to be plied with trials manifold.
Look round ! The obstacles which kept the rest
From your ambition, have been spurned by you ;
Their fears, their doubts, the chains that bind them all.

Were flax before your resolute soul, which
naught

Avails to awe save these delusions bred
From its own strength, its selfsame strength disguised,

Mocking itself. Be brave, dear Aureole ! Since
The rabbit has his shade to frighten him,
The fawn a rustling bough, mortals their cares,
And higher natures yet would slight and laugh
At these entangling fantasies, as you
At trammels of a weaker intellect, —
Measure your mind's height by the shade it casts !

I know you.

Par. And I know you, dearest Festus !
And how you love unworthily ; and how
All admiration renders blind.

Fest. You hold
That admiration blinds ?

Par. Ay and alas !

Fest. Naught blinds you less than admiration,
friend !

Whether it be that all love renders wise
In its degree ; from love which blends with
love —

Heart answering heart — to love which spends itself

In silent mad idolatry of some
Pre-eminent mortal, some great soul of souls,
Which ne'er will know how well it is adored.
I say, such love is never blind ; but rather Alive to every the minutest spot
Which mars its object, and which hate (supposed
So vigilant and searching) dreams not of.
Love broods on such : what then ? When first perceived

Is there no sweet strife to forget, to change,
To overflow those blemishes with all
The glow of general goodness they disturb ?
— To make those very defects an endless source
Of new affection grown from hopes and fears ?
And, when all fails, is there no gallant stand
Made even for much proved weak ? no shrinking-back

Lest, since all love assimilates the soul
To what it loves, it should at length become Almost a rival of its idol ? Trust me,
If there be fiends who seek to work our hurt,
To ruin and drag down earth's mightiest spirits
Even at God's foot, 't will be from such as love,
Their zeal will gather most to serve their cause ;
And least from those who hate, who most essay
By contumely and scorn to blot the light
Which forces entrance even to their hearts :
For thence will our defender tear the veil
And show within each heart, as in a shrine,
The giant image of perfection, grown

In hate's despite, whose calumnies were spawned
In the untroubled presence of its eyes.
True admiration blinds not ; nor am I
So blind. I call your sin exceptional ;
It springs from one whose life has passed the bounds

Prescribed to life. Compound that fault with God !

I speak of men ; to common men like me
The weakness you reveal endears you more,
Like the far traces of decay in suns.

I bid you have good cheer !

Par. Præclare ! Optime !
Think of a quiet mountain-cloistered priest
Instructing Paracelsus ! yet 't is so.

Come, I will show you where my merit lies.

'T is in the advance of individual minds

That the slow crowd should ground their expect-tation

Eventually to follow ; as the sea

Waits ages in its bed till some one wave

Out of the multitudinous mass, extends

The empire of the whole, some feet perhaps,

Over the strip of sand which could confine

Its fellows so long time : thenceforth the rest,

Even to the meanest, hurry in at once,

And so much is clear gained. I shall be glad

If all my labors, failing of aught else,

Suffice to make such inroad and procure

A wider range for thought : nay, they do this ;

For, whatsoe'er my notions of true knowledge

And a legitimate success, may be,

I am not blind to my undoubted rank

When classed with others : I precede my age :

And whose wills is very free to mount

These labors as a platform whence his own

May have a prosperous outset. But, alas !

My followers — they are noisy as you heard ;

But, for intelligence, the best of them

So clumsily wield the weapons I supply

And they extol, that I begin to doubt

Whether their own rude clubs and pebble-stones

Would not do better service than my arms

Thus vilely swayed — if error will not fall

Sooner before the old awkward batterings

Than my more subtle warfare, not half learned.

Fest. I would supply that art, then, or withhold

New arms until you teach their mystery.

Par. Content you, 't is my wish ; I have recourse

To the simplest training. Day by day I seek

To wake the mood, the spirit which alone

Can make those arms of any use to men.

Of course they are for swaggering forth at once

Graced with Ulysses' bow, Achilles' shield —

Flash on us, all in armor, thou Achilles !

Make our hearts dance to thy resounding step !

A proper sight to scare the crows away !

Fest. Pity you choose not then some other method

Of coming at your point. The marvellous art

At length established in the world bids fair

To remedy all hindrances like these :

Trust to Frobenius' press the precious lore

Obscured by uncouth manner, or unfit

For raw beginners ; let his types secure

A deathless monument to after-time ;

Meanwhile wait confidently and enjoy

The ultimate effect : sooner or later

You shall be all-revealed.

Par. The old dull question

In a new form ; no more. Thus : I possess

Two sorts of knowledge ; one, — vast, shadowy,

Hints of the unbounded aim I once pursued :

The other consists of many secrets, caught

While bent on nobler prize, — perhaps a few

Prime principles which may conduct to much :

These last I offer to my followers here.

Now, bid me chronicle the first of these,

My ancient study, and in effect you bid

Revert to the wild courses just abjured :

I must go find them scattered through the world.

Then, for the principles, they are so simple

(Being chiefly of the overturning sort),

That one time is as proper to propound them

As any other — to-morrow at my class,

Or half a century hence embalmed in print.

For if mankind intend to learn at all,

They must begin by giving faith to them

And acting on them : and I do not see

But that my lectures serve indifferent well :

No doubt these dogmas fall not to the earth,

For all their novelty and rugged setting.

I think my class will not forget the day

I let them know the gods of Israel,

Aëtius, Oribasius, Galen, Rhasis,

Serapion, Avicenna, Averroës,

Were blocks !

Fest. And that reminds me, I heard something

About your waywardness : you burned their

books,

It seems, instead of answering those sages.

Par. And who said that ?

Fest. Some I met yesternight

With Ecolampadius. As you know, the purpose

Of this short stay at Basel was to learn

His pleasure touching certain missives sent

For our Zuinglius and himself. 'T was he

Apprised me that the famous teacher here

Was my old friend.

Par. Ah, I forgot : you went . . .

Fest. From Zurich with advices for the ear

Of Luther, now at Wittenberg — (you know,

I make no doubt, the differences of late

With Carolostadius) — and returning sought

Basel and . . .

Par. I remember. Here's a case, now,

Will teach you why I answer not, but burn

The books you mention. Pray, does Luther

dream

His arguments convince by their own force

The crowds that own his doctrine ? No, indeed !

His plain denial of established points

Ages had sanctified and men supposed

Could never be oppugned while earth was under

And heaven above them — points which chance or time

Affected not — did more than the array

Of argument which followed. Boldly deny !

There is much breath-stopping, hair-stiffening

Awhile ; then, amazed glances, mute awaiting

The thunderbolt which does not come : and next,

Reproachful wonder and inquiry ; those

Who else had never stirred, are able now

To find the rest out for themselves, perhaps
To outstrip him who set the whole at work,
— As never will my wise class its instructor.
And you saw Luther ?

Fest. 'T is a wondrous soul !

Par. True : the so-heavy chain which galled mankind

Is shattered, and the noblest of us all
Must bow to the deliverer — nay, the worker
Of our own project — we who long before
Had burst our trammels, but forgot the crowd,
We should have taught, still groaned beneath their load :

This he has done and nobly. Speed that may !
Whatever be my chance or my mischance,
What benefits mankind must glad me too ;
And men seem made, though not as I believed,
For something better than the times produce.
Witness these gangs of peasants your new lights
From Suabia have possessed, whom Münzer leads,

And whom the duke, the landgrave and the elector
Will calm in blood ! Well, well ; 't is not my
world !

Fest. Hark !

Par. 'T is the melancholy wind astir
Within the trees ; the embers too are gray :
Morn must be near.

Fest. Best ope the casement : see,
The night, late strewn with clouds and flying stars,

Is blank and motionless : how peaceful sleep
The tree-tops altogether ! Like an asp,
The wind slips whispering from bough to bough.

Par. Ay ; you would gaze on a wind-shaken tree

By the hour, nor count time lost.

Fest. So you shall gaze :
Those happy times will come again.

Par. Gone, gone,
Those pleasant times ! Does not the moaning
wind

Seem to bewail that we have gained such gains
And bartered sleep for them ?

Fest. It is our trust
That there is yet another world to mend
All error and mischance.

Par. Another world !
And why this world, this common world, to be
A make-shift, a mere foil, how fair soever,
To some fine life to come ? Man must be fed
With angels' food, forsooth ; and some few traces

Of a diviner nature which look out
Through his corporeal baseness, warrant him
In a supreme contempt of all provision
For his inferior tastes — some straggling marks
Which constitute his essence, just as truly
As here and there a gem would constitute
The rock, their barren bed, one diamond.
But were it so — were man all mind — he gains
A station little enviable. From God
Down to the lowest spirit ministrant,
Intelligence exists which casts our mind
Into immeasurable shade. No, no :
Love, hope, fear, faith — these make humanity ;
These are its sign and note and character,

And these I have lost ! — gone, shut from me
forever.

Like a dead friend safe from unkindness more !
See, morn at length. The heavy darkness seems Diluted, gray and clear without the stars ;
The shrubs bestir and rouse themselves as if
Some snake, that weighed them down all night,
let go

His hold ; and from the East, fuller and fuller
Day, like a mighty river, flowing in ;
But clouded, wintry, desolate and cold.

Yet see how that broad prickly star-shaped
plant,

Half-down in the crevice, spreads its woolly leaves

All thick and glistening with diamond dew.
And you depart for Einsiedeln this day,
And we have spent all night in talk like this !
If you would have me better for your love,
Revert no more to these sad themes.

Fest. One favor,
And I have done. I leave you, deeply moved ;
Unwilling to have fared so well, the while
My friend has changed so sorely. If this mood
Shall pass away, if light once more arise
Where all is darkness now, if you see fit
To hope and trust again, and strive again,
You will remember — not our love alone —
But that my faith in God's desire that man Should trust on his support, (as I must think
You trusted) is obscured and dim through you :
For you are thus, and this is no reward.
Will you not call me to your side, dear Aureole ?

IV. PARACELSUS ASPIRES

SCENE, Colmar in Alsatia : an Inn. 1528.

PARACELSUS, FESTUS.

Par. (to JOHANNES OPORINUS, his Secretary).
Sic itur ad astra ! Dear Von Visenburg
Is scandalized, and poor Torinus paralyzed,
And every honest soul that Basel holds
Aghast ; and yet we live, as one may say,
Just as though Liechtenfels had never set
So true a value on his sorry carcass,
And learned Pütter had not frowned us dumb.
We live ; and shall as surely start to-morrow
For Nuremberg, as we drink speedy scathe
To Basel in this mantling wine, suffused
A delicate blush, no fainter tinge is born
I' the shut heart of a bud. Pledge me, good
John —

“ Basel ; a hot plague ravage it, and Pütter Oppose the plague ! ” Even so ? Do you too share Their panic, the reptiles ? Ha, ha ; faint through these,

Desist for these ! They manage matters so
At Basel, 't is like : but others may find means
To bring the stoutest braggart of the tribe
Once more to crouch in silence — means to breed
A stupid wonder in each fool again,
Now big with admiration at the skill
Which stript a vain pretender of his plumes :
And, that done, — means to brand each slavish
brow

So deeply, surely, ineffaceably,
That henceforth flattery shall not pucker it
Out of the furrow ; there that stamp shall stay
To show the next they fawn on, what they are,
This Basel with its magnates, — fill my cup, —
Whom I curse soul and limb. And now dispatch,
Dispatch, my trusty John ; and what remains
To do, whate'er arrangements for our trip
Are yet to be completed, see you hasten
This night ; we'll weather the storm at least :
to-morrow
For Nuremberg ! Now leave us ; this grave clerk
Has divers weighty matters for my ear :

[OPORINUS goes out.]

And spare my lungs. At last, my gallant Festus,
I am rid of this arch-knave that dogs my heels
As a gaunt crow a gasping sheep ; at last
May give a loose to my delight. How kind,
How very kind, my first best only friend !
Why, this looks like fidelity. Embrace me !
Not a hair silvered yet ? Right ! you shall live
Till I am worth your love ; you shall be proud,
And I — but let time show ! Did you not wonder ?

I sent to you because our compact weighed
Upon my conscience — (you recall the night
At Basel, which the gods confound ! ) — because Once more I aspire. I call you to my side :
You come. You thought my message strange ?
Fest. So strange

That I must hope, indeed, your messenger
Has mingled his own fancies with the words
Purporting to be yours.

Par. He said no more,
'Tis probable, than the precious folk I leave
Said fiftyfold more roughly. Welladay,
'Tis true ! poor Paracelsus is exposed
At last ; a most egregious quack he proves :
And those he overreached must spit their hate
On one who, utterly beneath contempt,
Could yet deceive their topping wits. You heard

Bare truth ; and at my bidding you come here
To speed me on my enterprise, as once
Your lavish wishes sped me, my own friend !

Fest. What is your purpose, Aureole ?
Par. Oh, for purpose,

There is no lack of precedents in a case
Like mine ; at least, if not precisely mine,
The case of men cast off by those they sought
To benefit.

Fest. They really cast you off ?
I only heard a vague tale of some priest,
Cured by your skill, who wrangled at your claim,
Knowing his life's worth best ; and how the judge

The matter was referred to saw no cause
To interfere, nor you to hide your full Contempt of him ; nor he, again, to smother
His wrath thereat, which raised so fierce a flame

That Basel soon was made no place for you.
Par. The affair of Liechtenfels ? the shal-lowest fable,

The last and silliest outrage — mere pretence !
I knew it, I foretold it from the first,
How soon the stupid wonder you mistook

For genuine loyalty — a cheering promise
Of better things to come — would pall and pass ;
And every word comes true. Saul is among
The prophets ! Just so long as I was pleased
To play off the mere antics of my art,
Fantastic gambols leading to no end,
I got huge praise ; but one can ne'er keep down
Our foolish nature's weakness. There they flocked,

Poor devils, jostling, swearing and perspiring,
Till the walls rang again ; and all for me !
I had a kindness for them, which was right ;
But then I stopped not till I tacked to that
A trust in them and a respect — a sort
Of sympathy for them ; I must needs begin
To teach them, not amaze them, " to impart
The spirit which should instigate the search
Of truth," just what you bade me ! I spoke out.
Forthwith a mighty squadron, in disgust,
Filed off — " the sifted chaff of the sack," I
said,

Redoubling my endeavors to secure
The rest. When lo ! one man had tarried so long

Only to ascertain if I supported
This tenet of his, or that ; another loved
To hear impartially before he judged,
And having heard, now judged ; this bland disciple

Passed for my dupe, but all along, it seems,
Spied error where his neighbors marvelled
most ;

That fiery doctor who had hailed me friend,
Did it because my by-paths, once proved wrong
And beacons properly, would commend again
The good old ways our sires jogged safely o'er,
Though not their squeamish sons ; the other worthy

Discovered divers verses of St. John,
Which, read successively, refreshed the soul,
But, mumbled backwards, cured the gout, the
stone,

The colic and what not. Quid multa ? The end
Was a clear class-room, and a quiet leer
From grave folk, and a sour reproachful glance
From those in chief who, cap in hand, installed
The new professor scarce a year before ;
And a vast flourish about patient merit
Obscured awhile by flashy tricks, but sure
Sooner or later to emerge in splendor —
Of which the example was some luckless wight
Whom my arrival had discomfited,
But now, it seems, the general voice recalled
To fill my chair and so efface the stain
Basel had long incurred. I sought no better,
Only a quiet dismissal from my post,
And from my heart I wished them better suited
And better served. Good night to Basel.
then !

But fast as I proposed to rid the tribe
Of my obnoxious back, I could not spare them
The pleasure of a parting kick.

Fest. You smile :
Despise them as they merit !

Par. If I smile,
'T is with as very contempt as ever turned Flesh into stone. This courteous recompense,
This grateful . . . Festus, were your nature fit

To be defiled, your eyes the eyes to ache
At gangrene-blotches, eating poison-blains,
The ulcerous barkscurf of leprosy
Which finds — a man, and leaves — a hideous
thing

That cannot but be mended by hell-fire,
— I would lay bare to you the human heart
Which God cursed long ago, and devils make since

Their pet nest and their never-tiring home.
Oh, sages have discovered we are born
For various ends — to love, to know: has ever
One stumbled, in his search, on any signs
Of a nature in us formed to hate? To hate?
If that be our true object which evokes
Our powers in fullest strength, be sure 't is hate!
Yet men have doubted if the best and bravest
Of spirits can nourish him with hate alone.
I had not the monopoly of fools,
It seems, at Basel.

Fest. But your plans, your plans!
I have yet to learn your purpose, Aureole!

Par. Whether to sink beneath such ponderous
shame,

To shrink up like a crushed snail, undergo
In silence and desist from further toil,
And so subside into a monument
Of one their censure blasted? or to bow
Cheerfully as submissively, to lower
My old pretensions even as Basel dictates,
To drop into the rank her wits assign me
And live as they prescribe, and make that use
Of my poor knowledge which their rules allow,
Proud to be patted now and then, and careful
To practise the true posture for receiving
The amplest benefit from their hoofs' appliance
When they shall condescend to tutor me?
Then, one may feel resentment like a flame
Within, and deck false systems in truth's garb,
And tangle and entwine mankind with error,
And give them darkness for a dower and falsehood

For a possession, ages: or one may mope
Into a shade through thinking, or else drowse
Into a dreamless sleep and so die off.
But I, — now Festus shall divine! — but I Am merely setting out once more, embracing
My earliest aims again! What thinks he now?

Fest. Your aims? the aims? — to Know?
and where is found

The early trust . . .

Par. Nay, not so fast; I say,
The aims — not the old means. You know they made me

A laughing-stock; I was a fool; you know
The when and the how: hardly those means again!

Not but they had their beauty; who should
know

Their passing beauty, if not I? Still, dreams
They were, so let them vanish, yet in beauty
If that may be. Stay: thus they pass in song!

[He sings.]

Heap cassia, sandal-buds and stripes
Of labdanum, and aloë-balls,
Smeared with dull nard an Indian waps
From out her hair: such balsam falls
Down sea-side mountain pedestals,

From tree-tops where tired winds are fain,
Spent with the vast and howling main,
To treasure half their island-gain.

And strew faint sweetness from some old
Egyptian's fine worm-eaten shroud
Which breaks to dust when once unrolled;
Or shredded perfume, like a cloud
From closet long to quiet vowed,
With moth and dropping arras hung,
Mouldering her lute and books among,
As when a queen, long dead, was young.

Mine, every word! And on such pile shall die
My lovely fancies, with fair perished things,
Themselves fair and forgotten; yes, forgotten,
Or why abjure them? So, I made this rhyme
That fitting dignity might be preserved;
No little proud was I; though the list of drugs
Smacks of my old vocation, and the verse
Halts like the best of Luther's psalms.

Fest. But, Aureole,
Talk not thus wildly and madly. I am here — Did you know all! I have travelled far, indeed,

To learn your wishes. Be yourself again!
For in this mood I recognize you less
Than in the horrible despondency
I witnessed last. You may account this, joy;
But rather let me gaze on that despair
Than hear these incoherent words and see
This flushed cheek and intensely-sparkling eye.

Par. Why, man, I was light-hearted in my prime,

I am light-hearted now; what would you have?
Aprile was a poet, I make songs —
'Tis the very augury of success I want!
Why should I not be joyous now as then?

Fest. Joyous! and how? and what remains for joy?

You have declared the ends (which I am sick
Of naming) are impracticable.

Par. Ay,
Pursued as I pursued them — the arch-fool:
Listen: my plan will please you not, 't is like
But you are little versed in the world's ways.
This is my plan — (first drinking its good luck, —
I will accept all helps; all I despised
So rashly at the outset, equally
With early impulses, late years have quenched:
I have tried each way singly: now for both!
All helps! no one sort shall exclude the rest.
I seek to know and to enjoy at once,
Not one without the other as before.
Suppose my labor should seem God's own cause
Once more, as first I dreamed, — it shall not balk me

Of the meanest earthliest sensualet delight
That may be snatched; for every joy is gain,
And gain is gain, however small. My soul
Can die then, nor be taunted — "what was gained?"

Nor, on the other hand, should pleasure follow
As though I had not spurned her hitherto,
Shall she o'ercloud my spirit's rapt communion
With the tumultuous past, the teeming future,
Glorious with visions of a full success.

Fest. Success!

Par. And wherefore not? Why not prefer Results obtained in my best state of being,
To those derived alone from seasons dark
As the thoughts they bred? When I was best, my youth

Unwasted, seemed success not surest too?
It is the nature of darkness to obscure.
I am a wanderer: I remember well
One journey, how I feared the track was missed,
So long the city I desired to reach
Lay hid; when suddenly its spires afar
Flashed through the circling clouds; you may conceive

My transport. Soon the vapors closed again,
But I had seen the city, and one such glance
No darkness could obscure: nor shall the present —

A few dull hours, a passing shame or two,
Destroy the vivid memories of the past.
I will fight the battle out; a little spent
Perhaps, but still an able combatant.
You look at my gray hair and furrowed brow?
But I can turn even weakness to account:
Of many tricks I know, 't is not the least
To push the ruins of my frame, whereon
The fire of vigor trembles scarce alive,
Into a heap, and send the flame aloft.
What should I do with age? So, sickness lends
An aid; it being, I fear, the source of all
We boast of: mind is nothing but disease,
And natural health is ignorance.

Fest. I see
But one good symptom in this notable scheme.
I feared your sudden journey had in view
To wreak immediate vengeance on your foes.
To rest is not so: I am glad.

Par. And if I please
To spit on them, to trample them, what then?
'T is sorry warfare truly, but the fools
Provoke it. I would spare their self-conceit,
But if they must provoke me, cannot suffer
Forbearance on my part, if I may keep
No quality in the shade, must needs put forth Power to match power, my strength against their strength,
And teach them their own game with their own arms —

Why, be it so and let them take their chance!
I am above them like a god, there's no
Hiding the fact: what idle scruples, then,
Were those that ever bade me soften it,
Communicate it gently to the world,
Instead of proving my supremacy,
Taking my natural station o'er their head,
Then owning all the glory was a man's!
— And in my elevation man's would be.
But live and learn, though life's short, learning
hard!

And therefore, though the wreck of my past self,
I fear, dear Pütter, that your lecture-room
Must wait awhile for its best ornament,
The penitent empiric, who set up
For somebody, but soon was taught his place;
Now, but too happy to be let confess
His error, snuff the candles, and illustrate (Fiat experientia corpore vili)
Your medicine's soundness in his person. Wait,
Good Pütter!

Fest. He who sneers thus, is a god!

Par. Ay, ay, laugh at me! I am very glad
You are not gulled by all this swaggering; you
Can see the root of the matter! — how I strive
To put a good face on the overthrow
I have experienced, and to bury and hide
My degradation in its length and breadth;
How the mean motives I would make you think
Just mingle as is due with nobler aims,
The appetites I modestly allow
May influence me as being mortal still —
Do goad me, drive me on, and fast supplant
My youth's desires. You are no stupid dupe:
You find me out! Yes, I had sent for you
To palm these childish lies upon you, Festus!
Laugh — you shall laugh at me!

Fest. The past, then, Aureole,
Proves nothing? Is our interchange of love
Yet to begin? Have I to swear I mean
No flattery in this speech or that? For you,
Whate'er you say, there is no degradation;
These low thoughts are no inmates of your mind,
Or wherefore this disorder? You are vexed
As much by the intrusion of base views,
Familiar to your adversaries, as they
Were troubled should your qualities alight
Amid their murky souls: not otherwise,
A stray wolf which the winter forces down
From our bleak hills, suffices to affright
A village in the vales — while foresters
Sleep calm, though all night long the famished troop

Snuff round and scratch against their crazy huts.
These evil thoughts are monsters, and will flee.

Par. May you be happy, Festus, my own
friend!

Fest. Nay, further; the delights you fail would think

The superseders of your nobler aims,
Though ordinary and harmless stimulants,
Will ne'er content you.

Par. Hush! I once despised them
But that soon passes. We are high at first
In our demand, nor will abate a jot
Of toil's strict value; but time passes o'er,
And humbler spirits accept what we refuse:
In short, when some such comfort is doled out
As these delights, we cannot long retain Bitter contempt which urges us at first
To hurl it back, but hug it to our breast
And thankfully retire. This life of mine
Must be lived out and a grave thoroughl earned:

I am just fit for that and naught beside.

I told you once, I cannot now enjoy,
Unless I deem my knowledge gains through joy;
Nor can I know, but straight warm tears reveal
My need of linking also joy to knowledge:
So, on I drive, enjoying all I can,
And knowing all I can. I speak, of course,
Confusedly; this will better explain — feel here
Quick beating, is it not? — a fire of the heart
To work off some way, this as well as any.
So, Festus sees me fairly launched; his calm Compassionate look might have disturbed m
once,

But now, far from rejecting, I invite
What bids me press the closer, lay myself

Open before him, and be soothed with pity ;
 I hope, if he command hope, and believe
 As he directs me — satiating myself
 With his enduring love. And Festus quits me
 To give place to some credulous disciple
 Who holds that God is wise, but Paracelsus
 Has his peculiar merits: I suck in
 That homage, chuckle o'er that admiration,
 And then dismiss the fool ; for night is come,
 And I betake myself to study again,
 Till patient searchings after hidden lore
 Half wring some bright truth from its prison ;
 my frame

Trembles, my forehead's veins swell out, my hair

Tingles for triumph. Slow and sure the morn Shall break on my pent room and dwindling
 lamp

And furnace dead, and scattered earths and ores ;

When, with a failing heart and throbbing brow,
 I must review my captured truth, sum up
 Its value, trace what ends to what begins,
 Its present power with its eventual bearings,
 Latent affinities, the views it opens,
 And its full length in perfecting my scheme.
 I view it sternly circumscribed, cast down
 From the high place my fond hopes yielded it, Proved worthless — which, in getting, yet had cost

Another wrench to this fast-falling frame.
 Then, quick, the cup to quaff, that chases sorrow !

I lapse back into youth, and take again
 My fluttering pulse for evidence that God
 Means good to me, will make my cause his own.
 See ! I have cast off this remorseless care
 Which clogged a spirit born to soar so free,
 And my dim chamber has become a tent,
 Festus is sitting by me, and his Michal . . .
 Why do you start ? I say, she listening here,
 (For yonder — Würzburg through the orchardbough !)

Motions as though such ardent words should find

No echo in a maiden's quiet soul,
 But her pure bosom heaves, her eyes fill fast
 With tears, her sweet lips tremble all the while !
 Ha, ha !

Fest. It seems, then, you expect to reap
 No unreal joy from this your present course,
 But rather . . .

Par. Death ! To die ! I owe that much
 To what, at least, I was. I should be sad
 To live contented after such a fall,
 To thrive and fatten after such reverse !
 The whole plan is a makeshift, but will last
 My time.

Fest. And you have never mused and said,
 " I had a noble purpose, and the strength
 To compass it ; but I have stopped half-way,
 And wrongly given the first-fruits of my toil
 To objects little worthy of the gift.
 Why linger round them still ? why clench my fault ?

Why seek for consolation in defeat,
 In vain endeavors to derive a beauty
 From ugliness ? why seek to make the most

Of what no power can change, nor strive instead
 With mighty effort to redeem the past
 And, gathering up the treasures thus cast down,
 To hold a steadfast course till I arrive
 At their fit destination and my own ? "

You have never pondered thus ?
Par. Have I, you ask ?
 Often at midnight, when most fancies come,
 Would some such airy project visit me :
 But ever at the end . . . or will you hear
 The same thing in a tale, a parable ?
 You and I, wandering over the world wide,
 Chance to set foot upon a desert coast.
 Just as we cry, " No human voice before Broke the inveterate silence of these rocks ! " —
 Their querulous echo startles us ; we turn :
 What ravaged structure still looks o'er the sea ?
 Some characters remain, too ! While we read,
 The sharp salt wind, impatient for the last
 Of even this record, wistfully comes and goes,
 Or sings what we recover, mocking it.
 This is the record ; and my voice, the wind's.

[He sings.]

Over the sea our galleys went,
 With cleaving prows in order brave
 To a speeding wind and a bounding wave

A gallant armament :
 Each bark built out of a forest-tree
 Left leafy and rough as first it grew,
 And nailed all over the gaping sides,
 Within and without, with black bull-hides,
 Seethed in fat and suppled in flame,
 To bear the playful billows' game :
 So, each good ship was rude to see,
 Rude and bare to the outward view.

But each upbore a stately tent
 Where cedar pales in scented row
 Kept out the flakes of the dancing brine,
 And an awning drooped the mast below,
 In fold on fold of the purple fine,
 That neither noontide nor starshine
 Nor moonlight cold which maketh mad,

Might pierce the regal tenement.
 When the sun dawned, oh, gay and glad
 We set the sail and plied the oar ;
 But when the night-wind blew like breath,
 For joy of one day's voyage more,
 We sang together on the wide sea,
 Like men at peace on a peaceful shore ;
 Each sail was loosed to the wind so free,
 Each helm made sure by the twilight star,
 And in a sleep as calm as death,

We, the voyagers from afar,
 Lay stretched along, each weary crew
 In a circle round its wondrous tent
 Whence gleamed soft light and curled rich scent,

And with light and perfume, music too :
 So the stars wheeled round, and the darkness
 past,

And at morn we started beside the mast,
 And still each ship was sailing fast.

Now, one morn, land appeared — a speck
 Dim trembling betwixt sea and sky :
 " Avoid it," cried our pilot, " check
 The shout, restrain the eager eye ! "
 But the heaving sea was black behind

For many a night and many a day,
And land, though but a rock, drew nigh;
So, we broke the cedar pales away,
Let the purple awning flap in the wind,
And a statue bright was on every deck!
We shouted, every man of us,
And steered right into the harbor thus,
With pomp and pæan glorious.

A hundred shapes of lucid stone!

All day we built its shrine for each,
A shrine of rock for every one,
Nor paused till in the westering sun
We sat together on the beach
To sing because our task was done.
When lo! what shouts and merry songs!
What laughter all the distance stirs!
A loaded raft with happy throngs
Of gentle islanders!

"Our isles are just at hand," they cried,
"Like cloudlets faint in even sleeping.

Our temple-gates are opened wide,
Our olive-groves thick shade are keeping
For these majestic forms" — they cried.
Oh, then we awoke with sudden start
From our deep dream, and knew, too late,
How bare the rock, how desolate,
Which had received our precious freight:

Yet we called out — "Depart!
Our gifts, once given, must here abide.
Our work is done; we have no heart
To mar our work," — we cried.

Fest. In truth?

Par. Nay, wait: all this in tracings faint
On rugged stones strewn here and there, but piled
In order once: then follows — mark what follows!

"The sad rhyme of the men who proudly clung
To their first fault, and withered in their pride."

Fest. Come back then, Aureole; as you fear God, come!

This is foul sin; come back! Renounce the past,
Forswear the future; look for joy no more,
But wait death's summons amid holy sights,
And trust me for the event — peace, if not joy.
Return with me to Einsiedeln, dear Aureole!

Par. No way, no way! it would not turn to good.

A spotless child slumber on the flowering moss —
'T is well for him; but when a sinful man,
Envyng such slumber, may desire to put
His guilt away, shall he return at once
To rest by lying there? Our sires knew well (Spite of the grave discoveries of their sons)
The fitting course for such: dark cells, dim lamps,

A stone floor one may writhe on like a worm:
No mossy pillow blue with violets!

Fest. I see no symptom of these absolute
And tyrannous passions. You are calmer now.
This verse-making can purge you well enough
Without the terrible penance you describe.
You love me still: the lusts you fear will never Outrage your friend. To Einsiedeln, once more!
Say but the word!

Par. No, no; those lusts forbid:

They crouch, I know, cowering with half-shut
eye

Beside you; 't is their nature. Thrust yourself Between them and their prey; let some fool style me

Or king or quack, it matters not — then try
Your wisdom, urge them to forego their trait!
No, no; learn better and look deeper, Festus!
If you knew how a devil sneers within me
While you are talking now of this, now that,
As though we differed scarcely save in trifles!

Fest. Do we so differ? True, change must proceed,

Whether for good or ill; keep from me, which!
Do not confide all secrets: I was born
To hope, and you . . .

Par. To trust: you know the fruits!

Fest. Listen: I do believe, what you call trust
Was self-delusion at the best: for, see!

So long as God would kindly pioneer
A path for you, and screen you from the world,
Procure you full exemption from man's lot,
Man's common hopes and fears, on the mere pretext

Of your engagement in his service — yield you
A limitless license, make you God, in fact,
And turn your slave — you were content to say
Most courtly praises! What is it, at last,
But selfishness without example? None Could trace God's will so plain as you, while
yours

Remained implied in it; but now you fail,
And we, who prate about that will, are fools!
In short, God's service is established here
As he determines fit, and not your way,
And this you cannot brook. Such discontent
Is weak. Renounce all creatureship at once!
Affirm an absolute right to have and use
Your energies; as though the rivers should
say —

"We rush to the ocean; what have we to do
With feeding streamlets, lingering in the vales,
Sleeping in lazy pools?" Set up that plea,
That will be bold at least!

Par. 'T is like enough.

The serviceable spirits are those, no doubt,
The East produces: lo, the master bids, —
They wake, raise terraces and garden-grounds
In one night's space; and, this done, straight begin

Another century's sleep, to the great praise
Of him that framed them wise and beautiful,
Till a lamp's rubbing, or some chance akin,
Wake them again. I am of different mould.
I would have soothed my lord, and slaved for
him

And done him service past my narrow bond,
And thus I get rewarded for my pains!
Beside, 't is vain to talk of forwarding
God's glory otherwise: this is alone
The sphere of its increase, as far as men
Increase it; why, then, look beyond this sphere?
We are his glory; and if we be glorious,
Is not the thing achieved?

Fest. Shall one like me Judge hearts like yours? Though years have changed you much,
And you have left your first love, and retain

Its empty shade to veil your crooked ways,
Yet I still hold that you have honored God.
And who shall call your course without reward?
For, wherefore this repining at defeat
Had triumph ne'er inured you to high hopes?
I urge you to forsake the life you curse,
And what success attends me? — simply talk
Of passion, weakness and remorse; in short,
Anything but the naked truth — you choose
This so-despised career, and cheaply hold
My happiness, or rather other men's.
Once more, return!

Par. And quickly. John the thief
Has pilfered half my secrets by this time:
And we depart by daybreak. I am weary,
I know not how; not even the wine-cup soothes
My brain to-night . . .
Do you not thoroughly despise me, Festus?
No flattery! One like you needs not be told
We live and breathe deceiving and deceived.
Do you not scorn me from your heart of hearts,
Me and my cant, each petty subterfuge,
My rhymes and all this frothy shower of words,
My glozing self-deceit, my outward crust
Of lies which wrap, as tetter, morpew, furfur
Wrap the sound flesh? — so, see you flatter not!
Even God flatters: but my friend, at least,
Is true. I would depart, secure henceforth
Against all further insult, hate and wrong
From puny foes; my one friend's scorn shall brand me:

No fear of sinking deeper!

Fest. No, dear Aureole!
No, no; I came to counsel faithfully.
There are old rules, made long ere we were
born,
By which I judge you. I, so fallible,
So infinitely low beside your mighty
Majestic spirit! — even I can see
You own some higher law than ours which call
Sin, what is no sin — weakness, what is strength.
But I have only these, such as they are,
To guide me; and I blame you where they bid,
Only so long as blaming promises
To win peace for your soul: the more, that sorrow

Has fallen on me of late, and they have helped me
So that I faint not under my distress.
But wherefore should I scruple to avow
In spite of all, as brother judging brother,
Your fate is most inexplicable to me?
And should you perish without recompense
And satisfaction yet — too hastily
I have relied on love: you may have sinned,
But you have loved. As a mere human matter —

As I would have God deal with fragile men
In the end — I say that you will triumph yet!

Par. Have you felt sorrow, Festus? — 't is because

You love me. Sorrow, and sweet Michal yours!
Well thought on: never let her know this last
Dull winding-up of all: these miscreants dared
Insult me — me she loved: — so, grieve her not!

Fest. Your ill success can little grieve her
now.

Par. Michal is dead! pray Christ we do not craze!

Fest. Aureole, dear Aureole, look not on me
thus!

Fool, fool! this is the heart grown sorrow-
proof —

I cannot bear those eyes.

Par. Nay, really dead?

Fest. 'T is scarce a month.

Par. Stone dead! — then you have laid her Among the flowers ere this. Now, do you
know,

I can reveal a secret which shall comfort
Even you. I have no julep, as men think,
To cheat the grave; but a far better secret.
Know, then, you did not ill to trust your love
To the cold earth: I have thought much of it:
For I believe we do not wholly die.

Fest. Aureole!

Par. Nay, do not laugh; there is a reason
For what I say: I think the soul can never Taste death. I am, just now, as you may see,
Very unfit to put so strange a thought
In an intelligible dress of words;
But take it as my trust, she is not dead.

Fest. But not on this account alone? you surely,

— Aureole, you have believed this all along?

Par. And Michal sleeps among the roots and dews,

While I am moved at Basel, and full of schemes
For Nuremberg, and hoping and despairing,
As though it mattered how the farce plays out,
So it be quickly played. Away, away!
Have your will, rabble! while we fight the
prize,

Troop you in safety to the snug back-seats
And leave a clear arena for the brave
About to perish for your sport! — Behold!

V. PARACELSUS ATTAINS

SCENE, Salzburg: a cell in the Hospital of St. Sebastian.
1541.

FESTUS, PARACELSUS.

Fest. No change! The weary night is well-nigh spent,

The lamp burns low, and through the casement-bars

Gray morning glimmers feebly: yet no change!

Another night, and still no sigh has stirred

That fallen discolored mouth, no pang relit

Those fixed eyes, quenched by the decaying body,

Like torch-flame choked in dust. While all beside

Was breaking, to the last they held out bright,

As a stronghold where life intrenched itself;

But they are dead now — very blind and dead:
He will drowse into death without a groan.

My Aureole — my forgotten, ruined Aureole!
The days are gone, are gone! How grand thou wast!

And now not one of those who struck thee
down —

Poor g'lorious spirit — concerns him even to stay

And satisfy himself his little hand
Could turn God's image to a livid thing.

Another night, and yet no change! 'Tis much
That I should sit by him, and bathe his brow,
And chafe his hands; 'tis much: but he will
sure

Know me, and look on me, and speak to me
Once more — but only once! His hollow cheek Looked all night long as though a creeping laugh

At his own state were just about to break
From the dying man: my brain swam, my throat swelled,

And yet I could not turn away. In truth,
They told me how, when first brought here, he seemed

Resolved to live, to lose no faculty;
Thus striving to keep up his shattered strength,
Until they bore him to this stifling cell:
When straight his features fell, an hour made
white

The flushed face, and relaxed the quivering
limb,

Only the eye remained intense awhile
As though it recognized the tomb-like place,
And then he lay as here he lies.

Ay, here!
Here is earth's noblest, nobly garlanded —
Her bravest champion with his well-won
prize —

Her best achievement, her sublime amends
For countless generations fleeting fast
And followed by no trace; — the creature-god
She instances when angels would dispute
The title of her brood to rank with them.
Angels, this is our angel! Those bright forms
We clothe with purple, crown and call to thrones,

Are human, but not his; those are but men
Whom other men press round and kneel before;
Those palaces are dwelt in by mankind;
Higher provision is for him you seek
Amid our pomps and glories: see it here!
Behold earth's paragon! Now, raise thee,
clay!

God! Thou art love! I build my faith on that.
Even as I watch beside thy tortured child
Unconscious whose hot tears fall fast by him,
So doth thy right hand guide us through the
world

Wherein we stumble. God! what shall we say?
How has he sinned? How else should he have done?

Surely he sought thy praise — thy praise, for all
He might be busied by the task so much
As half forget awhile its proper end.

Dost thou well, Lord? Thou canst not but prefer

That I should range myself upon his side —
How could he stop at every step to set
Thy glory forth? Hadst thou but granted him
Success, thy honor would have crowned success,
A halo round a star. Or, say he erred, —
Save him, dear God; it will be like thee: bathe
him

In light and life! Thou art not made like us;

We should be wroth in such a case; but thou
Forgivest — so, forgive these passionate thoughts
Which come unsought and will not pass away!
I know thee, who hast kept my path, and made Light for me in the darkness, tempering sorrow
So that it reached me like a solemn joy;
It were too strange that I should doubt thy love.
But what am I? Thou madest him and knowest
How he was fashioned. I could never err
That way: the quiet place beside thy feet,
Reserved for me, was ever in my thoughts:
But he — thou shouldst have favored him as
well!

Ah! he awakens! Aureole, I am here! 'tis Festus!

I cast away all wishes save one wish —
Let him but know me, only speak to me!
He mutters; louder and louder; any other
Than I, with brain less laden, could collect
What he pours forth. Dear Aureole, do but look!

Is it talking or singing, this he utters fast?
Misery that he should fix me with his eye,
Quick talking to some other all the while!
If he would husband this wild vehemence
Which frustrates its intent! — I heard, I know
I heard my name amid those rapid words.
Oh, he will know me yet! Could I divert
This current, lead it somehow gently back
Into the channels of the past! — His eye
Brighter than ever! It must recognize me!

I am Erasmus: I am here to pray
That Paracelsus use his skill for me.
The schools of Paris and of Padua send
These questions for your learning to resolve.
We are your students, noble master: leave
This wretched cell, what business have you
here?

Our class awaits you; come to us once more!
(O agony! the utmost I can do Touches him not; how else arrest his ear?)
I am commissioned . . . I shall craze like him.
Better be mute and see what God shall send.

Par. Stay, stay with me!

Fest. I will; I am come here
To stay with you — Festus, you loved of old;
Festus, you know, you must know!

Par. Festus! Where's
Aprile, then? Has he not chanted softly
The melodies I heard all night? I could not Get to him for a cold hand on my breast,
But I made out his music well enough,
O well enough! If they have filled him full
With magical music, as they freight a star
With light, and have remitted all his sin,
They will forgive me too, I too shall know!

Fest. Festus, your Festus!

Par. Ask him if Aprile
Knows as he Loves — if I shall Love and Know?
I try; but that cold hand, like lead — so cold!

Fest. My hand, see!

Par. Ah, the curse, Aprile, Aprile!
We get so near — so very, very near!
'Tis an old tale: Jove strikes the Titans down,
Not when they set about their mountain-piling
But when another rock would crown the work.

And Phaeton — doubtless his first radiant plunge
Astonished mortals, though the gods were calm,
And Jove prepared his thunder: all old tales!

Fest. And what are these to you?

Par. Ay, fiends must laugh
So cruelly, so well! most like I never Could tread a single pleasure underfoot,
But they were grinning by my side, were chuck-
ling

To see me toil and drop away by flakes!
Hell-spawn! I am glad, most glad, that thus I fail!

Your cunning has o'ershot its aim. One year,
One month, perhaps, and I had served your
turn!

You should have curbed your spite awhile. But
now,

Who will believe 't was you that held me back?
Listen: there's shame and hissing and contempt,

And none but laughs who names me, none but spits

Measureless scorn upon me, me alone,
The quack, the cheat, the liar, — all on me!
And thus your famous plan to sink mankind
In silence and despair, by teaching them
One of their race had probed the inmost truth,
Had done all man could do, yet failed no less —
Your wise plan proves abortive. Men despair?
Ha, ha! why, they are hooting the empiric,
The ignorant and incapable fool who rushed
Madly upon a work beyond his wits;
Nor doubt they but the simplest of themselves
Could bring the matter to triumphant issue.
So, pick and choose among them all, accursed!
Try now, persuade some other to slave for you,
To ruin body and soul to work your ends!
No, no; I am the first and last, I think.

Fest. Dear friend, who are accursed? who has done . . .

Par. What have I done? Fiends dare ask that? or you,
Brave men? Oh, you can chime in boldly, backed

By the others! What had you to do, sage peers?
Here stand my rivals; Latin, Arab, Jew,
Greek, join dead hands against me: all I ask
Is, that the world enroll my name with theirs,
And even this poor privilege, it seems,
They range themselves, prepared to disallow.
Only observe! why, fiends may learn from them!
How they talk calmly of my throes, my fierce Aspirings, terrible watchings, each one claiming
Its price of blood and brain; how they dissect
And sneeringly disparage the few truths
Got at a life's cost; they too hanging the while
About my neck, their lies misleading me
And their dead names browbeating me! Gray crew,

Yet steeped in fresh malevolence from hell,
Is there a reason for your hate? My truths
Have shaken a little the palm about each prince?
Just think, Aprile, all these leering dotards
Were bent on nothing less than to be crowned
As we! That yellow blear-eyed wretch in chief
To whom the rest cringe low with feigned respect,

Galen of Pergamos and he! — nay speak

The tale, old man! We met there face to face:
I said the crown should fall from thee. Once
more

We meet as in that ghastly vestibule:
Look to my brow! Have I redeemed my pledge?

Fest. Peace, peace; ah, see!

Par. Oh, emptiness of fame!
O Persie Zoroaster, lord of stars!
— Who said these old renowns, dead long ago,
Could make me overlook the living world
To gaze through gloom at where they stood, indeed,

But stand no longer? What a warm light life
After the shade! In truth, my delicate witch,
My serpent-queen, you did but well to hide
The juggles I had else detected. Fire
May well run harmless o'er a breast like yours!
The cave was not so darkened by the smoke
But that your white limbs dazzled me: oh, white,
And panting as they twinkled, wildly dancing!
I cared not for your passionate gestures then,
But now I have forgotten the charm of charms,
The foolish knowledge which I came to seek,
While I remember that quaint dance; and thus
I am come back, not for those mummeries,
But to love you, and to kiss your little feet
Soft as an ermine's winter coat!

Fest. A light
Will struggle through these thronging words at
last,

As in the angry and tumultuous West
A soft star trembles through the drifting clouds.
These are the strivings of a spirit which hates
So sad a vault should coop it, and calls up
The past to stand between it and its fate.

Were he at Einsiedeln — or Michal here!

Par. Cruel! I seek her now — I kneel — I shriek —

I clasp her vesture — but she fades, still fades;
And she is gone; sweet human love is gone!
'T is only when they spring to heaven that angels
Reveal themselves to you; they sit all day
Beside you, and lie down at night by you
Who care not for their presence, muse or sleep,
And all at once they leave you, and you know
them!

We are so fooled, so cheated! Why, even now
I am not too secure against foul play;
The shadows deepen and the walls contract:
No doubt some treachery is going on.

'T is very dusk. Where are we put, Aprile?
Have they left us in the lurch? This murky loathsome

Death-trap, this slaughter-house, is not the hall
In the golden city! Keep by me, Aprile!
There is a hand groping amid the blackness
To catch us. Have the spider-fingers got you,
Poet? Hold on me for your life! If once
They pull you! — Hold!

'T is but a dream — no more!
I have you still; the sun comes out again;
Let us be happy: all will yet go well!
Let us confer: is it not like, Aprile,
That spite of trouble, this ordeal passed,
The value of my labors ascertained,
Just as some stream foams long among the rocks

But after glideth glassy to the sea,

So, full content shall henceforth be my lot?
What think you, poet? Louder! Your clear voice

Vibrates too like a harp-string. Do you ask
How could I still remain on earth, should God
Grant me the great approval which I seek?
I, you, and God can comprehend each other,
But men would murmur, and with cause enough;
For when they saw me, stainless of all sin,
Preserved and sanctified by inward light,
They would complain that comfort, shut from
them,

I drank thus unespied; that they live on,
Nor taste the quiet of a constant joy,
For ache and care and doubt and weariness,
While I am calm; help being vouchsafed to me,
And hid from them. — 'T were best consider
that!

You reason well, Aprile; but at least
Let me know this, and die! Is this too much?
I will learn this, if God so please, and die!

If thou shalt please, dear God, if thou shalt please!

We are so weak, we know our motives least
In their confused beginning. If at first I sought . . . but wherefore bare my heart to thee?

I know thy mercy; and already thoughts
Flock fast about my soul to comfort it,
And intimate I cannot wholly fail,
For love and praise would clasp me willingly
Could I resolve to seek them. Thou art good,
And I should be content. Yet — yet first show
I have done wrong in daring! Rather give
The supernatural consciousness of strength
Which fed my youth! Only one hour of that,
With thee to help — O what should bar me
then!

Lost, lost! Thus things are ordered here!
God's creatures,

And yet he takes no pride in us! — none, none!
Truly there needs another life to come!
If this be all — (I must tell Festus that)
And other life await us not — for one,
I say 't is a poor cheat, a stupid bungle,
A wretched failure. I, for one, protest
Against it, and I hurl it back with scorn.

Well, onward though alone! Small time remains,

And much to do: I must have fruit, must reap
Some profit from my toils. I doubt my body
Will hardly serve me through; while I have labored

It has decayed; and now that I demand
Its best assistance, it will crumble fast:
A sad thought, a sad fate! How very full
Of wormwood 't is, that just at altar-service,
The rapt hymn rising with the rolling smoke,
When glory dawns and all is at the best,
The sacred fire may flicker and grow faint
And die for want of a wood-pile's help!
Thus fades the flagging body, and the soul
Is pulled down in the overthrow. Well, well —
Let men catch every word, let them lose naught
Of what I say; something may yet be done.

They are ruins! Trust me who am one of you!
All ruins, glorious once, but lonely now.

It makes my heart sick to behold you crouch
Beside your desolate fane: the arches dim,
The crumbling columns grand against the moon,
Could I but rear them up once more — but that May never be, so leave them! Trust me,
friends,

Why should you linger here when I have built
A far resplendent temple, all your own?
Trust me, they are but ruins! See, Aprile,
Men will not heed! Yet were I not prepared
With better refuge for them, congue of mine
Should ne'er reveal how blank their dwelling is:
I would sit down in silence with the rest.

Ha, what? you spit at me, you grin and shriek
Contempt into my ear — my ear which drank
God's accents once? you curse me? Why men,
men,

I am not formed for it! Those hideous eyes
Will be before me sleeping, waking, praying,
They will not let me even die. Spare, spare me,
Sinning or no, forget that, only spare me
The horrible scorn! You thought I could support it.

But now you see what silly fragile creature
Cowers thus. I am not good nor bad enough,
Not Christ nor Cain, yet even Cain was saved
From Hate like this. Let me but totter back!
Perhaps I shall elude those jeers which creep
Into my very brain, and shut these scorched
Eyelids and keep those mocking faces out.

Listen, Aprile! I am very calm:
Be not deceived, there is no passion here
Where the blood leaps like an imprisoned thing:
I am calm: I will exterminate the race!
Enough of that: 't is said and it shall be.
And now be merry: safe and sound am I Who broke through their best ranks to get at
you.

And such a havoc, such a rout, Aprile!

Fest. Have you no thought, no memory for
me,

Aureole? I am so wretched — my pure Michal
Is gone, and you alone are left me now,
And even you forget me. Take my hand —
Lean on me thus. Do you not know me, Aureole?

Par. Festus, my own friend, you are come at
last?

As you say, 't is an awful enterprise;
But you believe I shall go through with it:
'T is like you, and I thank you. Thank him
for me,

Dear Michal! See how bright St. Saviour's spire
Flames in the sunset; all its figures quaint Gay in the glancing light: you might conceive
them

A troop of yellow-vested white-haired Jews
Bound for their own land where redemption dawns.

Fest. Not that blest time — not our youth's time, dear God!

Par. Ha — stay! true, I forget — all is done
since,
And he is come to judge me. How he speaks,

How calm, how well! yes, it is true, all true;
 All quackery; all deceit; myself can laugh
 The first at it, if you desire: but still
 You know the obstacles which taught me tricks
 So foreign to my nature — envy and hate,
 Blind opposition, brutal prejudice,
 Bald ignorance — what wonder if I sunk
 To humor men the way they most approved?
 My cheats were never palmed on such as you,
 Dear Festus! I will kneel if you require me,
 Impart the meagre knowledge I possess,
 Explain its bounded nature, and avow
 My insufficiency — whate'er you will:
 I give the fight up: let there be an end,
 A privacy, an obscure nook for me,
 I want to be forgotten even by God.
 But if that cannot be, dear Festus, lay me,
 When I shall die, within some narrow grave,
 Not by itself — for that would be too proud —
 But where such graves are thickest; let it look
 Nowise distinguished from the hillocks round,
 So that the peasant at his brother's bed
 May tread upon my own and know it not;
 And we shall all be equal at the last,
 Or classed according to life's natural ranks,
 Fathers, sons, brothers, friends — not rich, nor wise,
 Nor gifted: lay me thus, then say, "He lived
 Too much advanced before his brother men;
 They kept him still in front: 't was for their
 good,

But yet a dangerous station. It were strange
 That he should tell God he had never ranked
 With men: so, here at least he is a man."

Fest. That God shall take thee to his breast,
 dear spirit,

Unto his breast, be sure! and here on earth
 Shall splendor sit upon thy name forever.
 Sun! all the heaven is glad for thee: what care
 If lower mountains light their snowy phares
 At thine effulgence, yet acknowledge not
 The source of day? Their theft shall be their bale:

For after-ages shall retrack thy beams,
 And put aside the crowd of busy ones
 And worship thee alone — the master-mind,
 The thinker, the explorer, the creator!
 Then, who should sneer at the convulsive throes
 With which thy deeds were born, would scorn
 as well

The sheet of winding subterranean fire
 Which, pent and writhing, sends no less at last
 Huge islands up amid the simmering sea.
 Behold thy might in me! thou hast infused
 Thy soul in mine; and I am grand as thou,
 Seeing I comprehend thee — I so simple,
 Thou so august. I recognize thee first;
 I saw thee rise, I watched thee early and late,
 And though no glance reveal thou dost accept
 My homage — thus no less I proffer it,
 And bid thee enter gloriously thy rest.

Par. Festus!

Fest. I am for noble Aureole, God!
 I am upon his side, come weal or woe.
 His portion shall be mine. He has done well.
 I would have sinned, had I been strong enough,
 As he has sinned. Reward him or I waive
 Reward! If thou canst find no place for him,

He shall be king elsewhere, and I will be
 His slave forever. There are two of us.

Par. Dear Festus!

Fest. Here, dear Aureole! ever by you!

Par. Nay, speak on, or I dream again.
 Speak on!

Some story, anything — only your voice,
 I shall dream else. Speak on! ay, leaning so!

Fest. Thus the Mayne glideth

Where my Love abideth.

Sleep 's no softer: it proceeds

On through lawns, on through meads,

On and on, whate'er befall,

Meandering and musical,

Though the niggard pasturage

Bears not on its shaven ledge

Aught but weeds and waving grasses

To view the river as it passes,

Save here and there a scanty patch

Of primroses too faint to catch

A weary bee.

Par. More, more; say on!

Fest. And scarce it pushes

Its gentle way through strangling rushes

Where the glossy kingfisher

Flutters when noon-heats are near,

Glad the shelving banks to shun,

Red and steaming in the sun,

Where the shrew-mouse with pale throat

Burrows, and the speckled stoat;

Where the quick sandpipers flit

In and out the marl and grit

That seems to breed them, brown as they:

Naught disturbs its quiet way,

Save some lazy stork that springs,

Trailing it with legs and wings,

Whom the shy fox from the hill

Rouses, creep he ne'er so still.

Par. My heart! they loose my heart, those simple words;

Its darkness passes, which naught else could touch:

Like some dark snake that force may not expel,
 Which glideth out to music sweet and low.

What were you doing when your voice broke
 through

A chaos of ugly images? You, indeed!

Are you alone here?

Fest. All alone: you know me?
 This cell?

Par. An unexceptionable vault:
 Good brick and stone: the bats kept out, the rats

Kept in: a snug nook: how should I mistake it?

Fest. But wherefore am I here?

Par. Ah, well remembered!

Why, for a purpose — for a purpose, Festus!

'T is like me: here I trifle while time fleets,

And this occasion, lost, will ne'er return.

You are here to be instructed. I will tell

God's message; but I have so much to say,

I fear to leave half out. All is confused

No doubt; but doubtless you will learn in time.
 He would not else have brought you here: no
 doubt

I shall see clearer soon.

Fest. Tell me but this —

You are not in despair?

Par. I? and for what?
Fest. Alas, alas! he knows not, as I feared!
Par. What is it you would ask me with that earnest

Dear searching face?

Fest. How feel you, Aureole?
Par. Well:

Well. 'Tis a strange thing: I am dying, Festus, And now that fast the storm of life subsides, I first perceive how great the whirl has been. I was calm then, who am so dizzy now — Calm in the thick of the tempest, but no less A partner of its motion and mixed up With its career. The hurricane is spent, And the good boat speeds through the brightening weather;

But is it earth or sea that heaves below?
 The gulf rolls like a meadow-swell, o'erstrewn With ravaged boughs and remnants of the shore;
 And now some islet, loosened from the land, Swims past with all its trees, sailing to ocean;
 And now the air is full of upturn canes, Light strippings from the fan-trees, tamarisks Unrooted, with their birds still clinging to them, All high in the wind. Even so my varied life Drifts by me; I am young, old, happy, sad, Hoping, desponding, acting, taking rest, And all at once: that is, those past conditions Float back at once on me. If I select Some special epoch from the crowd, 'tis but To will, and straight the rest dissolve away, And only that particular state is present With all its long-forgotten circumstance Distinct and vivid as at first — myself A careless looker-on and nothing more, Indifferent and amused, but nothing more. And this is death: I understand it all. New being waits me; new perceptions must Be born in me before I plunge therein;
 Which last is Death's affair; and while I speak, Minute by minute he is filling me With power; and while my foot is on the threshold

Of boundless life — the doors unopened yet, All preparations not complete within — I turn new knowledge upon old events, And the effect is . . . but I must not tell;
 It is not lawful. Your own turn will come One day. Wait, Festus! You will die like me.
Fest. 'Tis of that past life that I burn to hear.

Par. You wonder it engages me just now?
 In truth, I wonder too. What's life to me? Where'er I look is fire, where'er I listen Music, and where I tend bliss evermore. Yet how can I refrain? 'Tis a refined Delight to view those chances, — one last view. I am so near the perils I escape, That I must play with them and turn them over, To feel how fully they are past and gone. Still, it is like, some further cause exists For this peculiar mood — some hidden purpose; Did I not tell you something of it, Festus? I had it fast, but it has somehow slipped Away from me; it will return anon.

Fest. (Indeed his cheek seems young again, his voice Complete with its old tones: that little laugh Concluding every phrase, with upturned eye, As though one stooped above his head to whom He looked for confirmation and approval, Where was it gone so long, so well preserved? Then, the forefinger pointing as he speaks, Like one who traces in an open book The matter he declares; 'tis many a year Since I remarked it last; and this in him, But now a ghastly wreck!)

And can it be, Dear Aureole, you have then found out at last That worldly things are utter vanity? That man is made for weakness, and should wait In patient ignorance, till God appoint . . .

Par. Ha, the purpose: the true purpose: that is it!

How could I fail to apprehend! You here, I thus! But no more trifling: I see all, I know all: my last mission shall be done If strength suffice. No trifling! Stay; this posture

Hardly befits one thus about to speak: I will arise.

Fest. Nay, Aureole, are you wild? You cannot leave your couch.

Par. No help; no help; Not even your hand. So! there, I stand once more!

Speak from a couch? I never lectured thus. My gown — the scarlet lined with fur; now put The chain about my neck; my signet-ring Is still upon my hand, I think — even so; Last, my good sword; ah, trusty Azoth, leapest Beneath thy master's grasp for the last time? This couch shall be my throne: I bid these walls Be consecrate, this wretched cell become A shrine, for here God speaks to men through me.

Now, Festus, I am ready to begin.

Fest. I am dumb with wonder.

Par. Listen, therefore, Festus! There will be time enough, but none to spare. I must content myself with telling only The most important points. You doubtless feel That I am happy, Festus; very happy.

Fest. 'Tis no delusion which uplifts him thus! Then you are pardoned, Aureole, all your sin?

Par. Ay, pardoned: yet why pardoned?

Fest. 'Tis God's praise That man is bound to seek, and you . . .

Par. Have lived! We have to live alone to set forth well God's praise. 'Tis true, I sinned much, as I thought,

And in effect need mercy, for I strove To do that very thing; but, do your best Or worst, praise rises, and will rise forever. Pardon from him, because of praise denied — Who calls me to himself to exalt himself? He might laugh as I laugh!

Fest. But all comes To the same thing. 'Tis fruitless for mankind

To fret themselves with what concerns them not; They are no use that way: they should lie down Content as God has made them, nor go mad In thriveless cares to better what is ill.

Par. No, no; mistake me not; let me not work

More harm than I have worked ! This is my case :

If I go joyous back to God, yet bring
No offering, if I render up my soul
Without the fruits it was ordained to bear,
If I appear the better to love God
For sin, as one who has no claim on him,
Be not deceived ! It may be surely thus
With me, while higher prizes still await
The mortal persevering to the end.
Beside I am not all so valueless :
I have been something, though too soon I left
Following the instincts of that happy time.

Fest. What happy time ? For God's sake,
for man's sake,

What time was happy ? All I hope to know
That answer will decide. What happy time ?

Par. When but the time I vowed myself to
man ?

Fest. Great God, thy judgments are inscrutable !

Par. Yes, it was in me ; I was born for it —
I, Paracelsus : it was mine by right.

Doubtless a searching and impetuous soul
Might learn from its own motions that some task
Like this awaited it about the world ;
Might seek somewhere in this blank life of ours
For fit delights to stay its longings vast ;
And, grappling Nature, so prevail on her
To fill the creature full she dared thus frame
Hungry for joy ; and, bravely tyrannous,
Grow in demand, still craving more and more,
And make each joy conceded prove a pledge
Of other joy to follow — bating naught
Of its desires, still seizing fresh pretence
To turn the knowledge and the rapture wrung
As an extreme, last boon, from destiny,
Into occasion for new covetings,
New strifes, new triumphs : — doubtless a strong
soul,

Alone, unaided might attain to this,
So glorious is our nature, so august
Man's inborn uninstructed impulses,
His naked spirit so majestic !
But this was born in me ; I was made so ;
Thus much time saved : the feverish appetites,
The tumult of unproved desire, the unaimed
Uncertain yearnings, aspirations blind,
Distrust, mistake, and all that ends in tears
Were saved me ; thus I entered on my course.
You may be sure I was not all exempt
From human trouble ; just so much of doubt
As bade me plant a surer foot upon
The sun-road, kept my eye unruined 'mid
The fierce and flashing splendor, set my heart
Trembling so much as warned me I stood there
On sufferance — not to idly gaze, but cast
Light on a darkling race ; save for that doubt,
I stood at first where all aspire at last
To stand : the secret of the world was mine.
I knew, I felt, (perception unexpressed,
Uncomprehended by our narrow thought,
But somehow felt and known in every shift
And change in the spirit, — nay, in every pore
Of the body, even,) — what God is, what we are,
What life is — how God tastes an infinite joy
In infinite ways — one everlasting bliss,
From whom all being emanates, all power

Proceeds ; in whom is life forevermore,
Yet whom existence in its lowest form
Includes ; where dwells enjoyment there is he :
With still a flying point of bliss remote,
A happiness in store afar, a sphere
Of distant glory in full view ; thus climbs
Pleasure its heights forever and forever.
The centre-fire heaves underneath the earth,
And the earth changes like a human face ;
The molten ore bursts up among the rocks,
Winds into the stone's heart, outbranches bright
In hidden mines, spots barren river-beds,
Crumbles into fine sand where sunbeams bask —
God joys therein. The wroth sea's waves are edged

With foam, white as the bitten lip of hate,
When, in the solitary waste strange groups
Of young volcanos come up, cyclops-like,
Staring together with their eyes on flame —
God tastes a pleasure in their uncouth pride.
Then all is still ; earth is a wintry clod :
But spring-wind, like a dancing psaltress, passes
Over its breast to waken it, rare verdure
Buds tenderly upon rough banks, between
The withered tree-roots and the cracks of frost,
Like a smile striving with a wrinkled face ;
The grass grows bright, the boughs are swoln
with blooms

Like chrysalids impatient for the air,
The shining dorrs are busy, beetles run
Along the furrows, ants make their ado ;
Above, birds fly in merry flocks, the lark
Soars up and up, shivering for very joy ;
Afar the ocean sleeps ; white fishing-gulls
Flit where the strand is purple with its tribe
Of nested limpets ; savage creatures seek
Their loves in wood and plain — and God renews
His ancient rapture. Thus he dwells in all,
From life's minute beginnings, up at last
To man — the consummation of this scheme
Of being, the completion of this sphere
Of life : whose attributes had here and there
Been scattered o'er the visible world before,
Asking to be combined, dim fragments meant
To be united in some wondrous whole,
Imperfect qualities throughout creation,
Suggesting some one creature yet to make,
Some point where all those scattered rays should meet

Convergent in the faculties of man.

Power — neither put forth blindly, nor controlled

Calmly by perfect knowledge ; to be used
At risk, inspired or checked by hope and fear :
Knowledge — not intuition, but the slow
Uncertain fruit of an enhancing toil,
Strengthened by love : love — not serenely pure,
But strong from weakness, like a chance-sown
plant

Which, cast on stubborn soil, puts forth changed buds

And softer stains, unknown in happier climes ;
Love which endures and doubts and is oppressed
And cherished, suffering much and much sustained,

And blind, oft-failing, yet believing love,
A half-enlightened, often-checked trust : —
Hints and previsions of which faculties,

Are strewn confusedly everywhere about
The inferior natures, and all lead up higher,
All shape out dimly the superior race,
The heir of hopes too fair to turn out false,
And man appears at last. So far the seal
Is put on life; one stage of being complete,
One scheme wound up: and from the grand result

A supplementary reflux of light,
Illustrates all the inferior grades, explains
Each back step in the circle. Not alone
For their possessor dawn those qualities,
But the new glory mixes with the heaven
And earth; man, once desecrated, imprints forever
His presence on all lifeless things: the winds
Are henceforth voices, wailing or a shout,
A querulous mutter or a quick gay laugh,
Never a senseless gust now man is born.

The herded pines commune and have deep
thoughts,

A secret they assemble to discuss
When the sun drops behind their trunks which glare

Like grates of hell: the peerless cup afloat
Of the lake-lily is an urn, some nymph
Swims bearing high above her head: no bird
Whistles unseen, but through the gaps above
That let light in upon the gloomy woods,
A shape peeps from the breezy forest-top,
Arch with small puckered mouth and mocking
eye.

The morn has enterprise, deep quiet droops
With evening, triumph takes the sunset hour,
Voluptuous transport ripens with the corn
Beneath a warm moon like a happy face:
— And this to fill us with regard for man,
With apprehension of his passing worth,
Desire to work his proper nature out,
And ascertain his rank and final place,
For these things tend still upward, progress is
The law of life, man is not Man as yet.
Nor shall I deem his object served, his end
Attained, his genuine strength put fairly forth,
While only here and there a star dispels
The darkness, here and there a towering mind
O'erlooks its prostrate fellows: when the host
Is out at once to the despair of night,
When all mankind alike is perfected,
Equal in full-blown powers — then, not till then,
I say, begins man's general infancy.
For wherefore make account of feverish starts
Of restless members of a dormant whole,
Impatient nerves which quiver while the body
Slumbers as in a grave? Oh, long ago
The brow was twitched, the tremulous lids

astir,
The peaceful mouth disturbed; half uttered
speech

Ruffled the lip, and then the teeth were set,
The breath drawn sharp, the strong right-hand
clenched stronger,

As it would pluck a lion by the jaw;
The glorious creature laughed out even in sleep!

But when full roused, each giant-limb awake,
Each sinew strung, the great heart pulsing fast,
He shall start up and stand on his own earth,
Then shall his long triumphant march begin,

Thence shall his being date, — thus wholly roused,

What he achieves shall be set down to him.

When all the race is perfected alike
As man, that is; all tended to mankind,
And, man produced, all has its end thus far:
But in completed man begins anew

A tendency to God. Prognostics told
Man's near approach; so in man's self arise
August anticipations, symbols, types
Of a dim splendor ever on before
In that eternal circle life pursues.

For men begin to pass their nature's bound,
And find new hopes and cares which fast sup-
plant

Their proper joys and griefs; they grow too great

For narrow creeds of right and wrong, which fade

Before the unmeasured thirst for good: while
peace

Rises within them ever more and more.
Such men are even now upon the earth,
Serene amid the half-formed creatures round
Who should be saved by them and joined with
them.

Such was my task, and I was born to it —
Free, as I said but now, from much that chains
Spirits, high-dowered but limited and vexed
By a divided and delusive aim,
A shadow mocking a reality

Whose truth avails not wholly to disperse
The fitting mimic called up by itself,
And so remains perplexed and nigh put out
By its fantastic fellow's wavering gleam.
I, from the first, was never cheated thus;
I never fashioned out a fancied good
Distinct from man's; a service to be done,
A glory to be ministered unto
With powers put forth at man's expense, withdrawn

From laboring in his behalf; a strength
Denied that might avail him. I cared not
Lest his success ran counter to success
Elsewhere: for God is glorified in man,
And to man's glory vowed I soul and limb.
Yet, constituted thus, and thus endowed,
I failed: I gazed on power till I grew blind.
Power; I could not take my eyes from that:
That only, I thought, should be preserved, increased

At any risk, displayed, struck out at once —
The sign and note and character of man.
I saw no use in the past: only a scene
Of degradation, ugliness and tears,
The record of disgraces best forgotten,
A sullen page in human chronicles
Fit to erase. I saw no cause why man
Should not stand all-sufficient even now,
Or why his annals should be forced to tell
That once the tide of light, about to break
Upon the world, was sealed within its spring:
I would have had one day, one moment's space,
Change man's condition, push each slumbering
claim

Of mastery o'er the elemental world
At once to full maturity, then roll
Oblivion o'er the work, and hide from man

What night had ushered morn. Not so, dear child

Of after-days, wilt thou reject the past
Big with deep warnings of the proper tenure
By which thou hast the earth: for thee the present

Shall have distinct and trembling beauty, seen
Beside that past's own shade when, in relief,
Its brightness shall stand out: nor yet on thee
Shall burst the future, as successive zones
Of several wonder open on some spirit
Flying secure and glad from heaven to heaven:
But thou shalt painfully attain to joy,
While hope and fear and love shall keep thee man!

All this was hid from me: as one by one
My dreams grew dim, my wide aims circumscribed,

As actual good within my reach decreased,
While obstacles sprung up this way and that
To keep me from effecting half the sum,
Small as it proved; as objects, mean within
The primal aggregate, seemed, even the least,
Itself a match for my concentrated strength —
What wonder if I saw no way to shun Despair? The power I sought for man, seemed God's.

In this conjuncture, as I prayed to die,
A strange adventure made me know, one sin
Had spotted my career from its uprise;
I saw Aprile — my Aprile there!
And as the poor melodious wretch disburdened
His heart, and moaned his weakness in my ear,
I learned my own deep error; love's undoing
Taught me the worth of love in man's estate,
And what proportion love should hold with power

In his right constitution; love preceding
Power, and with much power, always much more love;

Love still too straitened in his present means,
And earnest for new power to set love free.
I learned this, and supposed the whole was learned:

And thus, when men received with stupid wonder

My first revealings, would have worshipped me,
And I despised and loathed their proffered praise —

When, with awakened eyes, they took revenge
For past credulity in casting shame

On my real knowledge, and I hated them —
It was not strange I saw no good in man,
To overbalance all the wear and waste
Of faculties, displayed in vain, but born
To prosper in some better sphere: and why?
In my own heart love had not been made wise
To trace love's faint beginnings in mankind,
To know even hate is but a mask of love's,
To see a good in evil, and a hope
In ill-success; to sympathize, be proud
Of their half-reasons, faint aspirings, dim
Struggles for truth, their poorest fallacies,
Their prejudice and fears and cares and doubts;
All with a touch of nobleness, despite
Their error, upward tending all though weak,
Like plants in mines which never saw the sun,
But dream of him, and guess where he may be,

And do their best to climb and get to him.
All this I knew not, and I failed. Let men
Regard me, and the poet dead long ago
Who loved too rashly; and shape forth a third
And better-tempered spirit, warned by both:
As from the over-radiant star too mad
To drink the life-springs, beamless thence itself —

And the dark orb which borders the abyss,
Ingulfed in icy night, — might have its course,
A temperate and equidistant world.
Meanwhile, I have done well, though not all well.

As yet men cannot do without contempt;
'Tis for their good, and therefore fit awhile
That they reject the weak, and scorn the false,
Rather than praise the strong and true, in me:
But after, they will know me. If I stoop
Into a dark tremendous sea of cloud,
It is but for a time; I press God's lamp
Close to my breast; its splendor, soon or late,
Will pierce the gloom: I shall emerge one day.
You understand me? I have said enough!

Fest. Now die, dear Aureole!

Par. Festus, let my hand —
This hand, lie in your own, my own true friend!
Aprile! Hand in hand with you, Aprile!

Fest. And this was Paracelsus!

STRAFFORD

A TRAGEDY

DEDICATED, IN ALL AFFECTIONATE ADMIRATION, TO

WILLIAM C. MACREADY

LONDON, APRIL 23, 1837

Paracelsus found an enthusiastic reader in the actor Macready, who begged Browning to write him a play, even suggesting the subject to him, which did not awaken the poet's interest. More than a year passed, when the two met at a supper given by Macready after the successful presentation of Talfourd's Ion. As the guests were leaving, Macready said to Browning: "Write a play, Browning, and keep me from going to America." "Shall it be historical and English?" replied Browning. "What do you say to a drama on Strafford?" and the poet now had his subject. His choice is readily explained by the fact that he was at this time helping his friend John Forster with his Life of Strafford contained in Lives of Eminent British Statesmen. Indeed, Mr. Furnivall says without hesitation that the agreement of the Strafford of the play with the Strafford of Forster's biography is due to the fact that Browning wrote the whole of the Life of Strafford after the first seven paragraphs.

When the play was rehearsing Browning gave Macready a lilt which he had composed for the children's song in Act V. It was not used, because the two children who were to sing wished a more pretentious song. The lilt which Browning composed was purposely no more than a crooning measure. He afterward gave it to Miss Hickey for her special edition of Strafford, and it is reproduced here in its place. The following is Browning's preface to the first edition:—

"I had for some time been engaged in a Poem of a very different nature, when induced to make the present attempt; and am not without apprehension that my eagerness to freshen a jaded mind by diverting it to the healthy natures of a grand epoch, may have operated unfavorably on the represented play, which is one of Action in Character, rather than Character in Action. To remedy this, in some degree, considerable curtailment will be necessary, and, in a few instances, the supplying details not required, I suppose, by the mere reader. While a trifling success would much gratify, failure will not wholly discourage me from another effort: experience is to come; and earnest endeavor may yet remove many disadvantages.

"The portraits are, I think, faithful; and I am exceedingly fortunate in being able, in proof of this, to refer to the subtle and eloquent exposition of the characters of Eliot and Strafford, in the Lives of Eminent British Statesmen, now in the course of publication in Lardner's Cyclopædia, by a writer [John Forster] whom I am proud to call my friend; and whose biographies of Hampden, Pym, and Vane, will, I am sure, fitly illustrate the present year—the Second Centenary of the Trial concerning Ship-Money. My Carlisle, however, is purely imaginary: I at first sketched her singular likeness roughly in, as suggested by Matthews and the memoir-writers—but it was too artificial, and the substituted outline is exclusively from Voiture and Waller.

"The Italian boat-song in the last scene is from Redi's 'Bacco,' long since naturalized in the joyous and delicate version of Leigh Hunt."

Two of Strafford's CHILDREN.

ACT I

SCENE I. A House near Whitehall. HAMPDEN, HOLLIS, the younger VANE, RUDYARD, FIENNES and many of the Presbyterian Party: LOUDON and other Scots Commissioners.

Vane. I say, if he be here —
Rudyard. (And he is here!) —
Hollis. For England's sake let every man be still

Nor speak of him, so much as say his name,
 Till Pym rejoin us! Rudyard! Henry Vane!
 One rash conclusion may decide our course
 And with it England's fate — think — England's fate!

Hampden, for England's sake they should be still!

Vane. You say so, Hollis? Well, I must be still.

It is indeed too bitter that one man,
 Any one man's mere presence, should suspend
 England's combined endeavor: little need
 To name him!

Rud. For you are his brother, Hollis!
Hampden. Shame on you, Rudyard! time to tell him that

When he forgets the Mother of us all.

Rud. Do I forget her? Vane. You talk idle hate
 Against her foe: is that so strange a thing?
 Is hating Wentworth all the help she needs?

A Puritan. The Philistine strode, cursing as he went:

But David — five smooth pebbles from the brook
 Within his scrip . . .

Rud. Be you as still as David!
Fiennes. Here's Rudyard not ashamed to wag a tongue

Stiff with ten years' disuse of Parliaments;
 Why, when the last sat, Wentworth sat with us!

Rud. Let's hope for news of them now he returns —

He that was safe in Ireland, as we thought!
 — But I'll abide Pym's coming.

Vane. Now, by Heaven,
 Then may be cool who can, silent who will —
 Some have a gift that way! Wentworth is here,
 Here, and the King's safe closeted with him
 Ere this. And when I think on all that's past
 Since that man left us, how his single arm
 Rolled the advancing good of England back
 And set the woeful past up in its place,
 Exalting Dagon where the Ark should be, —
 How that man has made firm the fickle King
 (Hampden, I will speak out!) — in aught he feared

To venture on before; taught tyranny
 Her dismal trade, the use of all her tools,
 To ply the scourge yet screw the gag so close
 That strangled agony bleeds mute to death —
 How he turns Ireland to a private stage
 For training infant villanies, new ways
 Of wringing treasure out of tears and blood,
 Unheard oppressions nourished in the dark
 To try how much man's nature can endure
 — If he dies under it, what harm? if not,
 Why, one more trick is added to the rest
 Worth a king's knowing, and what Ireland bears England may learn to bear: — how all this while
 That man has set himself to one dear task,
 The bringing Charles to relish more and more Power, power without law, power and blood too
 — Can I be still?

Hamp. For that you should be still.

Vane. Oh Hampden, then and now! The year he left us,

The People in full Parliament could wrest
 The Bill of Rights from the reluctant King;
 And now, he'll find in an obscure small room
 A stealthy gathering of great-hearted men
 That take up England's cause: England is here!

Hamp. And who despairs of England?

Rud. That do I.
 If Wentworth comes to rule her. I am sick
 To think her wretched masters, Hamilton,
 The muckworm Cottington, the maniac Land,
 May yet be longed-for back again. I say,
 I do despair.

Vane. And, Rudyard, I'll say this —
 Which all true men say after me, not loud
 But solemnly and as you'd say a prayer!
 This King, who treads our England underfoot.
 Has just so much . . . it may be fear or craft,
 As bids him pause at each fresh outrage;
 friends,

He needs some sterner hand to grasp his own,
 Some voice to ask, "Why shrink? Am I not by?"

Now, one whom England loved for serving her,
 Found in his heart to say, "I know where best
 The iron heel shall bruise her, for she leans
 Upon me when you trample." Witness, you!
 So Wentworth heartened Charles, so England fell.

But inasmuch as life is hard to take
 From England . . .

Many Voices. Go on, Vane! 'Tis well said,
Vane!

Vane. Who has not so forgotten Runnymede! —

Voices. 'Tis well and bravely spoken, Vane!
 Go on!

Vane. There are some little signs of late she knows

The ground no place for her. She glances round,
 Wentworth has dropped the hand, is gone his way

On other service: what if she arise?
 No! the King beckons, and beside him stands
 The same bad man once more, with the same smile

And the same gesture. Now shall England crouch,

Or catch at us and rise?

Voices. The Renegade!
Haman! Ahithophel!

Hamp. Gentlemen of the North,
 It was not thus the night your claims were urged,
 And we pronounced the League and Covenant,
 The cause of Scotland, England's cause as well:
 Vane there, sat motionless the whole night through.

Vane. Hampden!

Fien. Stay, Vane!

Loudon. Be just and patient, Vane!

Vane. Mind how you counsel patience, London! you

Have still a Parliament, and this your League
 To back it; you are free in Scotland still;
 While we are brothers, hope's for England yet.
 But know you wherefore Wentworth comes?
 to quench

This last of hopes? that he brings war with him?
Know you the man's self? what he dares?

Lou. We know,
All know — 't is nothing new.

Vane. And what's new, then,
In calling for his life? Why, Pym himself —
You must have heard — ere Wentworth dropped our cause

He would see Pym first; there were many more Strong on the people's side and friends of his,
Eliot that's dead, Rudyard and Hampden here,
But for these Wentworth cared not; only, Pym
He would see — Pym and he were sworn, 'tis
said,

To live and die together; so, they met
At Greenwich. Wentworth, you are sure, was
long,

Specious enough, the devil's argument
Lost nothing on his lips; he'd have Pym own
A patriot could not play a purer part
Than follow in his track; they two combined Might put down England. Well, Pym heard him out;

One glance — you know Pym's eye — one word
was all:

"You leave us, Wentworth! while your head
is on,

I'll not leave you."

Hamp. Has he left Wentworth, then?
Has England lost him? Will you let him speak,
Or put your crude surmises in his mouth?

Away with this! Will you have Pym or Vane?
Voices. Wait Pym's arrival! Pym shall speak.

Hamp. Meanwhile
Let London read the Parliament's report
From Edinburgh: our last hope, as Vane says,
Is in the stand it makes. London!

Vane. No, no!
Silent I can be: not indifferent!

Hamp. Then each keep silence, praying God
to spare

His anger, cast not England quite away
In this her visitation!

A Puritan. Seven years long

The Midianite drove Israel into dens
And caves. Till God sent forth a mighty man,
(Pym enters.)

Even Gideon!

Pym. Wentworth's come: nor sickness, care,
The ravaged body nor the ruined soul,
More than the winds and waves that beat his ship,

Could keep him from the King. He has not reached

Whitehall: they've hurried up a Council there
To lose no time and find him work enough.

Where's our Loudon? your Scots' Parliament . . .
Lou. Holds firm:

We were about to read reports.

Pym. The King

Has just dissolved your Parliament.

Lou. And other Scots. Great God!
An oath-breaker! Stand by us, England, then!

Pym. The King's too sanguine; doubtless Wentworth's here;

But still some little form might be kept up.

Hamp. Now speak, Vane! Rudyard, you had much to say!

Hol. The rumor's false, then . . .

Pym. Ay, the Court gives out
His own concerns have brought him back: I
know

'T is the King calls him. Wentworth supersedes
The tribe of Cottingtons and Hamiltons Whose part is played; there's talk enough, by
this, —

Merciful talk, the King thinks: time is now
To turn the record's last and bloody leaf
Which, chronicling a nation's great despair,
Tells they were long rebellious, and their lord
Indulgent, till, all kind expedients tried,
He drew the sword on them and reigned in
peace.

Laud's laying his religion on the Scots
Was the last gentle entry: the new page Shall run, the King thinks, "Wentworth thrust it down

At the sword's point."

A Puritan. I'll do your bidding, Pym,
England's and God's — one blow!

Pym. A goodly thing —
We all say, friends, it is a goodly thing
To right that England. Heaven grows dark
above:

Let's snatch one moment ere the thunder fall,
To say how well the English spirit comes out
Beneath it! All have done their best, indeed,
From lion Eliot, that grand Englishman,
To the least here: and who, the least one here,
When she is saved (for her redemption dawns Dimly, most dimly, but it dawns — it dawns)
Who'd give at any price his hope away
Of being named along with the Great Men?

We would not — no, we would not give that up!

Hamp. And one name shall be dearer than all names,

When children, yet unborn, are taught that
name

After their fathers', — taught what matchless
man . . .

Pym. . . . Saved England? What if Wentworth's should be still

That name?

Rud. and others. We have just said it, Pym!
His death

Saves her! We said it — there's no way beside!

I'll do God's bidding, Pym! They struck down Joab

And purged the land.

Vane. No villainous striking-down!
Rud. No, a calm vengeance: let the whole land rise

And shout for it. No Feltons!

Pym. Rudyard, no!
England rejects all Feltons; most of all

Since Wentworth . . . Hampden, say the trust
again

Of England in her servants — but I'll think
You know me, all of you. Then, I believe,

Spite of the past, Wentworth rejoins you,
friends!

Vane and others. Wentworth? Apostate!
Judas! Double-dyed

A traitor! Is it Pym, indeed . . .
Pym. . . . Who says

Vane never knew that Wentworth, loved that man,

Was used to stroll with him, arm locked in arm,
Along the streets to see the people pass,
And read in every island-countenance
Fresh argument for God against the King, —
Never sat down, say, in the very house
Where Eliot's brow grew broad with noble
thoughts,

(You've joined us, Hampden — Hollis, you as well.)

And then left talking over Gracchus's death . . .
Vane. To frame, we know it well, the choicest clause

In the Petition of Right: he framed such clause
One month before he took at the King's hand
His Northern Presidency, which that Bill Denounced.

Pym. Too true! Never more, never more Walked we together! Most alone I went.
I have had friends—all here are fast my
friends—

But I shall never quite forget that friend.
And yet it could not but be real in him!
You, Vane, — you, Rudyard, have no right to trust

To Wentworth: but can no one hope with me?
Hampden, will Wentworth dare shed English
blood

Like water?

Hamp. Ireland is Aeldama.

Pym. Will he turn Scotland to a hunting-ground

To please the King, now that he knows the King?

The People or the King? and that King,
Charles!

Hamp. Pym, all here know you: you'll not set your heart

On any baseless dream. But say one deed
Of Wentworth's, since he left us . . . [Shouting without.

Vane. There! he comes,
And they shout for him! Wentworth's at Whitehall,

The King embracing him, now, as we speak,
And he, to be his match in courtesies,
Taking the whole war's risk upon himself,
Now, while you tell us here how changed he is!
Hear you?

Pym. And yet if 't is a dream, no more,
That Wentworth chose their side, and brought
the King

To love it as though Laud had loved it first.
And the Queen after; that he led their cause
Calm to success, and kept it spotless through,
So that our very eyes could look upon
The travail of our souls, and close content
That violence, which something mars even right
Which sanctions it, had taken off no grace
From its serene regard. Only a dream!

Hamp. We meet here to accomplish certain
good

By giv'ng means, and keep tradition up
Of free assemblages, else obsolete,
In this poor chamber: nor without effect
Has friend met friend to counsel and confirm,
As, listening to the beats of England's heart,

We spoke its wants to Scotland's prompt reply
By these her delegates. Remains alone
That word grow deed, as with God's help it shall—

But with the devil's hindrance, who doubts too?
Looked we or no that tyranny should turn
Her engines of oppression to their use?

Whereof, suppose the worst be Wentworth
here—

Shall we break off the tactics which succeed
In drawing out our formidablest foe,
Let bickering and disunion take their place?
Or count his presence as our conquest's proof,
And keep the old arms at their steady play?

Proceed to England's work! Fiennes, read the list!

Fien. Ship-money is refused or fiercely paid

In every county, save the northern parts
Where Wentworth's influence . . . [Shouting.

Vane. I, in England's name,
Declare her work, this day, at end! Till now,
Up to this moment, peaceful strife was best.

We English had free leave to think; till now,
We had a shadow of a Parliament
In Scotland. But all's changed: they change

the first,
They try brute-force for law, they, first of
all . . .

Voices. Good! Talk enough! The old true hearts with Vane!

Vane. Till we crush Wentworth for her,
there's no act

Serves England!

Voices. Vane for England!

Pym. Pym should be Something to England. I seek Wentworth,
friends.

SCENE II. Whitehall.

Lady CARLISLE and WENTWORTH.

Wentworth. And the King?
Lady Carlisle. Wentworth, lean on me!

Sit then!
I'll tell you all; this horrible fatigue
Will kill you.

Went. No; — or, Lucy, just your arm;
I'll not sit till I've cleared this up with him:
After that, rest. The King?

Lady Car. Confides in you.

Went. Why? or, why now? — They have kind throats, the knaves!

Shout for me — they!

Lady Car. You come so strangely soon:
Yet we took measures to keep off the crowd —
Did they shout for you?

Went. Wherefore should they not?
Does the King take such measures for himself?

Beside, there's such a dearth of malcontents,
You say!

Lady Car. I said but few dared carp at you.
Went. At me? at us, I hope! The King
and I!

He's surely not disposed to let me hear
The fame away from him of these late deeds
In Ireland? I am yet his instrument
Be it for well or ill? He trusts me, too!

Lady Car. The King, dear Wentworth, purposes, I said,

To grant you, in the face of all the Court . . .

Went. All the Court! Evermore the Court about us!

Savile and Holland, Hamilton and Vane About us, — then the King will grant me — what?

That he for once put these aside and say —

“Tell me your whole mind, Wentworth!”

Lady Car. You professed You would be calm.

Went. Lucy, and I am calm!

How else shall I do all I come to do,
Broken, as you may see, body and mind,
How shall I serve the King? Time wastes meanwhile,

You have not told me half. His footstep! No, Quick, then, before I meet him, — I am calm — Why does the King distrust me?

Lady Car. He does not Distrust you.

Went. Lucy, you can help me; you Have even seemed to care for me: one word! Is it the Queen?

Lady Car. No, not the Queen: the party That poisons the Queen's ear, Savile and Holland.

Went. I know, I know: old Vane, too, he's one too?

Go on — and he's made Secretary. Well? Or leave them out and go straight to the charge; The charge!

Lady Car. Oh, there's no charge, no precise charge;

Only they sneer, make light of — one may say, Nibble at what you do.

Went. I know! but, Lucy,

I reckoned on you from the first! — Go on!

— Was sure could I once see this gentle friend

When I arrived, she'd throw an hour away

To help her . . . what am I?

Lady Car. You thought of me, Dear Wentworth?

Went. But go on! The party here!

Lady Car. They do not think your Irish government

Of that surpassing value . . .

Went. The one thing Of value! The one service that the crown

May count on! All that keeps these very Vanes

In power, to vex me — not that they do vex, Only it might vex some to hear that service

Decried, the sole support that's left the King!

Lady Car. So the Archbishop says.

Went. Ah? well, perhaps

The only hand held up in my defence

May be old Laud's! These Hollands then, these Saviles

Nibble? They nibble? — that's the very word!

Lady Car. Your profit in the Customs, Bristol says,

Exceeds the due proportion: while the tax . . .

Went. Enough! 't is too unworthy, — I am not

So patient as I thought! What's Pym about?

Lady Car. Pym?

Went. Pym and the People,

Lady Car. Oh, the Faction!

Extinct — of no account: there'll never be Another Parliament.

Went. Tell Savile that!

You may know — (ay, you do — the creatures here

Never forget!) that in my earliest life

I was not . . . much that I am now! The King

May take my word on points concerning Pym

Before Lord Savile's, Lucy, or if not,

I bid them ruin their wise selves, not me,

These Vanes and Hollands! I'll not be their tool

Who might be Pym's friend yet.

But there's the King!

Where is he?

Lady Car. Just apprised that you arrive.

Went. And why not here to meet me? I was told

He sent for me, nay, longed for me.

Lady Car. Because, —

He is now . . . I think a Council's sitting now About this Scots affair.

Went. A Council sits?

They have not taken a decided course

Without me in the matter?

Lady Car. I should say . . .

Went. The war? They cannot have agreed to that?

Not the Scots' war? — without consulting me — Me, that am here to show how rash it is,

How easy to dispense with? — Ah, you too Against me! well, — the King may take his time.

— Forget it, Lucy! Cares make peevish: mine Weigh me (but 't is a secret) to my grave.

Lady Car. For life or death I am your own, dear friend!

Went. Heartless! but all are heartless here. Go now,

Forsake the People! I did not forsake

The People: they shall know it, when the King

Will trust me! — who trusts all beside at once,

While I have not spoke Vane and Savile fair,

And am not trusted: have but saved the throne:

Have not picked up the Queen's glove prettily,

And am not trusted. But he'll see me now.

Weston is dead: the Queen's half English now —

More English: one decisive word will brush

These insects from . . . the step I know so well!

The King! But now, to tell him . . . no — to ask

What's in me he distrusts: — or, best begin

By proving that this frightful Scots affair

Is just what I foretold. So much to say,

And the flesh fails, now, and the time is come,

And one false step no way to be repaired.

You were avenged, Pym, could you look on me.

(Pym enters.)

Went. I little thought of you just then.

Pym. No? I

Think always of you, Wentworth.

Went. The old voice!

I wait the King, sir.

Pym. True — you look so pale!

A Council sits within; when that breaks up

He'll see you.

Went. Sir, I thank you.

Pym. Oh, thank Laud!

You know when Laud once gets on Church affairs

The case is desperate : he 'll not be long To-day : he only means to prove, to-day, We English all are mad to have a hand In butchering the Scots for serving God After their fathers' fashion : only that !

Went. Sir, keep your jests for those who relish them !

(Does he enjoy their confidence ?) 'T is kind To tell me what the Council does.

Pym. You grudge That I should know it had resolved on war Before you came ? no need : you shall have all The credit, trust me !

Went. Have the Council dared — They have not dared . . . that is — I know you not.

Farewell, sir : times are changed.

Pym. — Since we two met At Greenwich ? Yes : poor patriots though we be,

You cut a figure, makes some slight return For your exploits in Ireland ! Changed indeed, Could our friend Eliot look from out his grave ! Ah, Wentworth, one thing for acquaintance' sake,

Just to decide a question ; have you, now, Felt your old self since you forsook us ?

Went. Sir !

Pym. Spare me the gesture ! you misapprehend.

Think not I mean the advantage is with me. I was about to say that, for my part, I never quite held up my head since then — Was quite myself since then : for first, you see, I lost all credit after that event

With those who recollect how sure I was Wentworth would outdo Eliot on our side. Forgive me : Savile, old Vane, Holland here, Eschew plain-speaking : 't is a trick I keep.

Went. How, when, where, Savile, Vane, and Holland speak, Plainly or otherwise, would have my scorn, All of my scorn, sir . . .

Pym. . . . Did not my poor thoughts Claim somewhat ?

Went. Keep your thoughts ! believe the King Mistrusts me for their prattle, all these Vanes And Saviles ! make your mind up, o' God's love, That I am discontented with the King !

Pym. Why, you may be : I should be, that I know,

Were I like you.

Went. Like me ?

Pym. I care not much

For titles : our friend Eliot died no lord, Hampden's no lord, and Savile is a lord ; But you care, since you sold your soul for one. I can't think, therefore, your soul's purchaser Did well to laugh you to such utter scorn When you twice prayed so humbly for its price, The thirty silver pieces . . . I should say, The Earlom you expected, still expect, And may. Your letters were the movingest ! Console yourself : I've borne him prayers just now

From Scotland not to be oppressed by Laud,

Words moving in their way : he 'll pay, be sure. As much attention as to those you sent.

Went. False, sir ! Who showed them you ? Suppose it so,

The King did very well . . . nay, I was glad When it was shown me : I refused, the first ! John Pym, you were my friend — forbear me once !

Pym. Oh, Wentworth, ancient brother of my soul,

That all should come to this !

Went. Leave me !

Pym. My friend,

Why should I leave you ?

Went. To tell Rudyard this,

And Hampden this !

Pym. Whose faces once were bright At my approach, now sad with doubt and fear, Because I hope in you — yes, Wentworth, you Who never mean to ruin England — you Who shake off, with God's help, an obscene dream

In this Ezekiel chamber, where it crept Upon you first, and wake, yourself, your true And proper self, our Leader, England's Chief, And Hampden's friend !

This is the proudest day ! Come, Wentworth ! Do not even see the King ! The rough old room will seem itself again !

We 'll both go in together : you've not seen Hampden so long : come : and there's Fiennes : you 'll have

To know young Vane. This is the proudest day !

[The King enters. WENTWORTH lets fall PYM's hand.

Charles. Arrived, my lord ? — This gentleman, we know

Was your old friend.

The Scots shall be informed What we determine for their happiness.

[Pym goes out.

You have made haste, my lord.

Went. Sir, I am come . . .

Cha. To see an old familiar — nay, 't is well ; Aid us with his experience : this Scots' League And Covenant spreads too far, and we have proofs

That they intrigue with France : the Faction too,

Whereof your friend there is the head and front, Abets them, — as he boasted, very like.

Went. Sir, trust me ! but for this once, trust me, sir !

Cha. What can you mean ?

Went. That you should trust me, sir !

Oh — not for my sake ! but 't is sad, so sad That for distrusting me, you suffer — you Whom I would die to serve : sir, do you think That I would die to serve you ?

Cha. But rise, Wentworth !

Went. What shall convince you ? What does Savile do

To prove him . . . Ah, one can't tear out one's heart

And show it, how sincere a thing it is !

Cha. Have I not trusted you ?

Went. Say aught but that !

There is my comfort, mark you : all will be So different when you trust me — as you shall !

It has not been your fault, — I was away,
Mistook, maligned, how was the King to know?
I am here, now — he means to trust me, now —
All will go on so well!

Cha. Be sure I do —
I've heard that I should trust you : as you came,
Your friend, the Countess, told me . . .

Went. No, — hear nothing —
Be told nothing about me! — you're not told
Your right-hand serves you, or your children love you!

Cha. You love me, Wentworth : rise!
Went. I can speak now.

I have no right to hide the truth. 'Tis I Can save you : only I. Sir, what must be?

Cha. Since Laud's assured (the minutes are within)

— Louth as I am to spill my subjects' blood . . .

Went. That is, he'll have a war : what's done is done!

Cha. They have intrigued with France;
that's clear to Laud.

Went. Has Laud suggested any way to meet
The war's expense?

Cha. He'd not decide so far
Until you joined us.

Went. Most considerate!
He's certain they intrigue with France, these Scots?

The People would be with us.

Cha. Pym should know.
Went. The People for us — were the People
for us!

Sir, a great thought comes to reward your trust :

Summon a Parliament! in Ireland first,
Then, here.

Cha. In truth?

Went. That saves us! that puts off
The war, gives time to right their grievances —

To talk with Pym. I know the Faction — Laud
So styles it — tutors Scotland : all their plans

Suppose no Parliament : in calling one
You take them by surprise. Produce the proofs

Of Scotland's treason; then bid England help:
Even Pym will not refuse.

Cha. You would begin With Ireland?

Went. Take no care for that : that's sure
To prosper.

Cha. You shall rule me. You were best Return at once : but take this ere you go!

Now, do I trust you? You're an Earl: my
Friend

Of Friends : yes, while . . . You hear me not!

Went. Say it all o'er again — but once again:
The first was for the music : once again!

Cha. Strafford, my friend, there may have been reports,

Vain rumors. Henceforth touching Strafford is
To touch the apple of my sight : why gaze

So earnestly?

Went. I am grown young again,
And foolish. What was it we spoke of?

Cha. Ireland,
The Parliament, —

Went. I may go when I will?
— Now?

Cha. Are you tired so soon of us?

Went. My King!

But you will not so utterly abhor
A Parliament? I'd serve you any way.

Cha. You said just now this was the only
way.

Went. Sir, I will serve you!
Cha. Strafford, spare yourself :

You are so sick, they tell me.

Went. 'Tis my soul
That's well and prospers now.

This Parliament —
We'll summon it, the English one — I'll care
For everything. You shall not need them much.

Cha. If they prove restive . . .
Went. I shall be with you.

Cha. Ere they assemble?

Went. I will come, or else
Deposit this infirm humanity

I' the dust. My whole heart stays with you,
my King!

[As WENTWORTH goes out, the QUEEN enters.
Cha. That man must love me.

Queen. Is it over then?
Why, he looks yellower than ever! Well,

At least we shall not hear eternally
Of service — services : he's paid at least.

Cha. Not done with : he engages to surpass
All yet performed in Ireland.

Queen. I had thought
Nothing beyond was ever to be done.

The war, Charles — will he raise supplies
enough?

Cha. We've hit on an expedient; he . . .
that is,

I have advised . . . we have decided on
The calling — in Ireland — of a Parliament.

Queen. O truly! You agree to that? Is that
The first-fruit of his counsel? But I guessed
As much.

Cha. This is too idle, Henriette!
I should know best. He will strain every nerve,
And once a precedent established . . .

Queen. Notice
How sure he is of a long term of favor!

He'll see the next, and the next after that;
No end to Parliaments!

Cha. Well, it is done.
He talks it smoothly, doubtless. If, indeed,
The Commons here . . .

Queen. Here! you will summon them
Here? Would I were in France again to see A King!

Cha. But, Henriette!

Queen. Oh, the Scots see clear!
Why should they bear your rule?

Cha. But listen, sweet!

Queen. Let Wentworth listen — you confide in him!

Cha. I do not, love, — I do not so confide!
The Parliament shall never trouble us!

. . . Nay, hear me! I have schemes, such schemes : we'll buy

The leaders off : without that, Wentworth's counsel

Had ne'er prevailed on me. Perhaps I call it
To have excuse for breaking it forever,

And whose will then the blame be? See you
not?

Come, dearest! — look, the little fairy, now,
That cannot reach my shoulder! Dearest,
come!

ACT II

SCENE I. (As in Act I. Scene 1.)

The same Party enters.

Rud. Twelve subsidies!
Vane. O Rudyard, do not laugh
At least!

Rud. True: Strafford called the Parliament —

'T is he should laugh!

A Puritan. Out of the serpent's root
Comes forth a cockatrice.

Fien. — A stinging one,
If that's the Parliament: twelve subsidies!
A stinging one! but, brother, where's your
word

For Strafford's other nest-egg, the Scots' war?
The Puritan. His fruit shall be a fiery flying serpent.

Fien. Shall be? It chips the shell, man;
peeps abroad.

Twelve subsidies! — Why, how now, Vane?

Rud. Peace, Fiennes!
Fien. Ah? — But he was not more a dupe than I,

Or you, or any here, the day that Pym
Returned with the good news. Look up, friend
Vane!

We all believe that Strafford meant us well
In summoning the Parliament.

(HAMPDEN enters.)

Vane. Now, Hampden,
Clear me! I would have leave to sleep again:
I'd look the People in the face again:
Clear me from having, from the first, hoped,
dreamed

Better of Strafford!

Hamp. You may grow one day
A steadfast light to England, Henry Vane!

Rud. Meantime, by flashes I make shift to see

Strafford revived our Parliaments; before,
War was but talked of; there's an army, now:
Still, we've a Parliament! Poor Ireland bears
Another wrench (she dies the hardest death!) —
Why, speak of it in Parliament! and lo,
'T is spoken, so console yourselves!

Fien. The jest!
We clamored, I suppose, thus long, to win
The privilege of laying on our backs
A sorer burden than the King dares lay.

Rud. Mark now: we meet at length, complaints pour in

From every county, all the land cries out
On loans and levies, curses ship-money,
Calls vengeance on the Star Chamber; we lend
An ear. "Ay, lend them all the ears you have!"

Puts in the King: "my subjects, as you find,
Are fretful, and conceive great things of you.
Just listen to them, friends; you'll sanction me
The measures they most wince at, make them
yours,

Instead of mine, I know: and, to begin,
They say my levies pinch them, — raise me straight

Twelve subsidies!"

Fien. All England cannot furnish Twelve subsidies!

Hol. But Strafford, just returned
From Ireland — what has he to do with that?
How could he speak his mind? He left before

The Parliament assembled. Pym, who knows
Strafford

Rud. Would I were sure we know ourselves!
What is for good, what, bad — who friend, who foe!

Hol. Do you count Parliaments no gain?

Rud. A gain?

While the King's creatures overbalance us?
— There's going on, beside, among ourselves

A quiet, slow, but most effectual course
Of buying over, sapping, leavening

The lump till all is leaven. Glanville's gone.
I'll put a case; had not the Court declared

That no sum short of just twelve subsidies
Will be accepted by the King — our House,

I say, would have consented to that offer
To let us buy off ship-money!

Hol. Most like,
If, say, six subsidies will buy it off,

The House . . .
Rud. Will grant them! Hampden, do you hear?

Congratulate with me! the King's the king,
And gains his point at last — our own assent
To that detested tax! All's over, then
There's no more taking refuge in this room, Protesting, "Let the King do what he will,
We, England, are no party to our shame:
Our day will come!" Congratulate with me!

(PYM enters.)

Vane. Pym, Strafford called this Parliament,
you say,

But we'll not have our Parliaments like those
In Ireland, Pym!

Rud. Let him stand forth, your friend!
One doubtful act hides far too many sins;
It can be stretched no more, and, to my mind,
Begins to drop from those it covered.

Other Voices. Good!
Let him avow himself! No fitter time!

We wait thus long for you.

Rud. Perhaps, too long!
Since nothing but the madness of the Court,

In thus unmasking its designs at once,
Has saved us from betraying England. Stay —

This Parliament is Strafford's: let us vote
Our list of Grievances too black by far

To suffer talk of subsidies: or best,
That ship-money's disposed of long ago

By England: any vote that's broad enough:
And then let Strafford, for the love of it,

Support his Parliament!
Vane. And vote as well

No war to be with Scotland! Hear you, Pym?
We'll vote, no war! No part nor lot in it

For England!
Many Voices. Vote, no war! Stop the new levies!

No Bishops' war! At once! When next we meet!

Pym. Much more when next we meet! Friends, which of you

Since first the course of Strafford was in doubt, Has fallen the most away in soul from me?

Vane. I sat apart, even now under God's eye, Pondering the words that should denounce you,

Pym.
In presence of us all, as one at league
With England's enemy.

Pym. You are a good
And gallant spirit, Henry. Take my hand
And say you pardon me for all the pain
Till now! Strafford is wholly ours.

Many Voices. Sure? sure?
Pym. Most sure: for Charles dissolves the Parliament

While I speak here.

— And I must speak, friends, now!
Strafford is ours. The King detects the change,
Casts Strafford off forever, and resumes
His ancient path: no Parliament for us,
No Strafford for the King!

Come, all of you,
To bid the King farewell, predict success
To his Scots' expedition, and receive Strafford, our comrade now. The next will be Indeed a Parliament!

Vane. Forgive me, Pym!
Voices. This looks like truth: Strafford can have, indeed,

No choice.
Pym. Friends, follow me! He's with the King.

Come, Hampden, and come, Rudyard, and come, Vane!

This is no sullen day for England, sirs!
Strafford shall tell you!

Voices. To Whitehall then! Come!

SCENE II. Whitehall.

CHARLES and STRAFFORD.

Cha. Strafford!

Strafford. Is it a dream? my papers, here —
Thus, as I left them, all the plans you found
So happy — (look! the track you pressed my hand

For pointing out) — and in this very room,
Over these very plans, you tell me, sir,
With the same face, too — tell me just one thing
That ruins them! How's this? What may this mean?

Sir, who has done this?

Cha. Strafford, who but I?
You bade me put the rest away: indeed
You are alone.

Straf. Alone, and like to be!
No fear, when some unworthy scheme grows ripe,

Of those, who hatched it, leaving me to loose
The mischief on the world! Laud hatches war,
Falls to his prayers, and leaves the rest to me,
And I'm alone.

Cha. At least, you knew as much
When first you undertook the war.

Straf.

My liege,
Was this the way? I said, since Laud would lap
A little blood, 't were best to hurry over

The loathsome business, not to be whole months
At slaughter — one blow, only one, then, peace,
Save for the dreams. I said, to please you both
I'd lead an Irish army to the West.

While in the South an English . . . but you look
As though you had not told me fifty times
'T was a brave plan! My army is all raised,
I am prepared to join it . . .

Cha. Hear me, Strafford!
Straf. . . . When, for some little thing, my whole design

Is set aside — (where is the wretched paper?)
I am to lead — (ay, here it is) — to lead
The English army: why? Northumberland,
That I appointed, chooses to be sick —
Is frightened: and, meanwhile, who answers for
The Irish Parliament? or army, either?
Is this my plan?

Cha. So disrespectful, sir?
Straf. My liege, do not believe it! I am yours,
Yours ever: 't is too late to think about:

To the death, yours. Elsewhere, this untoward
step
Shall pass for mine; the world shall think it
mine.

But here! But here! I am so seldom here,
Seldom with you, my King! I, soon to rush
Alone upon a giant in the dark!

Cha. My Strafford!
Straf. [Examines papers awhile.] "Seize the passes of the Tyne!"

But, sir, you see — see all I say is true?
My plan was sure to prosper, so, no cause
To ask the Parliament for help; whereas
We need them heartily.

Cha. Need the Parliament?
Straf. Now, for God's sake, sir, not one error
more!

We can afford no error; we draw, now,
Upon our last resource: the Parliament
Must help us!

Cha. I've undone you, Strafford!

Straf. Nay —
Nay — why despond, sir, 't is not come to that!
I have not hurt you? Sir, what have I said
To hurt you? I unsay it! Don't despond!

Sir, do you turn from me?
Cha. My friend of friends!
Straf. We'll make a shift. Leave me the Parliament!

Help they us ne'er so little and I'll make Sufficient out of it. We'll speak them fair.
They're sitting, that's one great thing; that half gives

Their sanction to us; that's much: don't de-spond!

Why, let them keep their money, at the worst!
The reputation of the People's help
Is all we want: we'll make shift yet!

Cha. Good Strafford!
Straf. But meantime, let the sum be ne'er so small

They offer, we'll accept it: any sum —
For the look of it: the least grant tells the Scots
The Parliament is ours — their stomach ally

Turned ours : that told, there 's half the blow to strike!

What will the grant be? What does Glanville think?

Cha. Alas!

Straf. My liege?

Cha. Strafford!

Straf. But answer me!

Have they . . . Oh surely not refused us half?

Half the twelve subsidies? We never looked

For all of them. How many do they give?

Cha. You have not heard . . .

Straf. (What has he done?) — Heard what? But speak at once, sir, this grows terrible!

[The King continuing silent.]

You have dissolved them! — I'll not leave this man.

Cha. 'T was old Vane's ill-judged vehemence.

Straf. Old Vane?

Cha. He told them, just about to vote the half,

That nothing short of all twelve subsidies

Would serve our turn, or be accepted.

Straf. Vane!

Vane! Who, sir, promised me, that very Vane . . .

O God, to have it gone, quite gone from me,

The one last hope — I that despair, my hope —

That I should reach his heart one day, and cure

All bitterness one day, be proud again

And young again, care for the sunshine too,

And never think of Eliot any more, —

God, and to toil for this, go far for this,

Get nearer, and still nearer, reach this heart

And find Vane there!

[Suddenly taking up a paper, and continuing with a forced calmness.]

Northumberland is sick :

Well, then, I take the army : Wilmot leads

The horse, and he, with Conway, must secure

The passes of the Tyne : Ormond supplies

My place in Ireland. Here, we'll try the City :

If they refuse a loan — debase the coin

And seize the bullion! we've no other choice.

Herbert . . .

And this while I am here! with you!

And there are hosts such, hosts like Vane! I go,

And, I once gone, they'll close around you, sir,

When the least pique, pettiest mistrust, is sure

To ruin me — and you along with me!

Do you see that? And you along with me!

— Sir, you'll not ever listen to these men,

And I away, fighting your battle? Sir,

If they — if She — charge me, no matter how —

Say you, "At any time when he returns

His head is mine!" Don't stop me there! You know

My head is yours, but never stop me there!

Cha. Too shameful, Strafford! You advised the war,

And . . .

Straf. I! I! that was never spoken with

Till it was entered on! That loathe the war!

That say it is the maddest, wickedest . . .

Do you know, sir, I think within my heart,

That you would say I did advise the war;

And if, through your own weakness, or, what's worse,

These Scots, with God to help them, drive me back,

You will not step between the raging People

And me, to say . . .

I knew it! from the first

I knew it! Never was so cold a heart!

Remember that I said it — that I never Believed you for a moment!

— And, you loved me?

You thought your perfidy profoundly hid

Because I could not share the whisperings

With Vane, with Savile? What, the face was masked?

I had the heart to see, sir! Face of flesh,

But heart of stone — of smooth cold frightful stone!

Ay, call them! Shall I call for you? The Scots

Goaded to madness? Or the English — Pym —

Shall I call Pym, your subject? Oh, you think

I'll leave them in the dark about it all?

They shall not know you? Hampden, Pym shall not?

(PYM, HAMPDEN, VANE, etc., enter.)

[Dropping on his knee.] Thus favored with your gracious countenance

What shall a rebel League avail against

Your servant, utterly and ever yours?

So, gentlemen, the King's not even left

The privilege of bidding me farewell

Who haste to save the People — that you style

Your People — from the mercies of the Scots

And France their friend?

[To CHARLES.] Pym's grave gray eyes are fixed Upon you, sir!

Your pleasure, gentlemen.

Hamp. The King dissolved us — 't is the King we seek

And not Lord Strafford.

Straf.

Strafford, guilty too

Of counselling the measure. [To CHARLES.]

(Hush . . . you know —

You have forgotten — sir, I counselled it)

A heinous matter, truly! But the King

Will yet see cause to thank me for a course

Which now, perchance . . . (Sir, tell them so!)

— he blames.

Well, choose some fitter time to make your charge :

I shall be with the Scots, you understand?

Then yelp at me!

Meanwhile, your Majesty

Binds me, by this fresh token of your trust . . .

[Under the pretence of an earnest farewell, STRAFFORD conducts CHARLES to the door, in such a manner as to hide his agitation from the rest : as the King disappears, they turn as by one impulse to PYM, who has not changed his original posture of surprise.]

Hamp. Leave me this arrogant strong wicked man!

Vane and others. Hence, Pym! Come out of this unworthy place

To our old room again! He's gone.

[STRAFFORD, just about to follow the King, looks back.]

Pym.

Not gone!

[To STRAFFORD.] Keep tryst! the old appointment's made anew:

Forget not we shall meet again!

Straf.

So be it!

And if an army follows me ?

Vane.

His friends

Will entertain your army !

Pym.

I'll not say

You have misreckoned, Strafford : time shows.

Perish

Body and spirit ! Fool to feign a doubt,

Pretend the scrupulous and nice reserve

Of one whose prowess shall achieve the feat !

What share have I in it ? Do I affect

To see no dismal sign above your head

When God suspends his ruinous thunder there ?

Strafford is doomed. Touch him no one of you !

[PYM, HAMPDEN, etc., go out.]

Straf. Pym, we shall meet again !

(Lady CARLISLE enters.)

You here, child ?

Hush —

Lady Car.

I know it all : hush, Strafford !

Straf.

Ah ! you know ?

Well, I shall make a sorry soldier, Lucy !

All knights begin their enterprise, we read,

Under the best of auspices ; 't is morn,

The King girds his sword upon the Youth

(He 's always very young) — the trumpet sound,

Cups pledge him, and, why, the King blesses

him —

You need not turn a page of the romance

To learn the Dreadful Giant's fate. Indeed,

We 've the fair Lady here ; but she apart, —

A poor man, rarely having handled lance,

And rather old, weary, and far from sure

His Squires are not the Giant's friends. All 's

one :

Let us go forth !

Lady Car.

Go forth ?

Straf.

What matters it ?

We shall die gloriously — as the book says.

Lady Car. To Scotland ? not to Scotland ?

Straf.

Am I sick

Like your good brother, brave Northumberland ?

Beside, these walls seem falling on me.

Lady Car.

Strafford,

The wind that saps these walls can undermine

Your camp in Scotland, too. Whence creeps

the wind ?

Have you no eyes except for Pym ? Look here !

A breed of silken creatures lurk and thrive

In your contempt. You 'll vanquish Pym ? Old

Vane

Can vanquish you. And Vane you think to fly ?

Rush on the Scots ! Do nobly ! Vane's slight sneer

Shall test success, adjust the praise, suggest

The faint result : Vane's sneer shall reach you

there.

— You do not listen !

Straf.

Oh, — I give that up !

There 's fate in it : I give all here quite up.

Care not what old Vane does or Holland does

Against me ! 'T is so idle to withstand !

In no case tell me what they do !

Lady Car.

But, Strafford . . .

Straf. I want a little strife, beside ; real strife ;

This petty palace-warfare does me harm :

I shall feel better, fairly out of it.

Lady Car.

Why do you smile ?

Straf.

I got to fear them, child !

I could have torn his throat at first, old Vane's,

As he leered at me on his stealthy way

To the Queen's closet. Lord, one loses heart !

I often found it on my lips to say,

" Do not traduce me to her ! "

Lady Car.

But the King . . .

Straf. The King stood there, 't is not so long ago,

— There ; and the whisper, Lucy, " Be my friend

Of friends ! " — My King ! I would have . . .

Lady Car.

. . . Died for him ?

Straf. Sworn him true, Lucy : I can die for

him.

Lady Car. But go not, Strafford ! But you must renounce

This project on the Scots ! Die, wherefore die ?

Charles never loved you.

Straf.

And he never will.

He 's not of those who care the more for men

That they 're unfortunate.

Lady Car.

Then wherefore die

For such a master ?

Straf.

You that told me first

How good he was — when I must leave true

friends

To find a truer friend ! — that drew me here

From Ireland, — " I had but to show myself,

And Charles would spurn Vane, Savile, and the

rest " —

You, child, to ask me this ?

Lady Car.

(If he have set

His heart abidingly on Charles !)

Then, friend,

I shall not see you any more.

Straf.

Yes, Lucy.

There 's one man here I have to meet.

Lady Car.

(The King !

What way to save him from the King ?

My soul —

That lent from its own store the charmed disguise

Which clothes the King — he shall behold my

soul !)

Strafford, — I shall speak best if you 'll not gaze

Upon me : I had never thought, indeed,

To speak, but you would perish too, so sure !

Could you but know what 't is to bear, my

friend,

One image stamped within you, turning blank

The else imperial brilliance of your mind, —

A weakness, but most precious, — like a flaw

I' the diamond, which should shape forth some sweet face

Yet to create, and meanwhile treasured there

Let nature lose her gracious thought forever !

Straf. When could it be ? no ! Yet . . . was it the day

We waited in the anteroom, till Holland

Should leave the presence-chamber ?

Lady Car.

What ?

Straf.

— That I

Described to you my love for Charles ?

Lady Car.

(Ah, no —

One must not lure him from a love like that !

Oh, let him love the King and die ! 'T is past.

I shall not serve him worse for that one brief

And passionate hope, silent forever now !)

And you are really bound for Scotland then?
I wish you well: you must be very sure
Of the King's faith, for Pym and all his crew
Will not be idle — setting Vane aside!

Straf. If Pym is busy, — you may write of Pym.

Lady Car. What need, since there's your King to take your part?

He may endure Vane's counsel; but for Pym — Think you he'll suffer Pym to . . .

Straf. Child, your hair is glossier than the Queen's!

Lady Car. Is that to ask A curl of me?

Straf. Scotland — the weary way!
Lady Car. Stay, let me fasten it.

— A rival's, Strafford?
Straf. [showing the George.] He hung it there: twine yours around it, child!

Lady Car. No — no — another time — I trifle so!

And there's a masque on foot. Farewell. The Court

Is dull; do something to enliven us
In Scotland: we expect it at your hands.

Straf. I shall not fail in Scotland.
Lady Car. Prosper — if

You'll think of me sometimes!

Straf. How think of him And not of you? of you, the lingering streak

(A golden one) in my good fortune's eve.
Lady Car. Strafford . . . Well, when the eve has its last streak

The night has its first star. [She goes out.

Straf. That voice of hers — You'd think she had a heart sometimes! His voice

Is soft too.

Only God can save him now.
Be Thou about his bed, about his path!

His path! Where's England's path? Diverging wide,

And not to join again the track my foot
Must follow — whither? All that forlorn way

Among the tombs! Far — far — till . . . What, they do

Then join again, these paths? For, huge in the dusk,

There's — Pym to face!

Why then, I have a foe
To close with, and a fight to fight at last

Worthy my soul! What, do they beard the King,

And shall the King want Strafford at his need?
Am I not here?

Not in the market-place,
Pressed on by the rough artisans, so proud

To catch a glance from Wentworth! They lie down

Hungry yet smile, "Why, it must end some day:

Is he not watching for our sake?" Not there!
But in Whitehall, the whited sepulchre,

The . . .
Curse nothing to-night! Only one name

They'll curse in all those streets to-night.
Whose fault?

Did I make kings? set up, the first, a man

To represent the multitude, receive
All love in right of them — supplant them so,
Until you love the man and not the king —
The man with the mild voice and mournful eyes
Which send me forth.

— To breast the bloody sea
That sweeps before me: with one star for guide.
Night has its first, supreme, forsaken star.

ACT III

SCENE I. Opposite Westminster Hall.

SIR HENRY VANE, LORD SAVILE, LORD HOLLAND and others of the Court.

Sir H. Vane. The Commons thrust you out?
Savile. And what kept you

From sharing their civility?
Vane. Kept me?

Fresh news from Scotland, sir! worse than the last.

If that may be. All's up with Strafford there:
Nothing to bar the mad Scots marching hither

Next Lord's-day morning. That detained me, sir!

Well now, before they thrust you out, — go on, —
Their Speaker — did the fellow Lenthal say

All we set down for him?
Holland. Not a word missed.

Ere he began, we entered, Savile, I
And Bristol and some more, with hope to breed

A wholesome awe in the new Parliament.
But such a gang of graceless ruffians, Vane,

As glared at us!

Vane. So many?
Sav. Not a bench

Without its complement of burly knaves;
Your hopeful son among them: Hampden leant

Upon his shoulder — think of that!

Vane. I'd think
On Lenthal's speech, if I could get at it.

Urged he, I ask, how grateful they should prove
For this unlooked-for summons from the King?

Holl. Just as we drilled him.
Vane. That the Scots will march

On London?
Holl. All, and made so much of it,

A dozen subsidies at least seemed sure
To follow, when . . .

Vane. Well?
Holl. 'Tis a strange thing now!

I've a vague memory of a sort of sound,
A voice, a kind of vast unnatural voice —

Pym, sir, was speaking! Savile, help me out.
What was it all?

Sav. Something about "a matter" —
No, "work for England."

Holl. "England's great revenge"
He talked of.

Sav. How should I get used to Pym
More than yourselves?

Holl. However that may be,
'T was something with which we had naught to

do,
For we were "strangers," and 't was "England's work" —

(All this while looking us straight in the face)

In other words, our presence might be spared.
So, in the twinkling of an eye, before
I settled to my mind what ugly brute
Was likest Pym just then, they yelled us out,
Locked the doors after us, and here are we.

Vane. Eliot's old method . . .

Sav. Prithee, Vane, a truce
To Eliot and his times, and the great Duke,
And how to manage Parliaments! 'T was you
Advised the Queen to summon this: why, Strafford

(To do him justice) would not hear of it.

Vane. Say rather, you have done the best of turns

To Strafford: he's at York, we all know why.
I would you had not set the Scots on Strafford
Till Strafford put down Pym for us, my lord!

Sav. Was it I altered Strafford's plans? did I . . .

(A Messenger enters.)

Mes. The Queen, my lords — she sends me:
follow me

At once; 'tis very urgent! she requires
Your counsel: something perilous and strange
Occasions her command.

Sav. We follow, friend!
Now, Vane; — your Parliament will plague us
all!

Vane. No Strafford here beside!

Sav. If you dare hint
I had a hand in his betrayal, sir . . .

Holl. Nay, find a fitter time for quarrels —
Pym

Will overmatch the best of you; and, think,
The Queen!

Vane. Come on, then: understand, I loathe
Strafford as much as any — but his use!
To keep off Pym, to screen a friend or two,
I would we had reserved him yet awhile.

SCENE II. Whitehall.

The QUEEN and Lady CARLISLE.

Queen. It cannot be.

Lady Car. It is so.

Queen. Why, the House
Have hardly met.

Lady Car. They met for that.

Queen. No, no!
Meet to impeach Lord Strafford? 'T is a jest.

Lady Car. A bitter one.

Queen. Consider! 'T is the House
We summoned so reluctantly, which nothing
But the disastrous issue of the war
Persuaded us to summon. They'll wreak all
Their spite on us, no doubt; but the old way
Is to begin by talk of grievances:

They have their grievances to busy them.

Lady Car. Pym has begun his speech.

Queen. Where's Vane? — That is,
Pym will impeach Lord Strafford if he leaves
His Presidency; he's at York, we know,
Since the Scots beat him: why should he leave York?

Lady Car. Because the King sent for him.

Queen. Ah — but if
The King did send for him, he let him know
We had been forced to call a Parliament —

A step which Strafford, now I come to think,
Was vehement against.

Lady Car. The policy
Escaped him, of first striking Parliaments
To earth, then setting them upon their feet
And giving them a sword: but this is idle.
Did the King send for Strafford? He will come.

Queen. And what am I to do?

Lady Car. What do? Fail, madam!
Be ruined for his sake! what matters how,
So it but stand on record that you made
An effort, only one?

Queen. The King away

At Theobald's!

Lady Car. Send for him at once: he must Dissolve the House.

Queen. Wait till Vane finds the truth
Of the report: then . . .

Lady Car. — It will matter little What the King does. Strafford that lends his arm

And breaks his heart for you!

(Sir H. VANE enters.)

Vane. The Commons, madam,
Are sitting with closed doors. A huge debate,
No lack of noise; but nothing, I should guess,
Concerning Strafford: Pym has certainly
Not spoken yet.

Queen. [To Lady CARLISLE.] You hear?

Lady Car. I do not hear
That the King's sent for!

Vane. Savile will be able
To tell you more.

(HOLLAND enters.)

Queen. The last news, Holland?

Holl. Pym
Is raging like a fire. The whole House means
To follow him together to Whitehall
And force the King to give up Strafford.

Queen. Strafford?

Holl. If they content themselves with Strafford! Laud

Is talked of, Cottington and Windebank too.

Pym has not left out one of them — I would

You heard Pym raging!

Queen. Vane, go find the King!
Tell the King, Vane, the People follow Pym
To brave us at Whitehall!

(SAVILE enters.)

Sav. Not to Whitehall —
'T is to the Lords they go: they seek redress
On Strafford from his peers — the legal way,
They call it.

Queen. (Wait, Vane!)

Sav. But the adage gives
Long life to threatened men. Strafford can save Himself so readily: at York, remember,
In his own county: what has he to fear?
The Commons only mean to frighten him
From leaving York. Surely, he will not come.

Queen. Lucy, he will not come!

Lady Car. Once more, the King
Has sent for Strafford. He will come.

Vane. Oh doubtless!
And bring destruction with him: that's his way.
What but his coming spoilt all Conway's plan?
The King must take his counsel, choose his
friends,

Be wholly ruled by him! What's the result? The North that was to rise, Ireland to help, — What came of it? In my poor mind, a fright is no prodigious punishment.

Lady Car. A fright?
Pym will fail worse than Strafford if he thinks To frighten him. [To the QUEEN.] You will not save him then?

Sav. When something like a charge is made, the King

Will best know how to save him: and 't is clear, While Strafford suffers nothing by the matter, The King may reap advantage: this in question, No dunning you with ship-money complaints!

Queen. [To Lady CARLISLE.] If we dissolve them, who will pay the army?

Protect us from the insolent Scots?
Lady Car. In truth,

I know not, madam. Strafford's fate concerns Me little: you desired to learn what course Would save him: I obey you.

Vane. Notice, too,
There can't be fairer ground for taking full Revenge — (Strafford's revengeful) — than he 'll have Against his old friend Pym.

Queen. Why, he shall claim
Vengeance on Pym!

Vane. And Strafford, who is he
To 'scape unscathed amid the accidents
That harass all beside? I, for my part,
Should look for something of discomfiture
Had the King trusted me so thoroughly
And been so paid for it.

Holl. He 'll keep at York:
All will blow over: he 'll return no worse,
Humbled a little, thankful for a place
Under as good a man. Oh, we 'll dispense
With seeing Strafford for a month or two!

(STRAFFORD enters.)

Queen. You here!
Straf. The King sends for me, madam.

Queen. Sir,
The King . . .

Straf. An urgent matter that imports
the King!

[To Lady CARLISLE.] Why, Lucy, what's in agitation now,

That all this muttering and shrugging, see,
Begins at me? They do not speak!

Lady Car. 'T is welcome!
For we are proud of you — happy and proud

To have you with us, Strafford! You were stanch

At Durham: you did well there! Had you not Been stayed, you might have . . . we said, even

now,
Our hope's in you!

Vane. [To Lady CARLISLE.] The Queen would speak with you.

Straf. Will one of you, his servants here, vouchsafe

To signify my presence to the King?

Sav. An urgent matter?

Straf. None that touches you,
Lord Savile! Say, it were some treacherous

Sly pitiful intriguing with the Scots —

You would go free, at least! (They half divine

My purpose!) Madam, shall I see the King?
The service I would render, much concerns
His welfare.

Queen. But his Majesty, my lord,
May not be here, may . . .

Straf. Its importance, then,
Must plead excuse for this withdrawal, madam,
And for the grief it gives Lord Savile here.

Queen. [Who has been conversing with VANE and HOLLAND.] The King will see you,
sir!

[To Lady CARLISLE.] Mark me: Pym's worst
Is done by now: he has impeached the Earl,
Or found the Earl too strong for him, by now.

Let us not seem instructed! We should work
No good to Strafford, but deform ourselves

With shame in the world's eye. [To STRAFFORD.] His Majesty

Has much to say with you.
Straf. Time fleeting, too!

[To Lady CARLISLE.] No means of getting them away? And She —

What does she whisper? Does she know my purpose?

What does she think of it? Get them away!

Queen. [To Lady CARLISLE.] He comes to baffle Pym — he thinks the danger

Far off: tell him no word of it! a time
For help will come; we 'll not be wanting then.

Keep him in play, Lucy — you, self-possessed
And calm! [To STRAFFORD.] To spare your lordship some delay

I will myself acquaint the King. [*To LADY
CARLISLE.*] Beware!

[The QUEEN, VANE, HOLLAND, and SAVILE go out.
Straf. She knows it?

Lady Car. Tell me, Strafford!
Straf. Afterward!

This moment's the great moment of all time.
She knows my purpose?

Lady Car. Thoroughly: just now
She bade me hide it from you.

Straf. Quick, dear child,
The whole o' the scheme?

Lady Car. (Ah, he would learn if they Connive at Pym's procedure! Could they but

Have once apprised the King! But there's no
time

For falsehood, now.) Strafford, the whole is known.

Straf. Known and approved?

Lady Car. Hardly discountenanced.

Straf. And the King — say, the King consents as well?

Lady Car. The King's not yet informed,
but will not dare

To interpose.
Straf. What need to wait him, then?

He 'll sanction it! I stayed, child, tell him,
long!

It vexed me to the soul — this waiting here.
You know him, there's no counting on the

King.
Tell him I waited long!

Lady Car. (What can he mean?
Rejoice at the King's hollowness?)

Straf. I knew
They would be glad of it, — all over once,

I knew they would be glad: but he 'd contrive,
The Queen and he, to mar, by helping it,
An angel's making.

Lady Car. (Is he mad?) Dear Strafford,
You were not wont to look so happy.

Straf. Sweet,
I tried obedience thoroughly. I took
The King's wild plan: of course, ere I could reach

My army, Conway ruined it. I drew
The wrecks together, raised all heaven and earth,

And would have fought the Scots: the King at
once

Made truce with them. Then, Lucy, then,
dear child,

God put it in my mind to love, serve, die
For Charles, but never to obey him more!

While he endured their insolence at Ripon
I fell on them at Durham. But you'll tell

The King I waited? All the anteroom
Is filled with my adherents.

Lady Car. Strafford — Strafford,
What daring act is this you hint?

Straf. No, no!
'Tis here, not daring if you knew? all here!

[Drawing papers from his breast.
Full proof; see, ample proof — does the Queen
know

I have such damning proof? Bedford and Essex,

Brooke, Warwick, Savile (did you notice Savile?

The simper that I spoil?), Saye, Mandeville —
Sold to the Scots, body and soul, by Pym!

Lady Car. Great heaven!
Straf. From Savile and his lords, to Pym

And his losels, crushed! — Pym shall not ward
the blow

Nor Savile creep aside from it! The Crew
And the Cabal — I crush them!

Lady Car. And you go —
Strafford, — and now you go? —

Straf. — About no work
In the background, I promise you! I go Straight to the House of Lords to claim these knaves,

Mainwaring!
Lady Car. Stay — stay, Strafford!

Straf. She'll return,
The Queen — some little project of her own!

No time to lose: the King takes fright perhaps.
Lady Car. Pym's strong, remember!

Straf. Very strong, as fits
The Faction's head — with no offence to Hamp-

den,
Vane, Rudyard, and my loving Hollis: one

And all they lodge within the Tower to-night
In just equality. Bryan! Mainwaring!

[Many of his Adherents enter.
The Peers debate just now (a lucky chance)

On the Scots' war; my visit's opportune.
When all is over, Bryan, you proceed

To Ireland: these dispatches, mark me, Bryan,
Are for the Deputy, and these for Ormond:

We want the army here — my army, raised
At such a cost, that should have done such good,

And was inactive all the time! no matter,

We'll find a use for it. Willis . . . or, no —
you!

You, friend, make haste to York: bear this, at
once . . .

Or, — better stay for form's sake, see yourself
The news you carry. You remain with me

To execute the Parliament's command,
Mainwaring! Help to seize these lesser knaves,

Take care there's no escaping at backdoors:
I'll not have one escape, mind me — not one!

I seem revengeful, Lucy? Did you know
What these men dare!

Lady Car. It is so much they dare!
Straf. I proved that long ago; my turn is
now.

Keep sharp watch, Goring, on the citizens!
Observe who harbors any of the brood

That scramble off: be sure they smart for it!
Our coffers are but lean.

And you, child, too,
Shall have your task; deliver this to Laud.

Laud will not be the slowest in my praise:
"Thorough," he'll cry! — Foolish, to be so glad!

This life is gay and glowing, after all:
'Tis worth while, Lucy, having foes like mine

Just for the bliss of crushing them. To-day
Is worth the living for.

Lady Car. That reddening brow!
You seem . . .

Straf. Well — do I not? I would be well —
I could not but be well on such a day!

And, this day ended, 't is of slight import
How long the ravaged frame subjects the soul

In Strafford.
Lady Car. Noble Strafford!

Straf. No farewell!
I'll see you anon, to-morrow — the first thing.

— If She should come to stay me!
Lady Car. Go — 't is nothing —

Only my heart that swells: it has been thus Ere now: go, Strafford!

Straf. To-night, then, let it be.
I must see Him: you, the next after Him.

I'll tell you how Pym looked. Follow me,
friends!

You, gentlemen, shall see a sight this hour
To talk of all your lives. Close after me!

"My friend of friends!"
[STRAFFORD and the rest go out.

Lady Car. The King — ever the King!
No thought of one beside, whose little word

Unveils the King to him — one word from me,
Which yet I do not breathe!

Ah, have I spared
Strafford a pang, and shall I seek reward

Beyond that memory? Surely too, some way
He is the better for my love. No, no —

He would not look so joyous — I'll believe
His very eye would never sparkle thus,

Had I not prayed for him this long, long while.

SCENE III. The Ante-chamber of the House of Lords.
Many of the Presbyterian Party. The Adherents of

STRAFFORD, etc.

A Group of Presbyterians. — 1. I tell you he struck Maxwell: Maxwell sought

To stay the Earl ; he struck him and passed on.
2. Fear as you may, keep a good countenance
Before these rufflers.

3.                               Strafford here the first,
With the great army at his back !

4.                               No doubt.
I would Pym had made haste : that's Bryan,
hush—

The gallant pointing.

Strafford's Followers. — 1. Mark these worthies, now !

2. A goodly gathering ! "Where the carcass is

There shall the eagles" — What's the rest ?

3.                               For eagles
Say crows.

A Presbyterian. Stand back, sirs !

One of Strafford's Followers. Are we in Geneva ?

A Presbyterian. No, nor in Ireland ; we have leave to breathe.

One of Strafford's Followers. Truly ? Behold how privileged we be

That serve "King Pym" ! There's Some-one at Whitehall

Who skulks obscure ; but Pym struts . . .

The Presbyterian.                               Nearer.

A Follower of Strafford.                               Higher,
We look to see him. [To his Companions.] I'm to have St. John

In charge ; was he among the knaves just now
That followed Pym within there ?

Another.                               The gaunt man

Talking with Rudyard. Did the Earl expect
Pym at his heels so fast ? I like it not.

(MAXWELL enters.)

Another. Why, man, they rush into the net !
Here's Maxwell—

Ha, Maxwell ? How the brethren flock around
The fellow ! Do you feel the Earl's hand yet
Upon your shoulder, Maxwell ?

Maxwell.                               Gentlemen,
Stand back ! a great thing passes here.

A Follower of Strafford. [To another.] The Earl

Is at his work ! [To M.] Say, Maxwell, what great thing !

Speak out ! [To a Presbyterian.] Friend, I've a kindness for you ! Friend,

I've seen you with St. John : O stockishness !

Wear such a ruff, and never call to mind

St. John's head in a charger ? How, the plague,
Not laugh ?

Another. Say, Maxwell, what great thing !

Another.                               Nay, wait :

The jest will be to wait.

First.                               And who's to bear

These demure hypocrites ? You'd swear they came . . .

Came . . . just as we come !

[A Puritan enters hastily and without observing STRAF-FORD's Followers.

The Puritan.                               How goes on the work ?

Has Pym . . .

A Follower of Strafford. The secret's out at last. Aha,

The carrion's scented ! Welcome, crow the
first !

Gorge merrily, you with the blinking eye !

"King Pym has fallen !"

The Puritan.                               Pym ?

A Strafford.                               Pym !

A Presbyterian.                               Only Pym ?

Many of Strafford's Followers. No, brother, not Pym only ; Vane as well,

Rudyard as well, Hampden, St. John as well !

A Presbyterian. My mind misgives : can it be true ?

Another.                               Lost ! Lost !

A Strafford. Say we true, Maxwell ?

The Puritan.                               Pride before destruction,

A haughty spirit goeth before a fall.

Many of Strafford's Followers. Ah now ! The very thing ! A word in season !

A golden apple in a silver picture

To greet Pym as he passes !

[The doors at the back begin to open, noise and light issuing.

Max.                               Stand back, all !

Many of the Presbyterians. I hold with Pym !
And I !

Strafford's Followers.                               Now for the text !

He comes ! Quick !

The Puritan. How hath the oppressor ceased !

The Lord hath broken the staff of the wicked !

The sceptre of the rulers, he who smote

The people in wrath with a continual stroke,

That ruled the nations in his anger — he

Is persecuted and none hindereth !

[The doors open, and STRAFFORD issues in the greatest disorder, and amid cries from within of "Void the House !"

Straf. Impeach me ! Pym ! I never struck, I think,

The felon on that calm insulting mouth

When it proclaimed — Pym's mouth proclaimed me . . . God !

Was it a word, only a word that held

The outrageous blood back on my heart — which beats !

Which beats ! Some one word — "Traitor," did he say,

Bending that eye, brimful of bitter fire,
Upon me ?

Max. In the Commons' name, their servant
Demands Lord Strafford's sword.

Straf.                               What did you say ?

Max. The Commons bid me ask your lordship's sword.

Straf. Let us go forth : follow me, gentlemen !
Draw your swords too : cut any down that bar-rus.

On the King's service ! Maxwell, clear the way !
[The Presbyterians prepare to dispute his passage.

Straf. I stay : the King himself shall see me
here.

Your tablets, fellow !

[To MAINWARING.] Give that to the King !

Yes, Maxwell, for the next half-hour, let be !
Nay, you shall take my sword !

[MAXWELL advances to take it.

Or, no — not that !

Their blood, perhaps, may wipe out all thus far.
All up to that — not that ! Why, friend, you see

When the King lays your head beneath my foot
It will not pay for that. Go, all of you !

Max. I dare, my lord, to disobey : none stir !
Straf. This gentle Maxwell ! — Do not touch him, Bryan !

[To the Presbyterians.] Whichever cur of you will carry this Escapes his fellow's fate. None saves his life ? None ?

[Cries from within of "STRAFFORD !"] Slingsby, I've loved you at least : make haste ! Stab me ! I have not time to tell you why.

You then, my Bryan ! Mainwaring, you then ! Is it because I spoke so hastily

At Allerton ? The King had vexed me. You ! — Not even you ? If I live over this,

The King is sure to have your heads, you know ! But what if I can't live this minute through ?

Pym, who is there with his pursuing smile !

[Louder cries of "STRAFFORD !"] The King ! I troubled him, stood in the way

Of his negotiations, was the one Great obstacle to peace, the Enemy

Of Scotland : and he sent for me, from York, My safety guaranteed — having prepared

A Parliament — I see ! And at Whitehall The Queen was whispering with Vane — I see

The trap ! [Tearing off the George.]

I tread a gewgaw underfoot, And cast a memory from me. One stroke, now !

[His own Adherents disarm him. Renewed cries of "STRAFFORD !"]

England ! I see thy arm in this and yield. Pray you now — Pym awaits me — pray you now !

[STRAFFORD reaches the doors : they open wide. HAMPDEN and a crowd discovered, and, at the bar, PYM standing apart. As STRAFFORD kneels, the scene shuts.]

ACT IV

SCENE I. Whitehall.

The KING, the QUEEN, HOLLIS, Lady CARLISLE. (VANE, HOLLAND, SAVILE, in the background.)

Lady Car. Answer them, Hollis, for his sake ! One word !

Cha. [To HOLLIS.] You stand, silent and cold, as though I were Deceiving you — my friend, my playfellow Of other times. What wonder after all ?

Just so, I dreamed my People loved me.

Hol. Sir, It is yourself that you deceive, not me.

You'll quit me comforted, your mind made up That, since you've talked thus much and grieved thus much, All you can do for Strafford has been done.

Queen. If you kill Strafford — (come, we grant you leave, Suppose) —

Hol. I may withdraw, sir ?

Lady Car. Hear them out ! 'Tis the last chance for Strafford ! Hear them out !

Hol. "If we kill Strafford" — on the eighteenth day

Of Strafford's trial — "We !"

Cha. Pym, my good Hollis —

Pym, I should say !

Hol. Ah, true — sir, pardon me !

You witness our proceedings every day ; But the screened gallery, I might have guessed,

Admits of such a partial glimpse at us, Pym takes up all the room, shuts out the view.

Still, on my honor, sir, the rest of the place Is not unoccupied. The Commons sit

— That's England ; Ireland sends, and Scotland too,

Their representatives ; the Peers that judge Are easily distinguished ; one remarks

The People here and there : but the close curtain

Must hide so much !

Queen. Acquaint your insolent crew, This day the curtain shall be dashed aside !

It served a purpose.

Hol. Think ! This very day ? Ere Strafford rises to defend himself ?

Cha. I will defend him, sir ! — sanction the past

This day : it ever was my purpose. Rage At me, not Strafford !

Lady Car. Nobly ! — will he not Do nobly ?

Hol. Sir, you will do honestly ; And, for that deed, I too would be a king.

Cha. Only, to do this now ! — "deaf" (in your style)

"To subjects' prayers," — I must oppose them now !

It seems their will the trial should proceed, — So palpably their will !

Hol. You peril much, But it were no bright moment save for that,

Strafford, your prime support, the sole roof-tree

Which props this quaking House of Privilege, (Flood comes, winds beat, and see — the treacherous sand !)

Doubtless, if the mere putting forth an arm Could save him, you'd save Strafford.

Cha. And they dare Consummate calmly this great wrong ! No hope ?

This ineffaceable wrong ! No pity then ?

Hol. No plague in store for perfidy ? — Farewell !

You call me, sir — [To Lady CARLISLE.] You, lady, bade me come

To save the Earl : I came, thank God for it, To learn how far such perfidy can go !

You, sir, concert with me on saving him Who have just ruined Strafford !

Cha. I ? — and how ?

Hol. Eighteen days long he throws, one after one,

Pym's charges back : a blind moth-eaten law ! — He'll break from it at last : and whom to thank ?

The mouse that gnawed the lion's net for him Got a good friend, — but he, the other mouse,

That looked on while the lion freed himself — Fared he so well, does any fable say ?

Cha. What can you mean ?

Hol. Pym never could have proved Strafford's design of bringing up the troops

To force this kingdom to obedience: Vane — Your servant, not our friend, has proved it.

Cha. Vane?

Hol. This day. Did Vane deliver up or no Those notes which, furnished by his son to Pym, Seal Strafford's fate?

Cha. Sir, as I live, I know Nothing that Vane has done! What treason next?

I wash my hands of it. Vane, speak the truth! Ask Vane himself!

Hol. I will not speak to Vane, Who speak to Pym and Hampden every day.

Queen. Speak to Vane's master then! What gain to him Were Strafford's death?

Hol. Ha? Strafford cannot turn As you, sir, sit there — bid you forth, demand If every hateful act were not set down In his commission? — whether you contrived Or no, that all the violence should seem His work, the gentle ways — your own, — his part,

To counteract the King's kind impulses — While . . . but you know what he could say! And then

He might produce — mark, sir! — a certain charge

To set the King's express command aside, If need were, and be blameless. He might add . . .

Cha. Enough!

Hol. — Who bade him break the Parliament,

Find some pretence for setting up sword-law!

Queen. Retire!

Cha. Once more, whatever Vane dared do, I know not: he is rash, a fool — I know Nothing of Vane!

Hol. Well — I believe you. Sir, Believe me, in return, that . . . [Turning to Lady CARLISLE.] Gentle lady, The few words I would say, the stones might hear Sooner than these, — I rather speak to you, You, with the heart! The question, trust me, takes Another shape, to-day: not, if the King Or England shall succumb, — but, who shall pay The forfeit, Strafford or his master. Sir, You loved me once: think on my warning now!

[Goes out.]

Cha. On you and on your warning both! — Carlisle!

That paper!

Queen. But consider!

Cha. Give it me!

There, signed — will that content you? Do not speak!

You have betrayed me, Vane! See! any day, According to the tenor of that paper, He bids your brother bring the army up, Strafford shall head it and take full revenge. Seek Strafford! Let him have the same, before He rises to defend himself!

Queen. In truth?

That your shrewd Hollis should have worked a change

Like this! You, late reluctant . . .

Cha. Say, Carlisle,

Your brother Percy brings the army up, Falls on the Parliament — (I'll think of you, My Hollis!) say, we plotted long — 't is mine, The scheme is mine, remember! Say, I cursed Vane's folly in your hearing! If the Earl Does rise to do us shame, the fault shall lie With you, Carlisle!

Lady Car. Nay, fear not me! but still That's a bright moment, sir, you throw away. Tear down the veil and save him!

Queen. Go, Carlisle!

Lady Car. (I shall see Strafford — speak to him: my heart

Must never beat so, then! And if I tell The truth? What's gained by falsehood?

There they stand

Whose trade it is, whose life it is! How vain To gild such rottenness! Strafford shall know, Thoroughly know them!)

Queen. Trust to me! [To CARLISLE.]

Carlisle,

You seem inclined, alone of all the Court, To serve poor Strafford: this bold plan of yours Merits much praise, and yet . . .

Lady Car. Time presses, madam.

Queen. Yet — may it not be something premature?

Strafford defends himself to-day — reserves Some wondrous effort, one may well suppose!

Lady Car. Ay, Hollis hints as much.

Cha. Why linger then?

Haste with the scheme — my scheme: I shall be there

To watch his look. Tell him I watch his look!

Queen. Stay, we'll precede you!

Lady Car. At your pleasure.

Cha. Say —

Say, Vane is hardly ever at Whitehall!

I shall be there, remember!

Lady Car. Doubt me not.

Cha. On our return, Carlisle, we wait you here!

Lady Car. I'll bring his answer. Sir, I follow you.

(Prove the King faithless, and I take away All Strafford cares to live for: let it be — 'T is the King's scheme!)

My Strafford, I can save, Nay, I have saved you, yet am scarce content, Because my poor name will not cross your mind. Strafford, how much I am unworthy you!)

SCENE II. A passage adjoining Westminster Hall.

Many groups of Spectators of the Trial. Officers of the Court, etc.

1st Spec. More crowd than ever! Not know Hampden, man?

That's he, by Pym, Pym that is speaking now. No, truly, if you look so high you'll see Little enough of either!

2d Spec. Stay: Pym's arm Points like a prophet's rod.

3d Spec. Ay, ay, we've heard Some pretty speaking: yet the Earl escapes.

4th Spec. I fear it: just a foolish word or two

About his children — and we see, forsooth,
Not England's foe in Strafford, but the man
Who, sick, half-blind . . .

2d Spec. What's that Pym's saying now
Which makes the curtains flutter? look! A hand

Clutches them. Ah! The King's hand!

5th Spec. I had thought Pym was not near so tall. What said he,
friend?

2d Spec. "Nor is this way a novel way of blood,"

And the Earl turns as if to . . . Look! look!

Many Spectators. There!

What ails him? No — he rallies, see — goes on,
And Strafford smiles. Strange!

An Officer. Haselrig!

Many Spectators. Friend? Friend?

The Officer. Lost, utterly lost: just when we looked for Pym

To make a stand against the ill effects

Of the Earl's speech! Is Haselrig without?

Pym's message is to him.

3d Spec. Now, said I true?

Will the Earl leave them yet at fault or no?
1st Spec. Never believe it, man! These notes of Vane's

Ruin the Earl.

5th Spec. A brave end: not a whit
Less firm, less Pym all over. Then, the trial
Is closed. No — Strafford means to speak
again?

An Officer. Stand back, there!

5th Spec. Why, the Earl is coming hither!
Before the court breaks up! His brother,
look, —

You'd say he'd deprecated some fierce act
In Strafford's mind just now.

An Officer. Stand back, I say!

2d Spec. Who's the veiled woman that he talks with?

Many Spectators. Hush —

The Earl! the Earl!

[Enter STRAFFORD, SLINGSBY, and other Secretaries,
HOLLIS, Lady CARLISLE, MAXWELL, BALFOUR, etc.
STRAFFORD converses with Lady CARLISLE.

Hol. So near the end! Be patient —
Return!

Straf. [To his Secretaries.] Here — anywhere — or, 't is freshest here!

To spend one's April here, the blossom-month:
Set it down here!

[They arrange a table, papers, etc.

So, Pym can quail, can cower
Because I glance at him, yet more's to do.

What's to be answered, Slingsby? Let us end!

[To Lady CARLISLE.] Child, I refuse his offer; whatsoever

It be! Too late! Tell me no word of him!

'T is something, Hollis, I assure you that —

To stand, sick as you are, some eighteen days

Fighting for life and fame against a pack

Of very curs, that lie through thick and thin,

Eat flesh and bread by wholesale, and can't say

"Strafford" if it would take my life!

Lady Car. Be moved!

Glance at the paper!

Straf. Already at my heels!

Pym's faulting bloodhounds scent the track
again.

Peace, child! Now, Slingsby!

[Messengers from LANE and other of STRAFFORD's Counsel within the Hall are coming and going during the Scene.

Straf. [setting himself to write and dictate.]

I shall beat you, Hollis!

Do you know that? In spite of St. John's tricks,
In spite of Pym — your Pym who shrank from
me!

Eliot would have contrived it otherwise.

[To a Messenger.] In truth? This slip, tell

Lane, contains as much

As I can call to mind about the matter.

Eliot would have disdained . . .

[Calling after the Messenger.] And Radcliffe,
say,

The only person who could answer Pym,

Is safe in prison, just for that.

Well, well!

It had not been recorded in that case,

I baffled you.

[To Lady CARLISLE.] Nay, child, why look so grieved?

All's gained without the King! You saw Pym quail?

What shall I do when they acquit me, think
you,

But tranquilly resume my task as though

Nothing had intervened since I proposed

To call that traitor to account! Such tricks,

Trust me, shall not be played a second time,

Not even against Laud, with his gray hair —

Your good work, Hollis! Peace! To make amends,

You, Lucy, shall be here when I impeach

Pym and his fellows.

Hol. Wherefore not protest

Against our whole proceeding, long ago?

Why feel indignant now? Why stand this while

Enduring patiently?

Straf. Child, I'll tell you —

You, and not Pym — you, the slight graceful girl

Tall for a flowering lily, and not Hollis —

Why I stood patient! I was fool enough

To see the will of England in Pym's will;

To fear, myself had wronged her, and to wait

Her judgment: when, behold, in place of it . . .

[To a Messenger who whispers.] Tell Lane to answer no such question! Law, —

I grapple with their law! I'm here to try

My actions by their standard, not my own!

Their law allowed that levy: what's the rest

To Pym, or Lane, any but God and me?

Lady Car. The King's so weak! Secure

this chance! 'T was Vane,

Never forget, who furnished Pym the notes . . .

Straf. Fit, — very fit, those precious notes of Vane.

To close the Trial worthily! I feared

Some spice of nobleness might linger yet

And spoil the character of all the past.

Vane eased me . . . and I will go back and say

As much — to Pym, to England! Follow me,

I have a word to say! There, my defence

Is done!

Stay! why be proud? Why care to own

My gladness, my surprise? — Nay, not surprise!
Wherefore insist upon the little pride
Of doing all myself, and sparing him
The pain? Child, say the triumph is my King's!
When Pym grew pale, and trembled, and sank
down,

One image was before me: could I fail?
Child, care not for the past, so indistinct,
Obscure — there's nothing to forgive in it,
'Tis so forgotten! From this day begins
A new life, founded on a new belief
In Charles.

Hol. In Charles? Rather believe in Pym!
And here he comes in proof! Appeal to Pym!
Say how unfair . . .

Straff. To Pym? I would say nothing!
I would not look upon Pym's face again.

Lady Car. Stay, let me have to think I pressed your hand!

[STRAFFORD and his Friends go out.]

[Enter HAMPDEN and VANE.]

Vane. O Hampden, save the great misguided
man!
Plead Strafford's cause with Pym! I have remarked

He moved no muscle when we all declaimed
Against him: you had but to breathe — he turned
Those kind calm eyes upon you.

[Enter PYM, the Solicitor-General ST. JOHN, the Managers of the Trial, FIENNES, RUDYARD, etc.]

Rud. Horrible!
Till now all hearts were with you: I withdraw
For one. Too horrible! But we mistake
Your purpose, Pym: you cannot snatch away
The last spar from the drowning man.

Fien. He talks
With St. John of it — see, how quietly!
[To other Presbyterians.] You'll join us?

Strafford may deserve the worst:
But this new course is monstrous. Vane, take heart!

This Bill of his Attainder shall not have
One true man's hand to it.

Vane. Consider, Pym!
Confront your Bill, your own Bill: what is
it?

You cannot catch the Earl on any charge, —
No man will say the law has hold of him
On any charge; and therefore you resolve
To take the general sense on his desert,
As though no law existed, and we met
To found one. You refer to Parliament
To speak its thought upon the abortive mass
Of half-borne-out assertions, dubious hints
Hereafter to be cleared, distortions — ay,
And wild inventions. Every man is saved
The task of fixing any single charge
On Strafford: he has but to see in him
The enemy of England.

Pym. A right scruple!
I have heard some called England's enemy
With less consideration.

Vane. Pity me!
Indeed you make me think I was your friend!
I who have murdered Strafford, how remove
That memory from me?

Pym. I absolve you, Vane.
Take you no care for aught that you have done!

Vane. John Hampden, not this Bill! Reject this Bill!

He staggers through the ordeal: let him go,
Strew no fresh fire before him! Plead for us!
When Strafford spoke, your eyes were thick with tears!

Hamp. England speaks louder: who are we,
to play

The generous pardoner at her expense,
Magnanimously waive advantages,
And, if he conquer us, applaud his skill?

Vane. He was your friend.

Pym. I have heard that before.

Fien. And England trusts you.
Hamp. Shame be his, who turns

The opportunity of serving her
She trusts him with, to his own mean account —
Who would look nobly frank at her expense!

Fien. I never thought it could have come to
this.

Pym. But I have made myself familiar,
Fiennes,

With this one thought — have walked, and sat,
and slept,

This thought before me. I have done such things,

Being the chosen man that should destroy
The traitor. You have taken up this thought
To play with, for a gentle stimulant,
To give a dignity to idler life

By the dim prospect of emprise to come,
But ever with the softening, sure belief,
That all would end some strange way right at
last.

Fien. Had we made out some weightier charge!

Pym. You say
That these are petty charges: can we come
To the real charge at all? There he is safe
In tyranny's stronghold. Apostasy
Is not a crime, treachery not a crime:
The cheek burns, the blood tingles, when you
speak

The words, but where's the power to take revenge

Upon them? We must make occasion serve, —
The oversight shall pay for the main sin
That mocks us.

Rud. But this unexampled course,
This Bill!

Pym. By this, we roll the clouds away
Of precedent and custom, and at once
Bid the great beacon-light God sets in all,
The conscience of each bosom, shine upon
The guilt of Strafford: each man lay his hand
Upon his breast, and judge!

Vane. I only see
Strafford, nor pass his corpse for all beyond!

Rud. and others. Forgive him! He would join us, now he finds

What the King counts reward! The pardon,
too,

Should be your own. Yourself should bear to Strafford

The pardon of the Commons.
Pym. Meet him? Strafford?

Have we to meet once more, then? Be it so!
And yet — the prophecy seemed half fulfilled

When, at the Trial, as he gazed, my youth,
Our friendship, divers thoughts came back at
once

And left me, for a time . . . 'Tis very sad !
To-morrow we discuss the points of law
With Lane — to-morrow ?

Vane. Not before to-morrow —
So, time enough ! I knew you would relent !

Pym. The next day, Hasebrig, you introduce
The Bill of his Attainder. Pray for me !

SCENE III. Whitehall.

The KING.

Cha. My loyal servant ! To defend himself
Thus irresistibly,—withholding aught
That seemed to implicate us !

We have done
Less gallantly by Strafford. Well, the future
Must recompense the past.

She tarries long.
I understand you, Strafford, now !

The scheme —
Carlisle's mad scheme — he 'll sanction it, I fear,
For love of me. 'T was too precipitate :
Before the army's fairly on its march,
He 'll be at large : no matter.

Well, Carlisle ?

(Enter PYM.)

Pym. Fear me not, sir :—my mission is to save,
This time.

Cha. To break thus on me ! unannounced !

Pym. It is of Strafford I would speak.

Cha. No more
Of Strafford ! I have heard too much from
you.

Pym. I spoke, sir, for the People ; will you hear

A word upon my own account ?

Cha. Of Strafford ?
(So turns the tide already ? Have we tamed
The insolent brawler ? — Strafford's eloquence Is swift in its effect.) Lord Strafford, sir,
Has spoken for himself.

Pym. Sufficiently.
I would apprise you of the novel course
The People take : the Trial fails.

Cha. Yes, yes :
We are aware, sir : for your part in it
Means shall be found to thank you.

Pym. Pray you, read
This schedule ! I would learn from your own mouth

— (It is a matter much concerning me) —
Whether, if two Estates of us concede
The death of Strafford, on the grounds set forth
Within that parchment, you, sir, can resolve
To grant your own consent to it. This Bill
Is framed by me. If you determine, sir,
That England's manifested will should guide
Your judgment, ere another week such will Shall manifest itself. If not, — I cast
Aside the measure.

Cha. You can hinder, then,
The introduction of this Bill ?

Pym. I can.

Cha. He is my friend, sir : I have wronged him ; mark you,

Had I not wronged him, this might be. You
think

Because you hate the Earl . . . (turn not away,
We know you hate him) — no one else could love
Strafford : but he has saved me, some affirm.

Think of his pride ! And do you know one
strange,

One frightful thing ? We all have used the man
As though a drudge of ours, with not a source
Of happy thoughts except in us ; and yet
Strafford has wife and children, household cares,
Just as if we had never been. Ah, sir,
You are moved, even you, a solitary man
Wed to your cause — to England if you will !

Pym. Yes—think, my soul — to England !
Draw not back !

Cha. Prevent that Bill, sir ! All your course seems fair

Till now. Why, in the end, 't is I should sign
The warrant for his death ! You have said much
I ponder on ; I never meant, indeed,
Strafford should serve me any more. I take
The Commons' counsel ; but this Bill is yours —
Nor worthy of its leader : care not, sir,
For that, however ! I will quite forget
You named it to me. You are satisfied ?

Pym. Listen to me, sir ! Eliot laid his hand,
Wasted and white, upon my forehead once ;
Wentworth — he's gone now ! — has talked on,
whole nights,

And I beside him ; Hampden loves me ; sir,
How can I breathe and not wish England well,
And her King well ?

Cha. I thank you, sir, who leave
That King his servant. Thanks, sir !

Pym. Let me speak !
— Who may not speak again ; whose spirit yearns
For a cool night after this weary day ;
— Who would not have my soul turn sicker yet
In a new task, more fatal, more august,
More full of England's utter weal or woe.

I thought, sir, could I find myself with you,
After this trial, alone, as man to man —
I might say something, warn you, pray you,
save —

Mark me, King Charles, save — you !
But God must do it. Yet I warn you, sir —
(With Strafford's faded eyes yet full on me)
As you would have no deeper question moved,
— "How long the Many must endure the One,"
Assure me, sir, if England give assent
To Strafford's death, you will not interfere !
Or —

Cha. God forsakes me. I am in a net
And cannot move. Let all be as you say !

(Enter Lady CARLISLE.)

Lady Car. He loves you — looking beautiful with joy

Because you sent me ! he would spare you all
The pain ! he never dreamed you would forsake
Your servant in the evil day — nay, see Your scheme returned ! That generous heart of his !

He needs it not — or, needing it, disdains
A course that might endanger you — you, sir,
Whom Strafford from his inmost soul . . .

[Seeing Pym.] Well met!
No fear for Strafford! All that's true and brave
On your own side shall help us: we are now
Stronger than ever.

Ha — what, sir, is this?
All is not well! What parchment have you
there?

Pym. Sir, much is saved us both.
Lady Car. This Bill! Your lip
Whitens — you could not read one line to me
Your voice would falter so!

Pym. No recreant yet!
The great word went from England to my soul,
And I arose. The end is very near.

Lady Car. I am to save him! All have shrunk beside;

'Tis only I am left. Heaven will make strong
The hand now as the heart. Then let both die!

ACT V

SCENE I. Whitehall.

HOLLIS, Lady CARLISLE.

Hol. Tell the King then! Come in with me!
Lady Car. Not so!

He must not hear till it succeeds.

Hol. Succeed?
No dream was half so vain — you'd rescue Strafford

And outwit Pym! I cannot tell you . . . lady,
The block pursues me, and the hideous show.
To-day . . . is it to-day? And all the while He's sure of the King's pardon. Think, I have To tell this man he is to die. The King
May rend his hair, for me! I'll not see Strafford

Lady Car. Only, if I succeed, remember —
Charles

Has saved him. He would hardly value life Unless his gift. My stanch friends wait. Go in —
You must go in to Charles!

Hol. And all beside Left Strafford long ago. The King has signed
The warrant for his death! the Queen was sick

Of the eternal subject. For the Court, —
The Trial was amusing in its way,
Only too much of it: the Earl withdrew
In time. But you, fragile, alone, so young,
Amid rude mercenaries — you devise
A plan to save him! Even though it fails,
What shall reward you!

Lady Car. I may go, you think,
To France with him? And you reward me,
friend,

Who lived with Strafford even from his youth
Before he set his heart on state-affairs
And they bent down that noble brow of his.
I have learned somewhat of his latter life,
And all the future I shall know: but, Hollis,
I ought to make his youth my own as well.
Tell me, — when he is saved!

Hol. My gentle friend,
He should know all and love you, but 'tis vain!

Lady Car. Love? no — too late now! Let him love the King!

'Tis the King's scheme! I have your word, remember!

We'll keep the old delusion up. But, quick!
Quick! Each of us has work to do, beside!
Go to the King! I hope — Hollis — I hope!
Say nothing of my scheme! Hush, while we
speak

Think where he is! Now for my gallant friends!

Hol. Where he is? Calling wildly upon

Charles,
Guessing his fate, pacing the prison-floor.
Let the King tell him! I'll not look on Strafford.

SCENE II. *The Tower.*STRAFFORD sitting with his Children. They sing.

O bell' andare
Per barca in mare,
Verso la sera
Di Primavera!

Andante.

O bell' an-da-re, Per bar-ca in ma-re, Ver-so la se-ra, Di pri-ma-ve-ra, O bell' an-da-re,

slentando e diminuendo.

O bell' an-da-re.

William. The boat's in the broad moonlight all this while —

Verso la sera
Di Primavera!

And the boat shoots from underneath the moon
Into the shadowy distance; only still
You hear the dipping oar —

Verso la sera,

And faint, and fainter, and then all's quite gone,
Music and light and all, like a lost star.

Anne. But you should sleep, father: you were to sleep.

Straf. I do sleep, Anne; or if not — you must
know

There's such a thing as . . .

Wil. You're too tired to sleep?
Straf. It will come by-and-by and all day long,
 In that old quiet house I told you of:

We sleep safe there.

Anne. Why not in Ireland?

Straf. No!

Too many dreams!—That song's for Venice,
William:

You know how Venice looks upon the map—
 Isles that the mainland hardly can let go?

Wil. You've been to Venice, father?

Straf. I was young, then.

Wil. A city with no King; that's why I like Even a song that comes from Venice.

Straf. William?

Wil. Oh, I know why! Anne, do you love
 the King?

But I'll see Venice for myself one day.

Straf. See many lands, boy—England last
 of all,—

That way you'll love her best.

Wil. Why do men say

You sought to ruin her, then?

Straf. Ah,—they say that.

Wil. Why?

Straf. I suppose they must have words to say,
 As you to sing.

Anne. But they make songs beside:
 Last night I heard one, in the street beneath,
 That called you . . . Oh, the names!

Wil. Don't mind her, father!
 They soon left off when I cried out to them.

Straf. We shall so soon be out of it, my boy!
 'Tis not worth while: who heeds a foolish song?

Wil. Why, not the King.

Straf. Well: it has been the fate
 Of better; and yet,—wherefore not feel sure
 That Time, who in the twilight comes to mend
 All the fantastic day's caprice, consign
 To the low ground once more the ignoble Term,
 And raise the Genius on his orb again,—
 That Time will do me right?

Anne. (Shall we sing, William?
 He does not look thus when we sing.)

Straf. For Ireland,
 Something is done: too little, but enough
 To show what might have been.

Wil. (I have no heart
 To sing now! Anne, how very sad he looks!
 Oh, I so hate the King for all he says!)

Straf. Forsook them? What, the common songs will run

That I forsook the People? Nothing more?
 Ay, Fame, the busy scribe, will pause, no doubt,
 Turning a deaf ear to her thousand slaves

Noisy to be enrolled,—will register
 The curious glosses, subtle notices,
 Ingenious clearings-up one fain would see

Beside that plain inscription of The Name—
 The Patriot Pym, or the Apostate Strafford!

[The Children resume their song timidly, but break off.]

(Enter Hollis and an Attendant.)
Straf. No,—Hollis? in good time!—Who is he?

Hol. One
 That must be present.

Straf. Ah—I understand.
 They will not let me see poor Laud alone.

How politic! They'd use me by degrees
 To solitude: and, just as you came in,
 I was solicitous what life to lead
 When Strafford's "not so much as Constable
 In the King's service." Is there any means
 To keep one's self awake? What would you do
 After this bustle, Hollis, in my place?

Hol. Strafford!

Straf. Observe, not but that Pym and you
 Will find me news enough—news I shall hear
 Under a quince-tree by a fish-pond side
 At Wentworth. Garrard must be re-engaged
 My newsman. Or, a better project now—
 What if when all's consummated, and the Saints Reign, and the Senate's work goes swim-ingly,—

What if I venture up, some day, unseen,
 To saunter through the Town, notice how Pym,
 Your Tribune, likes Whitehall, drop quietly
 Into a tavern, hear a point discussed,
 As, whether Strafford's name were John or James—

And be myself appealed to—I, who shall Myself have near forgotten!

Hol. I would speak . . .

Straf. Then you shall speak,—not now. I want just now,

To hear the sound of my own tongue. This
 place
 Is full of ghosts.

Hol. Nay, you must hear me, Strafford!

Straf. Oh, readily! Only, one rare thing
 more,—

The minister! Who will advise the King,
 Turn his Sejanus, Richelieu and what not,
 And yet have health—children, for aught I
 know—

My patient pair of traitors! Ah,—but, William—

Does not his cheek grow thin?

Wil. 'Tis you look thin.
 Father!

Straf. A scamper o'er the breezy wolds
 Sets all to-rights.

Hol. You cannot sure forget
 A prison-roof is o'er you, Strafford?

Straf. No.
 Why, no. I would not touch on that, the first.

I left you that. Well, Hollis? Say at once,
 The King can find no time to set me free!

A mask at Theobald's?

Hol. Hold: no such affair
 Detains him.

Straf. True: what needs so great a matter?
 The Queen's lip may be sore. Well: when he pleases,—

Only, I want the air: it vexes flesh

To be pent up so long.

Hol. The King—I bear
 His message, Strafford: pray you, let me speak!

Straf. Go, William! Anne, try o'er your song again!

[The Children retire.]

They shall be loyal, friend, at all events.
 I know your message: you have nothing new
 To tell me: from the first I guessed as much.
 I know, instead of coming here himself,
 Leading me forth in public by the hand,

The King prefers to leave the door ajar
As though I were escaping — bids me trudge
While the mob gapes upon some show prepared
On the other side of the river ! Give at once
His order of release ! I've heard, as well,
Of certain poor manoeuvres to avoid
The granting pardon at his proper risk ;
First, he must prattle somewhat to the Lords,
Must talk a trifle with the Commons first,
Be grieved I should abuse his confidence,
And far from blaming them, and . . . Where's the order ?

Hol. Spare me !

Straf. Why, he'd not have me steal away ?
With an old doublet and a steeple hat
Like Prynne's ? Be smuggled into France, perhaps ?

Hollis, 'tis for my children ! 'Twas for them
I first consented to stand day by day
And give your Puritans the best of words,
Be patient, speak when called upon, observe
Their rules, and not return them prompt their lie !

What 's in that boy of mine that he should prove
Son to a prison-breaker ? I shall stay
And he'll stay with me. Charles should know
as much,

He too has children !
[Turning to HOLLIS'S companion.] Sir, you feel for me !

No need to hide that face ! Though it have looked

Upon me from the judgment-seat . . . I know Strangely, that somewhere it has looked on
me . . .

Your coming has my pardon, nay, my thanks :
For there is one who comes not.

Hol. Whom forgive,
A's one to die !

Straf. True, all die, and all need
Forgiveness : I forgive him from my soul.

Hol. 'Tis a world's wonder : Strafford, you must die !

Straf. Sir, if your errand is to set me free
This heartless jest mars much. Ha ! Tears in
truth ?

We'll end this ! See this paper, warm — feel
— warm

With lying next my heart ! Whose hand is
there ?

Whose promise ? Read, and loud for God to hear !

"Strafford shall take no hurt" — read it, I say !
"In person, honor, nor estate" —

Hol. The King . . .
Straf. I could unking him by a breath !
You sit

Where London sat, who came to prophesy
The certain end, and offer me Pym's grace
If I'd renounce the King : and I stood firm
On the King's faith. The King who lives . . .

Hol. To sign
The warrant for your death.

Straf. "Put not your trust
In princes, neither in the sons of men,
In whom is no salvation !"

Hol. Trust in God !
The scaffold is prepared : they wait for you :

He has consented. Cast the earth behind !

Cha. You would not see me, Strafford, at your foot !

It was wrung from me ! Only, curse me not !

Hol. [To STRAFFORD.] As you hope grace and pardon in your need,
Be merciful to this most wretched man.

[Voices from within.]

Di Primavera.*

Straf. You'll be good to those children, sir ?
I know

You'll not believe her, even should the Queen
Think they take after one they rarely saw.
I had intended that my son should live
A stranger to these matters : but you are
So utterly deprived of friends ! He too
Must serve you — will you not be good to him ?
Or, stay, sir, do not promise — do not swear !
You, Hollis — do the best you can for me !
I've not a soul to trust to : Wandesford's dead,
And you've got Radcliffe safe, Laud's turn comes next :

I've found small time of late for my affairs,
But I trust any of you, Pym himself —
No one could hurt them : there's an infant,
too, —

These tedious cares ! Your Majesty could spare
them.

Nay — pardon me, my King ! I had forgotten
Your education, trials, much temptation,
Some weakness : there escaped a peevish
word —

'T is gone : I bless you at the last. You know
All's between you and me : what has the world
To do with it ? Farewell !

Cha. [at the door.] Balfour ! Balfour !
(Enter BALFOUR.)

The Parliament ! — go to them : I grant all Demands. Their sittings shall be permanent :
Tell them to keep their money if they will :
I'll come to them for every coat I wear
And every crust I eat : only I choose To pardon Strafford. As the Queen shall choose !

— You never heard the People howl for blood,
Beside !

Balfour. Your Majesty may hear them now :
The walls can hardly keep their murmurs out :
Please you retire !

Cha. Take all the troops, Balfour !
Bal. There are some hundred thousand of the crowd.

Cha. Come with me, Strafford ! You'll not fear, at least !

Straf. Balfour, say nothing to the world of
this !

I charge you, as a dying man, forget
You gazed upon this agony of one . . .
Of one . . . or if . . . why, you may say, Balfour.

The King was sorry : 'tis no shame in him :
Yes, you may say he even wept, Balfour.
And that I walked the lighter to the block
Because of it. I shall walk lightly, sir !
Earth fades, heaven breaks on me : I shall stand next

Before God's throne: the moment's close at hand

When man the first, last time, has leave to lay
His whole heart bare before its Maker, leave
To clear up the long error of a life
And choose one happiness for evermore.
With all mortality about me, Charles,
The sudden wreck, the dregs of violent death --
What if, despite the opening angel-song,
There penetrate one prayer for you? Be saved
Through me! Bear witness, no one could prevent

My death! Lead on! ere he awake -- best, now!

All must be ready: did you say, Balfour,
The crowd began to murmur? They'll be kept

Too late for sermon at St. Antholin's!
Now! But tread softly -- children are at play
In the next room. Precede! I follow --

(Enter Lady CARLISLE, with many Attendants.)

Lady Car. Me!
Follow me, Strafford, and be saved! The King?

[To the KING.] Well -- as you ordered, they are ranged without,

The convoy . . . [seeing the KING's state.]

[To STRAFFORD.] You know all, then! Why, I thought

It looked best that the King should save you, -- Charles

Alone; 'tis a shame that you should owe me aught.

Or no, not shame! Strafford, you'll not feel shame

At being saved by me?

Hol. All true! Oh Strafford,
She saves you! all her deed! this lady's deed!
And is the boat in readiness? You, friend,
Are Billingsley, no doubt. Speak to her, Strafford!

See how she trembles, waiting for your voice!
The world's to learn its bravest story yet.

Lady Car. Talk afterward! Long nights in France enough,

To sit beneath the vines and talk of home.

Straf. You love me, child? Ah, Strafford can be loved

As well as Vane! I could escape, then?

Lady Car. Haste!

Advance the torches, Bryan!

Straf. I will die.

They call me proud: but England had no right,
When she encountered me -- her strength to mine --

To find the chosen foe a craven. Girl,

I fought her to the utterance, I fell,

I am hers now, and I will die. Beside,

The lookers-on! Eliot is all about

This place, with his most uncomplaining brow.

Lady Car. Strafford!

Straf. I think if you could know how much I love you, you would be repaid, my friend!

Lady Car. Then, for my sake!

Straf. Even for your sweet sake, I stay.

Hol. For their sake!

Straf. To bequeath a stain?

Leave me! Girl, humor me and let me die!

Lady Car. Bid him escape -- wake, King!

Bid him escape!

Straf. True, I will go! Die and forsake the King?

I'll not draw back from the last service.

Lady Car. Strafford!

Straf. And, after all, what is disgrace to me? Let us come, child! That it should end this way!

Lead then! but I feel strangely: it was not To end this way.

Lady Car. Lean -- lean on me!

Straf.

My King!

Oh, had he trusted me -- his friend of friends!

Lady Car. I can support him, Hollis!

Straf.

Not this way!

This gate -- I dreamed of it, this very gate.

Lady Car. It opens on the river: our good boat

Is moored below, our friends are there.

Straf.

The same:

Only with something ominous and dark,

Fatal, inevitable.

Lady Car. Strafford! Strafford!

Straf. Not by this gate! I feel what will be there!

I dreamed of it, I tell you: touch it not!

Lady Car. To save the King, -- Strafford, to save the King!

[As STRAFFORD opens the door, Pym is discovered with HAMPTON, VANE, etc. STRAFFORD falls back: Pym follows slowly and confronts him.]

Pym. Have I done well? Speak, England!

Whose sole sake

I still have labored for, with disregard

To my own heart, -- for whom my youth was made

Barren, my manhood waste, to offer up

Her sacrifice -- this friend, this Wentworth here --

Who walked in youth with me, loved me, it may be,

And whom, for his forsaking England's cause, I hunted by all means (trusting that she Would sanctify all means) even to the block

Which waits for him. And saying this, I feel

No bitter pang than first I felt, the hour

I swore that Wentworth might leave us, but I

Would never leave him: I do leave him now.

I render up my charge (be witness, God!)

To England who imposed it. I have done

Her bidding -- poorly, wrongly, -- it may be,

With ill effects -- for I am weak, a man:

Still, I have done my best, my human best,

Not faltering for a moment. It is done.

And this said, if I say . . . yes, I will say

I never loved but one man -- David not

More Jonathan! Even thus, I love him now:

And look for my chief portion in that world

Where great hearts led astray are turned again,

(Soon it may be, and, certes, will be soon:

My mission over, I shall not live long.) --

Ay, here I know I talk -- I dare and must,

Of England, and her great reward, as all

I look for there; but in my inmost heart,

Believe, I think of stealing quite away

To walk once more with Wentworth — my youth's friend

Purged from all error, gloriously renewed,
And Eliot shall not blame us. Then indeed . . .
This is no meeting, Wentworth! Tears increase

Too hot. A thin mist — is it blood? — enwraps
The face I loved once. Then, the meeting be!

Straf. I have loved England too; we'll meet then, Pym;

As well die now! Youth is the only time
To think and to decide on a great course:
Manhood with action follows; but 'tis dreary
To have to alter our whole life in age —

The time past, the strength gone! As well die
now.

When we meet, Pym, I'd be set right — not
now!

Best die. Then if there's any fault, fault too
Dies, smothered up. Poor gray old little Laud
May dream his dream out, of a perfect Church,
In some blind corner. And there's no one left.

I trust the King now wholly to you, Pym!

And yet, I know not: I shall not be there:
Friends fail — if he have any. And he's weak,
And loves the Queen, and . . . Oh, my fate is nothing —

Nothing! But not that awful head — not that!

Pym. If England shall declare such will to
me . . .

Straf. Pym, you help England! I, that am to die,

What I must see! 'tis here — all here! My God,

Let me but gasp out, in one word of fire,
How thou wilt plague him, satiating hell!

What? England that you help, become through
you

A green and putrefying charnel, left
Our children . . . some of us have children,
Pym —

Some who, without that, still must ever wear
A darkened brow, an over-serious look,
And never properly be young! No word?

What if I curse you? Send a strong curse
forth

Clothed from my heart, lapped round with horror till

She's fit with her white face to walk the world
Scaring kind natures from your cause and you —

Then to sit down with you at the board-head,
The gathering for prayer . . . O speak, but
speak!

. . . Creep up, and quietly follow each one home,

You, you, you, be a nestling care for each
To sleep with, — hardly moaning in his dreams,

She gnaws so quietly, — till, lo he starts,
Gets off with half a heart eaten away!

Oh, shall you 'scape with less if she's my child?
You will not say a word — to me — to Him?

Pym. If England shall declare such will to
me . . .

Straf. No, not for England now, not for Heaven now, —

See, Pym, for my sake, mine who kneel to you!
There, I will thank you for the death, my
friend!

This is the meeting: let me love you well!
Pym. England, — I am thine own! Dost thou exact

That service? I obey thee to the end.

Straf. O God, I shall die first — I shall die
first!

SORDELLO

BROWNING began Sordello in 1837, interrupted his work to write the earlier parts of Bells and Pomegranates, but resumed it and completed it in 1840, when it was published by Moxon. In 1863, when reprinting the poem,
Browning dedicated it as below to M. Milsand, and in his dedication wrote practically a preface to the poem.

TO J. MILSAND, OF DIJON

DEAR FRIEND, — Let the next poem be introduced by your name, therefore remembered along with one of the deepest of my affections, and so repay all trouble it ever cost me. I wrote it twenty-five years ago for only a few, counting even in these on somewhat more care about its subject than they really had. My own faults of expression were many: but with care for a man or book such would be surmounted, and without it what avails the faultlessness of either?

I blame nobody, least of all myself, who did my best then and since; for I lately gave time and pains to turn my work into what the many might — instead of what the few must — like;
but after all, I imagined another thing at first,
and therefore leave as I find it. The historical decoration was purposely of no more importance than a background requires; and my stress lay on the incidents in the development of a soul:
little else is worth study. I, at least, always thought so; you, with many known and unknown to me, think so; others may one day think so; and whether my attempt remain for them or not, I trust, though away and past it,
to continue ever yours,

R. B.

LONDON, June 9, 1863.

Concerning this revised edition he wrote to a friend :—

"I do not understand what — can mean by saying that Sordello has been 'rewritten.' I did certainly at one time intend to rewrite much of it, but changed my mind, — and the edition which I reprinted was the same in all respects as its predecessors — only with an elucidatory heading to each page, and some few alterations,

SORDELLO

BOOK THE FIRST

WHO will, may hear Sordello's story told :
His story? Who believes me shall behold
The man, pursue his fortunes to the end,
Like me : for as the friendless-people's friend
Spied from his hill-top once, despite A Quixotic the din attempt.

And dust of multitudes, Pentapolin
Named o' the Naked Arm, I single out
Sordello, compassed murky about
With ravage of six long sad hundred years.
Only believe me. Ye believe?

Verona . . . Never, I should warn you first,
Of my own choice had this, if not the worst
Yet not the best expedient, served to tell
A story I could body forth so well
By making speak, myself kept out of view,
The very man as he was wont to do,
And leaving you to say the rest for him.
Since, though I might be proud to see the dim
Abysmal past divide its hateful surge,
Letting of all men this one man emerge
Because it pleased me, yet, that moment past,
I should delight in watching first to last
His progress as you watch it, not a whit
More in the secret than yourselves who sit Fresh-chapleted to listen. But it seems
Your setters-forth of unexampled themes,
Makers of quite new men, producing them,
Would best chalk broadly on each vesture's hem

The wearer's quality ; or take their stand,
Motley on back and pointing-pole in hand,
Beside him. So, for once I face ye, friends, Why the Summoned together from the world's self ad- four ends,
dresses his audience—
Dropped down from heaven or cast
up from hell,

To hear the story I propose to tell.
Confess now, poets know the dragnet's trick,
Catching the dead, if fate denies the quick,
And shaming her ; 'tis not for fate to choose
Silence or song because she can refuse
Real eyes to glisten more, real hearts to ache
Less oft, real brows turn smoother for our sake :
I have experienced something of her spite ;
But there's a realm wherein she has no right
And I have many lovers. Say, but few Friends fate audience me? Here they are : now view

The host I muster ! Many a lighted face
Foul with no vestige of the grave's disgrace ;

presumably for the better, in the text, such as occur in most of my works. I cannot remember a single instance of any importance that is rewritten, and I only suppose that — has taken project for performance, and set down as 'done' what was for a while intended to be done."

For the sake of such elucidation as these head-lines give, they are introduced here as side-notes.

What else should tempt them back to taste our air

Except to see how their successors fare ?
My audience ! and they sit, each ghostly man
Striving to look as living as he can,

I need not fear this audience, I make free
With them, but then this is no place for thee !
The thunder-phrase of the Athenian, grown
Up out of memories of Marathon,
Would echo like his own sword's griding screech

Have I to play my puppets, bear my part
Before these worthies?

Lo, the past is hurled
In twain : up-thrust, out-staggering on the world,
Subsiding into shape, a darkness rears
Its outline, kindles at the core, appears
Verona. "Tis six hundred years and more
Since an event. The Second Friedrich wore
The purple, and the Third Honorius filled
The holy chair. That autumn eve was stilled :
A last remains of sunset dimly burned
O'er the far forests, like a torch-flame turned
By the wind back upon its bearer's hand
In one long flare of crimson ; as a brand,
The woods beneath lay black. A single eye
From all Verona cared for the soft sky.
But, gathering in its ancient market-place,
Talked group with restless group ; and not a face
But wrath made livid, for among them were Death's stanch purveyors, such as have in care
To feast him. Fear had long since taken root
In every breast, and now these crushed its fruit,
The ripe hate, like a wine : to note the way
It worked while each grew drunk ! Men grave and gray

Stood, with shut eyelids, rocking to and fro, Letting the silent luxury trickle slow

 glee

Some foretaste of their first debauch in blood
 At the fierce news: for, be it understood,
 Envoys apprised Verona that her prince
 Count Richard of Saint Boniface, joined since
 A year with Azzo, Este's Lord, to thrust
 Taurello Salinguerra, prime in trust
 With Ecelin Romano, from his seat
 Ferrara, — over-zealous in the feat
 And stumbling on a peril unaware,
 Was captive, trammelled in his proper saare,
 They phrase it, taken by his own intrigue.

 Men's faces, late agape, are now aghast.
 " Prone is the purple pavis ; Este makes Mirth for the devil when he undertakes
 To play the Ecelin ; as if it cost
 Merely your pushing-by to gain a post

" Duke o' the Rood, why not ? "
 Shouted an Estian, " grudge ye such a lot ?
 The hill-cat boasts some cunning of her own,
 Some stealthy trick to better beasts unknown,
 That quick with prey enough her hunger blunts,
 And feeds her fat while gaunt the lion hunts."
 " Taurello," quoth an envoy, " as in wane
 Dwelt at Ferrara. Like an osprey fain
 To fly but forced the earth his couch to make
 Far inland, till his friend the tempest wake,
 Waits he the Kaiser's coming ; and as yet
 That fast friend sleeps, and he too sleeps : but let
 Only the billow freshen, and he snuffs
 The aroused hurricane ere it enroughs
 The sea it means to cross because of him.
 Sinketh the breeze ? His hope-sick eye grows dim ;

Creep closer on the creature ! Every day
 Strengthens the Pontiff ; Ecelin, they say,
 Dozes now at Oliero, with dry lips
 Telling upon his perished finger-tips
 How many ancestors are to depose
 Ere he be Satan's Viceroy when the doze
 Deposits him in hell. So, Guefts rebuilt
 Their houses ; not a drop of blood was spilt
 When Cino Bocchimpane chanced to meet
 Buccio Virtù — God's wafer, and the street
 Is narrow ! Tutti Santi, think, a-swarm
 With Ghibellins, and yet he took no harm !
 This could not last. Off Salinguerra went
 To Padua, Podestà, ' with pure intent,'
 Said he, ' my presence, judged the single bar
 To permanent tranquillity, may jar
 No longer ' — so ! his back is fairly turned ?
 The pair of goodly palaces are burned,
 The gardens ravaged, and our Guefts laugh, drunk

A week with joy. The next, their laughter sunk
 In sobs of blood, for they found, some strange
 way,

Old Salinguerra back again — I say,
 Old Salinguerra in the town once
 In their more changed Uprooting, overturning, flame before, fortune at Blood fetlock-high beneath him.
 Ferrara: Azzo fled ;

Who 'scaped the carnage followed ; then the
 dead

Were pushed aside from Salinguerra's throne,
 He ruled once more Ferrara, all alone,
 Till Azzo, stunned awhile, revived, would
 pounce

Coupled with Boniface, like lynx and ounce,
 On the gorged bird. The burghers ground their teeth

To see troop after troop encamp beneath
 I' the standing corn thick o'er the scanty patch
 It took so many patient months to snatch
 Out of the marsh ; while just within their walls
 Men fed on men. At length Taurello calls
 A parley : ' let the Count wind up the war !
 Richard, light-hearted as a plunging star,
 Agrees to enter for the kindest ends
 Ferrara, flanked with fifty chosen friends,
 No horse-boy more, for fear your timid sort
 Should fly Ferrara at the bare report.
 Quietly through the town they rode, jog-jog ;
 ' Ten, twenty, thirty, — curse the catalogue
 Of burnt Gueft houses ! Strange, Taurello shows
 Not the least sign of life ' — whereat arose
 A general growl : ' How ? With his victors by ?
 I and my Veronese ? My troops and I ?
 Receive us, was your word ? ' So jogged they on,
 Nor laughed their host too openly : once gone
 Into the trap ! " —

Six hundred years ago !
 Such the time's aspect and peculiar woe (Yourselves may spell it yet in chronicles,
 Albeit the worm, our busy brother, drills
 His sprawling path through letters anciently
 Made fine and large to suit some abbot's eye)
 When the new Hohenstauffen dropped the mask,
 Flung John of Brienne's favor from his casque,
 Forswore crusading, had no mind to leave
 Saint Peter's proxy leisure to retrieve
 Losses to Otho and to Barbaross,
 Or make the Alps less easy to recross ;
 And, thus confirming Pope Honorius' fear,
 Was excommunicate that very year.
 " The triple-bearded Teuton come to life ! "
 Groaned the Great League ; and, arming for the strife,

 For the Wide Lombardy, on tiptoe to begin,

 His crowd of feudatories, all and some,
 That leapt down with a crash of swords, spears,
 shields,

 Scattered anon, took station here and there,
 And carried it, till now, with little care —
 Cannot but cry for him ; how else rebut
 Us longer ? Cliffs, an earthquake suffered jut
 In the mid-sea, each domineering crest

Which naught save such another throe can wrest
From out (conceive) a certain chokeweed grown
Since o'er the waters, twine and tangle thrown
Too thick, too fast accumulating round,
Too sure to over-riot and confound
Ere long each brilliant islet with itself,
Unless a second shock save shoal and shelf,
Whirling the sea-drift wide : alas, the bruised
And sullen wreck ! Sunlight to be diffused
For that ! Sunlight, 'neath which, a scum at
first,

The million fibres of our chokeweed nurst
Dispread themselves, mantling the troubled main,

And, shattered by those rocks, took hold again,
So kindly blazed it — that same blaze to brood
O'er every cluster of the multitude
Still hazarding new clasps, ties, filaments,
An emulous exchange of pulses, vents

Of Otho, "my own Este shall supplant
Your Este," come to pass. The sire led in
A son as cruel ; and this Ecelin
Had sons, in turn, and daughters sly and tall
And curling and compliant ; but for all

While his lord lifted writhen hands to pray,
Lost at Oliero's convent.

 Because that arras fell between ! Her wise
 And lulling words are yet about the room,
 Her presence wholly poured upon the gloom
 Down even to her vesture's creeping stir.
 And so reclines he, saturate with her,
 Until an outcry from the square beneath Pierces the charm : he springs up, glad to breathe,

Above the cunning element, and shakes
 The stupor off as (look you) morning breaks
 On the gay dress, and, near concealed by it,
 The lean frame like a half-burnt taper, lit
 Erst at some marriage-feast, then laid away
 Till the Armenian bridegroom's dying day,
 In his wool wedding-robe.

For he — for he,
 Gate-vein of this hearts' blood of Lombardy,
 (If I should falter now) — for he is thine !
 Sordello, thy forerunner, Florentine !
 A herald-star I know thou didst absorb
 Relentless into the consummate orb
 That scared it from its right to roll along
 A sempiternal path with dance and song
 Fulfilling its allotted period,
 Serenest of the progeny of God —
 Who yet resigns it not ! His darling stoops
 With no quenched lights, desponds with no blank troops

Of disenfranchised brilliances, for, blent
 Utterly with thee, its shy element
 Like thine upburneth prosperous and clear.
 Still, what if I approach the august sphere
 Named now with only one name, disintwine
 That under-current soft and argentine
 From its fierce mate in the majestic mass Leavened as the sea whose fire was mixt with glass

In John's transcendent vision, — launch once

That lustre ? Dante, pacer of the shore
 Where gluttied hell disgorgeth filthiest gloom,
 Unbitten by its whirling sulphur-spume —
 Or whence the grieved and obscure waterslope
 Into a darkness quieted by hope ;
 Plucker of amarantus grown beneath God's eye
 In gracious twilights where his chosen lie, —
 I would do this ! If I should falter now !

 Some thirty years before this evening's coil,
 One spot reclaimed from the surrounding spoil,
 Goito ; just a castle built amid
 A few low mountains ; firs and larches hid
 Their main defiles, and rings of vineyard bound
 The rest. Some captured creature in a pound,
 Whose artless wonder quite precludes distress,
 Secure beside in its own loveliness,
 So peered with airy head, below, above,
 The castle at its toils, the lapwings love

To glean among at grape-time. Pass within.
 A maze of corridors contrived for sin,
 Dusk winding-stairs, dim galleries got past,
 You gain the inmost chambers, gain at last
 A maple-panelled room : that haze which seems Floating about the panel, if there gleams
 A sunbeam over it, will turn to gold
 And in light-graven characters unfold
 The Arab's wisdom everywhere ; what shade
 Marred them a moment, those slim pillars made,
 Cut like a company of palms to prop
 The roof, each kissing top entwined with top,
 Leaning together ; in the carver's mind
 Some knot of bacchanals, flushed cheek combined

With straining forehead, shoulders purpled, hair
 Diffused between, who in a goat-skin bear
 A vintage ; graceful sister-palms ! But quick

 Upon a marvel in the midst. Nay, stoop —

A dullish gray-streaked cumbrous font, a group
 Round it, — each side of it, where'er one sees, —
 Upholds it ; shrinking Caryatides
 Of just-tinged marble like Eve's lilyd flesh
 Beneath her maker's finger when the fresh
 First pulse of life shot brightening the snow.
 The font's edge burdens every shoulder, so
 They nurse upon the ground, eyelids half closed ;
 Some, with meek arms behind their backs disposed,

Some, crossed above their bosoms, some, to veil
 Their eyes, some, propping chin and cheek so pale,

Some, hanging slack an utter helpless length
 Dead as a buried vestal whose whole strength
 Goes when the grate above shuts heavily.
 So dwell these noiseless girls, patient to see,
 Like priestesses because of sin impure
 Penanced forever, who resigned endure,
 Having that once drunk sweetness to the dregs.
 And every eve, Sordello's visit begs
 Pardon for them : constant as eve he came
 To sit beside each in her turn, the same
 As one of them, a certain space : and awe

Made a great indistinctness till he saw Sunset slant cheerful through the

And a smile stirs her as if one faint grain
 Her load were lightened, one shade less the stain
 Obscured her forehead, yet one more bead slept
 From off the rosary whereby the crypt
 Keeps count of the contritions of its charge ?
 Then with a step more light, a heart more large,
 He may depart, leave her and every one
 To linger out the penance in mute stone.
 Ah, but Sordello ? 'Tis the tale I mean
 To tell you.

In this castle may be seen,
 On the hill-tops, or underneath the vines,
 Or eastward by the mound of firs and pines
 That shuts out Mantua, still in loneliness,
 A slender boy in a loose page's dress,

Sordello: do but look on him awhile
 Watching 'tis autumn) with an earnest smile
 The noisy flock of thievish birds at work
 Among the yellowing vineyards; see him lurk (Tis winter with its sullenest of

 Beside that arras-length of brodered forms,

On tiptoe, lifting in both hands a light
 Which makes yon warrior's visage flutter bright
 — Ecelo, dismal father of the brood,
 And Ecelin, close to the girl he wooed,
 Auria, and their Child, with all his wives
 From Agnes to the Tuscan that survives,
 Lady of the castle, Adelaide. His face — Look, now he turns away! Yourselves shall trace

(The delicate nostril swerving wide and fine,
 A sharp and restless lip, so well combine
 With that calm brow) a soul fit to receive Delight at every sense; you can believe
 Sordello foremost in the regal class
 Nature has broadly severed from her mass
 Of men, and framed for pleasure, as she frames
 Some happy lands, that have luxurious names,
 For loose fertility; a footfall there
 Suffices to upturn to the warm air
 Half-germinating spices; mere decay
 Produces richer life; and day by day
 New pollen on the lily-petal grows,
 And still more labyrinthine buds the rose.
 You recognize at once the finer dress
 Of flesh that amply lets in loveliness
 At eye and ear, while round the rest is furled
 (As though she would not trust them with her
 world)

A veil that shadows a sky not near so blue,
 And lets but half the sun look fervid through.

How a poet's soul
 comes into play.
 How can such love? — like souls on each full-fraught Discovery brooding, blind at first to aught

Beyond its beauty, till exceeding love
 Becomes an aching weight; and, to remove
 A curse that haunts such natures — to preclude
 Their finding out themselves can work no good
 To what they love nor make it very best
 By their endeavor, — they are fain invest
 The lifeless thing with life from their own soul,
 Availing it to purpose, to control,
 To dwell distinct and have peculiar joy
 And separate interests that may employ
 That beauty fitly, for its proper sake.
 Nor rest they here; fresh births of beauty wake
 Fresh homage, every grade of love is past,
 With every mode of loveliness: then cast
 Inferior idols off their borrowed crown
 Before a coming glory. Up and down Runs arrowy fire, while earthly forms combine

To throb the secret forth; a touch divine —
 And the scaled eyeball owns the mystic rod;
 Visibly through his garden walketh God.

What denotes such a soul's progress.
 So fare they. Now revert. One character
 Denotes them through the progress and the stir, —
 A need to blend with each external charm,

Bury themselves, the whole heart wide and
 warm, —

In something not themselves; they would belong

To what they worship — stronger and more strong

Thus prodigally fed — which gathers shape
 And feature, soon imprisons past escape
 The votary framed to love and to submit
 Nor ask, as passionate he kneels to it,
 Whence grew the idol's empery. So runs
 A legend; light had birth ere moons and suns,
 Flowing through space a river and alone,
 Till chaos burst and blank the spheres were strown

Hither and thither, foundering and blind:
 When into each of them rushed light — to find
 Itself no place, foiled of its radiant chance.

Let such forego their just inheritance!
 For there's a class that eagerly looks, too,

On beauty, but, unlike the gentler crew,
 Proclaims each new revelation born a twin

With a distinctest consciousness within,
 Referring still the quality, now first

Revealed, to their own soul — its instinct nursed
 In silence, now remembered better, shown

More thoroughly, but not the less their own;
 A dream come true; the special exercise

For honor, Equal to being all!"

In truth? Thou hast
 Life, then — wilt challenge life for us: our race

Is vindicated so, obtains its place
 In thy ascent, the first of us; whom we

May follow, to the meanest, finally,

 The mastery another life should learn,

Thrusting in time eternity's concern,—
So that Sordello . . .

now,

With the new century, beside the glow
And efflorescence out of barbarism;
Witness a Greek or two from the abyss
That stray through Florence-town with studious air,

Calming the chisel of that Pisan pair:
If Nicolo should carve a Christus yet!

The same blue stripe round that—and, in the

Pursue the dizzy painter!

Woe, then, worth
Any officious babble letting forth
The leprosy confirmed and ruinous
To spirit lodged in a contracted house!
Go back to the beginning, rather; blend
It gently with Sordello's life; the end
Is piteous, you may see, but much between Pleasant enough. Meantime, some pyx to screen
The full-grown pest, some lid to shut upon
The goblin! So they found at Babylon,
(Colleagues, mad Lucius and sage Antonine)
Sacking the city, by Apollo's shrine,
In rummaging among the rarities,
A certain coffer; he who made the prize
Opened it greedily; and out there curled
Just such another plague, for half the world
Was stung. Crawl in then, hag, and couch asquat,

Keeping that blotchy bosom thick in spot
Until your time is ripe! The coffer-lid
Is fastened, and the coffer safely hid
Under the Loxian's choicest gifts of gold.

Who will may hear Sordello's story told,
And how he never could remember when
He dwelt not at Goito. Calmly, then,

On the fir-forest border, and the rim
Of the low range of mountain, was for him
No other world: but this appeared his own
To wander through at pleasure and alone.
The castle too seemed empty; far and wide
Might he disport; only the northern side
Lay under a mysterious interdiction—

Slight, just enough remembered to restrict
His roaming to the corridors, the vault
Where those font-bearers expiate their fault,
The maple-chamber, and the little nooks
And nests, and breezy parapet that looks
Over the woods to Mantua: there he strolled.
Some foreign women-servants, very old,
Tended and crept about him—all his clue
To the world's business and embroiled ado

Distant a dozen hill-tops at the most.

And first a simple sense of life

And, when September finds them sere or scant,
Puts forth two wondrous winglets, alters quite,
And hies him after unforeseen delight.
So fed Sordello, not a shard dissheathed;
As ever, round each new discovery, wreathed
Luxuriantly the fancies infantine
His admiration, bent on making fine
Its novel friend at any risk, would fling
In gay profusion forth; a ficklest king,
Confessed those minions!—eager to dispense
So much from his own stock of thought and sense

As might enable each to stand alone
And serve him for a fellow; with his own,
Joining the qualities that just before Had graced some older favorite. Thus they wore

A fluctuating halo, yesterday
Set flicker and to-morrow filched away,—
Those upland objects each of separate name,
Each with an aspect never twice the same,
Waxing and waning as the new-born host
Of fancies, like a single night's hoar-frost,

Gave to familiar things a face grotesque;
Which Only, preserving through the mad

The day those archers wound along the vines—
Related to the Chief that left their lines
To climb with clinking step the northern stair
Up to the solitary chambers where Sordello never came. Thus thrall reached thrall;

He o'er-festooning every interval,
As the adventurous spider, making light
Of distance, shoots her threads from depth to height,

From barbican to battlement: so flung
Fantasies forth and in their centre swung
Our architect,—the breezy morning fresh
Above, and merry,—all his waving mesh
Laughing with lucid dew-drops rainbow-edged.

This world of ours by tacit pact is pledged

 Selfish enough, without a moral sense
 However feeble; what informed the boy
 Others desired a portion in his joy?
 Or say a ruthless chance broke woof and warp —

A heron's nest beat down by March winds sharp,
 A fawn breathless beneath the precipice,
 A bird with unsoiled breast and unfilmed eyes
 Warm in the brake — could these undo the

Time put at length that period to content,
 By right the world should have imposed: be-

Of its good offices, Sordello, left
 To study his companions, managed rip
 Their fringe off, learn the true relationship,
 Core with its crust, their nature with his own:
 Amid his wild-wood sights he lived alone.
 As if the poppy felt with him! Though he Partook the poppy's red effrontery
 Till Autumn spoiled their fleeing quite with rain,

And, turbanless, a coarse brown rattling crane
 Lay bare. That's gone: yet why renounce, for that,

His disenchanted tributaries — flat
 Perhaps, but scarce so utterly forlorn,
 Their simple presence might not well be borne
 Whose parley was a transport once: recall
 The poppy's gifts, it flaunts you, after all,
 A poppy: — why distrust the evidence
 Of each soon satisfied and healthy sense?

 that he craved his soul.

Alas, from the beginning love is whole
 And true; if sure of naught beside,
 most sure

Of its own truth at least; nor may endure
 A crowd to see its face, that cannot know
 How hot the pulses throb its heart below.

While its own helplessness and utter want
 Of means to worthily be ministrant
 To what it worships, do but fan the more
 Its flame, exalt the idol far before
 Itself as it would have it ever be.
 Souls like Sordello, on the contrary,
 Coerced and put to shame, retaining will,
 Care little, take mysterious comfort still,
 But look forth tremblingly to ascertain
 If others judge their claims not urged in vain,
 And say for them their stifled thoughts aloud.
 So, they must ever live before a crowd:
 — "Vanity," Naddo tells you.

Whence contrive
 A crowd, now? From these women just alive,
 That archer-troop? Forth glided — not alone
 Each painted warrior, every girl of stone,
 Nor Adelaide (bent double o'er a scroll,
 One maiden at her knees, that eve, his soul
 Shook as he stumbled through the arras'd

 — But the entire out-world: whatever, scraps
 And snatches, song and story, dreams per-

Conceited the world's offices, and he
 Had hitherto transferred to flower or tree,
 Not counted a befitting heritage
 Each, of its own right, singly to engage
 Some man, no other, — such now dared to stand Alone. Strength, wisdom, grace on every hand

He foot, yet trod, you thought, with unwet sock —

Though really on the stubs of living rock
Ages ago it crenelled ; vines for roof,
Lindens for wall ; before him, aye aloof,
Flittered in the cool some azure damsel-fly,
Born of the simmering quiet, there to die.
Emerging whence, Apollo still, he spied
Mighty descents of forest ; multiplied
Tuft on tuft, here, the frolic myrtle-trees,
There gendered the grave maple stocks at ease,
And, proud of its observer, straight the wood Tried old surprises on him ; black it stood
A sudden barrier ('t was a cloud passed o'er)
So dead and dense, the tiniest brute no more
Must pass ; yet presently (the cloud dispatched)
Each clump, behold, was listening detached
A shrub, oak-boles shrunk into ilex-stems !
Yet could not he denounce the stratagems
He saw thro', till, hours thence, aloft would hang

White summer-lightnings ; as it sank and sprang

To measure, that whole palpitating breast
Of heaven, 't was Apollo, nature prest
At eve to worship.

Time stole : by degrees

The Pythons perish off ; his votaries

Mantua at last, and light our lady flits
Back to her place disburdened of a care.
Strange — to be constant here if he is there !
Is it distrust ? Oh, never ! for they both Goad Ecelin alike, Romano's growth
Is daily manifest, with Azzo dumb
And Richard wavering : let but Friedrich come,
Find matter for the minstrelsy's report !
— Lured from the Isle and its young Kaiser's court

To sing us a Messina morning up,
And, double rillet of a drinking cup,
Sparkle along to ease the land of drouth,
Northward to Provence that, and thus farsouth
The other. What a method to apprise
Neighbors of births, espousals, obsequies !
Which in their very tongue the Troubadour
Records ; and his performance makes a tour,
For Trouvers bear the miracle about,
Explain its cunning to the vulgar rout,
Until the Formidable House is famed
Over the country — as Taurello aimed,
Who introduced, although the rest adopt,
The novelty. Such games, her absence stopped,
Begin afresh now Adelaide, recluse
No longer, in the light of day pursues
Her plans at Mantua : whence an accident
Which, breaking on Sordello's mixed content,
Opened, like any flash that cures the blind,
The veritable business of mankind.

BOOK THE SECOND

The woods were long austere with snow : at last
This bub- Pink leaflets budded on the beech, ble of and fast
fancy. Larches, scattered through pine-tree
solitudes,

Brightened, "as in the slumbrous heart o' the woods

Our buried year, a witch, grew young again
To placid incantations, and that stain
About were from her caldron, green smoke blent
With those black pines" — so Eglamor gave vent

To a chance fancy. Whence a just rebuke
From his companion ; brother Naddo shook

The solemnest of brows ; " Beware," he said,
 " Of setting up conceits in nature's stead !"
 Forth wandered our Sordello. Naught so sure
 As that to-day's adventure will secure
 Palma, the visioned lady — only pass
 O'er yon damp mound and its exhausted grass, Under that brake where sundawn feeds the stalks

Of withered fern with gold, into those walks
 Of pine and take her ! Buoyantly he went.
 Again his stooping forehead was besprent
 With dew-drops from the skirting ferns. Then wide

Opened the great morass, shot every side
 With flashing water through and through ;
 a-shine,

Thick steaming, all alive. Whose shape divine,

Quivered i' the farthest rainbow-vapor, glanced Athwart the flying herons ? He advanced,
 But warily ; though Mincio leaped no more,
 Each footfall burst up in the marsh-floor
 A diamond jet : and if he stopped to pick
 Rose-lichen, or molest the leeches quick,
 And circling blood-worms, minnow, newt or loach,

A sudden pond would silently encroach
 This way and that. On Palma passed. The verge

Of a new wood was gained. She will emerge Flushed, now, and panting, — crowds to see, — will own

She loves him — Boniface to hear, to groan,
 To leave his suit ! One screen of pine-trees still Opposes : but — the startling spectacle —
 Mantua, this time ! Under the walls — a crowd
 Indeed, real men and women, gay and loud
 Round a pavilion. How he stood !

In truth
 When No prophecy had come to pass : his greatest youth and bright-est, bursts. In its prime now — and where was homage poured

Upon Sordello ? — born to be adored,
 And suddenly discovered weak, scarce made
 To cope with any, cast into the shade
 By this and this. Yet something seemed to prick

And tingle in his blood ; a sleight — a trick —
 And much would be explained. It went for
 naught —

The best of their endowments were ill bought
 With his identity : nay, the conceit,
 That this day's roving led to Palma's feet
 Was not so vain — list ! The word, " Palma !"
 Steal

Aside, and die, Sordello ; this is real,
 And this — abjure !

What next ? The curtains see
 Dividing ! She is there ; and presently
 He will be there — the proper You, at length —
 In your own cherished dress of grace and
 strength :

Most like, the very Boniface !

Not so.
 It was a showy man advanced ; but though
 A glad cry welcomed him, then every sound
 Sank and the crowd disposed themselves around,

— " This is not he," Sordello felt ; while, " Place
 For the best Troubadour of Boniface !"

Hollaed the Jongleurs, — " Eglamor, whose lay Concludes his patron's Court of Love to-day !"
 Obsequious Naddo strung the master's lute
 With the new lute-string, " Elys," named to suit

At a Court The song : he stealthily at watch, the of Love a while,
 minstrel Biting his lip to keep down a great

Of pride : then up he struck. Sordello's brain
 Swam ; for he knew a sometime deed again ;
 So, could supply each foolish gap and chasm
 The minstrel left in his enthusiasm,
 Mistaking its true version — was the tale
 Not of Apollo ? Only, what avail

Luring her down, that Elys an he pleased,
 If the man dared no further ? Has he ceased ?

And, lo, the people's frank applause half done,
 Sordello was beside him, had begun (Spite of indignant twitchings from his friend
 The Trouvere) the true lay with the true end,
 Taking the other's names and time and place
 For his. On flew the song, a giddy race,

Sordello, After the flying story ; word made before Palma leap

Out word, rhyme — rhyme ; the lay quers him, could barely keep Pace with the action visibly rushing past :

 Both ended. Back fell Naddo more aghast

Than some Egyptian from the harassed bull
 That wheeled abrupt and, bellowing, fronted full

His plague, who spied a scarab 'neath the
 tongue,

And found 't was Apis' flank his hasty prong
 Insulted. But the people — but the cries,
 The crowding round, and proffering the prize !
 — For he had gained some prize. He seemed to shrink

Into a sleepy cloud, just at whose brink
 One sight withheld him. There sat Adelaide,
 Silent ; but at her knees the very maid
 Of the North Chamber, her red lips as rich,
 The same pure fleecy hair ; one web of which,
 Golden and great, quite touched his cheek as o'er

She leant, speaking some six words and no more.

He answered something, anything ; and she Unbound a scarf and laid it heavily
 Upon him, her neck's warmth and all. Again
 Moved the arrested magic ; in his brain
 Noises grew, and a light that turned to glare,
 And greater glare, until the intense flare Engulfed him, shut the whole scene from his sense.

And when he woke 't was many a furlong thence,

At home ; the sun shining his ruddy wont ;
 The customary birds'-chirp ; but his front

Receives Was crowned — was crowned ! Her

A prize ? He turned, and peeringly on him
 Brooded the women-faces, kind and dim,
 Ready to talk — " The Jongleurs in a troop
 Had brought him back, Naddo and Squarcialupo

And Tagliafer; how strange! a childhood spent
In taking, well for him, so brave a bent!
Since Eglamor," they heard, "was dead with spite,
And Palma chose him for her minstrel."

Light

Sordello rose — to think, now; hitherto
He had perceived. Sure, a discovery grew
Out of it all! Best live from first to last
The transport o'er again. A week he passed,
Sucking the sweet out of each circumstance,
From the bard's outbreak to the luscious trance Bounding his own achievement. Strange! A
man

Recounted an adventure, but began
Imperfectly; his own task was to fill
The frame-work up, sing well what he sung ill,
Supply the necessary points, set loose
As many incidents of little use
— More imbecile the other, not to see
Their relative importance clear as he!
But, for a special pleasure in the act
Of singing — had he ever turned, in fact,
From Elys, to sing Elys? — from each fit
Of rapture to contrive a song of it?
True, this snatch or the other seemed to wind
Into a treasure, helped himself to find
A beauty in himself; for, see, he soared
By means of that mere snatch, to many a hoard
Of fancies; as some falling cone bears soft
The eye along the fir-tree spire, aloft
To a dove's nest. Then, how divine the cause
Why such performance should exact applause
From men, if they had fancies too? Did fate
Decree they found a beauty separate
In the poor snatch itself? — "Take Elys, there,
— 'Her head that's sharp and perfect like a pear,

So close and smooth are laid the few fine locks
Colored like honey oozed from topmost rocks
Sun-blanch the liveliest summer' — if they heard

Just those two rhymes, assented at my word,
And loved them as I love them who have run
These fingers through those pale looks, let the sun

Into the white cool skin — who first could clutch,
Then praise — I needs must be a god to such.
Or what if some, above themselves, and yet

And worship what they know not, nor receive Delight from. Have they fancies — slow, per-
chance,

Not at their beck, which indistinctly glance
Until, by song, each floating part be linked
To each, and all grow palpable, distinct?"
He pondered this.

Meanwhile, sounds low and drear
Stole on him, and a noise of footsteps, near
And nearer, while the underwood was pushed Aside, the larches grazed, the dead leaves
crushed

At the approach of men. The wind seemed laid;
Only, the trees shrunk slightly and a shade
Came o'er the sky although 't was mid-day yet:

You saw each half-shut downcast floweret
Flutter — "a Roman bride, when they'd dispart
Her unbound tresses with the Sabine dart,
Holding that famous rape in memory still,
Felt creep into her curls the iron chill,
And looked thus," Eglamor would say — indeed
This is "T is Eglamor, no other, these precede answered Home hither in the woods. "T were by Eglamor him- surely sweet self: Far from the scene of one's forlorn defeat

To sleep!" judged Naddo, who in person led Jongleurs and Trouveres, chanting at their head,
A scanty company; for, sooth to say,
Our beaten Troubadour had seen his day.
Old worshippers were something shamed, old
friends

Nigh weary; still the death proposed amends.
"Let us but get them safely through my song
And home again!" quoth Naddo.

All along,

This man (they rest the bier upon the sand)
— This calm corpse with the loose flowers in his
hand,

Eglamor, lived Sordello's opposite.
For him indeed was Naddo's notion right,
And verse a temple-worship vague and vast,
A ceremony that withdrew the last
Opposing bolt, looped back the lingering veil
Which hid the holy place: should one so frail
Stand there without such effort? or repine
If much was blank, uncertain at the shrine
He knelt before, till, soothed by many a rite,
The power responded, and some sound or sight

Grew up, his own forever, to be fixed,
One who In rhyme, the beautiful, forever! — belonged to what mixed
he loved,

With his own life, unloosed when he should please,

Having it safe at hand, ready to ease
All pain, remove all trouble; every time
He loosed that fancy from its bonds of rhyme,
(Like Perseus when he loosed his naked love)
Faltering; so distinct and far above
Himself, these fancies! He, no genius rare,
Transfiguring in fire or wave or air
At will, but a poor gnome that, cloistered up
In some rock-chamber with his agate cup,
His topaz rod, his seed-pearl, in these few
And their arrangement finds enough to do
For his best art. Then, how he loved that art!
The calling marking him a man apart

From men — one not to care, take counsel for Cold hearts, comfortless faces — (Eglamor
Was neediest of his tribe) — since verse, the gift,
Was his, and men, the whole of them, must shift
Without it, e'en content themselves with wealth
And pomp and power, snatching a life by stealth.
So, Eglamor was not without his pride!

Loving his The sorriest bat which cowers

When moon and stars are blinded, and the prime
Of earth is his to claim, nor find a peer;
And Eglamor was noblest poet here —
He well knew, 'mid those April woods, he cast
Conceits upon in plenty as he passed,

That Naddo might suppose him not to think Entirely on the coming triumph : wink
 At the one weakness ! 'Twas a fervid child,
 That song of his ; no brother of the guild
 Had e'er conceived its like. The rest you know,
 The exaltation and the overthrow :
 Our poet lost his purpose, lost his rank,
 His life — to that it came. Yet envy sank
 Within him, as he heard Sordello out,
 And, for the first time, shouted — tried to shout
 Like others, not from any zeal to show
 Pleasure that way : the common sort did so.
 What else was Eglamor ? who, bending down
 As they, placed his beneath Sordello's crown,
 Printed a kiss on his successor's hand,
 Left one great tear on it, then joined his band
 — In time ; for some were watching at the door :
 Who knows what envy may effect ? " Give
 o'er,

Nor charm his lips, nor craze him ! " (here one spied

And disengaged the withered crown) — " Beside His crown ? How prompt and clear those verses rang

To answer yours ! nay, sing them ! " And he sang

Them calmly. Home he went ; friends used to wait

His coming, zealous to congratulate ;
 But, to a man, — so quickly runs report, —
 Could do no less than leave him, and escort
 His rival. That eve, then, bred many a thought :
 What must his future life be ? was he brought
 So low, who stood so lofty this Spring morn ?
 At length he said, " Best sleep now with my scorn,

And by to-morrow I devise some plain
 Expedient ! " So, he slept, nor woke again.

About Sordello's paradise, his roves
 Among the hills and vales and plains and groves,
 Wherein, no doubt, this lay was roughly cast,
 Polished by slow degrees, completed last
 To Eglamor's discomfiture and death.

Such form the chanter now, and, out of
 breath,

They lay the beaten man in his abode,
 Naddo reciting that same luckless ode,
 Doleful to hear. Sordello could explore
 By means of it, however, one step more
 In joy ; and, mastering the round at length,
 Learnt how to live in weakness as in strength,
 When from his covert forth he stood, addressed
 Eglamor, bade the tender ferns invest,
 Primæval pines o'er canopy his couch,
 And, most of all, his fame — (shall I avouch
 Eglamor heard it, dead though he might look,
 And laughed as from his brow Sordello took
 The crown, and laid on the bard's breast, and

Beneath a flowering laurel thicket lay
 Sordello ; each new sprinkle of white stars
 That smell fainter of wine than Massie jars
 Dug up at Baixæ, when the south wind shed
 The ripest, made him happier ; filleted
 And robed the same, only a lute beside Lay on the turf. Before him far and wide
 The country stretched : Goito slept behind
 — The castle and its covert, which confined
 Him with his hopes and fears ; so fain of old
 To leave the story of his birth untold.
 At intervals, ' spite the fantastic glow
 Of his Apollo-life, a certain low
 And wretched whisper, winding through the
 bliss,

Admonished, no such fortune could be his,
 All was quite false and sure to fade one day :
 The closelier drew he round him his array
 Of brilliance to expel the truth. But when
 A reason for his difference from men
 Surprised him at the grave, he took no rest
 While aught of that old life, superbly dressed
 Down to its meanest incident, remained
 A mystery : alas, they soon explained
 Away Apollo ! and the tale amounts
 To this : when at Vicenza both her counts

 Of Adelaide, there too, and barely torn
 From the roused populace hard on the rear,
 By a poor archer when his chieftain's fear
 Grew high ; into the thick Elcorte leapt,
 Saved her, and died ; no creature left except
 His child to thank. And when the full escape
 Was known — how men impaled from chine to

Unlucky Prata, all to pieces spurned
 Bishop Pistore's concubines, and burned
 Taurello's entire household, flesh and fell,
 Missing the sweeter prey — such courage well
 Might claim reward. The orphan, ever since,
 Sordello, had been nurtured by his prince
 Within a blind retreat where Adelaide —
 (For, once this notable discovery made,
 The past at every point was understood)
 — Might harbor easily when times were rude,
 When Azzo schemed for Palma, to retrieve
 That pledge of Agnes Este — loth to leave
 Mantua unguarded with a vigilant eye,
 While there Taurello bode amb'gously —
 He who could have no motive now to moil
 For his own fortunes since their utter spoil —
 As it were worth while yet (went the report)
 To disengage himself from her. In short,
 Apollo vanished ; a mean youth, just named
 His lady's minstrel, was to be proclaimed

Until a magical equipment, strength,
Grace, wisdom, decked him too, — he chose at
length,

Content with unproved wits and failing frame,
In virtue of his simple will, to claim
That mastery, no less — to do his best
With means so limited, and let the rest
Go by, — the seal was set: never again
Sordello could in his own sight remain

If calmly reasoned of, how'er denied
By a mad impulse nothing justified
Short of Apollo's presence. The divorce

Is clear: why needs Sordello square his course
By any known example? Men no more
Compete with him than tree and flower before.

Himself, inactive, yet is greater far
Than such as act, each stooping to his star,
Acquiring thence his function; he has gained
The same result with meaner mortals trained
To strength or beauty, moulded to express
Each the idea that rules him; since no less
He comprehends that function, but can still Embrace the others, take of might his fill

With Richard as of grace with Palma, mix

Sounds, to affect on its basaltic bed,
Must sue in just one accent; tempests shed
Thunder, and raves the windstorm: only let
That key by any little noise be set —
The far benighted hunter's halloo pitch
On that, the hungry curlew chance to scritch
Or serpent hiss it, rustling through the rift,
However loud, however low — all lift
The groaning monster, stricken to the heart.

He thoroughly read o'er
 His truchman Naddo's missive six times more,
 Praying him visit Mantua and supply
 A famished world.

The evening star was high
 When he reached Mantua, but his fame arrived

Before him: friends applauded, foes connived,
 And Naddo looked an angel, and the rest
 Angels, and all these angels would be blest
 Supremely by a song — the thrice-reowned
 Goito-manufacture. Then he found
 (Casting about to satisfy the crowd)

That happy vehicle, so late allowed,
 A sore annoyance; 't was the song's effect
 He cared for, scarce the song itself:
 reflect!

In the past life, what might be singing's use?
 Just to delight his Delians, whose profuse
 Praise, not the toilsome process which procured
 That praise, enticed Apollo: dreams abjured,
 No overleaping means for ends — take both
 For granted or take neither! I am loth
 To say the rhymes at last were Eglamor's;
 But Naddo, chuckling, bade competitors
 "To pine; " the master certes meant to waste
 No effort, cautiously had probed the taste
 He'd please anon: true bard, in short, disturb
 His title if they could; nor spur nor curb,
 Fancy nor reason, wanting in him; whence
 The staple of his verses, common sense:
 He built on man's broad nature — gift of gifts,
 That power to build! The world contented shifts

With counterfeits enough, a dreary sort
 Of warriors, statesmen, ere it can extort
 Its poet-soul — that's, after all, a freak
 (The having eyes to see and tongue to speak)
 With our herd's stupid sterling happiness
 So plainly incompatible that — yes —
 Yes — should a son of his improve the breed
 And turn out poet, he were cursed indeed!"
 "Well, there's Goito and its woods anon,
 If the worst happen; best go stoutly on
 Now!" thought Sordello.

So, must effect this to obtain
 those.      Ay, and goes on yet!
 You pother with your glossaries to get

A notion of the Troubadour's intent
 In rondel, tenzon, virlai, or sirvent —
 Much as you study arras how to twirl
 His angelot, plaything of page and girl
 Once; but you surely reach, at last, — or, no!
 Never quite reach what struck the people so,
 As from the welter of their time he drew
 Its elements successively to view,
 Followed all actions backward on their course,
 And catching up, unmingled at the source,
 Such a strength, such a weakness, added then
 A touch or two, and turned them into men.

Virtue took form, nor vice refused a shape;
 Here heaven opened, there was hell agape,
 As Saint this simpered past in sanctity,
 Sinner the other flared portentous by
 A greedy people. Then why stop, surprised
 At his success? The scheme was realized
 Too suddenly in one respect: a crowd
 Praising, eyes quick to see, and lips as loud
 To speak, delicious homage to receive,
 The woman's breath to feel upon his sleeve,
 Who said, "But Anafest — why asks he less
 Than Lucio, in your verses? how confess,
 It seemed too much but yestereve!" — the
 youth,

Who bade him earnestly, "Avow the truth!
 You love Bianca, surely, from your song;
 I knew I was unworthy!" — soft or strong,
 In poured such tributes ere he had arranged
 Ethereal ways to take them, sorted, changed,
 Digested. Courted thus at unawares,
 In spite of his pretensions and his cares,
 He caught himself shamefully hankering
 After the obvious petty joys that spring
 From true life, fain relinquish pedestal

And condescend with pleasures — one and all little, but To be renounced, no doubt; for, thus fails to chain
 more;      Himself to single joys and so refrain From tasting their quintessence, frustrates.
 sure,
 His prime design; each joy must he abjure
 Even for love of it.

He laughed: what sage
 But perishes if from his magic page
 He look because, at the first line, a proof
 'T was heard salutes him from the cavern roof?
 "On! Give yourself, excluding aught beside,
 To the day's task; compel your slave provide
 Its utmost at the soonest; turn the leaf Thoroughly comed. These lays of yours, in brief —

Cannot men bear, now, something better? — fly
 A pitch beyond this unreal pageantry
 Of essences? the period sure has ceased
 For such: present us with ourselves, at least,
 Not portions of ourselves, mere loves and hates
 Made flesh: wait not!"

While the poet waits again, is However. The first trial was no better enough:

satisfied,      He left imagining, to try the stuff
 That held the imaged thing, and let it writhe
 Never so fiercely, scarce allowed a tithe
 To reach the light — his Language. How he sought

The cause, conceived a cure, and slow re-wrought

That Language, — welding words into the crude
 Mass from the new speech round him, till a

Armor was hammered out, in time to be Approved beyond the Roman panoply
 Melted to make it, — boots not. This obtained
 With some ado, no obstacle remained
 To using it; accordingly he took
 An action with its actors, quite forsook

Himself to live in each, returned anon
With the result — a creature, and, by one
And one, proceeded leisurely to equip
Its limbs in harness of his workmanship.
"Accomplished! Listen, Mantuans!" Fond essay!

Piece after piece that armor broke away,
Because perceptions whole, like that he sought
To clothe, reject so pure a work of thought
As language: thought may take perception's
place

But hardly co-exist in any case,
Being its mere presentment — of the whole
By parts, the simultaneous and the sole
By the successive and the many. Lacks
The crowd perception? painfully it tacks Thought to thought, which Sordello, needing
such,

Has rent perception into: it's to clutch
And reconstruct — his office to diffuse,
Destroy: as hard, then, to obtain a Muse
As to become Apollo. "For the rest,
E'en if some wondrous vehicle expressed
The whole dream, what impertinence in me
So to express it, who myself can be
The dream! nor, on the other hand, are those ideal of Both parties, rather — they with the song. old verse,

And I with the old praise — far go, fare
worse!"

A few adhering rivets loosed, upsprings
The angel, sparkles off his mail, which rings
Whirled from each delicate limb it warps,
So might Apollo from the sudden corpse
Of Hyacinth have cast his luckless quoits.
He set to celebrating the exploits
Of Montfort o'er the Mountaineers.

Then came

The world's revenge: their pleasure, now his aim
Merely, — what was it? "Not to play the fool
So much as learn our lesson in your school!"

Replied the world. He found that, every time
He gained applause by any ballad-rhyme,
His auditory recognized no jot
As he intended, and, mistaking not
Him for his meanest hero, ne'er was dunce
Sufficient to believe him — all, at once.

His will . . . conceive it caring for his will!
— Mantuans, the main of them, admiring still
How a mere singer, ugly, stunted, weak,
Had Montfort at completely (so to speak)
His fingers' ends; while past the praise-tide swept

To Montfort, either's share distinctly kept:
The true need for true merit! — his abates

What is Into a sort he most repudiates, the And on them angrily he turns. Who world's were

worth? should care

About their recognition, ay or no?
In spite of the convention months ago,
(Why blink the truth?) was not he forced to help

This same ungrateful audience, every whelp
Of Naddo's litter, make them pass for peers
With the bright band of old Goito years,
As erst he toiled for flower or tree? Why,
there

Sat Palma! Adelaide's funereal hair
Ennobled the next corner. Ay, he strewed
A fairy dust upon that multitude,
Although he feigned to take them by themselves;

His giants dignified those puny elves,
Sublime their faint applause. In short, he found

Himself still footing a delusive round,
Remote as ever from the self-display
He meant to compass, hampered every way
By what he hoped assistance. Wherefore then Continue, make believe to find in men
A use he found not?

Weeks, months, years went by,
And lo, Sordello vanished utterly,

Sundered in twain; each spectral part at strife
With each; one jarred against another life;
How, poet The Poet thwarting hopelessly the
no longer Man,

in unity Who, fooled no longer, free in fancy with man, ran

Here, there, — let slip no opportunities
As pitiful, forsooth, beside the prize
To drop on him some no-time and acquit
His constant faith (the Poet-half's to wit —
That waiving any compromise between
No joy and all joy kept the hunger keen Beyond most methods) — of incurring scoff
From the Man-portion — not to be put off
With self-reflectings by the Poet's scheme, Though ne'er so bright. Who sauntered forth in dream,

Dressed anyhow, nor waited mystic frames,
Immeasurable gifts, astounding claims,
But just his sorry self? — who yet might be Sorrier for aught he in reality

Achieved, so pinioned Man's the Poet-part,
Fondling, in turn of fancy, verse; the Art
Developing his soul a thousand ways —
Potent, by its assistance, to amaze
The multitude with majesties, convince
Each sort of nature, that the nature's prince Accosted it. Language, the makeshift, grew
Into a bravest of expedients, too;
Apollo, seemed it now, perverse had thrown
Quiver and bow away, the lyre alone
Sufficed. While, out of dream, his day's work went

To tune a crazy tenzon or sirvent —
So hampered him the Man-part, thrust to judge
Between the bard and the bard's audience, grudge

A minute's toil that missed its due reward!
But the complete Sordello, Man and Bard,

John's cloud-girt angel, this foot on
The whole the land, visible Sordello That on the sea, with, open in his

gone.

Then, if internal struggles to be one
Which frittered him incessantly piecemeal,

Referred, ne'er so obliquely, to the real
 Intruding Mantuans! ever with some call
 To action while he pondered, once for all,
 Which looked the easier effort — to pursue

 Know him; or else, forswearing bard-craft, wake
 From out his lethargy and nobly shake
 Off timid habits of denial, mix
 With men, enjoy like men. Ere he could fix
 On aught, in rushed the Mantuans; much they cared

For his perplexity! Thus unprepared,
 The obvious if not only shelter lay

'T is settled Palma's minstrel, good or bad,
 Submits to this and that established rule?
 Let Vidal change, or any other fool,
 His murrey-colored robe for filamot,
 And crop his hair; too skin-deep, is it not,
 Such vigor? Then, a sorrow to the heart,
 His talk! Whatever topics they might start
 Had to be groped for in his consciousness Straight, and as straight delivered them by guess.

Only obliged to ask himself, "What was,"
 A speedy answer followed; but, alas,
 One of God's large ones, tardy to condense
 Itself into a period; answers whence
 A tangle of conclusions must be stripped
 At any risk ere, trim to pattern clipped,
 They matched rare specimens the Mantuan flock
 Regaled him with, each talker from his stock
 Of sorted-o'er opinions, every stage,
 Juicy in youth or desecate with age,
 Fruits like the fig-tree's, rather-ripe, rotten-rich,
 Sweet-sour, all tastes to take: a practice which
 He too had not impossibly attained,
 Once either of those fancy-flights restrained;
 (For, at conjecture how might words appear
 To others, playing there what happened here,
 And occupied abroad by what he spurned
 At home, 't was slipped, the occasion he returned To seize:) he'd strike that lyre adroitly —
 speech,

Would but a twenty-cubit plectre reach;
 A clever hand, consummate instrument,
 Were both brought close; each excellency went
 For nothing, else. The question Naddo asked,
 Had just a lifetime moderately tasked

To move at all? The end was, he retailed
 Some ready-made opinion, put to use

 Gestures and tones — at any folly caught
 Serving to finish with, nor too much sought
 If false or true 't was spoken; praise and blame
 Of what he said grew pretty nigh the same
 — Meantime awards to meantime acts: his soul,

Unequal to the compassing a whole,
 Saw, in a tenth part, less and less to strive
 About. And as for men in turn . . . contrive
 Who could to take eternal interest
 In them, so hate the worst, so love the best!
 Though, in pursuance of his passive plan,
 He hailed, decried, the proper way.

As Man
 So figured he; and how as Poet? Verse
 Came only not to a stand-still. The worse,
 That his poor piece of daily work to do
 Was, not sink under any rivals; who He pleases Loudly and long enough, without neither these qualms,

Than pursed eyelids of a river-horse
 Sunning himself o' the slime when whirrs the breeze" —

Gad-fly, that is. He might compete with these!
 But — but —

"Observe a pompion-twine afloat;
 Pluck me one cup from off the castle-moat!
 Which the Along with cup you raise leaf, stalk

So could I pluck a cup, put in one song
 A single sight, did not my hand, too strong,
 Twich in the least the root-strings of the whole.
 How should externals satisfy my soul?"

"Why that's precise the error Squarcialupe"
 (Hazarded Naddo) "finds; 'the man can't stoop
 To sing us out,' quoth he, 'a mere romance;
 He'd fain do better than the best, enhance
 The subjects' rarity, work problems out Therewith.' Now, you're a bard, a bard past
 doubt,

And no philosopher; why introduce
 Crotchets like these? fine, surely, but no use
 In poetry — which still must be, to strike,
 Based upon common sense; there's nothing like Appealing to our nature! what beside
 Was your first poetry? No tricks were tried
 In that, no hollow thrills, affected throes!
 'The man,' said we, 'tells his own joys and woes:

We'll trust him.' Would you have your songs endure?

Build on the human heart! — why, to be sure
 Yours is one sort of heart — but I mean theirs,
 Ours, every one's, the healthy heart one cares
 To build on! Central peace, mother of strength, That's father of . . . nay, go yourself that
 length,

Ask those calm-hearted doers what they do
 When they have got their calm! And is it
 true,

Fire rankles at the heart of every globe?
 Perhaps. But these are matters one may probe
 Too deeply for poetic purposes:
 Rather select a theory that . . . yes,
 Laugh! what does that prove? — stations you midway

And saves some little o'er-refining. Nay,
That's rank injustice done me! I restrict
The poet? Don't I hold the poet picked
Out of a host of warriors, statesmen . . . did
I tell you? Very like! As well you hid
That sense of power, you have! True bards believe

All able to achieve what they achieve —
That is, just nothing — in one point abide Profounder simpletons than all beside.
Oh, ay! The knowledge that you are a bard
Must constitute your prime, nay sole, reward! ”
So prattled Naddo, busiest of the tribe
Of genius-haunters — how shall I describe
What grubs or nips or rubs or rips — your louse
For love, your flea for hate, magnanimous,
Their Malignant, Pappacoda, Tagliafer, criticisms Picking a sustenance from wear and give small tear
comfort: By implements it sedulous employs
To undertake, lay down, mete out, o'er-toise
Sordello? Fifty creepers to elude
At once! They settled stanchly: shame ensued:
Behold the monarch of mankind succumb
To the last fool who turned him round his thumb,

As Naddo styled it! 'T was not worth oppose
The matter of a moment, gainsay those
He aimed at getting rid of; better think
Their thoughts and speak their speech, secure to slink

Back expeditiously to his safe place,
And chew the cud — what he and what his race
Were really, each of them. Yet even this Conformity was partial. He would miss
Some point, brought into contact with them ere Assured in what small segment of the sphere
Of his existence they attended him;
Whence blunders, falsehoods rectified — a grim List — slur it over! How? If dreams were tried,

His will swayed sickly from side to side,
Nor merely neutralized his waking act
But tended e'en in fancy to distract
The intermediate will, the choice of means.
He lost the art of dreaming: Mantuan scenes
Supplied a baron, say, he sang before,
Handsomely reckless, full to running o'er
Of gallantries; “abjure the soul, content
With body, therefore!” Scarcely had he bent
Himself in dream thus low, when matter fast
Cried out, he found, for spirit to contrast
And task it duly; by advances slight,
The simple stuff becoming composite,
Count Lori grew Apollo — best recall
His fancy! Then would some rough peasant-Paul,

Like those old Ecelin confers with, glance
His gay apparel o'er; that countenance
Gathered his shattered fancies into one,
And, body clean abolished, soul alone
Sufficed the gray Paulician: by and by,

And his To balance the ethereality, own de- Passions were needed; foiled he sank gradation again.

Meanwhile the world rejoiced ('tis complete, time explain)

Because a sudden sickness set it free

From Adelaide. Missing the mother-bee,
Her mountain-hive Romano swarmed; at once
A rustle-forth of daughters and of sons
Blackened the valley. “I am sick too, old,
Half-crazed I think; what good's the Kaiser's
gold

To such an one? God help me! for I catch
My children's greedy sparkling eyes at watch —
“He hears that double breastplate on,” they say,
“So many minutes less than yesterday!”
Beside, Monk Hilary is on his knees
Now, sworn to kneel and pray till God shall
please

Exact a punishment for many things
You know, and some you never knew; which brings

To memory, Azzo's sister Beatrix
And Richard's Giglia are my Alberic's
And Ecelin's betrothed; the Count himself
Must get my Palma: Ghibellin and Gueff
Mean to embrace each other.” So began Adelaide's Romano's missive to his fighting death: man
what hap- Taurello — on the Tuscan's death,
pens on it: away

With Friedrich sworn to sail from Naples' bay
Next month for Syria. Never thunder-clap
Out of Vesuvius' throat, like this mishap
Startled him. “That accursed Vicenza! I
Absent, and she selects this time to die!
Ho, fellows, for Vicenza!” Half a score
Of horses ridden dead, he stood before
Romano in his reeking spurs: too late —
“Boniface urged me, Este could not wait,”
The chieftain stammered; “let me die in
peace —

Forget me! Was it I who craved increase
Of rule? Do you and Friedrich plot your worst
Against the Father: as you found me first
So leave me now. Forgive me! Palma, sure,
Is at Goito still. Retain that lure —
Only be pacified!”

The country rung
With such a piece of news: on every tongue,
How Ecelin's great servant, congeed off,
Had done a long day's service, so, might doff
The green and yellow, and recover breath
At Mantua, whither, — since Retrude's death,
(The girlish slip of a Sicilian bride
From Otto's house, he carried to reside
At Mantua till the Ferrarese should pile
A structure worthy her imperial style,
The gardens raise, the statues there enshrine,
She never lived to see) — although his line
Was ancient in her archives and she took
A pride in him, that city, nor forsook
Her child when he forsook himself and spent
A prowess on Romano surely meant
For his own growth — whither he ne'er resorts
If wholly satisfied (to trust reports)
With Ecelin. So, forward in a trice Were shows to greet him. “Take a friend's advice,”

Quoth Naddo to Sordello, “nor be rash
Because your rivals (nothing can abash
Some folks) demur that we pronounced you best
To sound the great man's welcome; 'tis a test,
Remember! Strojavecce looks askint,

The rough fat sloven; and there's plenty hint
Your pinions have received of late a shock —
Outsoar them, cobswan of the silver flock!

Sing well!" A signal wonder, song's no whit Facilitated.

Fast the minutes flit;
Another day, Sordello finds, will bring

The soldier, and he cannot choose but sing;
So, a last shift, quits Mantua — slow, alone:
Out of that aching brain, a very stone,
Song must be struck. What occupies that front?

Just how he was more awkward than his wont
The night before, when Naddo, who had seen
Taurello on his progress, praised the mien
For dignity no crosses could affect —
Such was a joy, and might not he detect
A satisfaction if established joys
Were proved imposture? Poetry annoys
Its utmost: wherefore fret? Verses may come
Or keep away! And thus he wandered, dumb
Till evening, when he paused, thoroughly spent,
On a blind hill-top: down the gorge he went,
Yielding himself up as to an embrace.
The moon came out; like features of a face,
A querulous fraternity of pines,
Sad blackthorn clumps, leafless and grovelling vines

Also came out, made gradually up
The picture; 't was Goito's mountain-cup
And castle. He had dropped through one defile

He never dared explore, the Chief erewhile Had vanished by. Back rushed the vironment, strel meant

To wear his soul away in discontent,
Brooding on fortune's malice. Heart and brain
Swelled; he expanded to himself again,
As some thin seedling spice-tree starved and frail,

Pushing between cat's head and ibis' tail
Crusted into the porphyry pavement smooth, — Suffered remain just as it sprung, to soothe
The Soldan's pining daughter, never yet
Well in her chilly green-glazed minaret, —
When rooted up, the sunny day she died,
And flung into the common court beside
Its parent tree. Come home, Sordello! Soon
Was he low muttering, beneath the moon,
Of sorrow saved, of quiet evermore, —
Since from the purpose, he maintained before,
Only resulted wailing and hot tears.

Sees but Ah, the slim castle! dwindled of failure in late years,
all done But more mysterious; gone to ruin
since, — trails

Of vine through every loop-hole. Naught avails
The night as, torch in hand, he must explore
The maple chamber: did I say, its floor
Was made of intersecting cedar beams?
Worn now with gaps so large, there blew cold streams

Of air quite from the dungeon; lay your ear
Close and 't is like, one after one, you hear
In the blind darkness water drop. The nests
And nooks retain their long ranged vesturechests

Empty and smelling of the iris root
The Tuscan grated o'er them to recruit
Her wasted wits. Palma was gone that day,
Said the remaining women. Last, he lay
Beside the Carian group reserved and still.
The Body, the Machine for Acting Will,
Had been at the commencement proved unfit;
That for Demonstrating, Reflecting it,
Mankind — no fitter: was the Will Itself
In fault?

His forehead pressed the moonlit shelf
Beside the youngest marble maid awhile;
Then, raising it, he thought, with a long smile,
and re- "I shall be king again!" as he

Next day, no poet! "Wherefore?" asked
Taurello, when the dance of Jongleurs, masked
As devils, ended; "don't a song come next?"
The master of the pageant looked perplexed
Till Naddo's whisper came to his relief.
"His Highness knew what poets were: in brief.
Had not the tetchy race prescriptive right
To peevishness, caprice? or, call it spite,
One must receive their nature in its length
And breadth, expect the weakness with the strength!"

— So phrasing, till, his stock of phrases spent.
The easy-natured soldier smiled assent,
Settled his portly person, smoothed his chin,
And nodded that the bull-bait might begin.

BOOK THE THIRD

And the foot took them: let our laurels lie!
Braid moonfern now with mystic trifoly
Because once more Goito gets, once more,
Sordello to itself! A dream is o'er,
And the suspended life begins anew;
Quiet those throbbing temples, then, subdue Nature That cheek's distortion! Nature's may strict embrace, triumph Putting aside the past, shall soon
therefore; efface
Its print as well — factitious humors grown
Over the true — loves, hatreds not his own —
And turn him pure as some forgotten vest
Woven of painted byssus, silkiest
Tufting the Tyrrhene whelk's pearl-sheeted
lip,

Left welter where a trireme let it slip
I' the sea, and vexed a satrap; so the stain
O' the world forsakes Sordello, with its pain.
Its pleasure: how the tint loosening escapes.
Cloud after cloud! Mantua's familiar shapes
Die, fair and foul die, fading as they flit,
Men, women, and the pathos and the wit,
Wise speech and foolish, deeds to smile or sigh
For, good, bad, seemly or ignoble, die.
The last face glances through the eglantines.

The last voice murmurs, 'twixt the blossomed vines,

Of Men, of that machine supplied by thought
To compass self-perception with, he sought
By forcing half himself — an insane pulse
Of a god's blood, on clay it could convulse,
Never transmute — on human sights and sounds,
To watch the other half with ; irksome bounds
It ebbs from to its source, a fountain sealed
Forever. Better sure be unrevealed
Than part revealed : Sordello well or ill
Is finished : then what further use of Will,
Point in the prime idea not realized,
An oversight ? inordinately prized,
No less, and pampered with enough of each
Delight to prove the whole above its reach.

"To need become all natures, yet retain
The law of my own nature — to remain
Myself, yet yearn . . . as if that chestnut, think,
Should yearn for this first larch-bloom crisp and pink,

Or those pale fragrant tears where zephyrs stanch

March wounds along the fretted pine-tree branch !

Will and the means to show will, great and small,

Material, spiritual, — abjure them all
Save any so distinct, they may be left

Since I possess thee ! — nay, thus shut mine eyes
And know, quite know, by this heart's fall and rise,

When thou dost bury thee in clouds, and when

Over a sweet and solitary year
Wasted ; or simply notice change in him —
How eyes, once with exploring bright, grew dim
And satiate with receiving. Some distress
Was caused, too, by a sort of consciousness
Under the imbecility, — naught kept
That down ; he slept, but was aware he slept,
So, frustrated : as who brainsick made pact
Erst with the overhanging cataract
To deafen him, yet still distinguished plain
His own blood's measured clicking at his brain.

To finish. One declining Autumn day —
Few birds about the heaven chill and gray,
No wind that cared trouble the tacit woods —
He sauntered home complacently, their moods
According, his and nature's. Every spark
Was found Of Mantua life was trodden out ; so and is lost. dark

The embers, that the Troubadour, who sung
Hundreds of songs, forgot, its trick his tongue,
Its craft his brain, how either brought to pass
Singing at all ; that faculty might class
With any of Apollo's now. The year
Began to find its early promise sere
As well. Thus beauty vanishes ; thus stone

Outlingers flesh : nature's and his youth gone,
They left the world to you, and wished you joy,
When, stopping his benevolent employ,
A presage shuddered through the welkin ; harsh
The earth's remonstrance followed. 'T was the marsh

Gone of a sudden. Mincio, in its place,
Laughed, a broad water, in next morning's face,
And, where the mists broke up immense and
white

T' the steady wind, burned like a spilth of light
Out of the crashing of a myriad stars.

And here was nature, bound by the same bars
Of fate with him !

But nature " No ! youth once gone is gone :

O'er the lagune: forth fare thee, put aside —
Entrance thy synod, as a god may glide
Out of the world he fills, and leave it mute
For myriad ages as we men compute,
Returning into it without a break
Being O' the consciousness! They sleep,

at Venice, Note,

In just such songs as Eglamor (say) wrote
With heart and soul and strength, for he believed

Himself achieving all to be achieved
By singer — in such songs you find alone
Completeness, judge the song and singer one,
And either purpose answered, his in it
Or its in him: while from true works (to wit
Sordello's dream-performances that will Never be more than dreamed) escapes there still

Some proof, the singer's proper life was 'neath
The life his song exhibits, this a sheath
To that; a passion and a knowledge far
Transcending these, majestic as they are,
Smouldered; his lay was but an episode
In the bard's life: which evidence you owed
To some slight weariness, some looking-off
Or start-away. The childish skit or scoff
In "Charlemagne," (his poem, dreamed divine
In every point except one silly line
About the restiff daughters) — what may lurk
In that? "My life commenced before this work,"

(So I interpret the significance Of the bard's start aside and look askance) —
"My life continues after: on I fare
With no more stopping, possibly, no care

To note the undercurrent, the why
And how,
watching Where, when, o' the deeper life, as his own thus just now.

times, Alas

For you! who sigh, 'When shall it come to pass
We read that story? How will he compress
The future gains, his life's true business,

Into the better lay which — that one flout,
Howe'er inopportune it be, lets out —
Engrosses him already, though professed
To meditate with us eternal rest,
And partnership in all his life has found? " "
"Tis but a sailor's promise, weather-bound:
"Strike sail, slip cable, here the bark be moored
For once, the awning stretched, the poles assured!

Noontide above; except the wave's crisp dash,
Or buzz of colibri, or tortoise' splash,
The margin's silent: out with every spoil
Made in our tracking, coil by mighty coil,
This serpent of a river to his head
I' the midst! Admire each treasure, as we spread

The bank, to help us tell our history
Aright: give ear, endeavor to descry
The groves of giant rushes, how they grew
Like demons' endlong tresses we sailed through,
What mountains yawned, forests to give us vent
Opened, each doleful side, yet on we went Till . . . may that beetle (shake your cap) attest

The springing of a land-wind from the West! "
— Wherefore? Ah yes, you frolic it to-day!
To-morrow, and, the pageant moved away
Down to the poorest tent-pole, we and you
Part company: no other may pursue
Eastward your voyage, be informed what fate
Intends, if triumph or decline await
The tempter of the everlasting steppe.

I muse this on a ruined palace-step
At Venice: why should I break off, nor sit Longer upon my step, exhaust the fit
England gave birth to? Who's adorable Enough reclaim a — no Sordello's Will Alack! — be queen to me? That Bassanese Busied among her smoking fruit-boats? These Perhaps from our delicious Asolo
Who twinkle, pigeons o'er the portico
Not prettier, bind June lilies into sheaves
To deck the bridge-side chapel, dropping leaves
Because it Soiled by their own loose gold-meal?

Engrossing what should furnish all, by rights !
For, these in evidence, you clearer claim
A like garb for the rest, — grace all, the same
As these my peasants. I ask youth and strength
And health for each of you, not more — at length
Grown wise, who asked at home that the whole race

Might add the spirit's to the body's grace,
And all be dizen'd out as chiefs and bards.
But in this magic weather one discards
Much old requirement. Venice seems a type
Of Life — 'twixt blue and blue extends, a stripe,
As Life, the somewhat, hangs 'twixt naught
and naught :

'T is Venice, and 't is Life — as good you
sought

To spare me the Piazzas's slippery stone
Or keep me to the unchoked canals alone,
As hinder Life the evil with the good
Which make up Living, rightly understood.

Which Only, do finish something ! Peasants,

That a luckless residue, we send to crouch
In corners out of sight, was just as framed
For happiness, its portion might have claimed
As well, and so, obtaining joy, had stalked
Fastuous as any ! — such my project, balked
Already ; I hardly venture to adjust

The first rags, when you find me. To mistrust
Me ! — nor unreasonably. You, no doubt,
Have the true knack of tiring suitors out
With those thin lips on tremble, lashless eyes
Inveterately tear-shot — there, be wise,
Mistress of mine, there, there, as if I meant
You insult ! — shall your friend (not slave) be

For speaking home ? Beside, care-bit erased
Broken-up beauties ever took my taste
Supremely ; and I love you more, far more
Than her I looked should foot Life's temple-

A whisper came, " Let others seek ! — thy care

Or no, your secret ? Rough apparel — grudge
All ornaments save tag or tassel worn
To hint we are not thoroughly forlorn —
Slouch bonnet, unloop mantle, careless go
Alone (that's saddest, but it must be so)
Through Venice, sing now and now glance aside,

Aught desultory or undignified, —
Then, ravishingest lady, will you pass
Or not each formidable group, the mass
Before the Basilic (that feast gone by, God's great day of the Corpus Domini)
And, wistfully foregoing proper men,
Come timid up to me for alms ? And then
The luxury to hesitate, feign do
Some unexampled grace ! — when, whom but
you

Dare I bestow your own upon ? And hear
Further before you say, it is to sneer
I call you ravishing ; for I regret
Little that she, whose early foot was set Forth as she 'd plant it on a pedestal,
Now, i' the silent city, seems to fall
Toward me — no wreath, only a lip's unrest
To quiet, surcharged eyelids to be pressed
Dry of their tears upon my bosom. Strange Such sad chance should produce in thee such
change,

My love ! Warped souls and bodies ! yet God
spoke

Of right-hand, foot and eye — selects our yoke,
Sordello, as your poetship may find !
So, sleep upon my shoulder, child, nor mind
Their foolish talk ; we 'll manage reinstate
Your old worth ; ask moreover, when they prate
Of evil men past hope, " Don't each contrive,
Despite the evil you abuse, to live ? —
Keeping, each losel, through a maze of lies,
His own conceit of truth ? to which he hies
By obscure windings, tortuous, if you will,
But to himself not inaccessible ;
He sees truth, and his lies are for the crowd
Who cannot see ; some fancied right allowed
His vilest wrong, empowered the losel clutch

" All men think all men stupider than they,
Since, save themselves, no other comprehends
The complicated scheme to make amends
— Evil, the scheme by which, through Ignorance,

Good labors to exist." A slight advance, —
Merely to find the sickness you die through,
And naught beside ! but if one can't eschew
One's portion in the common lot, at least
One can avoid an ignorance increased
Tenfold by dealing out hint after hint
How naught were like dispensing without sin
The water of life — so easy to dispense
Beside, when one has probed the centre whence Commotion's born — could tell you of it all !
" — Meantime, just meditate my madrigal
O' the mugwort that conceals a dewdrop safe ! "
What, dullard ? we and you in smothery chafe,
Babes, baldheads, stumbled thus far into Zin
The Horrid, getting neither out nor in,
A hungry sun above us, sands that bung
Our throats, — each dromedary lolls a tongue,
Each camel churns a sick and frothy chap,
And you, 'twixt tales of Potiphar's mishap,
And sonnets on the earliest ass that spoke.

Let the poet take his own part, then,
Such office: “office,” quotha? can we get
To the beginning of the office yet?

Make out each other more or less precise —
The scope of the whole engine’s to be proved;
We die: which means to say, the whole’s removed,

Dismounted wheel by wheel, this complex gin, —

To be set up anew elsewhere, begin
A task indeed, but with a clearer clime
Than the murky lodgment of our building-time.
And then, I grant you, it behoves forget

So occupied, then, are we: hitherto,
At present, and a weary while to come,
The office of ourselves, — nor blind nor dumb,
And seeing somewhat of man’s state, — has been,
For the worst of us, to say they so have seen;
For the better, what it was they saw; the best
Impart the gift of seeing to the rest:

“So that I glance,” says such an one, “around,
And there’s no face but I can read profound
Disclosures in; this stands for hope, that — fear,

‘That’s truth!’

(Adjudge you) ‘the incarcerated youth
Would say that!’

Youth? Plara the bard? Set down
That Plara spent his youth in a grim town Whose cramped ill-featured streets huddled about

The minster for protection, never out
Of its black belfry’s shade and its bells’ roar.
The brighter shone the suburb, — all the more
Ugly and absolute that shade’s reproof
Of any chance escape of joy, — some roof,
Taller than they, allowed the rest detect, —
Before the sole permitted laugh (suspect
Who could, ’t was meant for laughter, that ploughed cheek’s

Repulsive gleam!) when the sun stopped both peaks

Of the cleft belfry like a fiery wedge,
Then sank, a huge flame on its socket edge,
With leavings on the gray glass oriel-pane
Ghastly some minutes more. No fear of rain —
The minster minded that! in heaps the dust
Lay everywhere. This town, the minster’s trust, “Exact the town, the minster and the street!’”

“As all mirth triumphs, sadness means defeat:
Lust triumphs and is gay, Love’s triumphed
o’er

And sad: but Lucio’s sad. I said before,
Love’s sad, not Lucio; one who loves may
be

As gay his love has leave to hope, as he
Downcast that lusts’ desire escapes the springe:

’T is of the mood itself I speak, what tinge
Determines it, else colorless, — or mirth,
Or melancholy, as from heaven or earth.”

“Ay, that’s the variation’s gist!’

Indeed?

Thus far advanced in safety then, proceed!
And having seen too what I saw, be bold
And next encounter what I do behold
(That’s sure) but bid you carry on trust!’

Attack

The use and purpose of such sights? Alack,
Not so unwisely does the crowd dispense
On Salinguerras praise in preference
One ought To the Sordellos: men of action, not blame these!

but praise Who, seeing just as little as you
this; please,

Yet turn that little to account, — engage
With, do not gaze at, — carry on, a stage,
The work o’ the world, not merely make report
The work existed ere their day! In short,
When at some future no-time a brave band
Sees, using what it sees, then shake my hand
In heaven, my brother! Meanwhile where’s

Of keeping the Makers-see on the alert,
At whose defection mortals stare aghast
As though heaven’s bounteous windows were

Incontinent? Whereas all you, beneath,

Should scowl at, bruise their lips and break their teeth

Who ply the pullies, for neglecting you :
And therefore have I moulded, made anew
A Man, and give him to be turned and tried,
Be angry with or pleased at. On your side,
Have ye times, places, actors of your own ?

Try them upon Sordello when full-grown,
At all events, his own audience may :
And then — ah then ! If Hercules first parched
His foot in Egypt only to be marched

A sacrifice for Jove with pomp to suit,
What chance have I ? The demigod was mute
Till, at the altar, where time out of mind
Such guests became oblations, chaplets twined
His forehead long enough, and he began
Slaying the slayers, nor escaped a man.
Take not affront, my gentle audience ! whom
No Hercules shall make his hecatomb,
Believe, nor from his brows your chaplet rend —
That's your kind suffrage, yours, my patron-
friend,

Whose great verse blares unintermittent on
Like your own trumpeter at Marathon, —
You who, Plataea and Salamis being scant,
Put up with Aetna for a stimulant —
And did well, I acknowledged, as he loomed
Over the midland sea last month, presumed
Long, lay demolished in the blazing West
At eve, while towards him tilting cloudlets
pressed

Like Persian ships at Salamis. Friend, wear
A crest proud as desert while I declare
Had I a flawless ruby fit to wring
Tears of its color from that painted king
Who lost it, I would, for that smile which went

To my heart, fling it in the sea, content,
What if Wearing your verse in place, an

My English Eyebright, if you are not glad
That, as I stopped my task awhile, the sad
Dishevelled form, wherein I put mankind
To come at times and keep my pact in mind,
Renewed me, — hear no crickets in the hedge,
Nor let a glowworm spot the river's edge
At home, and may the summer showers gush
Without a warning from the missel thrush !
So, to our business, now — the fate of such
As find our common nature — overmuch
Despised because restricted and unfit
To bear the burden they impose on it —
Cling when they would discard it ; craving
strength

To leap from the allotted world, at length
They do leap, — flounder on without a term,
Each a god's germ, doomed to remain a germ
In unexpanded infancy, unless . . .
But that's the story — dull enough, confess !
There might be fitter subjects to allure ;
Still, neither misconceive my portraiture
Nor undervalue its adornments quaint :

Ponder a story ancient pens transmit,
Then say if you condemn me or acquit.

BOOK THE FOURTH

Meantime Ferrara lay in rueful case ;
The lady-city, for whose sole embrace
Her pair of suitors struggled, felt their arms
A brawny mischief to the fragile charms
They tugged for — one discovering that to

Admitted on a morning; every town
Of the East League was come by envoy down
To treat for Richard's ransom: here you saw
The Vicentine, here snowy oxen draw
The Paduan carroch, its vermilion cross
On its white field. A-tiptoe o'er the fosse
Looked Legate Montelungo wistfully
After the flock of steeples he might spy
In Este's time, gone (doubts he) long ago
To mend the ramparts: sure the laggards know
The Pope's as good as here! They paced the streets

More soberly. At last, "Taurello greets

"Tito!" Our delegates exchanged a glance,
And, keeping the main way, admired askance
The lazy engines of outlandish birth,
Couched like a king each on its bank of earth —
Arbalist, manganel and catapult;
While stationed by, as waiting a result,
Lean silent gangs of mercenaries ceased Working to watch the strangers. "This, at

She managed it so well that, night by night,
At their bed-foot stood up a soldier-sprite,

The fig-tree reared itself, — but stark and cramped.

Made fools of, like tamed lions: whence, on the edge,

Running 'twixt trunk and trunk to smooth one ledge

Of shade, were shrubs inserted, warp and woof,
Which smothered up that variance. Scale the roof

Of solid tops, and o'er the slope you slide
Down to a grassy space level and wide,
Here and there dotted with a tree, but trees
Of rarer leaf, each foreigner at ease,
Set by itself: and in the centre spreads,
Borne upon three uneasy leopards' heads,
A laver, broad and shallow, one bright spirt
Of water bubbles in. The walls begirt

With trees leave off on either hand ; pursue
Your path along a wondrous avenue
Those walls about on, heaped of gleamy stone,
With aloes leering everywhere, gray-grown
From many a Moorish summer : how they wind
Out of the fissures ! likelier to bind
The building than those rusted cramps which drop

Already in the eating sunshine. Stop,
You fleeting shapes above there ! Ah, the pride
Or else despair of the whole country-side !

Able to right themselves — who see you, stoop

Creatures of brighter mould and braver mien
Than any yet, the choicest of the Isle

Up-gathered on himself the Fighter stood
For his last fight, and, wiping treacherous

Such the state
Of Salinguerra's plan to emulate
Sicilian marvels, that his girlish wife
Retrude still might lead her ancient life
In her new home : whereat enlarged so much
Neighbors upon the novel princely touch
He took, — who here imprisons Boniface.
Here must the Envoys come to sue for grace ;
And here, emerging from the labyrinth
Below, Sordello paused beside the plinth
Of the door-pillar.

Sordello He had really left pondersall Verona for the cornfields (a poor theft seen and From the morass) where Este's camp heard, was made.

The Envoys' march, the Legate's cavalcade —
All had been seen by him, but scarce as when, —
Eager for cause to stand aloof from men
At every point save the fantastic tie
Acknowledged in his boyish sophistry, —
He made account of such. A crowd, — he meant
To task the whole of it ; each part's intent

Concerned him therefore : and, the more he pried,

The less became Sordello satisfied
With his own figure at the moment. Sought
He respite from his task ? Descried he aught
Novel in the anticipated sight
Of all these livers upon all delight ?
This phalanx, as of myriad points combined,
Whereby he still had imaged the mankind
His youth was passed in dreams of rivalling,
His age — in plans to prove at least such thing
Had been so dreamed, — which now he must impress

With his own will, effect a happiness
By theirs, — supply a body to his soul
Thence, and become eventually whole
With them as he had hoped to be without — sake, As well

Expect to find Taurello's triple line
Of trees a single and prodigious pine.
Real pines rose here and there ; but, close among,
Thrust into and mixed up with pines, a throng
Of shrubs, he saw, — a nameless common sort
O'erpast in dreams, left out of the report
And hurried into corners, or at best
Admitted to be fancied like the rest.
Reckon that morning's proper chiefs — how few !
And yet the people grew, the people grew,
Grew ever, as if the many there indeed,
More left behind and most who should succeed, —

Simply in virtue of their mouths and eyes,
Petty enjoyments and huge miseries, —
Mingled with, and made veritably great
Those chiefs : he overlooked not Mainard's state
Nor Concorezzi's station, but instead
Of stopping there, each dwindled to be head
Of infinite and absent Tyrolese
Or Paduans ; startling all the more, that these Seemed passive and disposed of, uncared for,
Yet doubtless on the whole (like Eglamor)
Smiling ; for if a wealthy man decays

And out of store of robes must wear, all days,
One tattered suit, alike in sun and shade,
'Tis commonly some tarnished gay brocade
Fit for a feast-night's flourish and no more :
Nor otherwise poor Misery from her store
Of looks is fain upgather, keep unfurled
For common wear as she goes through the world,
The faint remainder of some worn-out smile
Meant for a feast-night's service merely. While Crowd upon crowd rose on Sordello thus, — (Crowds no way interfering to discuss,
Much less dispute, life's joys with one employed
In envying them, — or, if they aught enjoyed,
Where lingered something indefinable

In every look and tone, the mirth as well
As woe, that fixed at once his estimate
Of the result, their good or bad estate) —
But a Old memories returned with new

Cohered, mankind and he were really fused.

The new self seemed impatient to be used
 By him, but utterly another way
 Than that anticipated : strange to say,
 They were too much below him, more in thrall
 Than he, the adjunct than the principal.
 What bootied scattered units ? — here a mind
 And there, which might repay his own to find,
 And stamp, and use ? — a few, howe'er august,
 If all the rest were grovelling in the dust ?
 No : first a mighty equilibrium, sure,
 Should he establish, privilege procure
 For all, the few had long possessed ! He felt
 An error, an exceeding error melt —
 While he was occupied with Mantuan chants, Behoved him think of men, and take their wants,

Such as he now distinguished every side,
 As his own want which might be satisfied, —
 And, after that, think of rare qualities
 Of his own soul demanding exercise.
 It followed naturally, through no claim
 On their part, which made virtue of the aim
 At serving them, on his, — that, past retrieve,
 He felt now in their toils, theirs, — nor could leave

Wonder how, in the eagerness to rule,
 Impress his will on mankind, he (the fool !)
 Had never even entertained the thought
 That this his last arrangement might be fraught
 With incidental good to them as well,

And rights And that mankind's delight would hitherto help to swell ignored by His own. So, if he sighed, as for-him, merly

Because the merry time of life must fleet,
 'T was deeper now, — for could the crowds repeat

Their poor experiences ? His hand that shook
 Was twice to be deplored. "The Legate, look !
 With eyes, like fresh-blown thrush-eggs on a thread,

Faint-blue and loosely floating in his head,
 Large tongue, moist open mouth ; and this long while

 Long previously, ere take the greater task,
 How render first these people happy ? Ask
 The people's friends: for there must be one
 good,

One way to it — the Cause ! — he understood
 The meaning now of Palma ; why the jar
 Else, the ado, the trouble wide and far
 Of Guelfs and Ghibellins, the Lombard hope
 And Rome's despair ? — 'twixt Emperor and Pope

The confused shifting sort of Eden tale —
 Hardihood still recurring, still to fail —
 That foreign interloping fiend, this free
 And native overbrooding deity —
 Yet a dire fascination o'er the palms
 The Kaiser ruined, troubling even the calms

Of paradise — or, on the other hand,
 Since he The Pontiff, as the Kaisers underappre- stand,
 hends its One snake-like cursed of God to love
 full extent, the ground,

Whose heavy length breaks in the noon profound
 Some saving tree — which needs the Kaiser, dressed

As the dislodging angel of that pest,
 Yet flames that pest bedropped, flat head, full
 fold,

With coruscating dower of dyes. "Behold
 The secret, so to speak, and master-spring
 O' the contest ! — which of the two Powers shall bring

Men good — perchance the most good — ay, it
 may

Be that ! — the question, which best knows the
 way."

And hereupon Count Mainard strutted past
 Out of San Pietro ; never seemed the last
 Of archers, slingers : and our friend began
 To recollect strange modes of serving man,
 Arbalist, catapult, brake, mangel,
 And more. "This way of theirs may, — who can tell ? —

Need perfecting," said he : "let all be solved
 At once ! Taurello 'tis, the task devolved
 On late — confront Taurello !"

And at last
 He did confront him. Scarce an hour had past
 When forth Sordello came, older by years
 Than at his entry. Unexampled fears
 Oppressed him, and he staggered off, blind, mute
 And deaf, like some fresh-mutilated brute,
 Into Ferrara — not the empty town
 That morning witnessed : he went up and down
 Streets whence the veil had been stripped shred
 by shred,

So that, in place of huddling with their dead
 Indoors, to answer Salinguerra's ends,
 Townsfolk make shift to crawl forth, sit like
 friends

With any one. A woman gave him choice
 Of her two daughters, the infantile voice
 Or the dimpled knee, for half a chain, his throat
 Was clasped with ; but an archer knew the coat —

Its blue cross and eight lilies, — bade beware
 One dogging him in concert with the pair
 Though thrumming on the sleeve that hid his knife.

Night set in early, autumn dews were rife,
 They kindled great fires while the Leaguers'
 mass

Began at every carroch — he must pass
 Between the kneeling people. Presently
 The carroch of Verona caught his eye
 With purple trappings ; silently he bent
 Over its fire, when voices violent Began, "Affirm not whom the youth was like some way, away ! Sing ! Take sake

He turned: "A song of Eglamor's!" — scarce named,
When, "Our Sordello's rather!" — all exclaimed;

"Is not Sordello famousest for rhyme?" —
He had been happy to deny, this time, —
Profess as heretofore the aching head
And failing heart, — suspect that in his stead
Some true Apollo had the charge of them,
Was champion to reward or to condemn,
So his intolerable risk might shift
Or share itself; but Naddo's precious gift
Of gifts, he owned, be certain! At the close —
"I made that," said he to a youth who rose
As if to hear: 't was Palma through the band
Conducted him in silence by her hand.

Back now for Salinguerra. Tito of Trent
Gave place to Palma and her friend; who went
In turn at Montelungo's visit — one
After the other were they come and gone, —
These spokesmen for the Kaiser and the Pope,
This incarnation of the People's hope,
Sordello, — all the say of each was said;
And Salinguerra sat, himself instead
Of these to talk with, lingered musing yet.
'T was a drear vast presence-chamber roughly set

In order for the morning's use; full face,
The Kaiser's ominous sign-mark had first place,
The crowned grim twy-necked eagle, coarselyblackened

With ochre on the naked wall; nor lacked
Romano's green and yellow either side;
But the new token Tito brought had tried
The Legate's patience — nay, if Palma knew
What Salinguerra almost meant to do
Until the sight of her restored his lip
A certain half-smile, three months' chieftainship
Had banished! Afterward, the Legate found No change in him, nor asked what badge he wound

And unbound carelessly. Now sat the Chief

His last sound troops ranged — care observed to post

His best of the maimed soldiers innermost —
So much was plain enough, but somehow struck
Him not before. And now with this strange luck
Of Tito's news, rewarding his address
So well, what thought he of? — how the success
With Friedrich's rescript there would either

A sharp white line divided clean the hair;
Glossy above, glossy below, it swept
Curling and fine about a brow thus kept
Calm, laid coat upon coat, marble and sound;
This was the mystic mark the Tuscan found,
Mused of, turned over books about. Square-

Nor might the half-smile reach them that de-

A lip supremely perfect else — unwarmed,
Unwidened, less or more; indifferent
Whether on trees or men his thoughts were bent,
Thoughts rarely, after all, in trim and train
As now a period was fulfilled again:

Of such, a series made his life, compressed
In each, one story serving for the rest —
And what How his life-streams rolling arrived

Beside his rescript, a new badge by way
Of baldrice; while, — another thing that marred
Alike emprise, achievement and reward, —
Ecelin's missive was conspicuous too.

What past life did those flying thoughts pursue?

As his, few names in Mantua half so old;
But at Ferrara, where his sires enrolled
It latterly, the Adelardi spared
No pains to rival them: both factions shared
Ferrara, so that, counted out, 't would yield
A product very like the city's shield,
Half black and white, or Ghibellin and Guelph

As after Salinguerra styled himself
And Este, who, till Marchesalla died,
(Last of the Adelardi) — never tried
His fortune there: with Marchesalla's child
Would pass — could Blacks and Whites be reconciled,

And young Taurello wed Linguetta — wealth
And sway to a sole grasp. Each treats by stealth Already: when the Guefts, the Ravenese
Arrive, assault the Pietro quarter, seize Linguetta, and are gone! Men's first dismay
Abated somewhat, hurries down, to lay
The after indignation, Boniface,
This Richard's father. "Learn the full disgrace
Averted, ere you blame us Guefts, who rate
Your Salinguerra, your sole potentate
That might have been, 'mongst Este's valvasors —

Ay, Azzo's — who, not privy to, abhors
Our step; but we were zealous." Azzo's then
To do with! Straight a meeting of old men:
"Old Salinguerra dead, his heir a boy,
What if we change our ruler and decoy
The Lombard Eagle of the azure sphere
With Italy to build in, fix him here,
Settle the city's troubles in a trice?
For private wrong, let public good suffice!"

The original check In fine, young Salinguerra's stanch-

Gave him a goshawk, and affirmed there was Rare sport, one morning, over the green grass
A mile or so. He sauntered through the plain,
Was restless, fell to thinking, turned again
In time for Azzo's entry with the bride;
Count Boniface rode smirking at their side;
"She brings him half Ferrara," whispers flew,
"And all Ancona! If the stripling knew!"

Anon the stripling was in Sicily
Where Heinrich ruled in right of Constance; he
Was gracious nor his guest incapable;
Each understood the other. So it fell,
One Spring, when Azzo, thoroughly at ease,
Had near forgotten by what precise degrees
He crept at first to such a downy seat,
The Count trudged over in a special heat
To bid him of God's love dislodge from each
Of Salinguerra's palaces, — a breach
Might yawn else, not so readily to shut,
For who was just arrived at Mantua but
The youngster, sword on thigh and tuft on chin,
Which he With tokens for Celano, Ecelin, was in the Pistore, and the like! Next news, — way to re- no whit
trieve,

Do any of Ferrara's domes befit
His wife of Heinrich's very blood: a band
Of foreigners assemble, understand
Garden-constructing, level and surround,
Build up and bury in. A last news crowned
The consternation: since his infant's birth,
He only waits they end his wondrous girth
Of trees that link San Pietro with Tomà,
To visit Mantua. When the Podestà
Ecelin, at Vicenza, called his friend
Taurello thither, what could be their end
But to restore the Ghibellins' late Head,
The Kaiser helping? He with most to dread

From vengeance and reprisal, Azzo, there
With Boniface beforehand, as aware
Of plots in progress, gave alarm, expelled
Both plotters: but the Guefts in triumph yelled
Too hastily. The burning and the fight,
And how Taurello, occupied that night
With Ecelin, lost wife and son, I told:

O' the fray, and hardly seemed to care at first:
But afterward men heard not constantly
Of Salinguerra's House so sure to be!
Though Azzo simply gained by the event
A shifting of his plagues — the first, content
To fall behind the second and estrange
So far his nature, suffer such a change
That in Romano sought he wife and child
And for Romano's sake seemed reconciled
To losing individual life, which shrunk
As the other prospered — mortised in his trunk;
Like a dwarf palm which wanton Arabs foil
Of bearing its own proper wine and oil,
By grafting into it the stranger-vine,
Which sucks its heart out, sly and serpentine,
Till forth one vine-palm feathers to the root,
And red drops moisten the insipid fruit.
Once Adelaide set on, — the subtle mate
Of the weak soldier, urged to emulate
The Church's valiant women deed for deed,
And paragon her namesake, win the meed
O' the great Matilda, — soon they overbore
The rest of Lombardy, — not as before
By an instinctive truculence, but patched
The Kaiser's strategy until it matched
The Pontiff's, sought old ends by novel means.
"Only, why is it Salinguerra screens
Himself behind Romano? — him we bade
Enjoy our shine! the front, not seek the shade!"

— Asked Heinrich, somewhat of the tardiest
To comprehend. Nor Philip acquiesced
At once in the arrangement; reasoned, plied
His friend with offers of another bride,
A statelier function — fruitlessly: 't was plain

Suffered its many turns of peace and strife
In many lands — you hardly could surprise
The man; who shamed Sordello (recognize!)
In this as much beside, that, unconcerned
What qualities were natural or earned,
With no ideal of graces, as they came
He took them, singularly well the same —

But to show how Taurello, on the watch
For men, to read their hearts and thereby catch
Their capabilities and purposes,
Displayed himself so far as displayed these :
While our Sordello only cared to know
About men as a means whereby he 'd show
Himself, and men had much or little worth
According as they kept in or drew forth
That self ; the other's choicest instruments
Surmised him shallow.

Meantime, malcontents
Dropped off, town after town grew wiser.
"How

Change the world's face ?" asked people ; "as

It has been, will be ever : very fine
Subjecting things profane to things divine,
In talk ! This contumacy will fatigue
The vigilance of Este and the League !
The Ghibellins gain on us !" — as it happened.
Old Azzo and old Boniface, entrapped
By Ponte Alto, both in one month's space
Slept at Verona : either left a brace
Of sons — but, three years after, either's pair
Lost Guglielm and Aldobrand its heir :
Azzo remained and Richard — all the stay
Of Este and Saint Boniface, at bay

But Ece-      As 't were. Then, either Ecelin

As in a drunkenness, or chuckle low
As proud of the completeness of his woe,
Then weep real tears ; — now make some mad onslaught

On Este, heedless of the lesson taught
So painfully, — now cringe for peace, sue peace
At price of past gain, bar of fresh increase
To the fortunes of Romano. Up at last
Rose Este, down Romano sank as fast.
And men remarked these freaks of peace and war

Happened while Salinguerra was afar :
Whence every friend brought him, all in vain,
To use his old adherent's wits again.
Not he ! — "who had advisers in his sons,
Could plot himself, nor needed any one's Advice." 'T was Adelaide's remaining stanch

Forthwith ; but when she died, doom fell, for gay

He made alliances, gave lands away
To whom it pleased accept them, and withdrew Forever from the world. Taurello, who
Was summoned to the convent, then refused
A word at the wicket, patience thus abused,
Promptly threw off alike his imbecile
Ally's yoke, and his own frank, foolish smile.
Soon a few movements of the happier sort
Changed matters, put himself in men's report
As heretofore ; he had to fight, beside,

And that became him ever. So, in

A laughing old outrageous stifled hate
He bore to Este — how it would outbreak
At times spite of disguise, like an earthquake
In sunny weather — as that noted day
When with his hundred friends he tried to slay
Azzo before the Kaiser's face : and how,
On Azzo's calm refusal to allow A liegeman's challenge, straight he too was calmed :

As if his hate could bear to lie embalmed,
Bricked up, the moody Pharaoh, and survive
All intermediate crumbings, to arrive
At earth's catastrophe — 't was Este's crash,
Not Azzo's he demanded, so, no rash
Procedure ! Este's true antagonist
Rose out of Ecelin : all voices whist,
All eyes were sharpened, wits predicted. He erewhile.

"Ay, fairly housed at last, my old compeer ?
That we should stick together, all the year
I kept Vicenza ! — How old Boniface,
Old Azzo caught us in its market-place,
He by that pillar, I at this, — caught each
In mid swing, more than fury of his speech,
Egging the rabble on to disavow
Allegiance to their Marquis — Bacchus, how
They boasted ! Ecelin must turn their drudge,
Nor, if released, will Salinguerra grudge
Paying arrears of tribute due long since — Bacchus ! My man could promise then, nor wince,

The bones-and-muscles ! Sound of wind and
limb,

Spoke he the set excuse I framed for him :
And now he sits me, slaving and mute,
Intent on chafing each starved purple foot
Benumbed past aching with the altar slab —
Will no vein throb there when some monk shall now, Anaclet?

Sworn to abjure the world, its fume and fret,
 God's own now? Drop the dormitory bar,
 Enfold the scanty gray serge scapular
 Twice o'er the cowl to muffle memories cut!
 So! But the midnight whisper turns a shout,
 Eyes wink, mouths open, pulses circulate
 In the stone walls: the past, the world you hate
 Is with you, ambush, open field — or see
 The surging flame — we fire Vicenza — glee!
 Follow, let Pilio and Bernardo chafe!
 Bring up the Mantuans — through San Biagio —

And hisses on your brass gloves as they tear
 Those upturned faces choking with despair.
 Brave! Slither through the reeking gate!
 'How now?

You six had charge of her?' And then the vow Comes, and the foam spirts, hair's plucked, till one shriek

(I hear it) and you fling — you cannot speak —
 Your gold-flowered basnet to a man who haled
 The Adelaide he dared scarce view unveiled
 This morn, naked across the fire: how crown
 The archer that exhausted lays you down
 Your infant, smiling at the flame, and dies?

 You rule, Taurello!' and upon this head
 Laid the silk glove of Constance — I see her
 Too, mantled head to foot in miniver,

 Gently lifted aside, laid upon shore?
 My life must be lived out in foam and roar,
 No question. Fifty years the province held
 Taurello; troubles raised, and troubles quelled.
 He in the midst — who leaves this quaint stone

I set Her Moorish lentisk, by the stair,
To overawe the aloes; and we trod
Those flowers, how call you such? — into the sod;

A stately foreigner — a world of pain
To make it thrive, arrest rough winds — all vain!

It would decline; these would not be destroyed:

And now, where is it? where can you avoid
The flowers? I frighten children twenty years
Longer! — which way, too, Ecelin appears
To thwart me, for his son's besotted youth
Gives promise of the proper tiger-tooth:
They feel it at Vicenza! Fate, fate, fate,
My fine Taurello! Go you, promulgate

Then, from the river's brink, his wrongs and
he,

Hugging revenge close to their hearts, are soon
Off-striding for the Mountains of the Moon.

Midnight: the watcher nodded on his spear,
Since clouds dispersing left a passage clear
For any meagre and discoloured moon
To venture forth; and such was peering soon
Above the harassed city — her close lanes
Closer, not half so tapering her fanes,
As though she shrunk into herself to keep
What little life was saved, more safely. Heap
By heap the watch-fires mouldered, and beside
The blackest spoke Sordello and replied
Palma with none to listen. "T is your cause:

What makes a Ghibellin? There
Sordello, should be laws —

With Salinguerra, to their interest
Refer the deeds he dwelt on, — so divest
Our conference of much that scared me. Why Affect that heartless tone to Tito? I
Esteemed myself, yes, in my inmost mind
This morn, a recreant to my race — mankind
O'erlooked till now: why boast my spirit's
force,

— Such force denied its object? why divorce
These, then admire my spirit's flight the same
As though it bore up, helped some half-orbed
flame

Else quenched in the dead void, to living space?
That orb cast off to chaos and disgrace,
Why vaunt so much my unencumbered dance,
Making a feat's facilities enhance
Its marvel? But I front Taurello, one
Of happier fate, and all I should have done,
He does; the people's good being paramount
With him, their progress may perhaps account
For his abiding still; whereas you heard
The talk with Tito — the excuse preferred
For burning those five hostages, — and broached
By way of blind, as you and I approached,
I do believe."

She spoke: then he, "My thought Plainlier expressed! All to your profit —
naught

Meantime of these, of conquests to achieve
For them, of wretchedness he might relieve

While profiting your party. Azzo,
And what too,
Guelfs, approves Supports a cause: what cause? Do of neither. Guelfs pursue

Their ends by means like yours, or better?"

When
The Guelfs were proved alike, men weighed with men,
And deed with deed, blaze, blood, with blood
and blaze,
Morn broke: "Once more, Sordello, meet its gaze

Proudly — the people's charge against thee fails
In every point, while either party quails!
These are the busy ones: be silent thou!
Two parties take the world up, and allow
No third, yet have one principle, subsist
By the same injustice; whoso shall enlist
With either, ranks with man's inveterate foes.
So there is one less quarrel to compose:
The Guelf, the Ghibellin may be to curse —
I have done nothing, but both sides do worse
Than nothing. Nay, to me, forgotten, reft
Of insight, lapped by trees and flowers, was left

The notion of a service — ha? What lured
Me here, what mighty aim was I assured
Must move Taurello? What if there remained

A cause, intact, distinct from these, ordained

Have men a cause distinct from both? For me, its true discoverer?"
Some one pressed
Before them here, a watcher, to suggest

The subject for a ballad: "They must know
The tale of the dead worthy, long ago
Consul of Rome — that's long ago for us,
Minstrels and bowmen, idly squabbling thus
In the world's corner — but too late no doubt,
For the brave time he sought to bring about.

— Not know Crescentius Nomentanius?" Then

Who was the famed Roman Crescen-
tius? He cast about for terms to tell him,
when Sordello disavowed it, how they used

Whenever their Superior introduced
A novice to the Brotherhood — ("for I
Was just a brown-sleeve brother, merrily
Appointed too," quoth he, "till Innocent
Bade me relinquish, to my small content,
My wife or my brown sleeves") — some brother
spoke

Ere nocturns of Crescentius, to revoke
The edict issued, after his demise,
Which blotted fame alike and effigies,
All out except a floating power, a name
Including, tending to produce the same
Great act. Rome, dead, forgotten, lived at least Within that brain, though to a vulgar priest
And a vile stranger, — two not worth a slave
Of Rome's, Pope John, King Otho, — fortune gave

The rule there: so, Crescentius, haply dressed
In white, called Roman Consul for a jest,
Taking the people at their word, forth stepped
As upon Brutus' heel, nor ever kept
Rome waiting, — stood erect, and from his brain
Gave Rome out on its ancient place again.
Ay, bade proceed with Brutus' Rome, Kings styled

Themselves mere citizens of, and, beguiled

Into great thoughts thereby, would choose the gem

Out of a lapfull, spoil their diadem
— The Senate's cypher was so hard to scratch!
He flashes like a phanal, all men catch
The flame, Rome's just accomplished! when returned

Otho, with John, the Consul's step had spurned,
And Hugo Lord of Este, to redress
The wrongs of each. Crescentius in the stress
Of adverse fortune bent. "They crucified
Their Consul in the Forum; and abide E'er since such slaves at Rome, that I — (for I
Was once a brown-sleeve brother, merrily
Appointed) — I had option to keep wife
Or keep brown sleeves, and managed in the strife Lose both. A song of Rome!"

And Rome, indeed,
Robed at Goito in fantastic weed,
The Mother-City of his Mantuan days,
Looked an established point of light whence rays
Traversed the world; for, all the clustered homes

Beside of men, seemed bent on being Romes
In their degree; the question was, how each
Should most resemble Rome, clean out of reach.

Of the Capitol, of Castle Angelo;
New structures, that inordinately glow,
Subdued, brought back to harmony, made ripe
By many a relic of the archetype
Extant for wonder; every upstart church
That hoped to leave old temples in the lurch,
Corrected by the Theatre forlorn

No —

E'en were Sordello ready to forego
His life for this, 't were overleaping work
Some one has first to do, howe'er it irk,
Nor stray a foot's breadth from the beaten road.
Who means to help must still support the load Hildebrand lifted — 'why hast Thou,' he groaned,

'Imposed on me a burden, Paul had moaned,
And Moses dropped beneath?' Much done —
and yet

Doubtless that grandest task God ever set
On man, left much to do: at his arm's wrench,
Charlemagne's scaffold fell; but pillars blench
Merely, start back again — perchance have been Taken for buttresses: crash every screen,
Hammer the tenons better, and engage
A gang about your work, for the next age
Or two, of Knowledge, part by Strength and part By Knowledge! Then, indeed, perchance may start

Sordello on his race — would time divulge
Such secrets! If one step's awry, one bulge
Calls for correction by a step we thought

Got over long since, why, till that is wrought,
No progress! And the scaffold in its turn
Becomes, its service o'er, a thing to spurn.
Meanwhile, if your half-dozen years of life
In store dispose you to forego the strife,
Who takes exception? Only bear in mind,

Addressed to Palma, silent at his side)
"— My sober councils have diversified.

Elcorte's son! good: forward as you may,
Our lady's minstrel with so much to say!"

The hesitating sunset floated back,
Rosily traversed in the wonted track

The chamber, from the lattice o'er the girth
Of pines, to the huge eagle blacked in earth

Opposite, — outlined sudden, spur to crest,
That solid Salinguerra, and caressed

Palma's contour; 't was day looped back night's pall;

Sordello had a chance left spite of all.

And much he made of the convincing speech
Meant to compensate for the past and reach

Through his youth's daybreak of unprofit, quite
To his noon's labor, so proceed till night

Leisurely! The great argument to bind
Taurello with the Guelf Cause, body and mind,

— Came the consummate rhetoric to that?
Yet most Sordello's argument dropped flat

Through his accustomed fault of breaking yoke,
Disjoining him who felt from him who spoke.

Was 't not a touching incident — so prompt
A rendering the world its just account,

Once proved its debtor? Who'd suppose, be-

This proof, that he, Goito's god of yore,
At duty's instance could demean himself

So memorably, dwindle to a Guelf?
Be sure, in such delicious flattery steeped,

His inmost self at the out-portion peeped,
Thus occupied; then stole a glance at those

Appealed to, curious if her color rose
Or his lip moved, while he discreetly urged

The need of Lombardy becoming purged
At soonest of her barons; the poor part

Abandoned thus, missing the blood at heart
And spirit in brain, unseasonably off

Elsewhere! But, though his speech was worthy scoff,

Good-humored Salinguerra, famed for tact
And tongue, who, careless of his phrase, ne'er lacked

The right phrase, and harangued Honorius dumb

At his accession, — looked as all fell plumb
To purpose and himself found interest
In every point his new instructor pressed — Left playing with the rescript's white wax seal

To scrutinize Sordello head and heel.
He means to yield assent sure? No, alas!
All he replied was, "What, it comes to pass
That poesy, sooner than politics,
Makes fade young hair?" To think such speech could fix Taurello!

Then a flash of bitter truth:
So fantasies could break and fritter youth
That he had long ago lost earnestness,
Lost will to work, lost power to
But to will even express and to do are different: The need of working! Earth was turned a grave:

No more occasions now, though he should crave
Just one, in right of superhuman toil,
To do what was undone, repair such spoil,
Alter the past — nothing would give the chance!
Not that he was to die; he saw askance
Protract the ignominious years beyond
To dream in — time to hope and time despond,
Remember and forget, be sad, rejoice
As saved a trouble; he might, at his choice,
One way or other, idle life out, drop

He may No few smooth verses by the way

Should pick up, and set store by, — far from blame,

Plant o'er his hearse, convinced his better part
Survived him. "Rather tear men out the heart
O' the truth!" — Sordello muttered, and renewed

His propositions for the Multitude.

But Salinguerra, who at this attack
Had thrown great breast and ruffling corselet
back

To hear the better, smilingly resumed
His task; beneath, the carroch's warning boomed;

He must decide with Tito; courteously
He turned then, even seeming to agree
With his admonisher — "Assist the Pope,
Extend Guelf domination, fill the scope
O' the Church, thus based on All, by All, for
All —

Change Secular to Evangelical" —
Echoing his very sentence: all seemed lost,
When suddenly he looked up, laughingly almost,

To Palma: "This opinion of your friend's —
For instance, would it answer Palma's ends?
Best, were it not, turn Guelf, submit our Strength" —

(Here he drew out his baldric to its length)
— "To the Pope's Knowledge — let our captive slip,

Wide to the walls throw ope our gates, equip
Azzo with . . . what I hold here! Who'll

To a trite censure of the minstrel tribe

This chanted, better than their most forlorn
Of bull-baits, — that's indisputable!"

Of — "Men of Action," as the Jongleurs said,

Perception brooded unexpressed and whole.
A healthy spirit like a healthy frame

Nor even dreamed about before — in fact,

Not when his sportive arm rose for the nonce —

But he had dallied overmuch, this once,

With power: the thing was done, and he, aware

The thing was done, proceeded to declare —

(So like a nature made to serve, excel

In serving, only feel by service well!)

— That he would make Sordello that and more.

"As good a scheme as any. What's to pore

His blood at half-recital, she contrived
To hide from him Taurello's infant lived,
Lest, by revealing that, himself should mar
Romano's fortunes. And, a crime so far,
Palma received that action: she was told
Of Salinguerra's nature, of his cold

Was not Romano's sign-mark on that brow? "

Across Taurello's heart his arms were locked:
And when he did speak 't was as if he mocked
The minstrel, "who had not to move," he said,
"Nor stir — should fate defraud him of a shred
Of his son's infancy? much less his youth!"
(Laughingly all this) — "which to aid, in truth,
Himself, reserved on purpose, had not grown
Old, not too old — 't was best they kept alone
Till now, and never idly met till now;"

— Then, in the same breath, told Sordello how
All intimations of this eve's event
Were lies, for Friedrich must advance to Trent,
Thence to Verona, then to Rome, there stop,
Tumble the Church down, institute a-top
The Alps a Prefecture of Lombardy:
— "That's now! — no prophesying what may
be

Anon, with a new monarch of the clime,
Native of Gesi, passing his youth's prime
At Naples. Tito bids my choice decide On whom" . . .

"Embrace him, madman!" Palma cried,
Who through the laugh saw sweat-drops burst
apace,

And his lips blanching: he did not embrace
Sordello, but he laid Sordello's hand
On his own eyes, mouth, forehead.

Taurello laughed — not quite with the same

And brain I waste? Think you, the people clap
Their hands at my out-hewing this wild gap
For any Friedrich to fill up? 'T is mine — That's yours: I tell you, towards some such design

Have I worked blindly, yes, and idly, yes,

And for another, yes — but worked no less
With instinct at my heart; I else had swerved,
While now — look round! My cunning has pre-

By land as she by sea; with Pisa ours,
And Florence, and Pistoia, one devours
The land at leisure! Gloriously dispersed — Brescia, observe, Milan, Piacenza first
That flanked us (ah, you know not!) in the March;

On these we pile, as keystone of our arch,
Romagna and Bologna, whose first span
Covered the Trentine and the Valsugan;
Sofia's Egna by Bolgiano's sure!" . . .
So he proceeded: half of all this, pure

Taurello from his child, she, without awe
Took off his iron arms from, one by one,
Sordello's shrinking shoulders, and, that done,
Made him avert his visage and relieve Sordello (you might see his corselet heave
The while) who, loose, rose — tried to speak,
then sank:

They left him in the chamber. All was blank.
And even reeling down the narrow stair
Taurello kept up, as though unaware Palma was by to guide him, the old device
— Something of Milan — "how we muster thrice

The Torriani's strength there; all along
Our own Visconti cowed them" — thus the song
Continued even while she bade him stoop,
Thrid somehow, by some glimpse of arrow-loop,
The turnings to the gallery below,
Where he stopped short as Palma let him
go.

When he had sat in silence long enough
Splintering the stone bench, braving a rebuff
She stopped the truncheon; only to commence
One of Sordello's poems, a pretence
For speaking, some poor rhyme of "Elys' hair
And head that's sharp and perfect like a pear,
So smooth and close are laid the few fine locks
May, even Stained like pale honey oozed from from the topmost rocks

failure — from his worst

Performance, the Goito, as his first:
And that at end, conceiving from the brow

And open mouth no silence would serve now,
Went on to say the whole world loved that man
And, for that matter, thought his face, though wan,
Eclipsed the Count's—he sucking in each phrase

As if an angel spoke. The foolish praise
Ended, he drew her on his mailed knees, made
Her face a framework with his hands, a shade,
A crown, an aureole: there must she remain
(Her little mouth compressed with smiling pain
As in his gloves she felt her tresses twitch)
To get the best look at, in fittest niche Dispose his saint. That done, he kissed her
brow,

—“Lauded her father for his treason now,”
He told her, “only, how could one suspect
The wit in him?—whose clansman, recollect,
Was ever Salinguerra—she, the same,
Romano and his lady—so, might claim
To know all, as she should”—and thus begun
Schemes with a vengeance, schemes on schemes,
“not one

Fit to be told that foolish boy,” he said,
“But only let Sordello Palma wed,
—Then!”

A gloom, a rift of fire, another gloom,
Faced Palma—but at length Taurello set
Her free; the grating held one ragged jet
Of fierce gold fire: he lifted her within
The hollow underneath—how else begin
Fate’s second marvellous cycle, else renew
The ages than with Palma plain in view?
Then paced the passage, hands clenched, head erect,

Pursuing his discourse; a grand unchecked
Monotony made out from his quick talk
And the recurring noises of his walk;
—Somewhat too much like the o’ercharged as-

Of two resolved friends in one danger blent,
Who hearten each the other against heart;
Boasting there’s naught to care for, when,

The boaster, all’s to care for. He, beside
Some shape not visible, in power and pride
Approached, out of the dark, ginglyling near,
Nearer, passed close in the broad light, his ear
Crimson, eyeballs suffused, temples full-fraught,

Just a snatch of the rapid speech you caught,
And on he strode into the opposite dark,
Till presently the harsh heel’s turn, a spark
I’ the stone, and whirl of some loose embossed thong

That crashed against the angle aye so long
After the last, punctual to an amount
Of mailed great paces you could not but count,—
Prepared you for the pacing back again.
And by the snatches you might ascertain
That, Friedrich’s Prefecture surmounted, left
By this alone in Italy, they cleft

Accept that compromise and stoop to give Rome law, the Cæsar’s Representative.”
Enough, that the illimitable flood
Of triumphs after triumphs, understood
In its faint reflux (you shall hear) sufficed
Young Ecelin for appanage, enticed
Him on till, these long quiet in their graves,
He found ’t was looked for that a whole life’s braves

Should somehow be made good; so, weak and worn,

Must stagger up at Milan, one gray morn
Of the to-come, and fight his latest fight.
But, Salinguerra’s prophecy at height—
Just this He voluble with a raised arm and decided, as stiff, it now may be, A blaring voice, a blazing eye, as if He had our very Italy to keep

Or cast away, or gather in a heap
To garrison the better—ay, his word
Was, “run the cucumber into a gourd,
Drive Trent upon Apulia”—at their pitch
Who spied the continents and islands which Grew mulberry-leaves and sickles, in the map—

Or sea, too little for their quietude : "
And, truly, somewhat in Sordello's mood
Confirmed its speciousness, while eve slow sank
Down the near terrace to the farther bank,
And only one spot left from out the night
Glimmered upon the river opposite —
A breadth of watery heaven like a bay,
A sky-like space of water, ray for ray,
And star for star, one richness where they

Alive now, and, to sullenness or sport
Given wholly up, disposed itself anew
At every passing instigation, grew
And dwindled at caprice, in foam-showers spilt,
Wedge-like insisting, quivered now a gilt
Shield in the sunshine, now a blinding race
Of whitest ripples o'er the reef — found place
For much display ; not gathered up and, hurled
Right from its heart, encompassing the world.
So had Sordello been, by consequence,
Without a function : others made pretence
To strength not half his own, yet had some core
Within, submitted to some moon, before
Them still, superior still whate'er their force, —
Were able therefore to fulfil a course,
Nor missed life's crown, authentic attribute.

Sordello's self: whereas for Mankind springs
Salvation by each hindrance interposed.

 Gigantic with its power of joy, beside
 The world's eternity of impotence
 To profit though at his whole joy's expense.
 For he can "Make nothing of my day because

 All tyrannies in every shape, be thrust
 Upon this Now, which time may reason out
 As mischiefs, far from benefits, no doubt;
 But long ere then Sordello will have slipped
 Away; you teach him at Goito's crypt,
 There's a blank issue to that fiery thrill.
 Stirring, the few cope with the many, still:
 So much of sand as, quiet, makes a mass
 Unable to produce three tufts of grass,
 Shall, troubled by the whirlwind, render void
 The whole calm glebe's endeavor: be employed!
 And e'en though somewhat smart the Crowd for
 this,
 Contribute each his pang to make your bliss,
 'Tis but one pang — one blood-drop to the bowl
 Which brimful tempts the sluggish asp uncowl
 At last, stains ruddily the dull red cape,
 And, kindling orbs gray as the unripe grape
 Before, avails forthwith to disentrance
 The portent, soon to lead a mystic dance
 Among you! For, who sits alone in Rome?
 Have those great hands indeed hewn out a home,
 And set me there to live? Oh life, life-breath, Life-blood, — ere sleep, come travail, life ere
 death!
 This life stream on my soul, direct, oblique,
 But always streaming! Hindrances? They pique:
 Helps? such . . . but why repeat, my soul o'er-tops
 Each height, then every depth profoundlier drops?
 Enough that I can live, and would live! Wait
 For some transcendent life reserved by Fate
 To follow this? Oh, never! Fate, I trust
 The same, my soul to; for, as who flings dust,
 Perchance (so facile was the deed) she checked
 The void with these materials to affect
 My soul diversely: these consigned anew
 To naught by death, what marvel if she threw
 A second and superber spectacle
 Before me? What may serve for sun, what still Wander a moon above me? What else wind
 About me like the pleasures left behind,
 And how shall some new flesh that is not flesh
 Cling to me? What's new laughter? Soothes the fresh
 Sleep like sleep? Fate's exhaustless for my sake
 In brave resource: but whether bids she slake
 My thirst at this first rivulet, or count
 No draught worth lip save from some rocky fount
 Above i' the clouds, while here she's provident
 Of pure loquacious pearl, the soft tree-tent
 Guards, with its face of reate and sedge, nor fail

The silver globules and gold-sparkling groll
 At bottom? Oh, 't were too absurd to slight
 For the hereafter the to-day's delight!
 Quench thirst at this, then seek next well-spring:
 wear
 Home-lilies ere strange lotus in my hair!
 Here is the Crowd, whom I with freest heart
 Offer to serve, contented for my part Freed from To give life up in service, — only a problem- grant
 That I do serve; if otherwise, why gation, want
 Aught further of me? If men cannot choose
 But set aside life, why should I refuse
 The gift? I take it — I, for one, engage Never to falter through my pilgrimage —
 Nor end it howling that the stock or stone
 Were enviable, truly: I, for one,
 Will praise the world, you style mere anteroom
 To palace — be it so! shall I assume
 — My foot the courtly gait, my tongue the trope,
 My mouth the smirk, before the doors fly open

 'Mid flying synods of worlds! No: in heaven's marge
 Show Titan still, recumbent o'er his targe
 Solid with stars — the Centaur at his game,
 Made tremulously out in hoary flame!
 "Life! Yet the very cup whose extreme dull
 Dregs, even, I would quaff, was dashed, at full,
 Aside so oft; the death I fly, revealed
 So oft a better life this life concealed,

 'T was well for them; let me become aware

As they, and I relinquish life, too! Let
That masters life disclose itself! Forget
Vain ordinances, I have one appeal —
I feel, am what I feel, know what I feel;
So much is truth to me. What Is, then? Since
One object, viewed diversely, may evince
Beauty and ugliness — this way attract,
That way repel, — why gloze upon the fact?
Why must a single of the sides be right?
What bids choose this and leave the opposite?
Where's abstract Right for me? — in youth en-dued

With Right still present, still to be pursued,
Through all the interchange of circles, rife
Each with its proper law and mode of life,
Each to be dwelt at ease in: where, to sway
Absolute with the Kaiser, or obey
Implicit with his serf of fluttering heart,
Or, like a sudden thought of God's, to start
Up, Brutus in the presence, then go shout
That some should pick the unstrung jewels out —
Each, well!"

And, as in moments when the past
Gave partially enfranchisement, he cast
Himself quite through mere secondary states
Of his soul's essence, little loves and hates,
Because Into the mid deep yearnings overlaid
there is a By these; as who should pierce hill, life beyond plain, grove, glade,
life, And on into the very nucleus probe
That first determined there exist a globe.
As that were easiest, half the globe dissolved,
So seemed Sordello's closing-truth evolved
By his flesh-half's break up; the sudden swell
Of his expanding soul showed Ill and Well,
Sorrow and Joy, Beauty and Ugliness,
Virtue and Vice, the Larger and the Less,
All qualities, in fine, recorded here,
Might be but modes of Time and this one sphere,
Urgent on these, but not of force to bind
Eternity, as Time — as Matter — Mind,
If Mind, Eternity, should choose assert
Their attributes within a Life: thus girt
With circumstance, next change beholds them
cinct

Quite otherwise — with Good and Ill distinct,
Joys, sorrows, tending to a like result —
Contrived to render easy, difficult,
This or the other course of . . . what new bond
In place of flesh may stop their flight beyond
Its new sphere, as that course does harm or good
To its arrangements. Once this understood,
As suddenly he felt himself alone,
Quite out of Time and this world: all was known.

What made the secret of his past despair?
— Most imminent when he seemed most aware
Of his own self-sufficiency; made mad
By craving to expand the power he had,
And not new power to be expanded? — just
This made it; Soul on Matter being thrust,
Joy comes when so much Soul is wrecked in
Time

On Matter, — let the Soul's attempt sublime
Matter beyond the scheme and so prevent
By more or less that deed's accomplishment,
And Sorrow follows: Sorrow how avoid?

Small, Great, are merely terms we bandy here;
Since to the spirit's absoluteness all
Are like. Now, of the present sphere we call Life, are conditions; take but this among Many; the body was to be so long
Youthful, no longer: but, since no control
Tied to that body's purposes his soul,
She chose to understand the body's trade
More than the body's self — had fain conveyed
Her boundless, to the body's bounded lot.
Hence, the soul permanent, the body not, —
Scarcely its minute for enjoying here, —
The soul must needs instruct her weak compeer,
Run o'er its capabilities and wring

A joy thence, she held worth experiencing:
Which, far from half discovered even, — lo,
The minute gone, the body's power let go
Apportioned to that joy's acquirement! Broke Nor such Morning o'er earth, he yearned for Black o'er the spread of sea, — down to the moist

Dale's silken barley-spikes sullied with rain,
Swayed earthwards, heavily to rise again —
The Small, a sphere as perfect as the Great
To the soul's absoluteness. Meditate
Too long on such a morning's cluster-chord
And the whole music it was framed afford, —
The chord's might half discovered, what should pluck

One string, his finger, was found palsy-struck.
And then no marvel if the spirit, shown
A saddest sight — the body lost alone
Through her officious proffered help, deprived
Of this and that enjoyment Fate contrived, —
Virtue, Good, Beauty, each allowed slip hence, —
Vain gloriously were fain, for recompense,
To stem the ruin even yet, protract
The body's term, supply the power it lacked
From her infinity, compel it learn
These qualities were only Time's concern,
And body may, with spirit helping, barred —
Advance the same, vanquished — obtain reward,
Reap joy where sorrow was intended grow,
Of Wrong make Right, and turn Ill Good below.
And the result is, the poor body soon
Sinks under what was meant a wondrous boon.
Leaving its bright accomplice all aghast.

So much was plain then, proper in the past;
To be complete for, satisfy the whole
Series of spheres — Eternity, his soul
Needs must exceed, prove incomplete for, each Single sphere — Time. But does our know-

Though during the mere space that shall elapse

'Twixt his enthrallment in new bonds, perhaps?
Must life be ever just escaped, which should Have been enjoyed? — nay, might have been and would,

Each purpose ordered right — the soul's no whit
Beyond the body's purpose under it —
Like yonder breadth of watery heaven, a bay,
And that sky-space of water, ray for ray
And star for star, one richness where they mixed
As this and that wing of an angel, fixed,
Tumultuary splendors folded in
To die — would soul, proportioned thus, begin
Exciting discontent, or surelier quell
The body if, aspiring, it rebel?
But how so order life? Still brutalize
The soul, the sad world's way, with muffled eyes
To all that was before, all that shall be
After this sphere — all and each quality
Save some sole and immutable Great-Good
And Beauteous whither fate has loosed its hood

To follow? Never may some soul

And take the single course prescribed before,
As the king-bird with ages on his plumes
Travels to die in his ancestral glooms?
But where descry the Love that shall select
That course? Here is a soul whom, to affect,
Nature has plied with all her means, from trees
And flowers e'en to the Multitude! — and these,
Decides he save or no? One word to end!

Ah, my Sordello, I this once befriend
And speak for you. Of a Power above you still Which, utterly incomprehensible,
Is out of rivalry, which thus you can

When in- by man — love? What need! And of — none the

But of a Power its representative
Who, being for authority the same,
Communication different, should claim
A course, the first chose but this last revealed —
This Human clear, as that Divine concealed —
What utter need!

What has Sordello found?
Or can his spirit go the mighty round,
End where poor Eglaamor begun? So, says
Old fable, the two eagles went two ways
About the world: where, in the midst, they met,
Though on a shifting waste of sand, men set
Jove's temple. Quick, what has Sordello found?

For they approach — approach — that Sordello foot's rebound knows: Palma? No, Salinguerra though in mail;

They mount, have reached the threshold, dash
the veil

Aside — and you divine who sat there dead,
Under his foot the badge: still, Palma said,
A triumph lingering in the wide eyes.
Wider than some spent swimmer's if he spies
Help from above in his extreme despair,

And, head far back on shoulder thrust, turns
there

With short quick passionate cry: as Palma
pressed

In one great kiss, her lips upon his breast,
It beat.

By this, the hermit-bee has stopped
His day's toil at Goito: the new-cropped
Dead vine-leaf answers, now 't is eve, he bit,
Twirled so, and filed all day: the mansion's fit,
God counselled for. As easy guess the word
That passed betwixt them, and become the third

To the soft small unfrighted bee, as tax
Him with one fault — so, no remembrance

 Ecelin flew there, and the town henceforth
 Was wholly his — Taurello sinking back
 From temporary station to a track
 That suited. News received of this acquist,
 Friedrich did come to Lombardy: who missed
 Taurello then? Another year: they took Vicenza, left the Marquis scarce a nook
 For refuge, and, when hundreds two or three Of Guelfs conspired to call themselves "The Free,"

Opposing Alberic, — vile Bassanese, —
 (Without Sordello!) — Ecelin at ease
 Slaughtered them so observably, that oft
 A little Salinguerra looked with soft
 Blue eyes up, asked his sire the proper age
 To get appointed his proud uncle's page.
 More years passed, and that sire had dwindled
 down

To a mere showy turbulent soldier, grown
 Better through age, his parts still in repute,
 Subtle — how else? — but hardly so astute
 As his contemporaneous friends professed;

God's part and testify that 'mid the brake
 Wild o'er his castle on the pleasant knoll,
 You hear its one tower left, a belfry, toll —
 The earthquake spared it last year, laying flat
 The modern church beneath, — no harm in
 that!

Chirrup the contumacious grasshopper,
Rustles the lizard and the cushats chirre
Above the ravage : there, at deep of day
A week since, heard I the old Canon say
He saw with his own eyes a barrow burst
And Alberic's huge skeleton unheard
Only five years ago. He added, " June 's
The month for carding off our first cocoons
The silkworms fabricate " — a double news,
Nor he nor I could tell the worthier. Choose !

And Naddo gone, all 's gone ; not Eglamor !
Believe, I knew the face I waited for,
A guest my spirit of the golden courts !
Oh strange to see how, despite ill-reports,
Disuse, some wear of years, that face retained
Its joyous look of love ! Suns waxed and waned,

And still my spirit held an upward flight,
Spiral on spiral, gyres of life and light
More and more gorgeous -- ever that face there
The last admitted ! crossed, too, with some care
As perfect triumph were not sure for all,

Good will But, on a few, enduring damp must
— ill luck, fall,
get second — A transient struggle, haply a pain-prize : ful sense

Of the inferior nature's clinging — whence
Slight starting tears easily wiped away,
Fine jealousies soon stifled in the play
Of irrepressible admiration — not
Aspiring, all considered, to their lot
Who ever, just as they prepare ascend
Spiral on spiral, wish thee well, impend
Thy frank delight at their exclusive track,
That upturned fervid face and hair put back !

Is there no more to say ? He of the rhymes —
Many a tale, of this retreat betimes,
Was born : Sordello die at once for men ?
The Chroniclers of Mantua tired their pen
Telling how Sordello Prince Visconti saved
Mantua, and elsewhere notably behaved —
Who thus, by fortune ordering events,
Passed with posterity, to all intents,
For just the god he never could become.
As Knight, Bard, Gallant, men were never dumb

In praise of him : while what he should have
been,

Could be, and was not — the one step too mean
For him to take, — we suffer at this day
Because of : Ecclin had pushed away
Its chance ere Dante could arrive and take What least That step Sordello spurned, for the one may I world's sake :

award He did much — but Sordello's chance
Sordello ? was gone.

Thus, had Sordello dared that step alone,
Apollo had been compassed — 't was a fit

He wished should go to him, not he to it
— As one content to merely be supposed
Singing or fighting elsewhere, while he dozed
Really at home — one who was chiefly glad
To have achieved the few real deeds he had,
Because that way assured they were not worth
Doing, so spared from doing them henceforth —
A tree that covets fruitage and yet tastes
Never itself, itself. Had he embraced Their cause then, men had plucked Hesperian
fruit

And, praising that, just thrown him in to boot
All he was anxious to appear, but scarce
Solicitous to be. A sorry farce
Such life is, after all ! Cannot I say
This — that He lived for some one better thing ?
must per- this way. —
force con- Lo, on a heathy brown and nameless tent him, hill

By sparkling Asolo, in mist and chill,
Morning just up, higher and higher runs
A child barefoot and rosy. See ! the sun 's
On the square castle's inner-court's low wall
Like the chine of some extinct animal
Half turned to earth and flowers ; and through the haze

(Save where some slender patches of gray maize

Are to be overleaped) that boy has crossed
The whole hill-side of dew and powder-frost
Matting the balm and mountain camomile.
Up and up goes he, singing all the while
Some unintelligible words to beat
The lark, God's poet, swooning at his feet,
So worsted is he at " the few fine locks
Stained like pale honey oozed from topmost
rocks

Sun-blanchd the livelong summer," — all that 's left

Of the Goito lay ! And thus bereft,
Sleep and forget, Sordello ! In effect
He sleeps, the feverish poet — I suspect
As no prize Not utterly companionless ; but,
at all, has friends, contented Wake up ! The ghost's gone, and
me. the story ends

I'd fain hope, sweetly ; seeing, peri or ghoul,
That spirits are conjectured fair or foul,
Evil or good, judicious authors think,
According as they vanish in a stink
Or in a perfume. Friends. be frank ! ye snuff Civet, I warrant. Really ? Like enough !
Merely the savor's rareness ; any nose
May ravage with impunity a rose :
Rifle a musk-pod and 't will ache like yours !
I'd tell you that same pungency ensures
An after-gust, but that were overbold.
Who would has heard Sordello's story told.

PIPPA PASSES

A DRAMA

Sordello did not prove commercially successful, and Browning was reluctant to go on publishing his poetry at his father's expense. "One day," Mr. Gosse says, "as the poet was discussing the matter with Mr. Edward Moxon, the publisher, the latter remarked that at that time he was bringing out some editions of the old Elizabethan dramatists in a comparatively cheap form, and that if Mr. Browning would consent to print his poems as pamphlets, using this cheap type, the expense would be very inconsiderable." Browning accepted the suggestion at once and began the issue of a cheap series of pamphlets, each sixteen octavo pages in double column, printed on poor paper and sold first for a sixpence each, the price afterward being raised to a shilling and then to half a crown. The series consisted of eight numbers under the general fanciful title Bells and Pomegranates. Apparently the passage in Exodus xxviii. 33, "And beneath upon the hem of it [the priest's robe] thou shalt make pomegranates of blue, and of purple, and of scarlet, round about the hem thereof; and bells of gold between them round about," suggested the title, but as all sorts of speculations sprang up about its significance, Browning appended the following note to the eighth and final number of the series:—

"Here ends my first series of Bells and Pomegranates, and I take the opportunity of explaining, in reply to inquiries, that I only meant by that title to indicate an endeavor towards something like an alteration, or mixture, of music with discoursing, sound with sense, poetry with thought; which looks too ambitious, thus expressed, so the symbol was preferred. It is little to the purpose, that such is actually one of the most familiar of the many Rabbinical (and Patristic) acceptations of the phrase; because I confess that, letting authority alone, I suppose the bare words, in such juxtaposition, would sufficiently convey the desired meaning. 'Faith and good works' is another fancy, for instance, and perhaps no easier to arrive at; yet Giotto placed a pomegranate fruit in the hand of Dante, and Raffaello crowned his Theology (in the Camera della Segnatura) with blossoms of the same; as if the Bellari and Vasari would be sure to come after, and explain that it was merely 'simbolo delle buone opere — il qual Pomegranato fu però usato nelle veste del Pontefice appresso gli Ebrei.'

The first number of Bells and Pomegranates contained Pippa Passes. It was published in 1841 and was introduced by the following dedicatory preface:—

ADVERTISEMENT

Two or three years ago I wrote a Play, about which the chief matter I much care to recollect at present is, that a Pitfull of good-natured people applauded it: ever since, I have been desirous of doing something in the same way that should better reward their attention. What follows, I mean for the first of a series of Dramatical Pieces, to come out at intervals; and I amuse myself by fancying that the cheap mode in which they appear, will for once help me to a sort of Pit-audience again. Of course such a work must go on no longer than it is liked; and to provide against a too certain and but too possible contingency, let me hasten to say now — what, if I were sure of success, I would try to say circumstantially enough at the close — that I dedicate my best intentions most admiringly to the Author of Ion — most affectionately to Sergeant Talfourd.

ROBERT BROWNING.

The phrases in the closing sentence were afterward used by Browning as a dedication when he discarded the advertisement in the collective editions of his poems.

INTRODUCTION

NEW YEAR'S DAY AT ASOLO IN THE TREVISAN

A large mean airy chamber. A girl, PIPPA, from the silk-mills, springing out of bed.

DAY!

Faster and more fast,
O'er night's brim, day boils at last :
Boils, pure gold, o'er the cloud-cup's brim
Where spurning and suppressed it lay,
For not a froth-flake touched the rim
Of yonder gap in the solid gray
Of the eastern cloud, an hour away ;
But forth one wavelet, then another, curled,
Till the whole sunrise, not to be suppressed,
Rose, reddened, and its seething breast
Flickered in bounds, grew gold, then overflowed
the world.

Oh Day, if I squander a wavelet of thee,
A mite of my twelve-hours' treasure,
The least of thy gazes or glances,
(Be they grants thou art bound to or gifts above measure)
One of thy choices or one of thy chances, (Be they tasks God imposed thee or freaks at thy pleasure)
— My Day, if I squander such labor or leisure,
Then shame fall on Asolo, mischief on me !

Thy long blue solemn hours serenely flowing,
Whence earth, we feel, gets steady help and
good —

Thy fitful sunshine-minutes, coming, going,
As if earth turned from work in gamesome mood —

All shall be mine ! But thou must treat me not
As prosperous ones are treated, those who live
At hand here, and enjoy the higher lot,
In readiness to take what thou wilt give,
And free to let alone what thou refusest ;
For, Day, my holiday, if thou ill-usest
Me, who am only Pippa, — old-year's sorrow,
Cast off last night, will come again to-morrow :
Whereas, if thou prove gentle, I shall borrow Sufficient strength of thee for new-year's sorrow.
All other men and women that this earth
Belongs to, who all days alike possess,
Make general plenty cure particular dearth,
Get more joy one way, if another, less :
Thou art my single day, God lends to leaven
What were all other else, with a feel of heaven, —

Sole light that helps me through the year, thy sun's !

Try now ! Take Asolo's Four Happiest Ones —
And let thy morning rain on that superb
Great haughty Ottima ; can rain disturb
Her Sebald's homage ? All the while thy rain
Beats fiercest on her shrub-house window-pane
He will but press the closer, breathe more warm Against her cheek ; how should she mind the storm ?

And, morning past, if mid-day shed a gloom
O'er Jules and Phene, — what care bride and groom ?

Save for their dear selves ? 'Tis their marriage-day ;

And while they leave church and go home their
way,

Hand clasping hand, within each breast would be
Sunbeams and pleasant weather spite of thee.

Then, for another trial, obscure thy eve
With mist, — will Luigi and his mother grieve —
The lady and her child, unmatched, forsooth,
She in her age, as Luigi in his youth,
For true content ? The cheerful town, warm,
close

And safe, the sooner that thou art morose,
Receives them. And yet once again, outbreak
In storm at night on Monsignor, they make Such stir about, — whom they expect from Rome

To visit Asolo, his brothers' home,
And say here masses proper to release
A soul from pain, — what storm dares hurt his
peace ?

Calm would he pray, with his own thoughts to ward

Thy thunder off, nor want the angels' guard.
But Pippa — just one such mischance would spoil

Her day that lightens the next twelvemonth's toil

At wearisome silk-winding, coil on coil !

And here I let time slip for naught !
Aha, you foolhardy sunbeam, caught
With a single splash from my ever !
You that would mock the best pursuer,
Was my basin over-deep ?

One splash of water ruins you asleep,
And up, up, fleet your brilliant bits
Wheeling and counterwheeling,
Reeling, broken beyond healing :
Now grow together on the ceiling !

That will task your wits.
Whoever it was quenched fire first, hoped to see
Morsel after morsel flee

As merrily, as giddily . . .
Meantime, what lights my sunbeam on,
Where settles by degrees the radiant cripple ?
Oh, is it surely blown, my martagon ?
New-blown and ruddy as St. Agnes' nipple, Plump as the flesh-bunch on some Turk bird's poll !

Be sure if corals, branching 'neath the ripple
Of ocean, bud there, — fairies watch unroll
Such turban-flowers ; I say, such lamps disperse Thick red flame through that dusk green universe !

I am queen of thee, floweret !

And each fleshy blossom

Preserve I not — (safer

Than leaves that embower it,

Or shells that embosom)

— From weevil and chafer ?

Laugh through my pane then ; solicit the bee ;

Gibe him, be sure ; and, in midst of thy glee,

Love thy queen, worship me !

— Worship whom else ? For am I not, this day,
Whate'er I please ? What shall I please to-day ?
My morn, noon, eve and night — how spend my
day ?

To-morrow I must be Pippa who winds silk,
The whole year round, to earn just bread and milk :

But, this one day, I have leave to go,
And play out my fancy's fullest games ;
I may fancy all day — and it shall be so —
That I taste of the pleasures, am called by the names

Of the Happiest Four in our Asolo !

See ! Up the hillside yonder, through the morning,

Some one shall love me, as the world calls love :
I am no less than Ottima, take warning !

The gardens, and the great stone house above,
And other house for shrubs, all glass in front,
Are mine ; where Sebald steals, as he is wont,
To court me, while old Luca yet reposes :

And therefore, till the shrub-house door uncloses,

I . . . what now ? — give abundant cause for prate

About me — Ottima, I mean — of late.

Too bold, too confident she 'll still face down
The spitefullest of talkers in our town.

How we talk in the little town below !

But love, love, love — there's better love, I know !

This foolish love was only day's first offer ;

I choose my next love to defy the scoffer :

For do not our Bride and Bridegroom sally

Out of Possagno church at noon ?

Their house looks over Ocreana valley :

Why should not I be the bride as soon

As Ottima ? For I saw, beside,

Arrive last night that little bride —

Saw, if you call it seeing her, one flash

Of the pale snow-pure cheek and black bright tresses,

Blacker than all except the black eyelash ;

I wonder she contrives those lids no dresses !

— So strict was she, the veil

Should cover close her pale

Pure cheeks — a bride to look at and scarce touch,

Scarce touch, remember, Jules ! For are not such

Used to be tended, flower-like, every feature,

As if one's breath would fray the lily of a creature ?

A soft and easy life these ladies lead :

Whiteness in us were wonderful indeed.

Oh, save that brow its virgin dimness,

Keep that foot its lady primness,

Let those ankles never swerve

From their exquisite reserve,

Yet have to trip along the streets like me,

All but naked to the knee !

How will she ever grant her Jules a bliss

So startling as her real first infant kiss ?

Oh, no — not envy, this !

— Not envy, sure ! — for if you gave me

Leave to take or to refuse,

In earnest, do you think I 'd choose

That sort of new love to enslave me ?

Mine should have lapped me round from the beginning ;

As little fear of losing it as winning :

Lovers grow cold, men learn to hate their wives,
And only parents' love can last our lives.

At eve the Son and Mother, gentle pair,

Commune inside our turret : what prevents

My being Luigi ? While that mossy lair

Of lizards through the winter-time is stirred

With each to each imparting sweet intents

For this new-year, as brooding bird to bird —

(For I observe of late, the evening walk

Of Luigi and his mother, always ends

Inside our ruined turret, where they talk,

Calmer than lovers, yet more kind than friends)

— Let me be cared about, kept out of harm,

And schemed for, safe in love as with a charm ;

Let me be Luigi ! If I only knew

What was my mother's face — my father, too !

Nay, if you come to that, best love of all

Is God's ; then why not have God's love befall

Myself as, in the palace by the Dome,

Monsignor ? — who to-night will bless the home

Of his dead brother ; and God bless in turn

That heart which beats, those eyes which mildly burn

With love for all men ! I, to-night at least,

Would be that holy and beloved priest.

Now wait ! — even I already seem to share

In God's love : what does New-year's hymn declare ?

What other meaning do these verses bear ?

All service ranks the same with God :

If now, as formerly he trod

Paradise, his presence fills

Our earth, each only as God wills

Can work — God's puppets, best and worst,

Are we ; there is no last nor first.

Say not "a small event !" Why "small" ?

Costs it more pain that this, ye call

A "great event," should come to pass,

Than that ? Untwine me from the mass

Of deeds which make up life, one deed

Power shall fall short in or exceed !

And more of it, and more of it ! — oh yes —

I will pass each, and see their happiness,

And envy none — being just as great, no doubt,

Useful to men, and dear to God, as they !

A pretty thing to care about

So mightily, this single holiday !

But let the sun shine ! Wherefore repine ?

— With thee to lead me, O Day of mine,

Down the grass path gray with dew,

Under the pine-wood, blind with boughs,

Where the swallow never flew

Nor yet cicala dared carouse —

No, dared carouse ! [She enters the street.]

I. MORNING

Up the Hillside, inside the Shrub-house. LUCA's Wife, OTTIMA, and her Paramour, the German SEBALD.

*Sebald. [sings.] Let the watching lids wink !
Day's ablaze with eyes, think !
Deep into the night, drink !*

Ottima. Night? Such may be your Rhine-land nights, perhaps;
But this blood-red beam through the shutter's chink

— We call such light, the morning: let us see!
Mind how you grope your way, though! How these tall

Naked geraniums straggle! Push the lattice
Behind that frame! — Nay, do I bid you? — Sebald,

It shakes the dust down on me! Why, of course

The slide-bolt catches. Well, are you content,
Or must I find you something else to spoil?
Kiss and be friends, my Sebald! Is't full morning?

Oh, don't speak then!

Seb. Ay, thus it used to be!
Ever your house was, I remember, shut
Till mid-day; I observed that, as I strolled
On mornings through the vale here; country girls

Were noisy, washing garments in the brook,
Hinds drove the slow white oxen up the hills:
But no, your house was mute, would ope no eye!
And wisely: you were plotting one thing there,
Nature, another outside. I looked up —
Rough white wood shutters, rusty iron bars,
Silent as death, blind in a flood of light.

Oh, I remember! — and the peasants laughed
And said, "The old man sleeps with the young wife."

This house was his, this chair, this window — his.

Otti. Ah, the clear morning! I can see Saint Mark's;

That black streak is the belfry. Stop: Vicenza Should lie . . . there's Padua, plain enough, that blue!

Look o'er my shoulder, follow my finger!

Seb. Morning?
It seems to me a night with a sun added.
Where's dew, where's freshness? That bruised plant, I bruised

In getting through the lattice yestereve,
Droops as it did. See, here 's my elbow's mark
I' the dust o' the sill.

Otti. Oh, shut the lattice, pray!

Seb. Let me lean out. I cannot scent blood here,
Foul as the morn may be.

There, shut the world out!
How do you feel now, Ottima? There, curse
The world and all outside! Let us throw off
This mask: how do you bear yourself? Let's out

With all of it!

Otti. Best never speak of it.

Seb. Best speak again and yet again of it,
Till words cease to be more than words. "His blood,"

For instance — let those two words mean, "His blood"

And nothing more. Notice, I'll say them now,
"His blood."

Otti. Assuredly if I repented

The deed —

Seb. Repent? Who should repent, or why?

What puts that in your head? Did I once say
That I repented?

Otti. No; I said the deed . . .
Seb. "The deed" and "the event" — just now it was

"Our passion's fruit" — the devil take such cant!

Say, once and always, Luca was a wittol,

I am his cut-throat, you are . . .

Otti. Here's the wine;
I brought it when we left the house above,
And glasses too — wine of both sorts. Black?
White then?

Seb. But am not I his cut-throat? What are you?

Otti. There trudges on his business from the Duomo

Benet the Capuchin, with his brown hood
And bare feet; always in one place at church,
Close under the stone wall by the south entry.
I used to take him for a brown cold piece
Of the wall's self, as out of it he rose
To let me pass — at first, I say, I used:
Now, so has that dumb figure fastened on me,
I rather should account the plastered wall
A piece of him, so chilly does it strike.

This, Sebald?

Seb. No, the white wine — the white wine!
Well, Ottima, I promised no new year
Should rise on us the ancient shameful way;
Nor does it rise. Pour on! To your black
eyes!

Do you remember last damned New Year's day?

Otti. You brought those foreign prints. We looked at them

Over the wine and fruit. I had to scheme
To get him from the fire. Nothing but saying
His own set wants the proof-mark, roused him
up

To hunt them out.

Seb. Faith, he is not alive
To fondle you before my face.

Otti. Do you

Fondle me then! Who means to take your life
For that, my Sebald?

Seb. Hark you, Ottima!

One thing to guard against. We'll not make much

One of the other — that is, not make more
Parade of warmth, childish officious coil,
Than yesterday: as if, sweet, I supposed
Proof upon proof were needed now, now first,
To show I love you — yes, still love you — love
you

In spite of Luca and what's come to him
— Sure sign we had him ever in our thoughts,
White sneering old reproachful face and all!
We'll even quarrel, love, at times, as if
We still could lose each other, were not tied
By this: conceive you?

Otti. Love!

Seb. Not tied so sure!
Because though I was wrought upon, have struck

His insolence back into him — am I

So surely yours? — therefore forever yours?

Otti. Love, to be wise, (one counsel pays another,)

Should we have — months ago, when first we loved,

For instance that May morning we two stole
Under the green ascent of sycamores —
If we had come upon a thing like that Suddenly . . .

Seb. "A thing" — there again — "a thing!"

Otti. Then, Venus' body, had we come upon
My husband Luca Gaddi's murdered corpse
Within there, at his couch-foot, covered close —
Would you have pored upon it? Why persist
In poring now upon it? For 't is here
As much as there in the deserted house:
You cannot rid your eyes of it. For me,
Now he is dead I hate him worse: I hate . . .
Dare you stay here? I would go back and hold
His two dead hands, and say, "I hate you worse, Luca, than" . . .

Seb. Off, off — take your hands off mine,
'T is the hot evening — off! oh, morning is it?

Otti. There's one thing must be done; you know what thing.

Come in and help to carry. We may sleep
Anywhere in the whole wide house to-night.

Seb. What would come, think you, if we let him lie

Just as he is? Let him lie there until
The angels take him! He is turned by this Off from his face beside, as you will see.

Otti. This dusty pane might serve for looking-glass.

Three, four — four gray hairs! Is it so you said
A plait of hair should wave across my neck?
No — this way.

Seb. Ottima, I would give your neck,
Each splendid shoulder, both those breasts of
yours,

That this were undone! Killing! Kill the
world,

So Luca lives again! — ay, lives to sputter
His fulsome dotage on you — yes, and feign
Surprise that I return at eve to sup,
When all the morning I was loitering here —
Bid me dispatch my business and begone.
I would . . .

Otti. See!

Seb. No, I'll finish. Do you think
I fear to speak the bare truth once for all?

All we have talked of, is, at bottom, fine
To suffer; there's a recompense in guilt;
One must be venturesome and fortunate:

What is one young for, else? In age we'll sigh
O'er the wild reckless wicked days flown over;
Still, we have lived: the vice was in its place.
But to have eaten Luca's bread, have worn
His clothes, have felt his money swell my purse —

Do lovers in romances sin that way?

Why, I was starving when I used to call
And teach you music, starving while you plucked me

These flowers to smell!

Otti. My poor lost friend!

Seb. He gave me
Life, nothing less: what if he did reproach
My perfidy, and threaten, and do more —
Had he no right? What was to wonder at?
He sat by us at table quietly:

Why must you lean across till our cheeks touched?

Could he do less than make pretence to strike?
'T is not the crime's sake — I'd commit ten crimes

Greater, to have this crime wiped out, undone!
And you — O how feel you? Feel you for me?

Otti. Well then, I love you better now than ever.

And best (look at me while I speak to you) —
Best for the crime; nor do I grieve, in truth,
This mask, this simulated ignorance,
This affectation of simplicity,
Falls off our crime; this naked crime of ours
May not now be looked over: look it down!
Great? let it be great; but the joys it brought,
Pay they or no its price? Come: they or it!
Speak not! The past, would you give up the
past

Such as it is, pleasure and crime together?
Give up that noon I owned my love for you?

The garden's silence: even the single bee
Persisting in his toil, suddenly stopped,
And where he hid you only could surmise
By some campanula chalice set a-swing,
Who stammered — "Yes, I love you?"

Seb. And I drew
Back; put far back your face with both my hands
Lest you should grow too full of me — your face
So seemed athirst for my whole soul and body!

Otti. And when I ventured to receive you
here,

Made you steal hither in the mornings —

Seb. When
I used to look up 'neath the shrub-house here,
Till the red fire on its glazed windows spread
To a yellow haze?

Otti. Ah — my sign was, the sun
Inflamed the sere side of yon chestnut-tree
Nipped by the first frost.

Seb. You would always laugh
At my wet boots: I had to stride through grass
Over my ankles.

Otti. Then our crowning night!

Seb. The July night?

Otti. The day of it too, Sebald!
When heaven's pillars seemed o'erbowed with heat,

Its black-blue canopy suffered descend
Close on us both, to weigh down each to each,
And smother up all life except our life.

So lay we till the storm came.

Seb. How it came!

Otti. Buried in woods we lay, you recollect;
Swift ran the searching tempest overhead;
And ever and anon some bright white shaft
Burned through the pine-tree roof, here burned
and there,

As if God's messenger through the close wood screen

Plunged and replunged his weapon at a venture,
Feeling for guilty thee and me: then broke

The thunder like a whole sea overhead —

Seb. Yes!

Otti. — While I stretched myself upon you,
hands
To hands, my mouth to your hot mouth, and shook

All my locks loose, and covered you with them —

You, Sebald, the same you!

Seb. Slower, Ottima!

Otti. And as we lay —

Seb. Less vehemently! Love me!

Forgive me! Take not words, mere words, to heart!

Your breath is worse than wine. Breathe slow, speak slow!

Do not lean on me!

Otti. Sebald, as we lay,

Rising and falling only with our pants,
Who said, "Let death come now! 'Tis right to die!"

Right to be punished! Naught completes such bliss

But woe!" Who said that?

Seb. How did we ever rise?

Was't that we slept? Why did it end?

Otti. I felt you

Taper into a point the ruffled ends

Of my loose locks 'twixt both your humid lips.

My hair is fallen now: knot it again!

Seb. I kiss you now, dear Ottima, now and now!

This way? Will you forgive me — be once more

My great queen?

Otti. Bind it thrice about my brow;

Crown me your queen, your spirit's arbitress,

Magnificent in sin. Say that!

Seb. I crown you

My great white queen, my spirit's arbitress,

Magnificent . . .

[From without is heard the voice of PIPPA singing —

The year's at the spring

And day's at the morn;

Morning's at seven;

The hillside's dew-pearled;

The lark's on the wing;

The snail's on the thorn;

God's in his heaven —

All's right with the world!

[PIPPA passes.

Seb. God's in his heaven! Do you hear that? Who spoke?

You, you spoke!

Otti. Oh — that little ragged girl!

She must have rested on the step: we give them

But this one holiday the whole year round.

Did you ever see our silk-mills — their inside?

There are ten silk-mills now belong to you.

She stoops to pick my double heartsease . . .

Sh!

She does not hear: call you out louder!

Seb. Leave me!

Go, get your clothes on — dress those shoulders!

Otti. Sebald?

Seb. Wipe off that paint! I hate you.

Otti. Miserable!

Seb. My God, and she is emptied of it now!

Outright now! — how miraculously gone

All of the grace — had she not strange grace once?

Why, the blank cheek hangs listless as it likes,
No purpose holds the features up together,
Only the cloven brow and puckered chin
Stay in their places: and the very hair,
That seemed to have a sort of life in it,
Drops, a dead web!

Otti. Speak to me — not of me!

Seb. — That round great full-orbed face,
where not an angle

Broke the delicious indolence — all broken!

Otti. To me — not of me! Ungrateful, perjured cheat!

A coward too: but ingrate's worse than all!

Beggar — my slave — a fawning, cringing lie!

Leave me! Betray me! I can see your drift!

A lie that walks and eats and drinks!

Seb. My God!

Those morbid olive faultless shoulder-blades —
I should have known there was no blood beneath!

Otti. You hate me then? You hate me then?

Seb. To think

She would succeed in her absurd attempt,

And fascinate by sinning, show herself

Superior — guilt from its excess superior

To innocence! That little peasant's voice

Has righted all again. Though I be lost,

I know which is the better, never fear,

Of vice or virtue, purity or lust,

Nature or trick! I see what I have done,

Entirely now! Oh I am proud to feel

Such torments — let the world take credit thence —

I, having done my deed, pay too its price!

I hate, hate — curse you! God's in his heaven!

Otti. — Me!

Me! no, no, Sebald, not yourself — kill me!

Mine is the whole crime. Do but kill me — then

Yourself — then — presently — first hear me speak!

I always meant to kill myself — wait, you!

Lean on my breast — not as a breast; don't love me

The more because you lean on me, my own

Heart's Sebald! There, there, both deaths presently!

Seb. My brain is drowned now — quite drowned: all I feel

Is . . . is, at swift-recurring intervals,

A hurry-down within me, as of waters

Loosened to smother up some ghastly pit:

There they go — whirls from a black fiery sea!

Otti. Not me — to him, O God, be merciful!

Talk by the way, while PIPPA is passing from the hill-side to Orcania. Foreign Students of painting and sculpture, from Venice, assembled opposite the house of JULES, a young French statuary, at Passagno.

1st Student. Attention! My own post is beneath this window, but the pomegranate clump yonder will hide three or four of you with a little squeezing, and Schramm and his pipe must lie flat in the balcony. Four, five — who's a defaulter? We want everybody, for Jules must not be suffered to hurt his bride when the jest's found out.

2d Stud. All here! Only our poet's away — never having much meant to be present, moonstrike him! The airs of that fellow, that Giovacchino! He was in violent love with himself, and had a fair prospect of thriving in his suit, so unmolested was it, — when suddenly a woman falls in love with him, too; and out of pure jealousy he takes himself off to Trieste, immortal poem and all: whereto is this prophetic epitaph appended already, as Bluphocks assures me, — “Here a mammoth-poem lies, Fouled to death by butterflies.” His own fault, the simpleton! Instead of cramp couplets, each like a knife in your entrails, he should write, says Bluphocks, both classically and intelligibly. — Æsculapius, an Epic. Catalogue of the drugs: Hebe's plaister — One strip Cools your lip. Phæbus' emulsion — One bottle Clears your throat. Mercury's bolus — One box Chres . . .

3d Stud. Subside, my fine fellow! If the marriage was over by ten o'clock, Jules will certainly be here in a minute with his bride.

2d Stud. Good! — only, so should the poet's muse have been universally acceptable, says Bluphocks, et canibus nostris . . . and Delia not better known to our literary dogs than the boy Giovacchino!

1st Stud. To the point, now. Where's Gottlieb, the new-comer? Oh, — listen, Gottlieb, to what has called down this piece of friendly vengeance on Jules, of which we now assemble to witness the winding-up. We are all agreed, all in a tale, observe, when Jules shall burst out on us in a fury by and by: I am spokesman — the verses that are to undeceive Jules bear my name of Lutwyche — but each professes himself alike insultered by this strutting stone-squarer, who came along from Paris to Munich, and thence with a crowd of us to Venice and Possagno here, but proceeds in a day or two alone again — oh, alone indubitably! — to Rome and Florence. He, forsooth, take up his portion with these dissolute, brutalized, heartless bunglers! — so he was heard to call us all. Now, is Schramm brutalized, I should like to know? Am I heartless?

Gottlieb. Why, somewhat heartless; for, suppose Jules a coxcomb as much as you choose, still, for this mere coxcombry, you will have brushed off — what do folks style it? — the bloom of his life. Is it too late to alter? These love-letters now, you call his — I can't laugh at them.

4th Stud. Because you never read the sham letters of our inditing which drew forth these.

Gott. His discovery of the truth will be frightful.

4th Stud. That's the joke. But you should have joined us at the beginning: there's no doubt he loves the girl — loves a model he might hire by the hour!

Gott. See here! “He has been accustomed,” he writes, “to have Canova's women about him, in stone, and the world's women beside him, in flesh; these being as much below, as those above, his soul's aspiration: but now he is to have the reality.” There you laugh again! I say, you wipe off the very dew of his youth.

1st Stud. Schramm! (Take the pipe out of his mouth, somebody!) Will Jules lose the bloom of his youth?

Schramm. Nothing worth keeping is ever lost in this world: look at a blossom — it drops presently, having done its service and lasted its time; but fruits succeed, and where would be the blossom's place could it continue? As well affirm that your eye is no longer in your body, because its earliest favorite, whatever it may have first loved to look on, is dead and done with — as that any affection is lost to the soul when its first object, whatever happened first to satisfy it, is superseded in due course. Keep but ever looking, whether with the body's eye or the mind's, and you will soon find something to look on! Has a man done wondering at women? — there follow men, dead and alive, to wonder at. Has he done wondering at men? — there's God to wonder at: and the faculty of wonder may be, at the same time, old and tired enough with respect to its first object, and yet young and fresh sufficiently, so far as concerns its novel one. Thus . . .

1st Stud. Put Schramm's pipe into his mouth again! There, you see! Well, this Jules . . . a wretched fribble — oh, I watched his disportings at Possagno, the other day! Canova's gallery — you know: there he marches first resolutely past great works by the dozen without vouchsafing an eye: all at once he stops full at the Psiche-fanciulla — cannot pass that old acquaintance without a nod of encouragement — “In your new place, beauty? Then behave yourself as well here as at Munich — I see you!” Next he posts himself deliberately before the unfinished Pietà for half an hour without moving, till up he starts of a sudden, and thrusts his very nose into — I say, into — the group; by which gesture you are informed that precisely the sole point he had not fully mastered in Canova's practice was a certain method of using the drill in the articulation of the knee-joint — and that, likewise, has he mastered at length! Good-by, therefore, to poor Canova — whose gallery no longer needs detain his successor Jules, the predestinated novel thinker in marble!

5th Stud. Tell him about the women: go on to the women!

1st Stud. Why, on that matter he could never be supercilious enough. How should we be other (he said) than the poor devils you see, with those debasing habits we cherish? He was not to wallow in that mire, at least: he would wait, and love only at the proper time, and meanwhile put up with the Psiche-fanciulla. Now, I happened to hear of a young Greek — real Greek girl at Malamocco; a true Islander, do you see, with Alciphron's “hair like sea-moss” — Schramm knows! — white and quiet as an apparition, and fourteen years old at farthest. — a daughter of Natalia, so she swears — that hag Natalia, who helps us to models at three lire an hour. We selected this girl for the heroine of our jest. So first, Jules received a scented letter — somebody had seen his Tydeus at the Academy, and my picture was nothing to it : a profound admirer bade him persevere — would make herself known to him ere long. (Paolina, my little friend of the Fenice, transcribes divinely.) And in due time, the mysterious correspondent gave certain hints of her peculiar charms — the pale cheeks, the black hair — whatever, in short, had struck us in our Malamocco model : we retained her name, too — Phene, which is, by interpretation, sea-eagle. Now, think of Jules finding himself distinguished from the herd of us by such a creature ! In his very first answer he proposed marrying his monitress : and fancy us over these letters, two, three times a day, to receive and dispatch ! I concocted the main of it : relations were in the way — secrecy must be observed — in fine, would he wed her on trust, and only speak to her when they were indissolubly united ? St — st — Here they come !

6th Stud. Both of them ! Heaven's love, speak softly, speak within yourselves !

5th Stud. Look at the bridegroom ! Half his hair in storm and half in calm, — patted down over the left temple, — like a frothy cup one blows on to cool it : and the same old blouse that he murders the marble in.

2d Stud. Not a rich vest like yours, Hannibal Seratchy ! — rich, that your face may the better set it off.

6th Stud. And the bride ! Yes, sure enough, our Phene ! Should you have known her in her clothes ? How magnificently pale !

Gott. She does not also take it for earnest, I hope ?

1st Stud. Oh, Natalia's concern, that is ! We settle with Natalia.

6th Stud. She does not speak — has evidently let out no word. The only thing is, will she equally remember the rest of her lesson, and repeat correctly all those verses which are to break the secret to Jules ?

Gott. How he gazes on her ! Pity — pity !

1st Stud. They go in : now, silence ! You three, — not nearer the window, mind, than that pomegranate : just where the little girl, who a few minutes ago passed us singing, is seated !

II. NOON

Over Orcana. The house of JULES, who crosses its threshold with PHENE : she is silent, on which JULES begins —

Do not die, Phene ! I am yours now, you are mine now ; let fate reach me how she likes, If you'll not die : so, never die ! Sit here — My work-room's single seat. I over-lean This length of hair and lustrous front ; they turn

Like an entire flower upward : eyes, lips, last Your chin — no, last your throat turns : 'tis their scent

Pulls down my face upon you. Nay, look ever This one way till I change, grow you — I could Change into you, beloved !

You by me,
And I by you ; this is your hand in mine,

And side by side we sit : all's true. Thank God !

I have spoken : speak you !

O my life to come !

My Tydeus must be carved that's there in clay ; Yet how be carved, with you about the room ? Where must I place you ? When I think that once

This room-full of rough block-work seemed my heaven

Without you ! Shall I ever work again, Get fairly into my old ways again, Bid each conception stand while, trait by trait, My hand transfers its lineaments to stone ?

Will my mere fancies live near you, their truth —

The live truth, passing and repassing me, Sitting beside me ?

Now speak !

Only first, See, all your letters ! Was't not well contrived ?

Their hiding-place is Psyche's robe ; she keeps Your letters next her skin : which drops out foremost ?

Ah, — this that swam down like a first moon-beam

Into my world !

Again those eyes complete

Their melancholy survey, sweet and slow, Of all my room holds ; to return and rest On me, with pity, yet some wonder too : As if God bade some spirit plague a world, And this were the one moment of surprise And sorrow while she took her station, pausing O'er what she sees, finds good, and must destroy !

What gaze you at ? Those ? Books, I told you of ;

Let your first word to me rejoice them, too :

This minion, a Coluthus, writ in red, Bistre and azure by Bessarion's scribe — Read this line . . . no, shame — Homer's be the Greek

First breathed me from the lips of my Greek girl !

This Odyssey in coarse black vivid type With faded yellow blossoms 'twixt page and page,

To mark great places with due gratitude ;

" He said, and on Antinous directed A bitter shaft " . . . a flower blots out the rest ! Again upon your search ? My statues, then !

— Ah, do not mind that — better that will look When cast in bronze — an Almain Kaiser, that, Swart-green and gold, with truncheon based on hip.

This, rather, turn to ! What, unrecognized ?

I thought you would have seen that here you sit As I imagined you, — Hippolyta,

Naked upon her bright Numidian horse. Recall you this then ? " Carve in bold relief " —

So you commanded — " carve, against I come, A Greek, in Athens, as our fashion was,

Feasting, bay-filleted and thunder-free, Who rises 'neath the lifted myrtle-branch.

' Praise those who slew Hipparchus ! ' cry the guests,

'While o'er thy head the singer's myrtle waves
As erst above our champion: stand up, all!'"
See, I have labored to express your thought.
Quite round, a cluster of mere hands and arms (Thrust in all senses, all ways, from all sides,
Only consenting at the branch's end
They strain toward) serves for frame to a sole
face,

The Praiser's, in the centre: who with eyes
Sightless, so bend they back to light inside
His brain where visionary forms throng up,
Sings, minding not that palpitating arch
Of hands and arms, nor the quick drip of wine
From the drenched leaves o'erhead, nor crowns
cast off,

Violet and parsley crowns to trample on —
Sings, pausing as the patron-ghosts approve,
Devoutly their unconquerable hymn.
But you must say a "well" to that — say
"well!"

Because you gaze — am I fantastic, sweet?
Gaze like my very life's-stuff, marble — marbly

Even to the silence! Why, before I found
The real flesh Phené, I inured myself
To see, throughout all nature, varied stuff
For better nature's birth by means of art:
With me, each substance tended to one form
Of beauty — to the human archetype.
On every side occurred suggestive germs
Of that — the tree, the flower — or take the fruit, —

Some rosy shape, continuing the peach,
Curved beewise o'er its bough; as rosy limbs,
Depending, nestled in the leaves; and just
From a cleft rose-peach the whole Dryad sprang.
But of the stuffs one can be master of,
How I divined their capabilities!
From the soft-rinded smoothening facile chalk
That yields your outline to the air's embrace,
Half-softened by a halo's pearly gloom;
Down to the crisp imperious steel, so sure
To cut its one confided thought clean out Of all the world. But marble! — 'neath my tools

More pliable than jelly — as it were
Some clear primordial creature dug from depths
In the earth's heart, where itself breeds itself,
And whence all baser substance may be worked;
Refine it off to air, you may, — condense it
Down to the diamond; — is not metal there.
When o'er the sudden speck my chisel trips?
— Not flesh, as flake off flake I scale, approach,
Lay bare those bluish veins of blood asleep?
Larks flame in no strange windings where, surprised

By the swift implement sent home at once,
Flushes and glowings radiate and hover
About its track?

Phené? what — why is this?
That whitening cheek, those still dilating eyes!
Ah, you will die — I knew that you would die!

PHENÉ begins, on his having long remained silent.

Now the end's coming; to be sure, it must Have ended sometime! Tush, why need I speak
Their foolish speech? I cannot bring to mind
One half of it, beside; and do not care

For old Natalia now, nor any of them.

Oh, you — what are you? — if I do not try
To say the words Natalia made me learn,
To please your friends, — it is to keep myself
Where your voice lifted me, by letting that Proceed: but can it? Even you, perhaps,
Cannot take up, now you have once let fall,
The music's life, and me along with that —
No, or you would! We'll stay, then, as we are:
Above the world.

You creature with the eyes!
If I could look forever up to them,
As now you let me, — I believe, all sin,
All memory of wrong done, suffering borne,
Would drop down, low and lower, to the earth
Whence all that's low comes, and there touch and stay

— Never to overtake the rest of me,
All that, unspotted, reaches up to you,
Drawn by those eyes! What rises is myself,
Not me the shame and suffering; but they sink.
Are left, I rise above them. Keep me so,
Above the world!

But you sink, for your eyes
Are altering — altered! Stay — "I love you,
love" . . .

I could prevent it if I understood:
More of your words to me: was't in the tone
Or the words, your power?

Or stay — I will repeat
Their speech, if that contents you! Only change
No more, and I shall find it presently
Far back here, in the brain yourself filled up.
Natalia threatened me that harm should follow
Unless I spoke their lesson to the end,
But harm to me, I thought she meant, not you.
Your friends, — Natalia said they were your
friends

And meant you well, — because, I doubted it,
Observing (what was very strange to see)
On every face, so different in all else,
The same smile girls like me are used to bear,
But never men, men cannot stoop so low;
Yet your friends, speaking of you, used that smile,

That hateful smirk of boundless self-conceit
Which seems to take possession of the world
And make of God a tame confederate,
Purveyor to their appetites . . . you know!
But still Natalia said they were your friends,
And they assented though they smiled the more.
And all came round me, — that thin Englishman
With light lank hair seemed leader of the rest;
He held a paper — "What we want," said he,
Ending some explanation to his friends —
"Is something slow, involved and mystical,
To hold Jules long in doubt, yet take his taste
And lure him on until, at innermost
Where he seeks sweetness' soul, he may find
— this!

— As in the apple's core, the noisome fly:
For insects on the rind are seen at once,
And brushed aside as soon, but this is found
Only when on the lips or loathing tongue."
And so he read what I have got by heart:
I'll speak it, — "Do not die, love! I am
yours" . . .

No — is not that, or like that, part of words

Yourself began by speaking? Strange to lose What cost such pains to learn! Is this more right?

*I am a painter who cannot paint;
In my life, a devil rather than saint;
In my brain, as poor a creature too:
No end to all I cannot do!
Yet do one thing at least I can —
Love a man or hate a man
Supremely: thus my lore began.
Through the Valley of Love I went,
In the loveliest spot to abide,
And just on the verge where I pitched my tent,
I found Hate dwelling beside.
(Let the Bridegroom ask what the painter meant,
Of his Bride, of the peerless Bride!)
And further, I traversed Hate's grove,
In the hatefullest nook to dwell;
But lo, where I flung myself prone, couched Love
Where the shadow threefold fell.
(The meaning — those black bride's-eyes above,
Not a painter's lip should tell!)*

"And here," said he, "Jules probably will ask,
'You have black eyes, Love, — you are, sure
enough,
My peerless bride, — then do you tell indeed
What needs some explanation! What means
this?'"
— And I am to go on, without a word —

*So, I grew wise in Love and Hate,
From simple that I was of late.
Once, when I loved, I would enlase
Breast, eyelids, hands, feet, form and face
Of her I loved, in one embrace —
As if by mere love I could love immensely!
Once, when I hated, I would plunge
My sword, and wipe with the first lunge
My foe's whole life out like a sponge —
As if by mere hate I could hate intensely!
But now I am wiser, know better the fashion
How passion seeks aid from its opposite passion:*

*And if I see cause to love more, hate more Than ever man loved, ever hated before —
And seek in the Valley of Love
The nest, or the nook in Hate's Grove
Where my soul may surely reach
The essence, naught less, of each,
The Hate of all Hates, the Love
Of all Loves, in the Valley or Grove, —
I find them the very warders
Each of the other's borders.
When I love most, Love is disguised
In Hate; and when Hate is surprised
In Love, then I hate most: ask
How Love smiles through Hate's iron casque,
Hate grins through Love's rose-braided mask, —
And how, having hated thee,
I sought long and painfully
To reach thy heart, nor prick
The skin but pierce to the quick —
Ask this, my Jules, and be answered straight
By thy bride — how the painter Lutwyche can hate!*

JULES interposes.

Lutwyche! Who else? But all of them, no
doubt,
Hated me: they at Venice — presently
Their turn, however! You I shall not meet:
If I dreamed, saying this would wake me.

Keep
What's here, the gold — we cannot meet again,
Consider! and the money was but meant
For two years' travel, which is over now,
All chance or hope or care or need of it.
This — and what comes from selling these, my casts

And books and medals, except . . . let them go
Together, so the produce keeps you safe
Out of Natalia's clutches! If by chance
(For all's chance here) I should survive the gang
At Venice, root out all fifteen of them,
We might meet somewhere, since the world is wide.

[From without is heard the voice of PIPPA, singing —

*Give her but a least excuse to love me!
When — where —
How — can this arm establish her above me,
If fortune fixed her as my lady there,
There already, to eternally reprove me?
(“Hist!” — said Kate the Queen;
But “Oh!” cried the maiden, binding her tresses,
“‘Tis only a page that carols unseen,
Crumbling your hounds their messes!”)*

*Is she wronged? — To the rescue of her honor,
My heart!
Is she poor? — What costs it to be styled a donor?
Merely an earth to cleave, a sea to part.
But that fortune should have thrust all this upon
her!
(“Nay, list!” — bade Kate the Queen;
And still cried the maiden, binding her tresses.
“‘Tis only a page that carols unseen,
Fitting your hawks their jesses!”)*

[PIPPA passes.

JULES resumes.

What name was that the little girl sang forth?
Kate? The Cornaro, doubtless, who renounced
The crown of Cyprus to be lady here
At Asolo, where still her memory stays,
And peasants sing how once a certain page
Pined for the grace of her so far above
His power of doing good to, “Kate the Queen —
She never could be wronged, be poor,” he sighed,

“Need him to help her!”
Yes, a bitter thing
To see our lady above all need of us;
Yet so we look ere we will love; not I,
But the world looks so. If whoever loves
Must be, in some sort, god or worshipper,
The blessing or the blest one, queen or page,
Why should we always choose the page's part?
Here is a woman with utter need of me, —
I find myself queen here, it seems!

How strange!
Look at the woman here with the new soul.
Like my own Psyche, — fresh upon her lips

Alit, the visionary butterfly,
Waiting my word to enter and make bright,
Or flutter off and leave all blank as first.
This body had no soul before, but slept
Or stirred, was beauteous or ungainly, free
From taint or foul with stain, as outward
things

Fastened their image on its passiveness :
Now, it will wake, feel, live — or die again !
Shall to produce form out of unshaped stuff
Be Art — and further, to evoke a soul
From form be nothing ? This new soul is
mine !

Now, to kill Lutwyche, what would that do ? —
save

A wretched dauber, men will hoot to death
Without me, from their hooting. Oh, to hear
God's voice plain as I heard it first, before They broke in with their laughter ! I heard
them

Henceforth, not God.

To Ancona — Greece — some isle !
I wanted silence only ; there is clay
Everywhere. One may do what'er one likes
In Art : the only thing is, to make sure That one does like it — which takes pains to
know.

Scatter all this, my Phene — this mad dream !
Who, what is Lutwyche, what Natalia's friends,
What the whole world except our love — my
own,

Own Phene ? But I told you, did I not,
Ere night we travel for your land — some isle
With the sea's silence on it ? Stand aside —
I do but break these paltry models up
To begin Art afresh. Meet Lutwyche, I —
And save him from my statue meeting him ?
Some unsuspected isle in the far seas !
Like a god going through his world, there
stands

One mountain for a moment in the dusk,
Whole brotherhoods of cedars on its brow :
And you are ever by me while I gaze
— Are in my arms as now — as now — as now !
Some unsuspected isle in the far seas !
Some unsuspected isle in far-off seas !

Talk by the way, while PIPPA is passing from Orcana to the Turret. Two or three of the Austrian Police loitering with BLUPHOCKS, an English vagabond, just in view of the Turret.

Bluphocks.<sup>1</sup> So, that is your Pippa, the little girl who passed us singing ? Well, your Bishop's Intendant's money shall be honestly earned : — now, don't make me that sour face because I bring the Bishop's name into the business ; we know he can have nothing to do with such horrors : we know that he is a saint and all that a bishop should be, who is a great man beside. Oh were but every worm a maggot, Every fly a grig, Every bough a Christmas fagot, Every tune a jig ! In fact, I have abjured all religions ; but the last I inclined to was the Armenian : for I have travelled, do you see, and at Koenigsberg, Prussia Improper (so styled because there 's a sort of bleak hungry sun there), you might remark, over a venerable house-porch, a certain Chaldee inscription ; and brief as it is, a mere glance at it used absolutely to change the mood of every bearded passenger. In they turned, one and all ; the young and lightsome, with no irreverent pause, the aged and decrepit, with a sensible alacrity : 't was the Grand Rabbi's abode, in short. Struck with curiosity, I lost no time in learning Syriac — (these are vowels, you dogs, — follow my stick's end in the mud — Celarent, Darri, Ferio !) and one morning presented myself, spelling-book in hand, a, b, c, — I picked it out letter by letter, and what was the purport of this miraculous posy ? Some cherished legend of the past, you'll say — "How Moses hocus-pocussed Egypt's land with fly and locust," — or, "How to Jonah sounded harshish, Get thee up and go to Tarshish," — or "How the angel meeting Balaam, Straight his ass returned a salaam." In no wise ! "Shackabrack — Boach — somebody or other — Isaach, Re-cei-ver, Pur-cha-ser and Ex-chan-ger of — Stolen Goods !" So, talk to me of the religion of a bishop ! I have renounced all bishops save Bishop Beveridge ! — mean to live so — and die — As some Greek dog-sage, dead and merry, Hellward bound in Charon's wherry, With food for both worlds, under and upper, Lupine-seed and Hecate's supper, And never an obolus . . . (though thanks to you, or this Intendant through you, or this Bishop through his Intendant — I possess a burning pocket-full of zwan-zigers) . . . To pay the Stygian Ferry !

1st Policeman. There is the girl, then ; go and deserve them the moment you have pointed out to us Signor Luigi and his mother. [To the rest.] I have been noticing a house yonder, this long while : not a shutter unclosed since morning !

2d Pol. Old Luca Gaddi's, that owns the silk-mills here : he dozes by the hour, wakes up, sighs deeply, says he should like to be Prince Metternich, and then dozes again, after having bidden young Sebald, the foreigner, set his wife to playing draughts. Never molest such a household, they mean well.

Blup. Only, cannot you tell me something of this little Pippa, I must have to do with ? One could make something of that name. Pippa — that is, short for Felippa — rhyming to Pamurge consults Hertrippa — Believeest thou, King Agrippa ? Something might be done with that name.

2d Pol. Put into rhyme that your head and a ripe muskmelon would not be dear at half a zwanziger ! Leave this fooling, and look out ; the afternoon 's over or nearly so.

3d Pol. Where in this passport of Signor Luigi does our Principal instruct you to watch him so narrowly ? There ? What 's there beside a simple signature ? (That English fool 's busy watching.)

ink-spirit on righthand side (which is the case here) — "Arrest him at once." Why and wherefore, I don't concern myself, but my instructions amount to this: if Signor Luigi leaves home to-night for Vienna — well and good, the passport deposed with us for our visa is really for his own use, they have misinformed the Office, and he means well; but let him stay over to-night — there has been the pretence we suspect, the accounts of his corresponding and holding intelligence with the Carbonari are correct, we arrest him at once, to-morrow comes Venice, and presently Spielberg. Bluphocks makes the signal, sure enough! That is he, entering the turret with his mother, no doubt.

III. EVENING

Inside the Turret on the Hill above Asolo. LUIGI and his MOTHER entering.

Mother. If there blew wind, you'd hear a long sigh, easing

The utmost heaviness of music's heart.

Luigi. Here in the archway?

Mother. Oh no, no — in farther,

Where the echo is made, on the ridge.

Luigi. Here surely, then.

How plain the tap of my heel as I leaped up!

Hark — "Lucius Junius!" The very ghost of a voice

Whose body is caught and kept by . . . what are those?

Mere withered wallflowers, waving overhead?

They seem an elvish group with thin bleached hair

That lean out of their topmost fortress — look

And listen, mountain men, to what we say,

Hand under chin of each grave earthy face.

Up and show faces all of you! — "All of you!"

That's the king dwarf with the scarlet comb; old Franz,

Come down and meet your fate? Hark — "Meet your fate!"

Mother. Let him not meet it, my Luigi — do not Go to his City! Putting crime aside,

Half of these ills of Italy are feigned:

Your Pellicos and writers for effect,

Write for effect.

Luigi. Hush! Say A writes, and B.

Mother. These A's and B's write for effect, I say.

Then, evil is in its nature loud, while good

Is silent; you hear each petty injury,

None of his virtues; he is old beside,

Quiet and kind, and densely stupid. Why

Do A and B kill not him themselves?

Luigi. They teach

Others to kill him — me — and, if I fail,

Others to succeed; now, if A tried and failed,

I could not teach that: mine's the lesser task.

Mother. They visit night by night . . .

Mother. — You, Luigi?

Ah, will you let me tell you what you are?

Luigi. Why not? Oh, the one thing you fear to hint,

You may assure yourself I say and say

Ever to myself! At times — nay, even as now

We sit — I think my mind is touched, suspect All is not sound: but is not knowing that, What constitutes one sane or otherwise? I know I am thus — so, all is right again. I laugh at myself as through the town I walk, And see men merry as if no Italy Were suffering; then I ponder — "I am rich, Young, healthy; why should this fact trouble me, More than it troubles these?" But it does trouble.

No, trouble's a bad word: for as I walk There's springing and melody and giddiness, And old quaint turns and passages of my youth, Dreams long forgotten, little in themselves, Return to me — whatever may amuse me: And earth seems in a truce with me, and heaven Accords with me, all things suspend their strife, The very cicala laughs "There goes he, and there!"

Feast him, the time is short; he is on his way For the world's sake: feast him this once, our friend!"

And in return for all this, I can trip Cheerfully up the scaffold-steps. I go This evening, mother!

Mother. But mistrust yourself — Mistrust the judgment you pronounce on him!

Luigi. Oh, there I feel — am sure that I am right!

Mother. Mistrust your judgment then, of the mere means

To this wild enterprise: say, you are right, — How should one in your state e'er bring to pass What would require a cool head, a cool heart, And a calm hand? You never will escape.

Luigi. Escape? To even wish that, would spoil all.

The dying is best part of it. Too much Have I enjoyed these fifteen years of mine,

To leave myself excuse for longer life:

Was not life pressed down, running o'er with joy,

That I might finish with it ere my fellows Who, sparerlier feasted, make a longer stay?

I was put at the board-head, helped to all

At first; I rise up happy and content.

God must be glad one loves his world so much.

I can give news of earth to all the dead

Who ask me: — last year's sunsets, and great stars

Which had a right to come first and see ebb The crimson wave that drifts the sun away — Those crescent moons with notched and burning rims

That strengthened into sharp fire, and there stood,

Impatient of the azure — and that day

In March, a double rainbow stopped the storm — May's warm slow yellow moonlit summer nights —

Gone are they, but I have them in my soul!

Mother. (He will not go!)

Luigi. You smile at me? 'Tis true, —

Voluptuousness, grotesqueness, ghastliness,

Environ my devotedness as quaintly

As round about some antique altar wreath

The rose festoons, goats' horns, and oxen's skulls.

Mother. See now : you reach the city, you must cross

His threshold — how ?

Luigi. Oh, that 's if we conspired !

Then would come pains in plenty, as you guess —

But guess not how the qualities most fit

For such an office, qualities I have,

Would little stead me, otherwise employed,

Yet prove of rarest merit only here.

Every one knows for what his excellence

Will serve, but no one ever will consider

For what his worst defect might serve : and yet

Have you not seen me range our coppice yonder

In search of a distorted ash ? — I find

The wry spoil branch a natural perfect bow.

Fancy the thrice-sage, thrice-precautioned man

Arriving at the palace on my errand !

No, no ! I have a handsome dress packed up —

White satin here, to set off my black hair ;

In I shall march — for you may watch your life

out

Behind thick walls, make friends there to betray you ;

More than one man spoils everything. March

straight —

Only, no clumsy knife to fumble for,

Take the great gate, and walk (not saunter) on

Through guards and guards — I have rehearsed it all

Inside the turret here a hundred times.

Don't ask the way of whom you meet, observe !

But where they cluster thickest is the door

Of doors ; they 'll let you pass — they 'll never

blab

Each to the other, he knows not the favorite,

Whence he is bound and what 's his business

now.

Walk in — straight up to him ; you have no

knife :

Be prompt, how should he scream ? Then, out with you !

Italy, Italy, my Italy !

You 're free, you 're free ! Oh mother, I could

dream

They got about me — Andrea from his exile,

Pier from his dungeon, Gualtier from his grave !

Mother. Well, you shall go. Yet seems this patriotism

The easiest virtue for a selfish man

To acquire : he loves himself — and next, the

world —

If he must love beyond, — but naught between :

As a short-sighted man sees naught midway

His body and the sun above. But you

Are my adored Luigi, ever obedient

To my least wish, and running o'er with love :

I could not call you cruel or unkind.

Once more, your ground for killing him ! — then

go !

Luigi. Now do you try me, or make sport of

me ?

How first the Austrians got these provinces . . .

(If that is all, I 'll satisfy you soon)

— Never by conquest but by cunning, for

That treaty whereby . . .

Mother. Well ?

Luigi. (Sure, he 's arrived,
The tell-tale cuckoo : spring 's his confidant,

And he lets out her April purposes !)

Or . . . better go at once to modern time.

He has . . . they have . . . in fact, I understand

But can't restate the matter ; that 's my boast :

Others could reason it out to you, and prove

Things they have made me feel.

Mother. Why go to-night ?

Morn 's for adventure. Jupiter is now

A morning-star. I cannot hear you, Luigi !

Luigi. " I am the bright and morning-star," saith God —

And, " to such an one I give the morning-star."

The gift of the morning-star ! Have I God's gift

Of the morning-star ?

Mother. Chiara will love to see

That Jupiter an evening-star next June.

Luigi. True, mother. Well for those who live through June !

Great noontides, thunder-storms, all glaring pumps

That triumph at the heels of June the god

Leading his revel through our leafy world.

Yes, Chiara will be here.

Mother. In June : remember,
Yourself appointed that month for her coming.

Luigi. Was that low noise the echo ?

Mother. The night-wind.
She must be grown — with her blue eyes up-

turned

As if life were one long and sweet surprise :

In June she comes.

Luigi. We were to see together

The Titian at Treviso. There, again !

[From without is heard the voice of PIPPA, singing —

A king lived long ago,

In the morning of the world,

When earth was nigher heaven than now ;

And the king's locks curled,

Disparting o'er a forehead full

As the milk-white space 'twixt horn and horn

Of some sacrificial bull —

Only calm as a babe new-born :

For he was got to a sleepy mood,

So safe from all decrepitude,

Age with its bane, so sure gone by,

(The gods so loved him while he dreamed)

That, having lived thus long, there seemed

No need the king should ever die.

Luigi. No need that sort of king should ever die !

Among the rocks his city was :

Before his palace, in the sun,

He sat to see his people pass,

And judge them every one

From its threshold of smooth stone,

They haled him many a valley-thief

Caught in the sheep-pens, robber-chief

Swarthy and shameless, beggar-cheat,

Spy-prowler, or rough pirate found

On the sea-sand left aground ;

And sometimes clung about his feet,

With bleeding lip and burning cheek,

A woman, bitterest wrong to speak

Of one with sullen thickset brows :

And sometimes from the prison-house

*The angry priests a pule wretch brought,
Who through some chink had pushed and pressed
On knees and elbows, belly and breast,
Worm-like into the temple, — caught
He was by the very god,
Who ever in the darkness strode
Backward and forward, keeping watch
O'er his brazen bowls, such rogues to catch !
These, all and every one,
The king judged, sitting in the sun.*

Luigi. That king should still judge sitting in the sun !

*His councillors, on left and right,
Looked anxious up, — but no surprise
Disturbed the king's old smiling eyes
Where the very blue had turned to white.
'T is said, a Python scared one day
The breathless city, till he came,
With forked tongue and eyes on flame,
Where the old king sat to judge away ;
But when he saw the sweepy hair
Girt with a crown of berries rare
Which the god will hardly give to wear
To the maiden who singeth, dancing bare
In the altar-smoke by the pine-torch lights,
At his wondrous forest rites, —
Seeing this, he did not dare
Approach that threshold in the sun,
Assault the old king smiling there.
Such grace had kings when the world begun !*

[PIPPA passes.]

Luigi. And such grace have they, now that the world ends !

The Python at the city, on the throne,
And brave men, God would crown for slaying him,
Lurk in by-corners lest they fall his prey.
Are crowns yet to be won in this late time,
Which weakness makes me hesitate to reach ?
'T is God's voice calls : how could I stay ?
Farewell !

Talk by the way, while PIPPA is passing from the Turret to the Bishop's Brother's House, close to the Duomo S. Maria. Poor GIRLS sitting on the steps.

1st Girl. There goes a swallow to Venice — the stout seafarer !

Seeing those birds fly, makes one wish for wings.
Let us all wish ; you, wish first !

2d Girl. I ? This sunset To finish.

3d Girl. That old — somebody I know,
Grayer and older than my grandfather,
To give me the same treat he gave last week —
Feeding me on his knee with fig-peckers,
Lampreys and red Breganze-wine, and mumbling

The while some folly about how well I fare,
Let sit and eat my supper quietly :
Since had he not himself been late this morning
Detained at — never mind where, — had he not . . .

" Eh, baggage, had I not ! " —

2d Girl. How she can lie !

3d Girl. Look there — by the nails !

2d Girl. What makes your fingers red ?

3d Girl. Dipping them into wine to write bad words with

On the bright table : how he laughed !

1st Girl. My turn. Spring 's come and summer 's coming. I would wear

A long loose gown, down to the feet and hands,
With plaits here, close about the throat, all day ;
And all night lie, the cool long nights, in bed ;
And have new milk to drink, apples to eat,
Deuzans and junetings, leather-coats . . . ah, I should say,

This is away in the fields — miles !

3d Girl. Say at once

You 'd be at home : she 'd always be at home !

Now comes the story of the farm among
The cherry orchards, and how April snowed
White blossoms on her as she ran. Why, fool
They 've rubbed the chalk-mark out, how tall you were,

Twisted your starling's neck, broken his cage,
Made a dung-hill of your garden !

1st Girl. They destroy

My garden since I left them ? well — perhaps
I would have done so : so I hope they have !

A fig-tree curled out of our cottage wall ;
They called it mine, I have forgotten why,
It must have been there long ere I was born :

Cric — cric — I think I hear the wasps o'er-head

Pricking the papers strung to flutter there
And keep off birds in fruit-time — coarse long papers,

And the wasps eat them, prick them through and through.

3d Girl. How her mouth twitches ! Where was I ? — before

She broke in with her wishes and long gowns
And wasps — would I be such a fool ! — Oh, here !

This is my way : I answer every one
Who asks me why I make so much of him —
(If you say, " you love him " — straight " he 'll not be gulled ! ")

" He that seduced me when I was a girl
Thus high — had eyes like yours, or hair like yours,

Brown, red, white, " — as the case may be : that pleases !

See how that beetle burnishes in the path !
There sparkles he along the dust : and, there —
Your journey to that maize-tuft spoiled at least !

1st Girl. When I was young, they said if you killed one

Of those sunshiny beetles, that his friend
Up there, would shine no more that day nor next.

2d Girl. When you were young ? Nor are you young, that 's true.

How your plump arms, that were, have dropped away !

Why, I can span them. Cecco beats you still ?
No matter, so you keep your curious hair.
I wish they 'd find a way to dye our hair
Your color — any lighter tint, indeed,
Than black : the men say they are sick of black,
Black eyes, black hair !

4th Girl. Sick of yours, like enough.

Do you pretend you ever tasted lampreys
And ortolans ? Giovita, of the palace,

Engaged (but there's no trusting him) to slice me

Polenta with a knife that had cut up An ortolan.

2d Girl. Why, there! Is not that Pippa We are to talk to, under the window, — quick! —

Where the lights are?

1st Girl. That she? No, or she would sing, For the Intendant said . . .

3d Girl. Oh, you sing first! Then, if she listens and comes close . . . I'll tell you, —

Sing that song the young English noble made, Who took you for the purest of the pure, And meant to leave the world for you — what fun!

2d Girl. [Sings.]

You'll love me yet! — and I can tarry

Your love's protracted growing:

June reared that bunch of flowers you carry,
From seeds of April's sowing.

I plant a heartfull now: some seed

At least is sure to strike,

And yield — what you'll not pluck indeed,
Not love, but, may be, like.

You'll look at least on love's remains,

A grave's one violet:

Your look? — that pays a thousand pains.

What's its death? You'll love me yet!

3d Girl. [To PIPPA who approaches.] Oh, you may come closer — we shall not eat you! Why, you seem the very person that the great rich handsome Englishman has fallen so violently in love with. I'll tell you all about it.

IV. NIGHT

Inside the Palace by the Duomo. MONSIGNOR, dismissing his Attendants.

Monsignor. Thanks, friends, many thanks! I chiefly desire life now, that I may recompense every one of you. Most I know something of already. What, a repast prepared? Benedicto benedicatur . . . ugh, ugh! Where was I? Oh, as you were remarking, Ugo, the weather is mild, very unlike winter-weather: but I am a Sicilian, you know, and shiver in your Julys here. To be sure, when 't was full summer at Messina, as we priests used to cross in procession the great square on Assumption Day, you might see our thickest yellow tapers twist suddenly in two, each like a falling star, or sink down on themselves in a pore of wax. But go, my friends, but go! [To the Intendant.] Not you, Ugo! [The others leave the apartment.] I have long wanted to converse with you, Ugo.

Intendant. Uguccio —

Mon. . . . 'guccio Stefani, man! of Aseoli, Fermo and Fossombruno; — what I do need instructing about, are these accounts of your administration of my poor brother's affairs. Ugh! I shall never get through a third part of your accounts; take some of these dainties before we attempt it, however. Are you bashful to that degree? For me, a crust and water suffice.

Inten. Do you choose this especial night to question me?

Mon. This night, Ugo. You have managed my late brother's affairs since the death of our elder brother: fourteen years and a month, all but three days. On the Third of December, I find him . . .

Inten. If you have so intimate an acquaintance with your brother's affairs, you will be tender of turning so far back: they will hardly bear looking into, so far back.

Mon. Ay, ay, ugh, ugh, — nothing but disappointments here below! I remark a considerable payment made to yourself on this Third of December. Talk of disappointments! There was a young fellow here, Jules, a foreign sculptor I did my utmost to advance, that the Church might be a gainer by us both: he was going on hopefully enough, and of a sudden he notifies to me some marvellous change that has happened in his notions of Art. Here's his letter, — "He never had a clearly conceived Ideal within his brain till to-day. Yet since his hand could manage a chisel, he has practised expressing other men's Ideals; and, in the very perfection he has attained to, he foresees an ultimate failure: his unconscious hand will pursue its prescribed course of old years, and will reproduce with a fatal expertness the ancient types, let the novel one appear never so palpably to his spirit. There is but one method of escape: confiding the virgin type to as chaste a hand, he will turn painter instead of sculptor, and paint, not carve, its characteristics," — strike out, I dare say, a school like Correggio: how think you, Ugo?

Inten. Is Correggio a painter?

Mon. Foolish Jules! and yet, after all, why foolish? He may — probably will — fail egregiously; but if there should arise a new painter, will it not be in some such way, by a poet now, or a musician (spirits who have conceived and perfected an Ideal through some other channel), transferring it to this, and escaping our conventional roads by pure ignorance of them; eh, Ugo? If you have no appetite, talk at least, Ugo!

Inten. Sir, I can submit no longer to this course of yours. First, you select the group of which I formed one, — next you thin it gradually, — always retaining me with your smile, — and so do you proceed till you have fairly got me alone with you between four stone walls. And now then? Let this farce, this chatter end now: what is it you want with me?

Mon. Ugo!

Inten. From the instant you arrived, I felt your smile on me as you questioned me about this and the other article in those papers — why your brother should have given me this villa, that podere, — and your nod at the end meant, — what?

Mon. Possibly that I wished for no loud talk here. If once you set me coughing, Ugo! —

Inten. I have your brother's hand and seal to all I possess: now ask me what for! what service I did him — ask me!

Mon. I would better not: I should rip up old disgraces, let out my poor brother's weaknesses. By the way, Maffeo of Forli, (which, I forgot to observe, is your true name,) was the interdict ever taken off you for robbing that church at Cesena?

Inten. No, nor needs be: for when I murdered your brother's friend, Pasquale, for him . . .

Mon. Ah, he employed you in that business, did he? Well, I must let you keep, as you say, this villa and that podere, for fear the world should find out my relations were of so indifferent a stamp? Maffeo, my family is the oldest in Messina, and century after century have my progenitors gone on polluting themselves with every wickedness under heaven: my own father . . . rest his soul!—I have, I know, a chapel to support that it may rest: my dear two dead brothers were,—what you know tolerably well; I, the youngest, might have rivalled them in vice, if not in wealth: but from my boyhood I came out from among them, and so am not partaker of their plagues. My glory springs from another source; or if from this, by contrast only,—for I, the bishop, am the brother of your employers, Ugo. I hope to repair some of their wrong, however; so far as my brother's ill-gotten treasure reverts to me, I can stop the consequences of his crime: and not one soldo shall escape me. Maffeo, the sword we quiet men spurn away, you shrewd knaves pick up and commit murders with; what opportunities the virtuous forego, the villanous seize. Because, to pleasure myself apart from other considerations, my food would be millet-cake, my dress sackcloth, and my couch straw,—am I therefore to let you, the off-scouring of the earth, seduce the poor and ignorant by appropriating a pomp these will be sure to think lessens the abominations so unaccountably and exclusively associated with it? Must I let villas and poderi go to you, a murderer and thief, that you may beget by means of them other murderers and thieves? No—if my cough would but allow me to speak!

Inten. What am I to expect? You are going to punish me?

Mon. Must punish you, Maffeo. I cannot afford to cast away a chance. I have whole centuries of sin to redeem, and only a month or two of life to do it in. How should I dare to say . . .

Inten. "Forgive us our trespasses"?

Mon. My friend, it is because I avow myself a very worm, sinful beyond measure, that I reject a line of conduct you would applaud perhaps. Shall I proceed, as it were, a-pardoning?—I?—who have no symptom of reason to assume that aught less than my strenuous efforts will keep myself out of mortal sin, much less keep others out. No: I do trespass, but will not double that by allowing you to trespass.

Inten. And suppose the villas are not your brother's to give, nor yours to take? Oh, you are hasty enough just now!

Mon. 1, 2—No 3!—ay, can you read the substance of a letter, No 3, I have received from Rome? It is precisely on the ground there mentioned, of the suspicion I have that a certain child of my late elder brother, who would have succeeded to his estates, was murdered in infancy by you, Maffeo, at the instigation of my late younger brother—that the Pontiff enjoins on me not merely the bringing that Maffeo to condign punishment, but the taking all pains, as guardian of the infant's heritage for the Church, to recover it parcel by parcel, howsoever, whensoever, and wheresoever. While you are now gnawing those fingers, the police are engaged in sealing up your papers, Maffeo, and the mere raising my voice brings my people from the next room to dispose of yourself. But I want you to confess quietly, and save me raising my voice. Why, man, do I not know the old story? The heir between the succeeding heir, and this heir's ruffianly instrument, and their complot's effect, and the life of fear and bribes and ominous smiling silence? Did you throttle or stab my brother's infant? Come now!

Inten. So old a story, and tell it no better? When did such an instrument ever produce such an effect? Either the child smiles in his face; or, most likely, he is not fool enough to put himself in the employer's power so thoroughly: the child is always ready to produce—as you say—howsoever, wheresoever, and whensoever.

Mon. Liar!

Inten. Strike me? Ah, so might a father chastise! I shall sleep soundly to-night at least, though the gallows await me to-morrow; for what a life did I lead! Carlo of Cesena reminds me of his connivance, every time I pay his annuity; which happens commonly thrice a year. If I remonstrate, he will confess all to the good bishop—you!

Mon. I see through the trick, caittiff! I would you spoke truth for once. All shall be sifted, however—seven times sifted.

Inten. And how my absurd riches encumbered me! I dared not lay claim to above half my possessions. Let me but once unbosom myself, glorify Heaven, and die!

Sir, you are no brutal dastardly idiot like your brother I frightened to death: let us understand one another. Sir, I will make away with her for you—the girl—here close at hand; not the stupid obvious kind of killing; do not speak—know nothing of her nor of me! I see her every day—saw her this morning: of course there is to be no killing; but at Rome the courtesans perish off every three years, and I can entice her thither—have indeed begun operations already. There's a certain lusty blue-eyed florid-complexioned English knave, I and the Police employ occasionally. You assent, I perceive—no, that's not it—assent I do not say—but you will let me convert my present havings and holdings into cash, and give me time to cross the Alps? 'Tis but a little black-eyed pretty singing Felippa, gay silk-winding girl. I have kept her out of harm's way up to this present; for I always intended to make your life a plague to you with her. 'Tis as well settled once and forever. Some women I have procured will pass Bluphocks, my handsome scoundrel, off for somebody; and once Pippa entangled!—you conceive? Through her singing? Is it a bargain?

[From without is heard the voice of PIPPA, singing —

*Overhead the tree-tops meet,
Flowers and grass spring 'neath one's feet;
There was naught above me, naught below,
My childhood had not learned to know:
For, what are the voices of birds
— Ay, and of beasts, — but words, our words,
Only so much more sweet?
The knowledge of that with my life begun.
But I had so near made out the sun,
And counted your stars, the seven and one,
Like the fingers of my hand:
Nay, I could all but understand
Wherefore through heaven the white moon ranges;
And just when out of her soft fifty changes
No unfamiliar face might overlook me —
Suddenly God took me.*

[PIPPA passes.

Mon. [Springing up.] My people — one and all — all — within there! Gag this villain — tie him hand and foot! He dares . . . I know not half he dares — but remove him — quick! Miserere mei, Domine! Quick, I say!

PIPPA'S Chamber again. She enters it.

The bee with his comb,
The mouse at her dray,
The grub in his tomb,
While winter away;
But the fire-fly and hedge-shrew and lob-worm,
I pray,

How fare they?
Ha, ha, thanks for your counsel, my Zanze!
"Feast upon lampreys, quaff Breganze" —
The summer of life so easy to spend,
And care for to-morrow so soon put away!
But winter hastens at summer's end,
And fire-fly, hedge-shrew, lob-worm, pray,
How fare they?

No bidding me then to . . . what did Zanze say?
"Pare your nails pearlwise, get your small feet shoes

More like" . . . (what said she?) — "and less like canoes!"

How pert that girl was! — would I be those pert impudent staring women! It had done me, However, surely no such mighty hurt To learn his name who passed that jest upon me:

No foreigner, that I can recollect,
Came, as she says, a month since, to inspect
Our silk-mills — none with blue eyes and thick rings

Of raw-silk-colored hair, at all events.
Well, if old Luca keep his good intents,
We shall do better, see what next year brings!
I may buy shoes, my Zanze, not appear
More destitute than you perhaps next year!
Bluph . . . something! I had caught the uncouth name

But for Monsignor's people's sudden clatter
Above us — bound to spoil such idle chatter
As ours: it were indeed a serious matter
If silly talk like ours should put to shame
The pious man, the man devoid of blame,
The . . . ah but — ah but, all the same,
No mere mortal has a right
To carry that exalted air;
Best people are not angels quite:
While — not the worst of people's doings scare
The devil; so there 's that proud look to spare!

Which is mere counsel to myself, mind! for
I have just been the holy Monsignor:
And I was you too, Luigi's gentle mother,
And you too, Luigi! — how that Luigi started
Out of the turret — doubtlessly departed
On some good errand or another,
For he passed just now in a traveller's trim,
And the sullen company that prowled
About his path, I noticed, scowled
As if they had lost a prey in him.
And I was Jules the sculptor's bride,
And I was Ottima beside,
And now what am I? — tired of fooling.
Day for folly, night for schooling!
New year's day is over and spent,
Ill or well, I must be content.

Even my lily's asleep, I vow:
Wake up — here's a friend I've plucked you!
Call this flower a heart's-ease now!
Something rare, let me instruct you,
Is this, with petals triply swollen,
Three times spotted, thrice the pollen;
While the leaves and parts that witness
Old proportions and their fitness,
Here remain unchanged, unmoved now;
Call this pampered thing improved now!
Suppose there's a king of the flowers
And a girl-show held in his bowers —
"Look ye, buds, this growth of ours,"
Says he, "Zanze from the Brenta,
I have made her gorge polenta
Till both cheeks are near as bouncing
As her . . . name there's no pronouncing!
See this heightened color too,
For she swilled Breganze wine
Till her nose turned deep carmine;
'T was but white when wild she grew.
And only by this Zanze's eyes
Of which we could not achieve the size,
The magnitude of all achieved
Otherwise, may be perceived."

Oh what a drear dark close to my poor day!
How could that red sun drop in that black cloud?

Ah Pippa, morning's rule is moved away,
Dispensed with, never more to be allowed!
Day's turn is over, now arrives the night's.
Oh lark, be day's apostle
To mavis, merle and thrustle,
Bid them their betters jostle
From day and its delights!
But at night, brother owlet, over the woods,
Toll the world to thy chantry;
Sing to the bats' sleek sisterhoods
Full complines with gallantry:
Then, owls and bats,

Cows and twats,
Monks and nuns, in a cloister's moods,
Adjourn to the oak-stump pantry!

[After she has begun to undress herself.]

Now, one thing I should like to really know:
How near I ever might approach all these
I only fancied being, this long day:
— Approach, I mean, so as to touch them, so As to . . . in some way . . . move them — if you please,

Do good or evil to them some slight way.

For instance, if I wind

Silk to-morrow, my silk may bind

[Sitting on the bedside.]

And border Ottima's cloak's hem.

Ah me, and my important part with them.

This morning's hymn half promised when I rose!

True in some sense or other, I suppose.

[As she lies down.]

God bless me! I can pray no more to-night.

No doubt, some way or other, hymns say
right.

All service ranks the same with God —

With God, whose puppets, best and worst,

Are we; there is no last nor first.

[She sleeps.]

KING VICTOR AND KING CHARLES

A TRAGEDY

THIS was No. II. of Bells and Pomegranates and was issued in 1842, though it appears to have been written before the publication of Pippa Passes. The following is the advertisement prefixed to the tragedy when first published and always afterward retained.

"So far as I know, this tragedy is the first artistic consequence of what Voltaire termed 'a terrible event without consequences;' and although it professes to be historical, I have taken more pains to arrive at the history than most readers would thank me for particularizing: since acquainted, as I will hope them to be, with the chief circumstances of Victor's remarkable European career — nor quite ignorant of the sad and surprising facts I am about to reproduce (a tolerable account of which is to be found, for instance, in Abbe Roman's Récit, or even the fifth of Lord Orrery's Letters from Italy) — I cannot expect them to be versed, nor desirous of becoming so, in all the detail of the memoirs, correspondence, and relations of the time. From these only may be obtained a knowledge of the fiery and audacious temper, unscrupulous selfishness, profound dissimulation, and singular fertility in resources, of Victor — the extreme and painful sensibility, prolonged immaturity of powers, earnest good purpose and vacillating will of Charles — the noble and right woman's manliness of his wife — and the ill-considered rascality and subsequent better-advised rectitude of D'Ormea. When I say, therefore, that I cannot but believe my statement (combining as it does what appears correct in Voltaire and plausible in Condorcet) more true to person and thing than any it has hitherto been my fortune to meet with, no doubt my word will be taken, and my evidence spared as readily.

LONDON, 1842.

PERSONS

VICTOR AMADEUS, first King of Sardinia.

CHARLES EMANUEL, his son, Prince of Piedmont.

POLYXENA, wife of Charles.

D'ORMEA, minister.

FIRST YEAR, 1730. — KING VICTOR

PART I

SCENE. — The Council Chamber of Rivoli Palace, near Turin, communicating with a Hall at the back, an Apartment to the left, and another to the right of the stage.

TIME, 1730-31.

CHARLES, POLYXENA.

Charles. You think so? Well, I do not.

Polyxena.

My beloved,

All must clear up; we shall be happy yet:

This cannot last forever — oh, may change

To-day or any day!

Cha.

— May change? Ah yes —

May change!

Pol.

Endure it, then.

Cha.

No doubt a life
Like this drags on, now better and now worse.

My father may . . . may take to loving me;

And he may take D'Ormea closer yet

To counsel him; — may even cast off her

— That bad Sebastian; but he also may

. . . Or no, Polyxena, my only friend,

He may not force you from me?

Pol.

Now, force me

From you!—me, close by you as if there gloomed

No Sebastians, no D'Ormeas on our path —
At Rivoli or Turin, still at hand,
Arch-counsellor, prime confidant . . . force me!

Cha. Because I felt as sure, as I feel sure
We clasp hands now, of being happy once.
Young was I, quite neglected, nor concerned
By the world's business that engrossed so much
My father and my brother: if I peered
From out my privacy, — amid the crash
And blaze of nations, domineered those two.
'T was war, peace — France our foe, now —
England, friend —

In love with Spain — at feud with Austria!
Well —

I wondered, laughed a moment's laugh for pride
In the chivalrous couple, then let drop
My curtain — "I am out of it," I said —
When . . .

Pol. You have told me, Charles.

Cha. Polyxena —
When suddenly, — a warm March day, just that!

Just so much sunshine as the cottage child
Basks in delighted, while the cottager
Takes off his bonnet, as he ceases work,
To catch the more of it — and it must fall
Heavily on my brother! Had you seen
Philip — the lion-featured! not like me!

Pol. I know —

Cha. And Philip's mouth yet fast to mine,
His dead cheek on my cheek, his arm still round

My neck, — they bade me rise, "for I was heir
To the Duke," they said, "the right hand of the Duke."

Till then he was my father, not the Duke.
So . . . let me finish . . . the whole intricate World's-business their dead boy was born to, I Must conquer, — ay, the brilliant thing he was
I of a sudden must be: my faults, my follies,
— All bitter truths were told me, all at once,
To end the sooner. What I simply styled
Their overlooking me, had been contempt:
How should the Duke employ himself, forsooth,
With such an one, while lordly Philip rode By him their Turin through? But he was punished,
And must put up with — me! 'T was sad
enough

To learn my future portion and submit.
And then the wear and worry, blame on blame!
For, spring-sounds in my ears, spring-smells
about.

How could I but grow dizzy in their pent
Dim palace-rooms at first? My mother's look
As they discussed my insignificance,
She and my father, and I sitting by, —
I bore; I knew how brave a son they missed;
Philip had gayly run state-papers through,
While Charles was spelling at them painfully!
But Victor was my father spite of that.
"Duke Victor's entire life has been," I said,
"Innumerable efforts to one end;
And on the point now of that end's success,
Our Ducal turning to a Kingly crown,

Where's time to be reminded 't is his child
He spurns?" And so I suffered — scarcely suffered,
Since I had you at length!

Pol. To serve in place
Of monarch, minister and mistress, Charles!

Cha. But, once that crown obtained, then was 't not like

Our lot would alter? "When he rests, takes
breath,

Glances around, sees who there's left to love —
Now that my mother's dead, sees I am left —
Is it not like he'll love me at the last?"

Well, Savoy turns Sardinia; the Duke's King:
Could I — precisely then — could you expect
His harshness to redouble? These few months
Have been . . . have been . . . Polyxena, do you
And God conduct me, or I lose myself!
What would he have? What is 't they want with me?

Him with this mistress and this minister,
— You see me and you hear him; judge us
both!

Pronounce what I should do, Polyxena!

Pol. Endure, endure, beloved! Say you
not

He is your father? All's so incident
To novel sway! Beside, our life must change:
Or you'll acquire his kingcraft, or he'll find
Harshness a sorry way of teaching it.
I bear this — not that there's so much to bear.

Cha. You bear? Do not I know that you, though bound

To silence for my sake, are perishing
Piecemeal beside me? And how otherwise
When every creephole from the hideous Court
Is stopped; the Minister to dog me, here —
The Mistress posted to entrap you, there!
And thus shall we grow old in such a life;
Not careless, never estranged, — but old: to alter

Our life, there is so much to alter!

Pol. Come —

Is it agreed that we forego complaint
Even at Turin, yet complain we here
At Rivoli? 'T were wiser you announced
Our presence to the King. What's now afoot
I wonder? Not that any more 's to dread
Than every day's embarrassment: but guess
For me, why train so fast succeeded train
On the high-road, each gayer still than each!
I noticed your Archbishop's pursuivant,
The sable cloak and silver cross; such pomp Bodes . . . what now, Charles? Can you conceive?

Cha. Not I.

Pol. A matter of some moment —

Cha. There's our life!

Which of the group of loiterers that stare
From the lime-avenue, divines that I —
About to figure presently, he thinks,
In face of all assembled — am the one
Who knows precisely least about it?

Pol. Tush!

D'Ormea's contrivance!

Cha. Ay, how otherwise Should the young Prince serve for the old King's foil?

— So that the simplest courtier may remark
 'T were idle raising parties for a Prince
 Content to linger the court's laughing-stock.
 Something, 't is like, about that weary business
[Pointing to papers he has laid down, and which POLYXENA examines.

— Not that I comprehend three words, of course,
 After last night's study.

Pol. The faint heart!
 Why, as we rode and you rehearsed just now
 Its substance . . . (that's the folded speech I mean,

Concerning the Reduction of the Fiefs)
 — What would you have? — I fancied while you spoke,

Some tones were just your father's.

Cha. Flattery!
Pol. I fancied so: — and here lurks, sure
 enough,

My note upon the Spanish Claims! You've mastered

The fief-speech thoroughly: this other, mind,
 Is an opinion you deliver, — stay,
 Best read it slowly over once to me;

Read — there's bare time; you read it firmly — loud

— Rather loud, looking in his face, — don't sink
 Your eye once — ay, thus! "If Spain claims"
 . . . begin

— Just as you look at me!

Cha. At you! Oh truly,
 You have I seen, say, marshalling your troops,
 Dismissing councils, or, through doors ajar,
 Head sunk on hand, devoured by slow chagrins
 — Then radiant, for a crown had all at once Seemed possible again! I can behold
 Him, whose least whisper ties my spirit fast,
 In this sweet brow, naught could divert me from Save objects like Sebastian's shameless lip,
 Or worse, the clipped gray hair and dead white
 face

And dwindling eye as if it ached with guile,
D'Ormea wears . . .
(As he kisses her, enter from the King's apartment D'ORMEA.)

I said he would divert

My kisses from your brow!

D'Ormea. [Aside.] Here! So, King Victor Spoke truth for once: and who's ordained,
 but I

To make that memorable? Both in call,
 As he declared! Were 't better gnash the teeth,
 Or laugh outright now?

Cha. [to POL.] What's his visit for?
D'O. [Aside.] I question if they even speak to me,

Pol. [to CHA.] Face the man! He'll suppose you fear him else.

[Aloud.] The Marquis bears the King's command, no doubt?

D'O. [Aside.] Precisely! — If I threatened him, perhaps?

Well, this at least is punishment enough!

Men used to promise punishment would come.

Cha. Deliver the King's message, Marquis!

D'O. [Aside.] Ah —
 So anxious for his fate? [Aloud.] A word,
 my Prince,

Before you see your father — just one word
 Of counsel!

Cha. Oh, your counsel certainly!

Polyxena, the Marquis counsels us!

Well, sir? Be brief, however!

D'O. What? You know
 As much as I? — preceded me, most like,
 In knowledge! So! ('T is in his eye, beside —
 His voice: he knows it, and his heart's on flame Already!) You surmise why you, myself,
 Del Borgo, Spava, fifty nobles more,
 Are summoned thus?

Cha. Is the Prince used to know,
 At any time, the pleasure of the King,
 Before his minister? — Polyxena,
 Stay here till I conclude my task: I feel
 Your presence (smile not) through the walls, and take

Fresh heart. The King's within that chamber?

D'O. [Passing the table whereon a paper lies,
exclaims, as he glances at it] "Spain!"

Pol. [Aside to CHA.] Tarry awhile: what ails the minister?

D'O. Madam, I do not often trouble you.
 The Prince loathes, and you scorn me — let that pass!

But since it touches him and you, not me,
 Bid the Prince listen!

Pol. [to CHA.] Surely you will listen:
 — Deceit? — Those fingers crumpling up his vest?

Cha. Deceitful to the very fingers' ends!
D'O. [who has approached them, overlooks the other paper CHARLES continues to hold].

My project for the Fiefs! As I supposed!
 Sir, I must give you light upon those measures
 — For this is mine, and that I spied of Spain,
 Mine too!

Cha. Release me! Do you gloze on me
 Who bear in the world's face (that is, the world
 You make for me at Turin) your contempt?
 — Your measures? — When was not a hateful task

D'Ormea's imposition? Leave my robe!
 What post can I bestow, what grant concede?
 Or do you take me for the King?

D'O. Not I!
 Not yet for King, — not for, as yet, thank God,
 One who in . . . shall I say a year, a month?
 Ay! — shall be wretcheder than e'er was slave
 In his Sardinia, — Europe's spectacle
 And the world's by-word! What? The Prince aggrieved

That I excluded him our counsels? Here
[Touching the paper in CHARLES'S hand.]

Accept a method of extorting gold
 From Savoy's nobles, who must wring its worth
 In silver first from tillers of the soil,
 Whose hind's again have to contribute brass
 To make up the amount: there's counsel, sir,
 My counsel, one year old; and the fruit, this — Savoy's become a mass of misery
 And wrath, which one man has to meet — the King:

You're not the King! Another counsel, sir!
 Spain entertains a project (here it lies)
 Which, guessed, makes Austria offer that same
 King

Thus much to baffle Spain ; he promises ;
Then comes Spain, breathless lest she be forestalled,

Her offer follows ; and he promises . . .

Cha. — Promises, sir, when he has just agreed To Austria's offer ?

D'O. That's a counsel, Prince !
But past our foresight, Spain and Austria (choosing

To make their quarrel up between themselves
Without the intervention of a friend)

Produce both treaties, and both promises . . .

Cha. How ?

D'O. Prince, a counsel ! And the fruit of
that ?

Both parties covenant afresh, to fall
Together on their friend, blot out his name,
Abolish him from Europe. So, take note,
Here's Austria and here's Spain to fight against,

And what sustains the King but Savoy here,
A miserable people mad with wrongs ?

You're not the King !

Cha. Polyxena, you said

All would clear up : all does clear up to me.

D'O. Clear up ! 'Tis no such thing to envy, then ?

You see the King's state in its length and breadth ?

You blame me now for keeping you aloof
From counsels and the fruit of counsels ? Wait
Till I explain this morning's business !

Cha. [Aside.] No —
Stoop to my father, yes, — D'Ormea, no ;
— The King's son, not to the King's counsellor !

I will do something, but at least retain
The credit of my deed ! [Aloud.] Then it is
this

You now expressly come to tell me ?

D'O. This

To tell ! You apprehend me ?

Cha. Perfectly.

Further, D'Ormea, you have shown yourself,
For the first time these many weeks and months,

Disposed to do my bidding ?

D'O. From the heart !
Cha. Acquaint my father, first, I wait his pleasure :

Next . . . or, I'll tell you at a fitter time.
Acquaint the King !

D'O. [Aside.] If I 'scape Victor yet !

First, to prevent this stroke at me : if not, —
Then, to avenge it ! [To CHA.] Gracious sir,
I go. [Goes.]

Cha. God, I forbore ! Which more offenses, that man

Or that man's master ? Is it come to this ?
Have they supposed (the sharpest insult yet)
I needed e'en his intervention ? No !

No — dull am I, conceded, — but so dull,
Scarcely ! Their step decides me.

Pol.

How decides ?

Cha. You would be freed D'Ormea's eye and hers ?

— Could fly the court with me and live content ?
So, this it is for which the knights assemble !

The whispers and the closeting of late,
The savageness and insolence of old,
— For this !

Pol. What mean you ?

Cha. How ? You fail to catch
Their clever plot ? I missed it, but could you ?

These last two months of care to inculcate

How dull I am, — D'Ormea's present visit

To prove that, being dull, I might be worse

Were I a King — as wretched as now dull —

You recognize in it no winding up

Of a long plot ?

Pol. Why should there be a plot ?

Cha. The crown's secure now ; I should shame the crown —

An old complaint ; the point is, how to gain

My place for one more fit in Victor's eyes,

His mistress the Sebastian's child.

Pol.

In truth ?

Cha. They dare not quite dethrone Sardinia's Prince :

But they may descend on my dulness till

They sting me into even praying them

Grant leave to hide my head, resign my state,

And end the coil. Not see now ? In a word,

They'd have me tender them myself my rights

As one incapable ; — some cause for that.

Since I delayed thus long to see their drift !

I shall apprise the King he may resume

My rights this moment.

Pol.

Pause ! I dare not think

So ill of Victor.

Cha.

Think no ill of him !

Pol. — Nor think him, then, so shallow as to suffer

His purpose be divined thus easily.

And yet — you are the last of a great line ;

There's a great heritage at stake ; new days

Seemed to await this newest of the realms

Of Europe : — Charles, you must withstand
this !

Cha.

Ah !

You dare not then renounce the splendid court
For one whom all the world despises ? Speak !

Pol. My gentle husband, speak I will, and
truth.

Were this as you believe, and I once sure

Your duty lay in so renouncing rule,

I could . . . could ? Oh what happiness it were

To live, my Charles, and die, alone with you !

Cha. I grieve I asked you. To the presence, then !

By this, D'Ormea acquaints the King, no
doubt,

He fears I am too simple for mere hints,

And that no less will serve than Victor's mouth
Demonstrating in council what I am.

I have not breathed, I think, these many years !

Pol. Why, it may be ! — if he desire to wed
That woman, call legitimate her child.

Cha. You see as much ? Oh, let his will have way !

You'll not repent confiding in me, love ?

There's many a brighter spot in Piedmont, far,
Than Rivoli. I'll seek him : or, suppose

You hear first how I mean to speak my mind ?

Loudly and firmly both, this time, be sure !

I yet may see your Rhine-land, who can tell?
Once away, ever then away! I breathe.

Pol. And I too breathe.

Cha. Come, my Polyxena!

KING VICTOR

PART II

Enter KING VICTOR, bearing the regalia on a cushion, from his apartment. He calls loudly —

D'Ormea! — for patience fails me, treading thus Among the obscure trains I have laid, — my knights

Safe in the hall here — in that anteroom.

My son, — D'Ormea, where? Of this, one touch — [Laying down the crown.]

This fireball to these mute black cold trains —
then

Outbreak enough!

[Contemplating it.] To lose all, after all!

This, glancing o'er my house for ages — shaped,
Brave meteor, like the crown of Cyprus now,
Jerusalem, Spain, England, every change

The braver, — and when I have clutched a prize

My ancestry died wan with watching for,

To lose it! — by a slip, a fault, a trick

Learnt to advantage once and not unlearned

When past the use, — "just this once more" (I thought)

"Use it with Spain and Austria happily,

And then away with trick!" An oversight

I'd have repaired thrice over, any time

These fifty years, must happen now! There's
peace

At length; and I, to make the most of peace,

Ventured my project on our people here,

As needing not their help: which Europe
knows,

And means, cold-blooded, to dispose herself

(Apart from plausibilities of war)

To crush the new-made King — who ne'er till
now

Feared her. As Duke, I lost each foot of earth
And laughed at her: my name was left, my sword

Left, all was left! But she can take, she
knows,

This crown, herself conceded . . .

That's to try,
Kind Europe! — My career's not closed as
yet,

This boy was ever subject to my will,

Timid and tame — the fitter! — D'Ormea, too

What if the sovereign also rid himself

Of thee, his prime of parasites? I delay!

D'Ormea!

(As D'ORMEA enters, the King seats himself.)

My son, the Prince — attends he?

D'O. Sir,
He does attend. The crown prepared! — it seems

That you persist in your resolve.

Victor. Who's come?
The chancellor and the chamberlain? My knights?

D'O. The whole Annunziata. If, my liege.
Your fortune had not tottered worse than
now . . .

Vic. Del Borgo has drawn up the schedules?
mine —

My son's, too? Excellent! Only, beware

Of the least blunder, or we look but fools.

First, you read the Annulment of the Oaths;

Del Borgo follows . . . no, the Prince shall sign;

Then let Del Borgo read the Instrument:

On which, I enter.

D'O. Sir, this may be truth;

You, sir, may do as you affect — may break

Your engine, me, to pieces: try at least

If not a spring remain worth saving! Take

My counsel as I've counselled many times!

What if the Spaniard and the Austrian threat?

There's England, Holland, Venice — which ally

Select you?

Vic. Aha! Come, D'Ormea. — "truth"

Was on your lip a minute since. Allies?

I've broken faith with Venice, Holland, England

— As who knows if not you?

D'O. But why with me

Break faith — with one ally, your best, break
faith?

Vic. When first I stumbled on you, Marquis
— 't was

At Mondovi — a little lawyer's clerk . . .

D'O. Therefore your soul's ally! — who brought you through

Your quarrel with the Pope, at pains enough —

Who simply echoed you in these affairs —

On whom you cannot therefore visit these

Affairs' ill fortune — whom you trust to guide

You safe (yes, on my soul) through these affairs!

Vic. I was about to notice, had you not

Prevented me, that since that great town kept

With its chicane D'Ormea's satchel stuffed

And D'Ormea's self sufficiently reclude,

He missed a sight, — my naval armament

When I burned Toulon. How the skiff exults

Upon the galliot's wave! — rises its height,

O'ertops it even; but the great wave bursts,

And hell-deep in the horrible profound

Buries itself the galliot: shall the skiff

Think to escape the sea's black trough in turn?

Apply this: you have been my minister

— Next me, above me possibly; — sad post,

Huge care, abundant lack of peace of mind;

Who would desiderate the eminence?

You gave your soul to get it; you'd yet give

Your soul to keep it, as I mean you shall,

D'Ormea! What if the wave ebbed with me?

Whereas it cants you to another crest;

I toss you to my son; ride out your ride!

D'O. Ah, you so much despise me?

Vic. You, D'Ormea?

Nowise: and I'll inform you why. A king

Must in his time have many ministers,

And I've been rash enough to part with mine

When I thought proper. Of the tribe, not one ( . . . Or wait, did Pianezze? . . . ah, just the same!)

Not one of them, ere his remonstrance reached

The length of yours, but has assured me (commonly

Standing much as you stand, — or nearer, say,
 (The door to make his exit on his speech)
 — I should repent of what I did. D'Ormea,
 Be candid, you approached it when I bade you Prepare the schedules! But you stopped in
 time,

You have not so assured me: how should I
 Despise you then?

(Enter CHARLES.)

Vic. [Changing his tone.] Are you instructed?
 Do

My order, point by point! About it, sir!

D'O. You so despise me! [Aside.] One last stay remains —

The boy's discretion there.

[To CHA.] For your sake, Prince,

I pleaded, wholly in your interest,

To save you from this fate!

Cha. [Aside.] Must I be told

The Prince was supplicated for — by him?

Vic. [To D'O.] Apprise Del Borgo, Spava,
 and the rest,

Our son attends them; then return.

D'O. One word!

Cha. [Aside.] A moment's pause and they would drive me hence,

I do believe!

D'O. [Aside.] Let but the boy be firm!

Vic. You disobey?

Cha. [To D'O.] You do not disobey

Me, at least. Did you promise that or no?

D'O. Sir, I am yours: what would you?

Yours am I!

Cha. When I have said what I shall say,
 't is like

Your face will ne'er again disgust me. Go!

Through you, as through a breast of glass, I see.

And for your conduct, from my youth till now,

Take my contempt! You might have spared me much,

Secured me somewhat, nor so harmed yourself:

That's over now. Go, ne'er to come again!

D'O. As son, the father — father, as the son!

My wits! My wits! [Goes.]

Vic. [Seated.] And you, what meant you,
 pray,

Speaking thus to D'Ormea?

Cha. Let us not

Waste words upon D'Ormea! Those I spent

Have half unsettled what I came to say.

His presence vexes to my very soul.

Vic. One called to manage a kingdom, Charles, needs heart

To bear up under worse annoyances

Than seems D'Ormea — to me, at least.

Cha. [Aside.] Ah, good!

He keeps me to the point! Then be it so.

[Aloud.] Last night, sir, brought me certain papers — these —

To be reported on, — your way of late.

Is it last night's result that you demand?

Vic. For God's sake, what has night brought forth? Pronounce

The . . . what's your word? — result!

Cha. Sir, that had proved

Quite worthy of your sneer, no doubt: — a few

Lame thoughts, regard for you alone could wring,

Lame as they are, from brains like mine, believe!

As 't is, sir, I am spared both toil and sneer.

These are the papers.

Vic.

Well, sir? I suppose

You hardly burned them. Now for your result!

Cha. I never should have done great things,
 of course,

But . . . oh my father, had you loved me more!

Vic. Loved? [Aside.] Has D'Ormea played me false, I wonder?

[Aloud.] Why, Charles, a king's love is diffused
 — yourself

May overlook, perchance, your part in it.

Our monarchy is absolutelest now

In Europe, or my trouble's thrown away.

I love, my mode, that subjects each and all

May have the power of loving, all and each,

Their mode: I doubt not, many have their sons

To trifle with, talk soft to, all day long:

I have that crown, this chair, D'Ormea, Charles!

Cha. 'T is well I am a subject then, not you.

Vic. [Aside.] D'Ormea has told him everything. [Aloud.] Aha,

I apprehend you: when all's said, you take

Your private station to be prized beyond

My own, for instance?

Cha.

— Do and ever did

So take it: 't is the method you pursue

That grieves . . .

Vic. These words! Let me express, my
 friend,

Your thoughts. You penetrate what I supposed

Secret. D'Ormea plies his trade betimes!

I purpose to resign my crown to you.

Cha. To me?

Vic. Now, — in that chamber.

Cha.

You resign

The crown to me?

Vic. And time enough, Charles, sure?

Confess with me, at four-and-sixty years

A crown's a load. I covet quiet once

Before I die, and summoned you for that.

Cha. 'T is I will speak: you ever hated me,

I bore it, — have insulted me, borne too —

Now you insult yourself; and I remember

What I believed you, what you really are,

And cannot bear it. What! My life has passed

Under your eye, tormented as you know, —

Your whole sagacities, one after one,

At leisure brought to play on me — to prove me

A fool, I thought and I submitted; now

You'd prove . . . what would you prove me?

Vic.

This to me?

I hardly know you!

Cha.

Know me? Oh indeed

You do not! Wait till I complain next time

Of my simplicity! — for here's a sage

Knows the world well, is not to be deceived,

And his experience and his Machiavels,

D'Ormeas, teach him — what? — that I this
 while

Have envied him his crown! He has not smiled,

I warrant, — has not eaten, drunk, nor slept,

For I was plotting with my Princess yonder!

Who knows what we might do or might not do?

Go now, be politic, astound the world!

That sentry in the antechamber — nay,

The varlet who disposed this precious trap
[Pointing to the crown.]

That was to take me — ask them if they think
 Their own sons envy them their posts! — Know
 me!

Vic. But you know me, it seems : so, learn,
 in brief,

My pleasure. This assembly is convened . . .

Cha. Tell me, that woman put it in your head!

You were not sole contriver of the scheme,
 My father!

Vic. Now observe me, sir! I jest
 Seldom — on these points, never. Here, I say,
 The knights assemble to see me concede,
 And you accept, Sardinia's crown.

Cha. Farewell!
 'T were vain to hope to change this: I can end it.
 Not that I cease from being yours, when sunk
 Into obscurity: I'll die for you,
 But not annoy you with my presence. Sir,
 Farewell! Farewell!

(Enter D'ORMEA.)

D'O. [Aside.] Ha, sure he's changed again —
 Means not to fall into the cunning trap!

Then, Victor, I shall yet escape you, Victor!

Vic. [Suddenly placing the crown upon the head of CHARLES.] D'Ormea, your king!

[To CHA.] My son, obey me! Charles,

Your father, clearer-sighted than yourself,

Decides it must be so. 'Faith, this looks real!

My reasons after; reason upon reason

After: but now, obey me! Trust in me!

By this, you save Sardinia, you save me!

Why, the boy swoons! [To D'O.] Come this
 side!

D'O. [As CHARLES turns from him to VIC-TOR.] You persist?

Vic. Yes, I conceive the gesture's meaning.
 'Faith,

He almost seems to hate you: how is that?

Be reassured, my Charles! Is 't over now?

Then, Marquis, tell the new King what remains

To do! A moment's work. Del Borgo reads

The Act of Abdication out, you sign it,

Then I sign; after that, come back to me.

D'O. Sir, for the last time, pause!

Vic. Five minutes longer

I am your sovereign, Marquis. Hesitate —

And I'll so turn those minutes to account

That . . . Ay, you recollect me! [Aside.]

Could I bring

My foolish mind to undergo the reading

That Act of Abdication!

[As CHARLES motions D'ORMEA to precede him.]

Thanks, dear Charles!

[CHARLES and D'ORMEA retire.]

Vic. A novel feature in the boy, — indeed

Just what I feared he wanted most. Quite
 right,

This earnest tone: your truth, now for effect!

It answers every purpose: with that look,

That voice, — I hear him: "I began no treaty,"

(He speaks to Spain,) "nor ever dreamed of
 this

You show me; this I from my soul regret;

But if my father signed it, bid not me

Dishonor him — who gave me all, beside: "
 And, "true," says Spain, "t were harsh to visit that

Upon the Prince." Then come the nobles trooping:

"I grieve at these exactions — I had cut

This hand off ere impose them; but shall I

Undo my father's deed?" — and they confer:

"Doubtless he was no party, after all;

Give the Prince time!"

Ay, give us time, but time!

Only, he must not, when the dark day comes.

Refer our friends to me and frustrate all.

We'll have no child's play, no desponding fits,

No Charles at each cross turn entreating Victor

To take his crown again. Guard against that!

(Enter D'ORMEA.)

Long live King Charles!

No — Charles's counsellor!

Well, is it over, Marquis? Did I jest?

D'O. "King Charles!" What then may you be?

Vic. Anything!

A country gentleman that, cured of bustle,

Now beats a quick retreat toward Chambery,

Would hunt and hawk and leave you noisy folk

To drive your trade without him. I'm Count

Remont —

Count Tende — any little place's Count!

D'O. Then Victor, Captain against Catinat

At Staffarde, where the French beat you; and

Duke

At Turin, where you beat the French; King

late

Of Savoy, Piedmont, Montferrat, Sardinia,

— Now, "any little place's Count" —

Vic. Proceed!

D'O. Breaker of vows to God, who crowned you first;

Breaker of vows to man, who kept you since;

Most profligate to me who outraged God

And man to serve you, and am made pay crimes

I was but privy to, by passing thus

To your imbecile son — who, well you know,

Must — (when the people here, and nations
 there,

Clamor for you the main delinquent, slipped

From King to — "Count of any little place")

Must needs surrender me, all in his reach, —

I, sir, forgive you: for I see the end —

See you on your return — (you will return) —

To him you trust, a moment . . .

Vic. Trust him? How?

My poor man, merely a prime-minister,

Make me know where my trust errs!

D'O. In his fear,

His love, his — but discover for yourself

What you are weakest, trusting in!

Vic. Aha,

D'Ormea, not a shrewder scheme than this

In your repertory? You know old Victor —

Vain, choleric, inconstant, rash — (I've heard Talkers who little thought the King so close) —

Felicitous now, were 't not, to provoke him

To clean forget, one minute afterward,

His solemn act, and call the nobles back

And pray them give again the very power

He has abjured — for the dear sake of what?

Vengeance on you, D'Ormea! No: such am I,
 Count Tende or Count anything you please,
 — Only, the same that did the things you say,
 And, among other things you say not, used
 Your finest fibre, meanest muscle, — you
 I used, and now, since you will have it so,
 Leave to your fate — mere lumber in the midst,
 You and your works. Why, what on earth beside

Are you made for, you sort of ministers?

D'O. Not left, though, to my fate! Your witless son

Has more wit than to load himself with lumber:
 He foils you that way, and I follow you.

Vic. Stay with my son — protect the weaker
 side!

D'O. Ay, to be tossed the people like a rag,
 And flung by them for Spain and Austria's sport,

Abolishing the record of your part

In all this perfidy!

Vic. Prevent, beside,

My own return!

D'O. That 's half prevented now!
 'T will go hard but you find a wondrous charm
 In exile, to discredit me. The Alps,
 Silk-mills to watch, vines asking vigilance —
 Hounds open for the stag, your hawk 's a-wing —

Brave days that wait the Louis of the South, Italy's Janus!

Vic. So, the lawyer's clerk
 Won't tell me that I shall repent!

D'O. You give me
 Full leave to ask if you repent?

Vic. Whene'er
 Sufficient time 's elapsed for that, you judge!
 [Shouts inside, "KING CHARLES!" ]

D'O. Do you repent?

Vic. [After a slight pause.] . . . I've kept them waiting? Yes!
 Come in, complete the Abdication, sir! [They go out.]

(Enter POLYXENA.)

Pol. A shout! The sycophants are free of
 Charles!

Oh, is not this like Italy? No fruit
 Of his or my distempered fancy, this,
 But just an ordinary fact! Beside,
 Here they've set forms for such proceedings;
 Victor

Imprisoned his own mother: he should know,
 If any, how a son 's to be deprived
 Of a son's right. Our duty 's palpable.
 Ne'er was my husband for the wily king
 And the unworthy subjects: be it so!
 Come you safe out of them, my Charles! Our life

Grows not the broad and dazzling life, I dreamed

Might prove your lot; for strength was shut in
 you

None gessed but I — strength which, untram-melled once,

Had little shamed your vaunted ancestry —

Patience and self-devotion, fortitude,

Simplicity and utter truthfulness

— All which, they shout to lose!

So, now my work
 Begins — to save him from regret. Save
 Charles

Regret? — the noble nature! He 's not made
 Like these Italians: 't is a German soul.

(CHARLES enters crowned.)

Oh, where 's the King's heir? Gone: — the Crown-prince? Gone: —

Where 's Savoy? Gone! — Sardinia? Gone!

But Charles

Is left! And when my Rhine-land bowers ar-
 rise,

If he looked almost handsome yester-twilight
 As his gray eyes seemed widening into black
 Because I praised him, then how will he look?
 Farewell, you stripped and whited mulberry-trees

Bound each to each by lazy ropes of vine!

Now I'll teach you my language: I'm not forced

To speak Italian now, Charles?

[She sees the crown.] What is this?

Answer me — who has done this? Answer!

Cha. He!

I am King now.

Pol. Oh worst, worst, worst of all!
 Tell me! What, Victor? He has made you
 King?

What 's he then? What 's to follow this? You,
 King?

Cha. Have I done wrong? Yes, for you were not by!

Pol. Tell me from first to last.

Cha. Hush — a new world
 Brightens before me; he is moved away
 — The dark form that eclipsed it, he subsides
 Into a shape supporting me like you,
 And I, alone, tend upward, more and more
 Tend upward: I am grown Sardinia's King.

Pol. Now stop: was not this Victor, Duke of Savoy

At ten years old?

Cha. He was.

Pol. And the Duke spent,
 Since then, just four-and-fifty years in toil
 To be — what?

Cha. King.

Pol. Then why unking himself?

Cha. Those years are cause enough.

Pol. The only cause?

Cha. Some new perplexities.

Pol. Which you can solve
 Although he cannot?

Cha. He assures me so.

Pol. And this he means shall last — how long?

Cha. How long?

Think you I fear the perils I confront?

He 's praising me before the people's face —
 My people!

Pol. Then he 's changed — grown kind, the King?

Where can the trap be?

Cha. Heart and soul I pledge!

My father, could I guard the crown you gained.
 Transmit as I received it, — all good else

Would I surrender!

Pol. Ah, it opens then

Before you, all you dreaded formerly?

You are rejoiced to be a king, my Charles?

Cha. So much to dare? The better, — much to dread;

The better. I'll adventure though alone.
Triumph or die, there's Victor still to witness
Who dies or triumphs — either way, alone!

Pol. Once I had found my share in triumph,
Charles,

Or death.

Cha. But you are I! But you I call
To take, Heaven's proxy, vows I tendered
Heaven

A moment since. I will deserve the crown!

Pol. You will. [Aside.] No doubt it were a glorious thing

For any people, if a heart like his

Ruled over it. I would I saw the trap.

(Enter VICTOR.)

'Tis he must show me.

Vic. So, the mask falls off
An old man's foolish love at last. Spare thanks!
I know you, and Polyxena I know.

Here's Charles — I am his guest now — does he bid me

Be seated? And my light-haired blue-eyed child

Must not forget the old man far away

At Chambéry, who dozes while she reigns.

Pol. Most grateful shall we now be, talking least

Of gratitude — indeed of anything

That hinders what yourself must need to say

To Charles.

Cha. Pray speak, sir!

Vic. 'Faith, not much to say:
Only what shows itself, you once i' the point
Of sight. You're now the King: you'll comprehend

Much you may oft have wondered at — the
shifts,

Dissimulation, willness I showed.

For what's our post? Here's Savoy and here's Piedmont,

Here's Montferrat — a breadth here, a space
there —

To o'er-sweep all these, what's one weapon
worth?

I often think of how they fought in Greece

(Or Rome, which was it? You're the scholar, Charles!)

You made a front-thrust? But if your shield
too

Were not adroitly planted, some shrewd knave Reached you behind; and him foiled, straight if thong

And handle of that shield were not cast loose,

And you enabled to outstrip the wind,

Fresh foes assailed you, either side; 'scape these,

And reach your place of refuge — e'en then,
odds

If the gate opened unless breath enough

Were left in you to make its lord a speech.

Oh, you will see!

Cha. No: straight on shall I go,
Truth helping; win with it or die with it.

Vic. 'Faith, Charles, you're not made
Europe's fighting-man!

The barrier-guarder, if you please. You clutch
Hold and consolidate, with envious France
This side, with Austria that, the territory
I held — ay, and will hold . . . which you shall hold

Despite the couple! But I've surely earned Exemption from these weary politics,
— The privilege to prattle with my son
And daughter here, though Europe wait the while.

Pol. Nay, sir, — at Chambéry, away forever.
As soon you will be, 't is farewell we bid you:
Turn these few fleeting moments to account!

'T is just as though it were a death.

Vic.

Indeed!

Pol. [Aside.] Is the trap there?

Cha. Ay, call this parting — death!

The sacredder your memory becomes.

If I misrule Sardinia, how bring back

My father?

Vic. I mean . . .

Pol. [who watches VICTOR narrowly this while.] Your father does not mean

You should be ruling for your father's sake:

It is your people must concern you wholly

Instead of him. You mean this, sir? (He drops
My hand!)

Cha. That people is now part of me.

Vic. About the people! I took certain measures

Some short time since . . . Oh, I know well,
you know

But little of my measures! These affect

The nobles; we've resumed some grants, imposed

A tax or two: prepare yourself, in short,

For clamor on that score. Mark me: you yield
No jot of aught entrusted you!

Pol.

No jot

You yield!

Cha. My father, when I took the oath,
Although my eye might stray in search of yours,
I heard it, understood it, promised God
What you require. Till from this eminence
He move me, here I keep, nor shall concede
The meanest of my rights.

Vic. [Aside.] The boy's a fool!

— Or rather, I'm a fool: for, what's wrong
here?

To-day the sweets of reigning: let to-morrow
Be ready with its bitters.

(Enter D'ORMEA.)

There's beside

Somewhat to press upon your notice first.

Cha. Then why delay it for an instant, sir?
That Spanish claim perchance? And, now you
speak,

— This morning, my opinion was mature,
Which, boy-like, I was bashful in producing
To one I ne'er am like to fear in future!

My thought is formed upon that Spanish claim.

Vic. Betimes indeed. Not now, Charles!

You require

A host of papers on it.

D'O. [Coming forward.] Here they are.

[To CHA.] I, sir, was minister and much beside
Of the late monarch; to say little, him
I served: on you I have, to say e'en less,

No claim. This case contains those papers :
with them

I tender you my office.

Vic. [Hastily.] Keep him, Charles !
There's reason for it — many reasons : you
Distrust him, nor are so far wrong there, — but He's mixed up in this matter — he'll desire
To quit you, for occasions known to me :
Do not accept those reasons : have him stay !

Pol. [Aside.] His minister thrust on us !

Cha. [To D'O.] Sir, believe,

In justice to myself, you do not need
E'en this commending : howsoever might seem
My feelings toward you, as a private man,
They quit me in the vast and untried field
Of action. Though I shall myself (as late
In your own hearing I engaged to do)
Preside o'er my Sardinia, yet your help
Is necessary. Think the past forgotten
And serve me now !

D'O. I did not offer you
My service — would that I could serve you, sir !
As for the Spanish matter . . .

Vic. But dispatch
At least the dead, in my good daughter's phrase,
Before the living ! Help to house me safe
Ere with D'Ormea you set the world agape !
Here is a paper — will you overlook
What I propose reserving for my needs ?
I get as far from you as possible :

Here's what I reckon my expenditure.

Cha. [Reading.] A miserable fifty thousand crowns !

Vic. Oh, quite enough for country gentlemen !

Beside, the exchequer happens . . . but find
out

All that, yourself !

Cha. [Still reading.] "Count Tende" — what means this ?

Vic. Me : you were but an infant when I burst

Through the defile of Tende upon France.

Had only my allies kept true to me !

No matter. Tende's, then, a name I take

Just as . . .

D'O. — The Marchioness Sebastian takes
The name of Spigno.

Cha. How, sir ?

Vic. [To D'O.] Fool ! All that Was for my own detailing. [To CHA.] That anon !

Cha. [To D'O.] Explain what you have said, sir !

D'O. I supposed
The marriage of the King to her I named,
Profoundly kept a secret these few weeks,
Was not to be one, now he's Count.

Pol. [Aside.] With us
The minister — with him the mistress !

Cha. [To VIC.] No —
Tell me you have not taken her — that woman —

To live with, past recall !

Vic. And where's the crime . . .

Pol. [To CHA.] True, sir, this is a matter past recall

And past your cognizance. A day before,

And you had been compelled to note this —
now

Why note it ? The King saved his House from shame :

What the Count did, is no concern of yours.

Cha. [After a pause.] The Spanish claim,
D'Ormea !

Vic. Why, my son,
I took some ill-advised . . . one's age, in fact,
Spoils everything : though I was overreached,
A younger brain, we'll trust, may extricate
Sardinia readily. To-morrow, D'Ormea,
Inform the King !

D'O. [Without regarding VICTOR, and leisurely.]

Thus stands the case with Spain :
When first the Infant Carlos claimed his proper Succession to the throne of Tuscany . . .

Vic. I tell you, that stands over ! Let that
rest !

There is the policy !

Cha. [To D'O.] Thus much I know,

And more — too much. The remedy ?

D'O. Of course !

No glimpse of one.

Vic. No remedy at all !

It makes the remedy itself — time makes it.

D'O. [To CHA.] But if . . .

Vic. [Still more hastily.] In fine, I shall take care of that :

And, with another project that I have . . .

D'O. [Turning on him.] Oh, since Count
Tende means to take again

King Victor's crown ! —

Pol. [Throwing herself at VICTOR's feet.]
E'en now retake it, sir !

Oh, speak ! We are your subjects both, once
more !

Say it — a word effects it ! You meant not,
Nor do mean now, to take it : but you must !

'T is in you — in your nature — and the shame's
Not half the shame 't would grow to afterwards !

Cha. Polyxena !

Pol. A word recalls the knights — Say it ! — What's promising and what's the
past ?

Say you are still King Victor !

D'O. Better say

The Count repents, in brief !

[VICTOR rises.]

Cha. With such a crime

I have not charged you, sir !

Pol. Charles turns from me !

SECOND YEAR, 1731. — KING CHARLES

PART I

Enter QUEEN POLYXENA and D'ORMEA. — A pause.

Pol. And now, sir, what have you to say ?

D'O. Count Tende . . .

Pol. Affirm not I betrayed you ; you resolve

On uttering this strange intelligence

— Nay, post yourself to find me ere I reach

The capital, because you know King Charles

Tarries a day or two at Evian baths

Behind me:—but take warning,—here and thus [Seating herself in the royal seat.]
 I listen, if I listen—not your friend.
 Explicitly the statement, if you still Persist to urge it on me, must proceed:
 I am not made for aught else.

D'O. Good! Count Tende . . .
Pol. I, who mistrust you, shall acquaint
 King Charles,

Who even more mistrusts you.

D'O. Does he so?
Pol. Why should he not?
D'O. Ay, why not? Motives, seek
 You virtuous people, motives! Say, I serve
 God at the devil's bidding—will that do?
 I'm proud: our people have been pacified,
 Really I know not how—

Pol. By truthfulness.
D'O. Exactly; that shows I had naught to
 do

With pacifying them. Our foreign perils
 Also exceed my means to stay: but here
 'Tis otherwise, and my pride's piqued. Count
 Tende

Completes a full year's absence: would you,
 madam,
 Have the old monarch back, his mistress back,
 His measures back? I pray you, act upon
 My counsel, or they will be.

Pol. When?
D'O. Let's think.
 Home-matters settled—Victor's coming now;
 Let foreign matters settle—Victor's here
 Unless I stop him; as I will, this way.

Pol. [Reading the papers he presents.] If this should prove a plot 'twixt you and Victor?
 You seek annoyances to give the pretext
 For what you say you fear!

D'O. Oh, possibly!
 I go for nothing. Only show King Charles
 That thus Count Tende purposes return,
 And style me his inviter, if you please!

Pol. Half of your tale is true; most like,
 the Count
 Seeks to return: but why stay you with us?
 To aid in such emergencies.

D'O. Keep safe
 Those papers: or, to serve me, leave no proof
 I thus have counselled! When the Count returns,
 And the King abdicates, 't will stead me little
 To have thus counselled.

Pol. The King abdicate!
D'O. He's good, we knew long since—wise, we discover—
 Firm, let us hope:—but I'd have gone to work
 With him away. Well!

[CHARLES without.] In the Council Chamber?
D'O. All's lost!
Pol. Oh, surely not King Charles! He's changed—

That's not this year's care-burdened voice and
 step:

'T is last year's step, the Prince's voice!
D'O. I know.

(Enter CHARLES—D'ORMEA retiring a little.)
Cha. Now wish me joy, Polyxena! Wish it
 me

The old way! [She embraces him.]
 There was too much cause for that!
 But I have found myself again. What news
 At Turin? Oh, if you but felt the load I'm free of—free! I said this year would end

Or it, or me—but I am free, thank God!
Pol. How, Charles?

Cha. You do not guess? The day I found Sardinia's hideous coil, at home, abroad,
 And how my father was involved in it,—
 Of course, I vowed to rest and smile no more
 Until I cleared his name from obloquy.
 We did the people right—'t was much to gain

That point, redress our nobles' grievance, too—
 But that took place here, was no crying shame:
 All must be done abroad,—if I abroad
 Appeased the justly-angered Powers, destroyed
 The scandal, took down Victor's name at last
 From a bad eminence, I then might breathe
 And rest! No moment was to lose. Behold
 The proud result—a Treaty, Austria, Spain Agree to—

D'O. [Aside.] I shall merely stipulate
 For an experienced headsman.

Cha. Not a soul
 Is compromised: the blotted past's a blank:
 Even D'Ormea escapes unquestioned. See!
 It reached me from Vienna; I remained
 At Evian to dispatch the Count his news;
 'T is gone to Chambéry a week ago—
 And here am I; do I deserve to feel
 Your warm white arms around me?

D'O. [Coming forward.] He knows that?
Cha. What, in Heaven's name, means this?

D'O. He knows that matters
 Are settled at Vienna? Not too late!
 Plainly, unless you post this very hour
 Some man you trust (say, me) to Chambéry
 And take precautions I acquaint you with,
 Your father will return here.

Cha. Are you crazed, D'Ormea? Here? For what? As well return

To take his crown!
D'O. He will return for that.

Cha. [To POL.] You have not listened to this man?

Pol. He spoke
 About your safety—and I listened.

[He disengages himself from her arms.]
Cha. [To D'O.] What

Apprised you of the Count's intentions?
D'O. Me?

His heart, sir; you may not be used to read
 Such evidence however; therefore read

[Pointing to POLYXENA'S papers.]
 My evidence.

Cha. [To POL.] Oh, worthy this of you!
 And of your speech I never have forgotten,
 Though I professed forgetfulness; which haunts
 me

As if I did not know how false it was;
 Which made me toil unconsciously thus long
 That there might be no least occasion left
 For aught of its prediction coming true!
 And now, when there is left no least occasion

To instigate my father to such crime —
When I might venture to forget (I hoped)
That speech and recognize Polyxena —
Oh worthy, to revive, and tenfold worse,
That plague! D'Ormea at your ear, his slan-
ders

Still in your hand! Silent?

Pol. As the wronged are.

Cha. And you, D'Ormea, since when have you presumed

To spy upon my father? I conceive

What that wise paper shows, and easily.

Since when?

D'O. The when and where and how belong
To me. 'Tis sad work, but I deal in such.

You oftentimes serve yourself; I'd serve you here:

Use makes me not so squeamish. In a word,

Since the first hour he went to Chambery,

Of his seven servants, five have I suborned.

Cha. You hate my father?

D'O. Oh, just as you will!

[Looking at POLYXENA.]

A minute since, I loved him — hate him, now!

What matter? — if you ponder just one thing:

Has he that treaty? — he is setting forward

Already. Are your guards here?

Cha.

Well for you
They are not! [To POL.] Him I knew of old,
but you —

To hear that pickthank, further his designs!

[To D'O.]

Guards? — were they here, I'd bid them, for your trouble,

Arrest you.

D'O. Guards you shall not want. I lived

The servant of your choice, not of your need.

You never greatly needed me till now

That you discard me. This is my arrest.

Again I tender you my charge — its duty

Would bid me press you read those documents.

Here, sir!

[Offering his badge of Office.]

Cha. [Taking it.] The papers also! Do you think

I dare not read them?

Pol.

Read them, sir!

Cha.

They prove,
My father, still a month within the year

Since he so solemnly consigned it me,

Means to resume his crown? They shall prove

that,

Or my best dungeon . . .

D'O.

Even say, Chambery!

'Tis vacant, I surmise, by this.

Cha.

You prove
Your words or pay their forfeit, sir. Go there!

Polyxena, one chance to rend the veil

Thickening and blackening 'twixt us two! Do
say,

You'll see the falsehood of the charges proved!
Do say, at least, you wish to see them proved

False charges — my heart's love of other times!

Pol. Ah, Charles!

Cha. [To D'O.]

Precede me, sir!

D'O.

And I'm at length
A martyr for the truth! No end, they say,
Of miracles. My conscious innocence!

[As they go out, enter — by the middle door, at which he pauses — VICTOR.]

Vic. Sure I heard voices? No. Well, I do best

To make at once for this, the heart o' the place.
The old room! Nothing changed! So near my seat,

D'Ormea? [Pushing away the stool which is by the KING's chair.]

I want that meeting over first,

I know not why. Tush, he, D'Ormea, slow

To hearten me, the supple knave? That burst

Of spite so eased him! He'll inform me . . .

What?

Why come I hither? All's in rough; let all

Remain rough. There's full time to draw back

— nay,

There's naught to draw back from, as yet;

whereas,

If reason should be, to arrest a course

Of error — reason good, to interpose

And save, as I have saved so many times,

Our House, admonish my son's giddy youth,

Relieve him of a weight that proves too much —

Now is the time, — or now, or never.

'Faith,

This kind of step is pitiful, not due

To Charles, this stealing back — hither, because

He's from his capital! Oh Victor! Victor!

But thus it is. The age of crafty men

Is loathsome; youth contrives to carry off

Dissimulation; we may intersperse

Extenuating passages of strength,

Ardu, vivacity and wit — may turn

E'en guile into a voluntary grace:

But one's old age, when graces drop away

And leave guile the pure staple of our lives —

Ah, loathsome!

Not so — or why pause I? Turin

Is mine to have, were I so minded, for

The asking; all the army's mine — I've witnessed

Each private fight beneath me; all the Court's

Mine too; and, best of all, D'Ormea's still D'Ormea and mine. There's some grace clinging yet.

Had I decided on this step, ere midnight

I'd take the crown.

No. Just this step to rise

Exhausts me. Here am I arrived: the rest

Must be done for me. Would I could sit here

And let things right themselves, the masque unmasque

Of the old King, crownless, gray hair and hot
blood, —

The young King, crowned, but calm before his
time,

They say, — the eager mistress with her taunts, —

And the sad earnest wife who motions me

Away — ay, there she knelt to me! E'en yet

I can return and sleep at Chambery

A dream out.

Rather shake it off at Turin.

King Victor! Say: to Turin — yes, or no?

'Tis this relentless noonday-lighted chamber.

Lighted like life but silent as the grave,

That disconcerts me. That's the change must strike.

No silence last year! Some one flung doors wide

(Those two great doors which scrutinize me now)
And out I went 'mid crowds of men — men talking,

Men watching if my lip fell or brow knit,
Men saw me safe forth, put me on my road :
That makes the misery of this return.
Oh had a battle done it! Had I dropped,
Haling some battle, three entire days old,
Hither and thither by the forehead — dropped
In Spain, in Austria, best of all, in France —
Spurned on its horns or underneath its hoofs,
When the spent monster went upon its knees
To pad and pash the prostrate wretch — I, Victor,

Sole to have stood up against France, beat down

By inches, brayed to pieces finally
In some vast unimaginable charge,
A flying hell of horse and foot and guns
Over me, and all's lost, forever lost,
There's no more Victor when the world wakes up!

Then silence, as of a raw battlefield,
Throughout the world. Then after (as whole days

After, you catch at intervals faint noise
Through the stiff crust of frozen blood) — there creeps

A rumor forth, so faint, no noise at all,
That a strange old man, with face outworn for wounds,

Is stumbling from frontier town to town,
Begging a pittance that may help him find
His Turin out; what scorn and laughter follow
The coin you fling into his cap! And last,
Some bright morn, how men crowd about the midst

O' the market-place, where takes the old king breath

Ere with his crutch he strike the palace-gate Wide ope!

To Turin, yes or no — or no?

(Re-enter CHARLES with papers.)

Cha. Just as I thought! A miserable falsehood

Of hirelings discontented with their pay
And longing for enfranchisement! A few
Testy expressions of old age that thinks
To keep alive its dignity o'er slaves
By means that suit their natures!

[Tearing them.] Thus they shake
My faith in Victor!

[Turning, he discovers VICTOR.

Vic. [After a pause.] Not at Evian, Charles?
What's this? Why do you run to close the doors?

No welcome for your father?

Cha. [Aside.] Not his voice!
What would I give for one imperious tone
Of the old sort! That's gone forever.

Vic. Must
I ask once more . . .

Cha. No — I concede it, sir!
You are returned for . . . true, your health declines;

True, Chambery's a bleak unkindly spot;

You'd choose one fitter for your final lodge —
Veneria, or Moncagliero — ay, that's close
And I concede it.

Vic. I received advices
Of the conclusion of the Spanish matter,
Dated from Evian Baths . . .

Cha. And you forbore
To visit me at Evian, satisfied
The work I had to do would fully task
The little wit I have, and that your presence
Would only disconcert me —

Vic. Charles?

Cha. — Me, set
Forever in a foreign course to yours,
And . . .

Sir, this way of wile were good to catch,
But I have not the sleight of it. The truth!
Though I sink under it! What brings you here?

Vic. Not hope of this reception, certainly.
From one who'd scarce assume a stranger mode
Of speech, did I return to bring about
Some awfullest calamity!

Cha. — You mean,
Did you require your crown again! Oh yes,
I should speak otherwise! But turn not that
To jesting! Sir, the truth! Your health declines?

Is aught deficient in your equipage?
Wisely you seek myself to make complaint,
And foil the malice of the world which laughs
At petty discontents; but I shall care
That not a soul knows of this visit. Speak!

Vic. [Aside.] Here is the grateful much-professing son

Prepared to worship me, for whose sole sake
I think to waive my plans of public good!
[Aloud.] Nay, Charles, if I did seek to take once more

My crown, were so disposed to plague myself,
What would be warrant for this bitterness?
I gave it — grant I would resume it — well?

Cha. I should say simply — leaving out the why

And how — you made me swear to keep that crown:

And as you then intended . . .

Vic. Fool! What way
Could I intend or not intend? As man,
With a man's will, when I say "I intend,"
I can intend up to a certain point,
No farther. I intended to preserve
The crown of Savoy and Sardinia whole:
And if events arise demonstrating
The way, I hoped should guard it, rather like
To lose it . . .

Cha. Keep within your sphere and mine!
It is God's province we usurp on, else.
Here, blindfold through the maze of things we walk

By a slight clue of false, true, right and wrong;
All else is rambling and presumption. I Have sworn to keep this kingdom: there's my
truth.

Vic. Truth, boy, is here, within my breast;
and in

Your recognition of it, truth is, too;
And in the effect of all this tortuous dealing

With falsehood, used to carry out the truth,
— In its success, this falsehood turns, again,
Truth for the world! But you are right: these themes

Are over-subtle. I should rather say
In such a case, frankly, — it fails, my scheme:
I hoped to see you bring about, yourself,
What I must bring about. Interpose
On your behalf — with my son's good in sight —
To hold what he is nearly letting go,
Confirm his title, add a grace perhaps.
There's Sicily, for instance, — granted me
And taken back, some years since: till I give
That island with the rest, my work's half
done.

For his sake, therefore, as of those he rules . . .

Cha. Our sakes are one; and that, you could not say,

Because my answer would present itself
Forthwith: — a year has wrought an age's
change.

This people's not the people now, you once
Could benefit; nor is my policy
Your policy.

Vic. [With an outburst.] I know it! You undo
All I have done — my life of toil and care!
I left you this the absolute rule
In Europe: do you think I sit and smile,
Bid you throw power to the populace —
See my Sardinia, that has kept apart,
Join in the mad and democratic whirl
Whereto I see all Europe haste full tide?
England casts off her kings; France mimics
England:

This realm I hoped was safe! Yet here I talk,
When I can save it, not by force alone,
But bidding plagues, which follow sons like you,
Fasten upon my disobedient . . .

[Recollecting himself.] Surely
I could say this — if minded so — my son?

Cha. You could not. Bitterer curses than your curse

Have I long since denounced upon myself
If I misused my power. In fear of these
I entered on those measures — will abide
By them: so, I should say, Count Tende . . .

Vic. No!
But no! But if, my Charles, your — more than old —

Half-foolish father urged these arguments,
And then confessed them futile, but said plainly
That he forgot his promise, found his strength
Fail him, had thought at savage Chambery
Too much of brilliant Turin, Rivoli here
And Susa, and Veneria, and Superga —
Pined for the pleasant places he had built
When he was fortunate and young —

Cha. My father!
Vic. Stay yet! — and if he said he could not die

Deprived of baubles he had put aside,
He deemed, forever — of the Crown that binds
Your brain up, whole, sound and impregnable,
Creating kingliness — the Sceptre too,
Those mere wind, should you wave it, back would beat

Invaders — and the golden Ball which throbs
As if you grasped the palpitating heart

Indeed o' the realm, to mould as choose you
may!

— If I must totter up and down the streets
My sires built, where myself have introduced
And fostered laws and letters, sciences,
The civil and the military arts!
Stay, Charles! I see you letting me pretend
To live my former self once more — King Victor,
The venturesome yet politic: they style me
Again, the Father of the Prince: friends wink
Good-humoredly at the delusion you
So sedulously guard from all rough truths
That else would break upon my dotage! —
You —

Whom now I see preventing my old shame —
I tell not, point by cruel point, my tale —
For is 't not in your breast my brow is hid?
Is not your hand extended? Say you not . . .

(Enter D'ORMEA, leading in POLYXENA.)

Pol. [Advancing and withdrawing CHARLES — to VICTOR.]

In this conjuncture even, he would say
(Though with a moistened eye and quivering lip)
The suppliant is my father. I must save
A great man from himself, nor see him fling
His well-earned fame away: there must not follow

Ruin so utter, a break-down of worth
So absolute: no enemy shall learn,
He thrust his child 'twixt danger and himself,
And, when that child somehow stood danger
out,

Stole back with serpent wiles to ruin Charles — Body, that's much, — and soul, that's more
— and realm,

That's most of all! No enemy shall say . . .

D'O. Do you repent, sir?

Vic. [Resuming himself.] D'Ormea? This is
well!

Worthily done, King Charles, craftily done!
Judiciously you post these, to o'erhear
The little your importunate father thrusts
Himself on you to say! — Ah, they'll correct
The amiable blind facility
You show in answering his peevish suit.
What can he need to sue for? Thanks,
D'Ormea!

You have fulfilled your office: but for you,
The old Count might have drawn some few more livres

To swell his income! Had you, lady, missed
The moment, a permission might be granted
To buttress up my ruinous old pile!
But you remember properly the list
Of wise precautions I took when I gave Nearly as much away — to reap the fruits
I should have looked for!

Cha. Thanks, sir: degrade me,
So you remain yourself! Adieu!

Vic. I'll not

Forget it for the future, nor presume
Next time to slight such mediators! Nay —
Had I first moved them both to intercede,
I might secure a chamber in Moneagliè
— Who knows?

Cha. Adieu!

Vic. You bid me this adieu

With the old spirit?

Cha. Adieu !
 Vic. Charles — Charles !
 Cha. Adieu !
 [VICTOR goes.]

Cha. You were mistaken, Marquis, as you hear !

'T was for another purpose the Count came.
 The Count desires Moncagliier. Give the order !

D'O. [Leisurely.] Your minister has lost your confidence,

Asserting late, for his own purposes,
 Count Tende would . . .

Cha. [Flinging his badge back.] Be still the minister !

And give a loose to your insulting joy ;
 It irks me more thus stifled than expressed :
 Loose it !

D'O. There's none to loose, alas ! I see
 I never am to die a martyr.

Pol. Charles !

Cha. No praise, at least, Polyxena — no praise !

KING CHARLES

PART II

D'ORMEA seated, folding papers he has been examining.

This at the last effects it : now, King Charles Or else King Victor — that's a balance : but
 now,

D'Ormea the arch-culprit, either turn
 O' the scale, — that's sure enough. A point to solve,

My masters, moralists, whate'er your style !
 When you discover why I push myself
 Into a pitfall you'd pass safely by,
 Impart to me among the rest ! No matter.
 Prompt are the righteous ever with their rede
 To us the wrongful : lesson them this once !
 For safe among the wicked are you set,
 D'Ormea ! We lament life's brevity,
 Yet quarter e'en the threescore years and ten,
 Nor stick to call the quarter roundly " life."
 D'Ormea was wicked, say, some twenty years ;
 A tree so long was stunted ; afterward,
 What if it grew, continued growing, till
 No fellow of the forest equalled it ?
 'T was a stump then ; a stump it still must be :
 While forward saplings, at the outset checked,
 In virtue of that first sprout keep their style
 Amid the forest's green fraternity.
 Thus I shoot up to surely get lopped down
 And bound up for the burning. Now for it !

(Enter CHARLES and POLYXENA with Attendants.)

D'O. [Rises.] Sir, in the due discharge of this my office —

This enforced summons of yourself from Turin,
 And the disclosure I am bound to make
 To-night, — there must already be, I feel,
 So much that wounds . . .

Cha. Well, sir ?

D'O. — That I, perchance,

May utter also what, another time,
 Would irk much, — it may prove less irksome
 now.

Cha. What would you utter ?

D'O. That I from my soul
 Grieve at to-night's event : for you I grieve, E'en grieve for . . .

Cha. Tush, another time for talk !
 My kingdom is in imminent danger ?

D'O. Let
 The Count communicate with France — its
 King,

His grandson, will have Fleury's aid for this.
 Though for no other war.

Cha. First for the levies :
 What forces can I muster presently ?

[D'ORMEA delivers papers which CHARLES inspects.]

Cha. Good — very good. Montorio . . .
 how is this ?

— Equips me double the old complement
 Of soldiers ?

D'O. Since his land has been relieved
 From double imposts, this he manages :

But under the late monarch . . .

Cha. Peace ! I know.
 Count Spava has omitted mentioning
 What proxy is to head these troops of his.

D'O. Count Spava means to head his troops himself.

Something to fight for now ; " Whereas," says
 he,

" Under the sovereign's father " . . .

Cha. It would seem
 That all my people love me.

D'O. Yes.

[To POLYXENA while CHARLES continues to inspect the papers.]

A temper

Like Victor's may avail to keep a state ;
 He terrifies men and they fall not off ;
 Good to restrain : best, if restraint were all.
 But, with the silent circle round him, ends
 Such sway : our King's begins precisely there.
 For to suggest, impel and set at work,
 Is quite another function. Men may slight,
 In time of peace, the King who brought them
 peace :

In war, — his voice, his eyes, help more than
 fear.

They love you, sir !

Cha. [To Attendants.] Bring the regalia
 forth !

Quit the room ! And now, Marquis, answer
 me !

Why should the King of France invade my realm ?

D'O. Why ? Did I not acquaint your Majesty

An hour ago ?

Cha. I choose to hear again

What then I heard.

D'O. Because, sir, as I said,
 Your father is resolved to have his crown
 At any risk ; and, as I judge, calls in
 The foreigner to aid him.

Cha. And your reason
 For saying this ?

D'O. [Aside.] Ay, just his father's way !
 [To CHA.] The Count wrote yesterday to your forces' Chief,

Rhebinder — made demand of help —

Cha. To try

Rhebinder — he 's of alien blood. Aught else ?

D'O. Receiving a refusal,—some hours after,

The Count called on Del Borgo to deliver

The Act of Abdication : he refusing,

Or hesitating, rather —

Cha. What ensued ?

D'O. At midnight, only two hours since, at Turin,

He rode in person to the citadel

With one attendant, to Soccorso gate,

And bade the governor, San Remi, open —

Admit him.

Cha. For a purpose I divine.

These three were faithful, then ?

D'O. They told it me :

And I —

Cha. Most faithful —

D'O. Tell it you — with this

Moreover of my own : if, an hour hence,

You have not interposed, the Count will be

O' the road to France for succor.

Cha. Very good !

You do your duty now to me your monarch

Fully, I warrant — have, that is, your project

For saving both of us disgrace, no doubt ?

D'O. I give my counsel, — and the only one.

A month since, I besought you to employ

Restraints which had prevented many a pang :

But now the harsher course must be pursued.

These papers, made for the emergency,

Will pain you to subscribe : this is a list

Of those suspected merely — men to watch ;

This — of the few of the Count's very household

You must, however reluctantly, arrest ;

While here 's a method of remonstrance — sure

Not stronger than the case demands — to take

With the Count's self.

Cha. Deliver those three papers.

Pol. [While CHARLES inspects them — to D'ORMEA.]

Your measures are not over-harsh, sir : France

Will hardly be deterred from her intents

By these.

D'O. If who proposes might dispose,

I could soon satisfy you. Even these,

Hear what he 'll say at my presenting !

Cha. [who has signed them.] There !

About the warrants ! You 've my signature.

What turns you pale ? I do my duty by you

In acting boldly thus on your advice.

D'O. [Reading them separately.] Arrest the people I suspected merely ?

Cha. Did you suspect them ?

D'O. Doubtless : but — but — sir,

This Forquieri 's governor of Turin,

And Rivarol and he have influence over

Half of the capital ! Rabella, too ?

Why, sir —

Cha. Oh, leave the fear to me !

D'O. [Still reading.] You bid me

Incarcerate the people on this list ?

Sir —

Cha. But you never bade arrest those men,

So close related to my father too,

On trifling grounds ?

D'O.

Oh, as for that, St. George,

President of Chambery's senators,

Is hatching treason ! still —

[More troubled.] Sir, Count Cumiane
Is brother to your father's wife ! What 's
here ?

Arrest the wife herself ?

Cha. You seem to think

A venial crime this plot against me. Well ?

D'O. [who has read the last paper.] Wherefore am I thus ruined ? Why not take

My life at once ? This poor formality

Is, let me say, unworthy you ! Prevent it

You, madam ! I have served you, am prepared

For all disgraces : only, let disgrace

Be plain, be proper — proper for the world !

To pass its judgment on 'twixt you and me !

Take back your warrant, I will none of it !

Cha. Here is a man to talk of fickleness !

He stakes his life upon my father's falsehood ;

I bid him . . .

D'O. Not you ! Were he trebly false,

You do not bid me . . .

Cha. Is 't not written there ?

I thought so : give — I 'll set it right.

D'O. Is it there ?

Oh yes, and plain — arrest him now — drag
here

Your father ! And were all six times as plain,

Do you suppose I trust it ?

Cha. Just one word !

You bring him, taken in the act of flight,

Or else your life is forfeit.

D'O. Ay, to Turin

I bring him, and to-morrow ?

Cha. Here and now !

The whole thing is a lie, a hateful lie,

As I believed and as my father said.

I knew it from the first, but was compelled

To circumvent you ; and the great D'Ormea,

That baffled Alberoni and tricked Coscia,

The miserably sower of such discord

'Twixt sire and son, is in the toils at last.

Oh I see ! you arrive — this plan of yours,

Weak as it is, torments sufficiently

A sick old peevish man — wrings hasty speech,

An ill-considered threat from him ; that 's noted ;

Then out you ferret papers, his amusement

In lonely hours of lassitude — examine

The day-by-day report of your paid spies —

And back you come : all was not ripe, you find,

And, as you hope, may keep from ripening yet.

But you were in bare time ! Only, 't were best

I never saw my father — these old men

Are potent in excuses : and meanwhile,

D'Ormea 's the man I cannot do without !

Pol. Charles —

Cha. Ah, no question ! You against me too !

You 'd have me eat and drink and sleep, live,
die,

With this lie coiled about me, choking me !

No, no, D'Ormea ! You venture life, you say,

Upon my father's perfidy : and I

Have, on the whole, no right to disregard

The chains of testimony you thus wind

About me ; though I do — do from my soul.

Discredit them: still I must authorize
These measures, and I will. Perugia!

[Many Officers enter.] Count —
You and Solar, with all the force you have,
Stand at the Marquis' orders: what he bids,
Implicitly perform! You are to bring
A traitor here; the man that 's likest one
At present, fronts me; you are at his beck
For a full hour! he undertakes to show
A fouler than himself, — but, failing that,
Return with him, and, as my father lives,
He dies this night! The clemency you blame
So oft, shall be revoked — rights exercised,
Too long abjured.

[To D'O.] Now, sir, about the work!
To save your king and country! Take the warrant!

D'O. You hear the sovereign's mandate,
Count Perugia?

Obeys me! As your diligence, expect
Reward! All follow to Montcagliar!

[D'ORMEA goes.]

Cha. [In great anguish.] D'Ormea!
He goes, lit up with that appalling smile!

[To POLYXENA after a pause.]
At least you understand all this?

Pol. These means
Of our defence — these measures of precaution?

Cha. It must be the best way: I should have else

Withered beneath his scorn.

Pol. What would you say?

Cha. Why, do you think I mean to keep the crown, Polyxena?

Pol. You then believe the story
In spite of all — that Victor comes?

Cha. Believe it?

I know that he is coming — feel the strength
That has upheld me leave me at his coming!

'T was mine, and now he takes his own again.
Some kinds of strength are well enough to
have;

But who's to have that strength? Let my crown go!

I meant to keep it; but I cannot — cannot!
Only, he shall not taunt me — he, the first . . .

See if he would not be the first to taunt me
With having left his kingdom at a word,

With letting it be conquered without stroke,
With . . . no — no — 't is no worse than when he left!

I've just to bid him take it, and, that over,
We'll fly away — fly, for I loathe this Turin,

This Rivoli, all titles loathe, all state.

We'd best go to your country — unless God
Send I die now!

Pol. Charles, hear me!

Cha. And again
Shall you be my Polyxena — you'll take me Out of this woe! Yes, do speak, and keep speaking!

I would not let you speak just now, for fear
You'd counsel me against him: but talk, now,

As we two used to talk in blessed times:
Bid me endure all his caprices; take me
From this mad post above him!

Pol. I believe
We are undone, but from a different cause.

All your resources, down to the least guard,
Are at D'Ormea's beck. What if, the while,
He act in concert with your father? We Indeed were lost. This lonely Rivoli —
Where find a better place for them?

Cha. [Pacing the room.] And why

Does Victor come? To undo all that's done,
Restore the past, prevent the future! Seat

His mistress in your seat, and place in mine
. . . Oh, my own people, whom will you find
there,

To ask of, to consult with, to care for,
To hold up with your hands? Whom? One that's false —

False — from the head's crown to the foot's sole, false!

The best is, that I knew it in my heart
From the beginning, and expected this,

And hated you, Polyxena, because You saw through him, though I too saw through
him,

Saw that he meant this while he crowned me,
while

He prayed for me, — nay, while he kissed my brow,

I saw —

Pol. But if your measures take effect,
D'Ormea true to you?

Cha. Then worst of all!

I shall have loosed that callous wretch on him!
Well may the woman taunt him with his child —

I, eating here his bread, clothed in his clothes,
Seated upon his seat, let slip D'Ormea

To outrage him! We talk — perchance he tears

My father from his bed; the old hands feel
For one who is not, but who should be there:

He finds D'Ormea! D'Ormea too finds him!
The crowded chamber when the lights go
out —

Closed doors — the horrid scuffle in the dark —
The accursed prompting of the minute! My guards!

To horse — and after, with me — and prevent!

Pol. [Seizing his hand.] King Charles!
Pause here upon this strip of time

Allotted you out of eternity!

Crowns are from God: you in his name hold
yours.

Your life's no least thing, were it fit your life
Should be abjured along with rule; but now,

Keep both! Your duty is to live and rule —
You, who would vulgarly look fine enough
In the world's eye, deserting your soul's
charge, —

Ay, you would have men's praise, this Rivoli
Would be illumined! While, as 't is, no doubt,

Something of stain will ever rest on you;
No one will rightly know why you refused
To abdicate; they'll talk of deeds you could
Have done, no doubt, — nor do I much expect
Future achievement will blot out the past,

Envelope it in haze — nor shall we two
Live happy any more. 'T will be, I feel,
Only in moments that the duty's seen
As palpably as now: the months, the years
Of painful indistinctness are to come,

While daily must we tread these palace-rooms

Pregnant with memories of the past: your eye
May turn to mine and find no comfort there,
Through fancies that beset me, as yourself,
Of other courses, with far other issues,
We might have taken this great night: such bear,

As I will bear! What matters happiness?
Duty! There's man's one moment: this is
yours!

[Putting the crown on his head, and the sceptre in his hand, she places him on his seat: a long pause and silence.]

(Enter D'ORMEA and VICTOR, with Guards.)

Vic. At last I speak; but once — that once, to you!

'T is you I ask, not these your varletry,
Who's King of us?

Cha. [From his seat.] Count Tende . . .

Vic. What your spies

Assert I ponder in my soul, I say —
Here to your face, amid your guards! I choose 'To take again the crown whose shadow I gave —
For still its potency surrounds the weak

White locks their felon hands have discomposed.
Or I'll not ask who's King, but simply, who Withholds the crown I claim? Deliver it!
I have no friend in the wide world: nor France
Nor England cares for me: you see the sum
Of what I can avail. Deliver it!

Cha. Take it, my father!

And now say in turn,

Was it done well, my father — sure not well,
To try me thus! I might have seen much cause
For keeping it — too easily seen cause!
But, from that moment, e'en more woefully
My life had pined away, than pine it will.
Already you have much to answer for.
My life to pine is nothing, — her sunk eyes
Were happy once! No doubt, my people think
I am their King still . . . but I cannot strive!
Take it!

Vic. [One hand on the crown CHARLES offers,
the other on his neck.] So few years give it quietly,

My son! It will drop from me. See you
not?

A crown's unlike a sword to give away —
That, let a strong hand to a weak hand give!
But crowns should slip from palsied brows to heads

Young as this head: yet mine is weak enough,
E'en weaker than I knew. I seek for phrases
To vindicate my right. 'T is of a piece!
All is alike gone by with me — who beat
Once D'Orleans in his lines — his very lines!
To have been Eugene's comrade, Louis's rival,
And now . . .

Cha. [Putting the crown on him, to the rest.]
The King speaks, yet none kneels, I
think!

Vic. I am then King! As I became a King

Despite the nations, kept myself a King,
So I die King, with Kingship dying too
Around me! I have lasted Europe's time!
What wants my story of completion? Where Must needs the damning break show? Who mistrusts

My children here — tell they of any break
'Twixt my day's sunrise and its fiery fall?
And who were by me when I died but they?
D'Ormea there!

Cha. What means he?

Vic. Ever there!

Charles — how to save your story! Mine must
go!

Say — say that you refused the crown to me!
Charles, yours shall be my story! You im-mured

Me, say, at Rivoli. A single year
I spend without a sight of you, then die.
That will serve every purpose — tell that tale
The world!

Cha. Mistrust me? Help!

Vic. Past help, past reach!

'T is in the heart — you cannot reach the heart:
This broke mine, that I did believe, you,
Charles,

Would have denied me and disgraced me.

Pol. Charles

Has never ceased to be your subject, sir!
He reigned at first through setting up yourself
As pattern: if he e'er seemed harsh to you,
'T was from a too intense appreciation
Of your own character: he acted you —
Ne'er for an instant did I think it real,
Nor look for any other than this end.
I hold him worlds the worse on that account;
But so it was.

Cha. [To POL.] I love you now indeed!

[To VIC.] You never knew me!

Vic. Hardly till this moment,

When I seem learning many other things
Because the time for using them is past.
If 't were to do again! That's idly wished.
Truthfulness might prove policy as good
As guile. Is this my daughter's forehead?
Yes:

I've made it fitter now to be a queen's
Than formerly: I've ploughed the deep lines
there

Which keep too well a crown from slipping off.
No matter. Guile has made me King again.

Louis — 't was in King Victor's time: — long
since,

When Louis reigned and, also, Victor reigned.
How the world talks already of us two!
God of eclipse and each discolored star,
Why do I linger then?

Ha! Where lurks he?

D'Ormea! Nearer to your King! Now stand!

[Collecting his strength, as D'ORMEA approaches.
You lied, D'Ormea! I do not repent. [Dies

DRAMATIC LYRICS

THE third number of Bells and Pomegranates, published in 1842, contained a collection of short poems under the general head of Dramatic Lyrics. When Browning made his first collective edition, he redistributed all his groups of poems, retaining this title and making it cover some of the poems included in the original group, but many more first published under other headings. The arrangement here given is that adopted finally by Browning. "Such Poems," he says, "as the majority in this volume (Dramatic Lyrics) might also come properly enough, I suppose, under the head of Dramatic Pieces; being, though often Lyric in expression, always Dramatic in principle, and so many utterances of so many imaginary persons, not mine. Part of the Poems were inscribed to my dear friend, John Kenyon; I hope the whole may obtain the honor of an association with his memory."

The third of the Cavalier Tunes was originally entitled My Wife Gertrude. The three songs have been set to music by Dr. Villiers Stanford

CAVALIER TUNES

I. MARCHING ALONG

KENTISH Sir Byng stood for his King,
Bidding the crop-headed Parliament swing;
And, pressing a troop unable to stoop
And see the rogues flourish and honest folk droop,
Marched them along, fifty-score strong,
Great-hearted gentlemen, singing this song.

God for King Charles! Pym and such carles
To the Devil that prompts 'em their treasonous parles!
Cavaliers, up! Lips from the cup,
Hands from the pasty, nor bite take nor sup
Till you 're—

CHORUS. — Marching along, fifty-score strong,
Great-hearted gentlemen, singing
this song.

Hampden to hell, and his obsequies' knell.
Serve Hazelrig, Fiennes, and young Harry as well!

England, good cheer! Rupert is near!
Kentish and loyalists, keep we not here.

CHO. — Marching along, fifty-score strong,
Great-hearted gentlemen, singing this song?

Then, God for King Charles! Pym and his snarls
To the Devil that pricks on such pestilent carles!

Hold by the right, you double your might;
So, onward to Nottingham, fresh for the fight,

CHO. — March we along, fifty-score strong,
Great-hearted gentlemen, singing this song!

II. GIVE A ROUSE

King Charles, and who 'll do him right now?
King Charles, and who 's ripe for fight now?
Give a rouse: here 's, in hell's despite now,
King Charles!

Who gave me the goods that went since?
Who raised me the house that sank once?
Who helped me to gold I spent since?
Who found me in wine you drank once?

CHO. — King Charles, and who 'll do him right now?

King Charles, and who 's ripe for fight now?

Give a rouse: here 's, in hell's de spite now,

King Charles!

To whom used my boy George quaff else,
By the old fool's side that begot him?
For whom did he cheer and laugh else,
While Noll's damned troopers shot him?

CHO. — King Charles, and who 'll do him right now?

King Charles, and who 's ripe for fight now?

Give a rouse: here 's, in hell's de spite now,

King Charles!

III. BOOT AND SADDLE

Boot, saddle, to horse, and away!
Rescue my castle before the hot day
Brightens to blue from its silvery gray.

CHO. — Boot, saddle, to horse, and away!

Ride past the suburbs, asleep as you 'd say;
Many 's the friend there, will listen and pray
"God's luck to gallants that strike up the lay—
CHO. — Boot, saddle, to horse, and away!"

Forty miles off, like a roebuck at bay,
Flouts my castle Brancepeth the Roundheads' array:

Who laughs, "Good fellows ere this, by my fay,
CHO. — Boot, saddle, to horse, and away!"

Who? My wife Gertrude; that, honest and gay,

Laughs when you talk of surrendering, "Nay!
I 've better counsellors; what counsel they?"

CHO. — Boot, saddle, to horse, and away!

THE LOST LEADER

Browning was beset with questions by people asking if he referred to Wordsworth in this poem. He answered the question more than once, as an artist would : the following letter to Rev. A. B. Grosart, the editor of Wordsworth's Prose Works, sufficiently states his position.

" 19 Warwick-Crescent, W., Feb. 24, '75.

" DEAR MR. GROSART, — I have been asked the question you now address me with, and as duly answered it, I can't remember how many times ; there is no sort of objection to one more assurance or rather confession, on my part, that I did in my hasty youth presume to use the great and venerated personality of Wordsworth as a sort of painter's model ; one from which this or the other particular feature may be selected and turned to account ; had I intended more, above all, such a boldness as portraying the entire man, I should not have talked about ' handfuls of silver and bits of ribbon.' These never influenced the change of politics in the great poet, whose defection, nevertheless, accompanied as it was by a regular face-about of his special party, was to my juvenile apprehension, and even mature consideration, an event to deplore. But just as in the tapestry on my wall I can recognize figures which have struck out a fancy, on occasion, that though truly enough thus derived, yet would be preposterous as a copy, so, though I dare not deny the original of my little poem, I altogether refuse to have it considered as the ' very effigies' of such a moral and intellectual superiority.

" Faithfully yours,

" ROBERT BROWNING."

JUST for a handful of silver he left us,

Just for a riband to stick in his coat —

Found the one gift of which fortune bereft us,

Lost all the others she lets us devote ;

They, with the gold to give, doled him out silver,

So much was theirs who so little allowed :

How all our copper had gone for his service !

Rags — were they purple, his heart had been proud !

We that had loved him so, followed him, honored him,

Lived in his mild and magnificent eye,

Learned his great language, caught his clear accents,

Made him our pattern to live and to die !

Shakespeare was of us, Milton was of us,

Burns, Shelley, were with us, — they watch from their graves !

He alone breaks from the van and the freemen,

— He alone sinks to the rear and the slaves !

We shall march prospering, — not through his presence ;

Songs may inspirit us, — not from his lyre ;
Deeds will be done, — while he boasts his quiescence,

Still bidding crouch whom the rest bade aspire :

Blot out his name, then, record one lost soul more,

One task more declined, one more footpath untrod,

One more devils'-triumph and sorrow for angels,

One wrong more to man, one more insult to God !

Life's night begins : let him never come back to us !

There would be doubt, hesitation and pain,
Forced praise on our part — the glimmer of twilight,

Never glad confident morning again !

Best fight on well, for we taught him — strike gallantly,

Menace our heart ere we master his own ;
Then let him receive the new knowledge and wait us,

Pardoned in heaven, the first by the throne !

"HOW THEY BROUGHT THE GOOD NEWS FROM GHENT TO AIX"

Browning wrote to an American inquirer about this poem : " There is no sort of historical foundation for the poem about ' Good News from Ghent.' I wrote it under the bulwark of a vessel, off the African coast, after I had been at sea long enough to appreciate even the fancy of a gallop on the back of a certain good horse ' York,' then in my stable at home. It was written in pencil on the fly-leaf of Bartoli's Simboli, I remember."

[16—]

I SPRANG to the stirrup, and Joris, and he ;
I galloped, Dirck galloped, we galloped all three ;

" Good speed ! " cried the watch, as the gatebolts undrew ;

" Speed ! " echoed the wall to us galloping through ;

Behind shut the postern, the lights sank to rest,

And into the midnight we galloped abreast.

Not a word to each other ; we kept the great pace

Neck by neck, stride by stride, never changing our place ;

I turned in my saddle and made its girths tight,
Then shortened each stirrup, and set the pique right,

Rebuckled the cheek-strap, chained slacker the bit,

Nor galloped less steadily Roland a whit.

'T was moonset at starting ; but while we drew near Lokeren, the cocks crew and twilight dawned
 clear ;
 At Boom, a great yellow star came out to see ;
 At Düffeld, 't was morning as plain as could
 be ;
 And from Mecheln church-steeple we heard the half-chime,
 So Joris broke silence with, "Yet there is
 time !"

At Aershot, up leaped of a sudden the sun,
 And against him the cattle stood black every
 one,
 To stare through the mist at us galloping past,
 And I saw my stout galloper Roland at last,
 With resolute shoulders, each butting away
 The haze, as some bluff river headland its spray :

And his low head and crest, just one sharp ear
 bent back
 For my voice, and the other pricked out on his track ;
 And one eye's black intelligence, — ever that glance
 O'er its white edge at me, his own master, askance !
 And the thick heavy spume-flakes which aye
 and anon
 His fierce lips shook upwards in galloping on.

By Hasselt, Dirck groaned ; and cried Joris,
 "Stay spur !
 Your Roos galloped bravely, the fault 's not in
 her,
 We'll remember at Aix" — for one heard the quick wheeze
 Of her chest, saw the stretched neck and staggering knees,
 And sunk tail, and horrible heave of the flank,
 As down on her haunches she shuddered and sank.

So, we were left galloping, Joris and I,
 Past Looz and past Tongres, no cloud in the sky ;
 The broad sun above laughed a pitiless laugh,
 'Neath our feet broke the brittle bright stubble like chaff ;
 Till over by Dalhem a dome-spire sprang white,
 And "Gallop," gasped Joris, "for Aix is in sight !"

"How they'll greet us !" — and all in a moment his roan
 Rolled neck and croup over, lay dead as a stone ;
 And there was my Roland to bear the whole weight
 Of the news which alone could save Aix from her fate,
 With his nostrils like pits full of blood to the brim,
 And with circles of red for his eye-sockets' rim.

Then I cast loose my buffcoat, each holster let fall,
 Shook off both my jack-boots, let go belt and all,

Stood up in the stirrup, leaned, patted his ear, Called my Roland his pet-name, my horse without peer ;
 Clapped my hands, laughed and sang, any noise,
 bad or good,
 Till at length into Aix Roland galloped and stood.

And all I remember is — friends flocking round
 As I sat with his head 'twixt my knees on the
 ground ;
 And no voice but was praising this Roland of
 mine,
 As I poured down his throat our last measure
 of wine,
 Which (the burgesses voted by common consent)
 Was no more than his due who brought good news from Ghent.

THROUGH THE METIDJA TO ABD-EL-KADR

As I ride, as I ride,
 With a full heart for my guide,
 So its tide rocks my side,
 As I ride, as I ride,
 That, as I were double-eyed,
 He, in whom our Tribes confide,
 Is desried, ways untried,
 As I ride, as I ride.

As I ride, as I ride
 To our Chief and his Allied,
 Who dares chide my heart's pride
 As I ride, as I ride ?
 Or are witnesses denied —
 Through the desert waste and wide
 Do I glide unespied
 As I ride, as I ride ?

As I ride, as I ride,
 When an inner voice has cried,
 The sands slide, nor abide
 (As I ride, as I ride)
 O'er each visioned homicide
 That came vaunting (has he lied ?)
 To reside — where he died,
 As I ride, as I ride.

As I ride, as I ride,
 Ne'er has spur my swift horse plied,
 Yet his hide, streaked and pied,
 As I ride, as I ride,
 Shows where sweat has sprung and dried,
 — Zebra-footed, ostrich-thighed —
 How has vied stride with stride
 As I ride, as I ride !

As I ride, as I ride,
 Could I loose what Fate has tied,
 Ere I pried, she should hide
 (As I ride, as I ride)
 All that 's meant me — satisfied
 When the Prophet and the Bride
 Stop veins I'd have subside
 As I ride, as I ride !

NATIONALITY IN DRINKS

The first two of this group, under the titles Claret and Tokay, were published in Hood's Magazine, June, 1844, at the request of Richard Monckton Milnes, who was editing the magazine during Hood's illness. The third, first entitled Beer, was called out by the description of Nelson's coat at Greenwich, given by the captain of the vessel in which Browning was sailing to Italy.

I

MY heart sank with our Claret-flask,
Just now, beneath the heavy sedges
That serve this pond's black face for mask;
And still at yonder broken edges
O' the hole, where up the bubbles glisten,
After my heart I look and listen.

Our laughing little flask, compelled Through depth to depth more bleak and shady;
As when, both arms beside her held,
Feet straightened out, some gay French lady
Is caught up from life's light and motion,
And dropped into death's silent ocean!

II

— Up jumped Tokay on our table,
Like a pygmy castle-warder,
Dwarfish to see, but stout and able,
Arms and accoutrements all in order;
And fierce he looked North, then, wheeling South,
Blew with his bugle a challenge to Drouth,
Cocked his flap-hat with the tosspot-feather,
Twisted his thumb in his red moustache,
Jingled his huge brass spurs together,
Tightened his waist with its Buda sash,
And then, with an impudence naught could abash,
Shrugged his hump-shoulder, to tell the beholder,
For twenty such knaves he should laugh but the bolder:
And so, with his sword-hilt gallantly jutting,
And dexter-hand on his haunch abutting,
Went the little man, Sir Ausbruch, strutting!

III

— Here 's to Nelson's memory!
'T is the second time that I, at sea,
Right off Cape Trafalgar here,
Have drunk it deep in British Beer.
Nelson forever — any time
Am I his to command in prose or rhyme!
Give me of Nelson only a touch,
And I save it, be it little or much:
Here 's one our Captain gives, and so
Down at the word, by George, shall it go!
He says that at Greenwich they point the beholder
To Nelson's coat, "still with tar on the shoulder:

For he used to lean with one shoulder digging,
Jigging, as it were, and zig-zag-zigging
Up against the mizzen-rigging!"

GARDEN FANCIES

These two poems also appeared in Hood's Magazine, July, 1844.

I. THE FLOWER'S NAME

HERE 's the garden she walked across,
Arm in my arm, such a short while since:
Hark, now I push its wicket, the moss
Hinders the hinges and makes them wince!
She must have reached this shrub ere she turned,
As back with that murmur the wicket swung;
For she laid the poor snail, my chance foot
spurned,
To feed and forget it the leaves among.

Down this side of the gravel-walk
She went while her robe's edge brushed the box:
And here she paused in her gracious talk
To point me a moth on the milk-white phlox.
Roses, ranged in valiant row,
I will never think that she passed you by!
She loves you, noble roses, I know;
But yonder, see, where the rock-plants lie!

This flower she stopped at, finger on lip,
Stooped over, in doubt, as settling its claim;
Till she gave me, with pride to make no slip,
Its soft meandering Spanish name:
What a name! Was it love or praise?
Speech half-asleep or song half-awake?
I must learn Spanish, one of these days,
Only for that slow sweet name's sake.

Roses, if I live and do well,
I may bring her, one of these days,
To fix you fast with as fine a spell,
Fit you each with his Spanish phrase;
But do not detain me now; for she lingers
There, like sunshine over the ground,
And ever I see her soft white fingers
Searching after the bud she found.

Flower, you Spaniard, look that you grow not,
Stay as you are and be loved forever!
Bud, if I kiss you 't is that you blow not,
Mind, the shut pink mouth opens never!
For while it pouts, her fingers wrestle,
Twinkling the audacious leaves between,
Till round they turn and down they nestle —
Is not the dear mark still to be seen?

Where I find her not, beauties vanish;
Whither I follow her, beauties flee;
Is there no method to tell her in Spanish June's twice June since she breathed it with
me?
Come, bud, show me the least of her traces,
Treasure my lady's lightest footfall!
— Ah, you may flout and turn up your faces —
Roses, you are not so fair after all!

II. SIBRANDUS SCHAFNABURGENSIS

Plague take all your pedants, say I !

He who wrote what I hold in my hand,
Centuries back was so good as to die,
Leaving this rubbish to cumber the land ;
This, that was a book in its time,
Printed on paper and bound in leather,
Last month in the white of a matin-prime,
Just when the birds sang all together.

Into the garden I brought it to read,
And under the arbut and laurustine
Read it, so help me grace in my need,
From title-page to closing line.
Chapter on chapter did I count,
As a curious traveller counts Stonehenge ;
Added up the mortal amount ;
And then proceeded to my revenge.

Yonder 's a plum-tree with a crevice
An owl would build in, were he but sage ;
For a lap of moss, like a fine pont-levis
In a castle of the Middle Age,
Joins to a lip of gum, pure amber ;
When he 'd be private, there might he spend
Hours alone in his lady's chamber :
Into this crevice I dropped our friend.

Splash, went he, as under he ducked,
— At the bottom, I knew, rain-drippings stagnate ;
Next, a handful of blossoms I plucked
To bury him with, my bookshelf's magnate ;
Then I went in-doors, brought out a loaf,
Half a cheese, and a bottle of Chablis ;
Lay on the grass and forgot the oaf
Over a jolly chapter of Rabelais.

Now, this morning, betwixt the moss
And gum that locked our friend in limbo,
A spider had spun his web across,
And sat in the midst with arms akimbo :
So, I took pity, for learning's sake,
And, de profundis, accentibus letis,
Cantate! quoth I, as I got a rake ;
And up I fished his delectable treatise.

Here you have it, dry in the sun,
With all the binding all of a blister,
And great blue spots where the ink has run,
And reddish streaks that wink and glisten
O'er the page so beautifully yellow :
Oh, well have the droppings played their tricks !
Did he guess how toadstools grow, this fellow ?
Here 's one stuck in his chapter six !

How did he like it when the live creatures
Tickled and toused and browsed him all
over,
And worm, slug, eft, with serious features,
Came in, each one, for his right of trover ?
— When the water-beetle with great blind deaf
face
Made of her eggs the stately deposit,

And the newt borrowed just so much of the preface
As tiled in the top of his black wife's closet ?

All that life and fun and romping,
All that frisking and twisting and coupling,
While slowly our poor friend's leaves were swamping
And clasps were cracking and covers suppling !
As if you had carried sour John Knox
To the play-house at Paris, Vienna or Munich,
Fastened him into a front-row box,
And danced off the ballet with trousers and tunic.

Come, old martyr ! What, torment enough is it ?
Back to my room shall you take your sweet
self.
Good-bye, mother-beetle ; husband-eft, sufficit!
See the snug niche I have made on my shelf !
A's book shall prop you up, B's shall cover you.
Here 's C to be grave with, or D to be gay,
And with E on each side, and F right over you,
Dry-rot at ease till the Judgment-day !

SOLILOQUY OF THE SPANISH
CLOISTER

When first printed in Bells and Pomegranates, this poem was the second of a group of two bearing the general title Camp and Cloister, the first of the two being Incident of the French Camp.

GR-R-R — there go, my heart's abhorrence !
Water your damned flower-pots, do !
If hate killed men, Brother Lawrence,
God's blood, would not mine kill you !
What ? your myrtle-bush wants trimming ?
Oh, that rose has prior claims —
Needs its leaden vase filled brimming ?
Hell dry you up with its flames !

At the meal we sit together :
Salve tibi! I must hear
Wise talk of the kind of weather,
Sort of season, time of year :
*Not a plenteous cork-crop : scarcely
Dare we hope oak-galls, I doubt ;
What 's the Latin name for "parsley" ?
What 's the Greek name for Swine's Snout ?*

Whew ! We 'll have our platter burnished,
Laid with care on our own shelf !
With a fire-new spoon we 're furnished,
And a goblet for ourself,
Rinsed like something sacrificial
Ere 't is fit to touch our chaps —
Marked with L for our initial !
(He-he ! There his lily snaps !)

Saint, forsooth ! While brown Dolores Squats outside the Convent bank
With Sanchicha, telling stories,
Steeping tresses in the tank,
Blue-black, lustrous, thick like horsehairs,
— Can't I see his dead eye glow,

Bright as 't were a Barbary corsair's?
(That is, if he 'd let it show!)

When he finishes refection,
Knife and fork he never lays
Cross-wise, to my recollection,
As do I, in Jesu's praise.
I the Trinity illustrate,
Drinking watered orange-pulp —
In three sips the Arian frustrate;
While he drains his at one gulp.

Oh, those melons! If he 's able
We 're to have a feast! so nice!
One goes to the Abbot's table,
All of us get each a slice.
How go on your flowers? None double?
Not one fruit-sort can you spy?
Strange! — And I, too, at such trouble
Keep them close-nipped on the sly!

There's a great text in Galatians,
Once you trip on it, entails
Twenty-nine distinct damnations,
One sure, if another fails:
If I trip him just a-dying,
Sure of heaven as sure can be,
Spin him round and send him flying
Off to hell, a Manichee?

Or, my serofulous French novel
On gray paper with blunt type!
Simply glance at it, you grovel
Hand and foot in Belial's gripe:
If I double down its pages
At the woeful sixteenth print,
When he gathers his greengages,
Ope a sieve and slip it in 't?

Or, there 's Satan! — one might venture
Pledge one's soul to him, yet leave
Such a flaw in the indenture
As he 'd miss till, past retrieve,
Blasted lay that rose-acacia
We 're so proud of! Hy, Zy, Hine . . .
'St, there 's Vespers! Plena gratiâ,
Ave, Virgo! Gr-r-r — you swine!

THE LABORATORY

ANCIEN RÉGIME

Published first in Hood's Magazine, June, 1844. In Bells and Pomegranates it was grouped with The Confessional under the title France and Spain.

Now that I, tying thy glass mask tightly,
May gaze through these faint smokes curling whitely,
As thou pliest thy trade in this devil's-smithy —
Which is the poison to poison her, prithee?

He is with her, and they know that I know
Where they are, what they do: they believe my tears flow

While they laugh, laugh at me, at me fled to the drear
Empty church, to pray God in, for them! — I am here.

Grind away, moisten and mash up thy paste,
Pound at thy powder, — I am not in haste!
Better sit thus, and observe thy strange things,
Than go where men wait me and dance at the King's.

That in the mortar — you call it a gum?
Ah, the brave tree whence such gold ooings
come!
And yonder soft phial, the exquisite blue,
Sure to taste sweetly, — is that poison too?

Had I but all of them, thee and thy treasures,
What a wild crowd of invisible pleasures!
To carry pure death in an earring, a casket,
A signet, a fan-mount, a filigree basket!

Soon, at the King's, a mere lozenge to give,
And Pauline should have just thirty minutes to live!
But to light a pastile, and Elise, with her head
And her breast and her arms and her hands, should drop dead!

Quick — is it finished? The color 's too grim!
Why not soft like the phial's, enticing and
dim?
Let it brighten her drink, let her turn it and
stir,
And try it and taste, ere she fix and prefer!

What a drop! She 's not little, no minion like
me!
That 's why she ensnared him: this never will
free
The soul from those masculine eyes, — say,
"no!"
To that pulse's magnificent come-and-go.

For only last night, as they whispered, I brought
My own eyes to bear on her so, that I thought Could I keep them one half minute fixed, she would fall
Shrivelled; she fell not; yet this does it all!

Not that I bid you spare her the pain;
Let death be felt and the proof remain:
Brand, burn up, bite into its grace —
He is sure to remember her dying face!

Is it done? Take my mask off! Nay, be not morose;
It kills her, and this prevents seeing it close:
'The delicate droplet, my whole fortune's fee!
If it hurts her, beside, can it ever hurt me?

Now, take all my jewels, gorge gold to your fill,
You may kiss me, old man, on my mouth if you will!
But brush this dust off me, lest horror it brings Ere I know it — next moment I dance at the King's!

THE CONFESSIONAL

SPAIN

It is a lie — their Priests, their Pope,
 Their Saints, their . . . all they fear or hope
 Are lies, and lies — there! through my door
 And ceiling, there! and walls and floor,
 There, lies, they lie — shall still be hurled
 Till spite of them I reach the world!

You think Priests just and holy men!
 Before they put me in this den
 I was a human creature too,
 With flesh and blood like one of you,
 A girl that laughed in beauty's pride
 Like lilies in your world outside.

I had a lover — shame avaunt!
 This poor wrenched body, grim and gaunt,
 Was kissed all over till it burned,
 By lips the truest, love e'er turned
 His heart's own tint: one night they kissed
 My soul out in a burning mist.

So, next day when the accustomed train
 Of things grew round my sense again,
 "That is a sin," I said: and slow
 With downcast eyes to church I go,
 And pass to the confession-chair,
 And tell the old mild father there.

But when I falter Beltran's name,
 "Ha!" quoth the father; "much I blame
 The sin; yet wherefore idly grieve?
 Despair not — strenuously retrieve!
 Nay, I will turn this love of thine
 To lawful love, almost divine;

"For he is young, and led astray,
 This Beltran, and he schemes, men say,
 To change the laws of church and state;
 So, thine shall be an angel's fate,
 Who, ere the thunder breaks, should roll
 Its cloud away and save his soul.

"For, when he lies upon thy breast,
 Thou mayest demand and be possessed
 Of all his plans, and next day steal
 To me, and all those plans reveal,
 That I and every priest, to purge
 His soul, may fast and use the scourge."

That father's beard was long and white,
 With love and truth his brow seemed bright;
 I went back, all on fire with joy,
 And, that same evening, bade the boy
 Tell me, as lovers should, heart-free,
 Something to prove his love of me.

He told me what he would not tell
 For hope of heaven or fear of hell;
 And I lay listening in such pride!
 And, soon as he had left my side,
 Tripped to the church by morning-light
 To save his soul in his despite.

I told the father all his schemes,
 Who were his comrades, what their dreams;
 "And now make haste," I said, "to pray
 The one spot from his soul away;
 To-night he comes, but not the same
 Will look!" At night he never came.

Nor next night: on the after-morn,
 I went forth with a strength new-born.
 The church was empty; something drew
 My steps into the street; I knew
 It led me to the market-place:
 Where, lo, on high, the father's face!

That horrible black scaffold dressed,
 That stapled block . . . God sink the rest!
 That head strapped back, that blinding vest,
 Those knotted hands and naked breast,
 Till near one busy hangman pressed,
 And, on the neck these arms caressed . . .

No part in aught they hope or fear!
 No heaven with them, no hell! — and here,
 No earth, not so much space as pens
 My body in their worst of dens
 But shall bear God and man my cry,
 Lies — lies, again — and still, they lie!

CRISTINA

In Bells and Pomegranates, this poem was the second of a group headed Queen-Worship, the first being Rudel and the Lady of Tripoli.

SHE should never have looked at me
 If she meant I should not love her!
 There are plenty . . . men, you call such,
 I suppose . . . she may discover
 All her soul to, if she pleases,
 And yet leave much as she found them:
 But I'm not so, and she knew it
 When she fixed me, glancing round them.

What? To fix me thus meant nothing?
 But I can't tell (there's my weakness)
 What her look said! — no vile cant, sure,
 About "need to strew the bleakness
 Of some lone shore with its pearl-seed,
 That the sea feels" — no "strange yearning
 That such souls have, most to lavish
 Where there's chance of least returning."

Oh, we're sunk enough here. God knows!
 But not quite so sunk that moments,
 Sure though seldom, are denied us,
 When the spirit's true endowments
 Stand out plainly from its false ones,
 And apprise it if pursuing
 Or the right way or the wrong way,
 To its triumph or undoing.

There are flashes struck from midnights,
 There are fire-flames noondays kindle,
 Whereby piled-up honors perish,
 Whereby swollen ambitions dwindle,

While just this or that poor impulse,
Which for once had play unstifled,
Seems the sole work of a lifetime,
That away the rest have trifled.

Doubt you if, in some such moment,
As she fixed me, she felt clearly,
Ages past the soul existed,
Here an age 't is resting merely,
And hence fleets again for ages,
While the true end, sole and single,
It stops here for is, this love-way,
With some other soul to mingle?

Else it loses what it lived for,
And eternally must lose it;
Better ends may be in prospect,
Deeper blisses (if you choose it),
But this life's end and this love-bliss
Have been lost here. Doubt you whether
This she felt as, looking at me,
Mine and her souls rushed together?

Oh, observe! Of course, next moment,
The world's honors, in derision,
Trampled out the light forever:
Never fear but there 's provision
Of the devil's to quench knowledge
Lest we walk the earth in rapture!
— Making those who catch God's secret
Just so much more prize their capture!

Such am I: the secret 's mine now!
She has lost me, I have gained her;
Her soul 's mine: and thus, grown perfect,
I shall pass my life's remainder.
Life will just hold out the proving
Both our powers, alone and blended:
And then, come the next life quickly!
This world's use will have been ended.

THE LOST MISTRESS

ALL 's over, then: does truth sound bitter
As one at first believes?
Hark, 't is the sparrows' good-night twitter
About your cottage eaves!

And the leaf-buds on the vine are woolly.
I noticed that, to-day;
One day more bursts them open fully
— You know the red turns gray.

To-morrow we meet the same then, dearest?
May I take your hand in mine?
Mere friends are we, — well, friends the merest
Keep much that I resign:

For each glance of the eye so bright and black
Though I keep with heart's endeavor, —
Your voice, when you wish the snowdrops back,
Though it stay in my soul forever! —

Yet I will but say what mere friends say,
Or only a thought stronger;
I will hold your hand but as long as all may,
Or so very little longer!

EARTH'S IMMORTALITIES

FAME

SEE, as the prettiest graves will do in time,
Our poet's wants the freshness of its prime;
Spite of the sexton's browsing horse, the sods
Have struggled through its binding osier rods;
Headstone and half-sunk footstone lean awry,
Wanting the brick-work promised by-and-by;
How the minute gray lichens, plate o'er plate,
Have softened down the crisp-cut name and date!

LOVE

So, the year 's done with!
(Love me forever!)
All March begun with,
April's endeavor;
May-wreaths that bound me
June needs must sever;
Now snows fall round me,
Quenching June's fever —
(Love me forever!)

MEETING AT NIGHT

This and its companion piece were published originally simply as Night and Morning.

THE gray sea and the long black land;
And the yellow half-moon large and low;
And the startled little waves that leap
In fiery ringlets from their sleep,
As I gain the cove with pushing prow,
And quench its speed i' the slushy sand.

Then a mile of warm sea-scented beach;
Three fields to cross till a farm appears;
A tap at the pane, the quick sharp scratch
And blue spurt of a lighted match,
And a voice less loud, through its joys and
fears,
Than the two hearts beating each to each!

PARTING AT MORNING

ROUND the cape of a sudden came the sea,
And the sun looked over the mountain's rim:
And straight was a path of gold for him,
And the need of a world of men for me.

SONG

NAY but you, who do not love her,
Is she not pure gold, my mistress?
Holds earth aught — speak truth — above her?
Aught like this tress, see, and this tress,
And this last fairest tress of all,
So fair, see, ere I let it fall?

Because you spend your lives in praising;
To praise, you search the wide world over:

Then why not witness, calmly gazing,
 If earth holds aught—speak truth—above
 her?
 Above this tress, and this, I touch
 But cannot praise, I love so much!

A WOMAN'S LAST WORD

LET 's contend no more, Love,
 Strive nor weep:
 All be as before, Love,
 — Only sleep!

What so wild as words are?
 I and thou
 In debate, as birds are,
 Hawk on bough!

See the creature stalking
 While we speak!
 Hush and hide the talking,
 Cheek on cheek!

What so false as truth is,
 False to thee?
 Where the serpent's tooth is Shun the tree—

Where the apple reddens
 Never pry—
 Lest we lose our Edens,
 Eve and I.

Be a god and hold me
 With a charm!
 Be a man and fold me
 With thine arm!

Teach me, only teach, Love!
 As I ought
 I will speak thy speech, Love,
 Think thy thought—

Meet, if thou require it,
 Both demands,
 Laying flesh and spirit
 In thy hands.

That shall be to-morrow,
 Not to-night:
 I must bury sorrow
 Out of sight:

— Must a little weep, Love,
 (Foolish me!)
 And so fall asleep, Love,
 Loved by thee.

EVELYN HOPE

BEAUTIFUL Evelyn Hope is dead!
 Sit and watch by her side an hour.
 That is her book-shelf, this her bed;
 She plucked that piece of geranium-flower,
 Beginning to die too, in the glass;
 Little has yet been changed, I think:

The shutters are shut, no light may pass
 Save two long rays through the hinge's chink.

Sixteen years old when she died!
 Perhaps she had scarcely heard my name;
 It was not her time to love; beside,
 Her life had many a hope and aim,
 Duties enough and little cares,
 And now was quiet, now astir,
 Till God's hand beckoned unawares, —
 And the sweet white brow is all of her.

Is it too late then, Evelyn Hope?
 What, your soul was pure and true,
 The good stars met in your horoscope,
 Made you of spirit, fire and dew—
 And, just because I was thrice as old
 And our paths in the world diverged so wide,
 Each was naught to each, must I be told?
 We were fellow mortals, naught beside?

No, indeed! for God above
 Is great to grant, as mighty to make,
 And creates the love to reward the love:
 I claim you still, for my own love's sake!
 Delayed it may be for more lives yet,
 Through worlds I shall traverse, not a few:
 Much is to learn, much to forget
 Ere the time be come for taking you.

But the time will come, — at last it will,
 When, Evelyn Hope, what meant (I shall say)
 In the lower earth, in the years long still,
 That body and soul so pure and gay?
 Why your hair was amber, I shall divine,
 And your mouth of your own geranium's red—
 And what you would do with me, in fine,
 In the new life come in the old one's stead.

I have lived (I shall say) so much since then,
 Given up myself so many times,
 Gained me the gains of various men,
 Ransacked the ages, spoiled the climes;
 Yet one thing, one, in my soul's full scope,
 Either I missed or itself missed me:
 And I want and find you, Evelyn Hope!
 What is the issue? let us see!

I loved you, Evelyn, all the while!
 My heart seemed full as it could hold;
 There was place and to spare for the frank young smile,
 And the red young mouth, and the hair's
 young gold.
 So, hush, — I will give you this leaf to keep:
 See, I shut it inside the sweet cold hand!
 There, that is our secret: go to sleep!
 You will wake, and remember, and understand.

LOVE AMONG THE RUINS

WHERE the quiet-colored end of evening smiles
 Miles and miles
 On the solitary pastures where our sheep
 Half-asleep

Tinkle homeward through the twilight, stray or stop

As they crop —

Was the site once of a city great and gay,

(So they say)

Of our country's very capital, its prince

Ages since

Held his court in, gathered councils, wielding far
Peace or war.

Now, — the country does not even boast a tree,
As you see,

To distinguish slopes of verdure, certain rills
From the hills

Intersect and give a name to, (else they run Into one.)

Where the domed and daring palace shot its spires

Up like fires

O'er the hundred-gated circuit of a wall

Bounding all,

Made of marble, men might march on nor be pressed,

Twelve abreast.

And such plenty and perfection, see, of grass
Never was!

Such a carpet as, this summer-time, o'erspreads
And embeds

Every vestige of the city, guessed alone,
Stock or stone —

Where a multitude of men breathed joy and woe
Long ago;

Lust of glory pricked their hearts up, dread of shame

Struck them tame;

And that glory and that shame alike, the gold
Bought and sold.

Now, — the single little turret that remains
On the plains,

By the caper overrooted, by the gourd
Overscored,

While the patching houseleek's head of blossom
winks

Through the chinks —

Marks the basement whence a tower in ancient
time

Sprang sublime,

And a burning ring, all round, the chariots traced

As they raced,

And the monarch and his minions and his dames

Viewed the games.

And I know, while thus the quiet-colored eve
Smiles to leave

To their folding, all our many-tinkling fleece
In such peace,

And the slopes and rills in undistinguished gray

Melt away —

That a girl with eager eyes and yellow hair
Waits me there

In the turret whence the charioteers caught
soul

For the goal,

When the king looked, where she looks now, breathless, dumb
Till I come.

But he looked upon the city, every side,
Far and wide,

All the mountains topped with temples, all the glades'

Colonnades,

All the causeys, bridges, aqueducts, — and then,
All the men!

When I do come, she will speak not, she will
stand,

Either hand

On my shoulder, give her eyes the first embrace
Of my face,

Ere we rush, ere we extinguish sight and speech
Each on each.

In one year they sent a million fighters forth

South and North,

And they built their gods a brazen pillar high

As the sky,

Yet reserved a thousand chariots in full force —
Gold, of course.

Oh heart! oh blood that freezes, blood that burns!

Earth's returns

For whole centuries of folly, noise and sin!

Shut them in,

With their triumphs and their glories and the
rest!

Love is best.

A LOVERS' QUARREL

OH, what a dawn of day!

How the March sun feels like May!

All is blue again

After last night's rain,

And the South dries the hawthorn-spray.

Only, my Love's a shadow!

I'd as lief that the blue were gray.

Runnels, which rilllets swell,

Must be dancing down the dell,

With a foaming head

On the beryl bed

Paven smooth as a hermit's cell;

Each with a tale to tell,

Could my Love but attend as well.

Dearest, three months ago!

When we lived blocked-up with snow, —

When the wind would edge

In and in his wedge,

In, as far as the point could go —

Not to our ingle, though,

Where we loved each the other so!

Laughs with so little cause!

We devised games out of straws,

We would try and trace

One another's face

In the ash, as an artist draws;

Free on each other's flaws,

How we chattered like two church-daws!

What 's in the "Times" ? — a scold
 At the Emperor deep and cold ;
     He has taken a bride
     To his gruesome side,
 That 's as fair as himself is bold :
     There they sit ermine-stoled,
 And she powders her hair with gold.

Fancy the Pampas' sheen !
 Miles and miles of gold and green
     Where the sunflowers blow
     In a solid glow,
 And — to break now and then the screen —
     Black neck and eyeballs keen,
 Up a wild horse leaps between !

Try, will our table turn ?
 Lay your hands there light, and yearn
     Till the yearning slips
     Through the finger-tips
 In a fire which a few discern,
     And a very few feel burn,
 And the rest, they may live and learn !

Then we would up and pace,
 For a change, about the place,
     Each with arm o'er neck :
     'T is our quarter-deck,
 We are seamen in woeful case,
     Help in the ocean-space !
 Or, if no help, we 'll embrace.

See, how she looks now, dressed
 In a sledging-cap and vest !
     'T is a huge fur cloak —
     Like a reindeer's yoke
 Falls the lappet along the breast :
     Sleeves for her arms to rest,
 Or to hang, as my Love likes best.

Teach me to flirt a fan
 As the Spanish ladies can,
     Or I tint your lip
     With a burnt stick's tip
 And you turn into such a man !
     Just the two spots that span
 Half the bill of the young male swan.

Dearest, three months ago
 When the mesmerizer Snow
     With his hand's first sweep
     Put the earth to sleep :
 'T was a time when the heart could show
     All — how was earth to know,
 'Neath the mute hand's to-and-fro ?

Dearest, three months ago
 When we loved each other so,
     Lived and loved the same
     Till an evening came
 When a shaft from the devil's bow
     Pierced to our ingle-glow,
 And the friends were friend and foe !

Not from the heart beneath —
 'T was a bubble born of breath,
     Neither sneer nor vaunt,
     Nor reproach nor taunt.

See a word, how it severeth !
     Oh, power of life and death
 In the tongue, as the Preacher saith !

Woman, and will you cast
 For a word, quite off at last
     Me, your own, your You, —
     Since, as truth is true,
 I was You all the happy past —
     Me do you leave aghast
 With the memories We amassed ?

Love, if you knew the light
 That your soul casts in my sight,
     How I look to you
     For the pure and true,
 And the beauteous and the right, —
     Bear with a moment's spite
 When a mere mote threatens the white !

What of a hasty word ?
 Is the fleshly heart not stirred
     By a worm's pin-prick
     Where its roots are quick ?
 See the eye, by a fly's-foot blurred —
     Ear, when a straw is heard
 Scratch the brain's coat of curd !

Foul be the world or fair
 More or less, how can I care ?
     'T is the world the same
     For my praise or blame,
 And endurance is easy there.
     Wrong in the one thing rare —
 Oh, it is hard to bear !

Here 's the spring back or close,
 When the almond-blossom blows ;
     We shall have the word
     In a minor third,
 There is none but the cuckoo knows :
     Heaps of the guelder-rose !
 I must bear with it, I suppose.

Could but November come,
 Were the noisy birds struck dumb
     At the warning slash
     Of his driver's-lash —
 I would laugh like the valiant Thumb
     Facing the castle glum
 And the giant's fee-faw-fun !

Then, were the world well stripped
 Of the gear wherein equipped
     We can stand apart,
     Heart dispense with heart
 In the sun, with the flowers unripp'd, —
     Oh, the world's hangings ripped,
 We were both in a bare-walled crypt !

Each in the crypt would cry
 " But one freezes here ! and why ?
     When a heart, as chill,
     At my own would thrill
 Back to life, and its fires out-fly ?
     Heart, shall we live or die ?
 The rest, . . . settle by and by ! "

So, she 'd efface the score,
And forgive me as before.
It is twelve o'clock :
I shall hear her knock
In the worst of a storm's uproar,
I shall pull her through the door,
I shall have her for evermore !

UP AT A VILLA — DOWN IN THE CITY

(AS DISTINGUISHED BY AN ITALIAN PERSON OF QUALITY)

HAD I but plenty of money, money enough and
to spare,
The house for me, no doubt, was a house in the city-square ;
Ah, such a life, such a life, as one leads at the window there !

Something to see, by Bacchus, something to hear, at least !
There, the whole day long, one's life is a perfect feast ;
While up at a villa one lives, I maintain it, no more than a beast.

Well now, look at our villa ! stuck like the horn of a bull
Just on a mountain-edge as bare as the creature's skull,
Save a mere shag of a bush with hardly a leaf to pull !
— I scratch my own, sometimes, to see if the hair's turned wool.

But the city, oh the city — the square with the houses ! Why ?
They are stone-faced, white as a curd, there's something to take the eye !
Houses in four straight lines, not a single front
awry ;
You watch who crosses and gossips, who saunters, who hurries by ;
Green blinds, as a matter of course, to draw
when the sun gets high ;
And the shops with fanciful signs which are painted properly.

What of a villa ? Though winter be over in March by rights,
'Tis May perhaps ere the snow shall have withered well off the heights :
You've the brown ploughed land before, where the oxen steam and wheeze,
And the hills over-smoked behind by the faint
gray olive-trees.

Is it better in May, I ask you ? You've summer all at once ;
In a day he leaps complete with a few strong
April suns.
'Mid the sharp short emerald wheat, scarce
risen three fingers well,
The wild tulip, at end of its tube, blows out its great red bell
Like a thin clear bubble of blood, for the children to pick and sell.

Is it ever hot in the square ? There's a fountain to spout and splash !
In the shade it sings and springs ; in the shine
such foambows flash
On the horses with curling fish-tails, that prance
and paddle and pash
Round the lady atop in her coach — fifty gazers
do not abash,
Though all that she wears is some weeds round
her waist in a sort of sash.

All the year long at the villa, nothing to see though you linger,
Except yon cypress that points like death's lean lifted forefinger.
Some think fireflies pretty, when they mix i' the corn and mingle,
Or thrid the stinking hemp till the stalks of it seem a-tingle.
Late August or early September, the stunning
cicala is shrill,
And the bees keep their tiresome whine round
the resinous firs on the hill.
Enough of the seasons, — I spare you the months of the fever and chill.

Ere you open your eyes in the city, the blessed church-bells begin :
No sooner the bells leave off than the diligence
rattles in :
You get the pick of the news, and it costs you never a pin.
By and by there's the travelling doctor gives pills, lets blood, draws teeth ;
Or the Pulcinello-trumpet breaks up the market beneath.
At the post-office such a scene-picture — the new play, piping hot !
And a notice how, only this morning, three liberal thieves were shot.
Above it, behold the Archbishop's most fatherly of rebukes,
And beneath, with his crown and his lion, some little new law of the Duke's !
Or a sonnet with flowery marge, to the Reverend Don So-and-so,
Who is Dante, Boccaccio, Petrarca, Saint Jerome, and Cicero,
" And moreover," (the sonnet goes rhyming,)
" the skirts of Saint Paul has reached,
Having preached us those six Lent-lectures more unctuous than ever he preached."
Noon strikes, — here sweeps the procession !
our Lady borne smiling and smart
With a pink gauze gown all spangles, and seven swords stuck in her heart !
Bang-wang-wang goes the drum, tootle-te-
tootle the life ;
No keeping one's haunches still : it's the greatest pleasure in life.

But bless you, it's dear — it's dear ! fowls,
wine, at double the rate.
They have clapped a new tax upon salt, and what oil pays passing the gate
It's a horror to think of. And so, the villa for me, not the city !

Beggars can scarcely be choosers : but still —
 ah, the pity, the pity !
 Look, two and two go the priests, then the monks with cows and sandals,
 And the penitents dressed in white shirts,
 a-holding the yellow candles ;
 One, he carries a flag up straight, and another
 a cross with handles,
 And the Duke's guard brings up the rear, for the better prevention of scandals :
Bang-whang-whang goes the drum, tootle-te-tootle
 the fife.
 Oh, a day in the city-square, there is no such pleasure in life !

A TOCCATA OF GALUPPI'S

Published in Men and Women in 1855. An American author, visiting Browning and his wife at Casa Guidi in 1847, wrote of their occupations : "Mrs. Browning," he said, "was still too much of an invalid to walk, but she sat under the great trees upon the lawn-like hillsides near the convent, or in the seats of the dusky convent chapel, while Robert Browning at the organ chased a fugue, or dreamed out upon the twilight keys a faint throbbing toccata of Galuppi."

Oh Galuppi, Baldassare, this is very sad to find !

I can hardly misconceive you ; it would prove me deaf and blind ;

But although I take your meaning, 't is with such a heavy mind !

Here you come with your old music, and here 's
 all the good it brings.

What, they lived once thus at Venice where the merchants were the kings,

Where St. Mark's is, where the Doges used to wed the sea with rings ?

Ay, because the sea's the street there ; and
 't is arched by . . . what you call

. . . Shylock's bridge with houses on it, where they kept the carnival :

I was never out of England — it's as if I saw it
 all.

Did young people take their pleasure when the sea was warm in May ?

Balls and masks begun at midnight, burning ever to mid-day,

When they made up fresh adventures for the morrow, do you say ?

Was a lady such a lady, cheeks so round and lips so red, —

On her neck the small face buoyant, like a bellflower on its bed,

O'er the breast's superb abundance where a man might base his head ?

Well, and it was graceful of them — they 'd break talk off and afford

— She, to bite her mask's black velvet — he, to finger on his sword,
 While you sat and played Toccatas, stately at the clavichord ?

What ? Those lesser thirds so plaintive, sixths diminished, sigh on sigh,

Told them something ? Those suspensions, those solutions — "Must we die ?"

Those commiserating sevenths — "Life might last ! we can but try !"

"Were you happy ?" — "Yes." — "And are you still as happy ?" — "Yes. And
 you ?"

— "Then, more kisses !" — "Did I stop them, when a million seemed so few ?"

Hark, the dominant's persistence till it must be answered to !

So, an octave struck the answer. Oh, they praised you, I dare say !

"Brave Galuppi ! that was music ! good alike at grave and gay !

I can always leave off talking when I hear a master play !"

Then they left you for their pleasure : till in due time, one by one,

Some with lives that came to nothing, some
 with deeds as well undone,

Death stepped tacitly and took them where they never see the sun.

But when I sit down to reason, think to take my stand nor swerve,

While I triumph o'er a secret wrung from nature's close reserve,

In you come with your cold music till I creep through every nerve.

Yes, you, like a ghostly cricket, creaking where a house was burned :

"Dust and ashes, dead and done with, Venice spent what Venice earned.

The soul, doubtless, is immortal — where a soul
 can be discerned.

"Yours for instance : you know physics, something of geology,

Mathematics are your pastime ; souls shall rise
 in their degree ;

Butterflies may dread extinction, — you 'll not die, it cannot be !

"As for Venice and her people, merely born to bloom and drop,

Here on earth they bore their fruitage, mirth
 and folly were the crop :

What of soul was left, I wonder, when the kissing had to stop ?

"Dust and ashes !" So you creak it, and I want the heart to scold.

Dear dead women, with such hair, too — what 's become of all the gold

Used to hang and brush their bosoms ? I feel chilly and grown old.

OLD PICTURES IN FLORENCE

THE morn when first it thunders in March,
The eel in the pond gives a leap, they say :
As I leaned and looked over the aloed arch
Of the villa-gate this warm March day,
No flash snapped, no dumb thunder rolled
In the valley beneath where, white and wide
And washed by the morning water-gold,
Florence lay out on the mountain-side.

River and bridge and street and square
Lay mine, as much at my beck and call,
Through the live translucent bath of air,
As the sights in a magic crystal ball.
And of all I saw and of all I praised,
The most to praise and the best to see,
Was the startling bell-tower Giotto raised :
But why did it more than startle me ?

Giotto, how, with that soul of yours,
Could you play me false who loved you so ?
Some slights if a certain heart endures
Yet it feels, I would have your fellows know !
I' faith, I perceive not why I should care
To break a silence that suits them best,
But the thing grows somewhat hard to bear
When I find a Giotto join the rest.

On the arch where olives overhead
Print the blue sky with twig and leaf,
(That sharp-curved leaf which they never shed)
'Twixt the aloes, I used to lean in chief,
And mark through the winter afternoons,
By a gift God grants me now and then,
In the mild decline of those suns like moons,
Who walked in Florence, besides her men.

They might chirp and chaffer, come and go
For pleasure or profit, her men alive —
My business was hardly with them, I trow,
But with empty cells of the human hive ;
— With the chapter-room, the cloister-porch,
The church's apsis, aisle or nave,
Its crypt, one fingers along with a torch,
Its face set full for the sun to shave.

Wherever a fresco peels and drops,
Wherever an outline weakens and wanes
Till the latest life in the painting stops,
Stands One whom each fainter pulse-tick
pains :
One, wishful each scrap should clutch the brick,
Each tinge not wholly escape the plaster,
— A lion who dies of an ass's kick,
The wronged great soul of an ancient Master.

For oh, this world and the wrong it does !
They are safe in heaven with their backs to
it,
The Michaels and Rafaels, you hum and buzz
Round the works of, you of the little wit !
Do their eyes contract to the earth's old scope,
Now that they see God face to face,
And have all attained to be poets, I hope ?
'T is their holiday now, in any case.

Much they reckon of your praise and you !
But the wronged great souls — can they be quit
Of a world where their work is all to do,
Where you style them, you of the little wit,
Old Master This and Early the Other,
Not dreaming that Old and New are fellows :
A younger succeeds to an elder brother,
Da Vincis derive in good time from Dellos.

And here where your praise might yield returns,
And a handsome word or two give help,
Here, after your kind, the mastiff grins
And the puppy pack of poodles yelp.
What, not a word for Stefano there,
Of brow once prominent and starry,
Called Nature's Ape, and the world's despair
For his peerless painting ? (See Vasari.)

There stands the Master. Study, my friends,
What a man's work comes to ! So he plans
it,
Performs it, perfects it, makes amends
For the toiling and moiling, and then, sic transit !
Happier the thrifty blind-folk labor,
With upturned eye while the hand is busy,
Not sidling a glance at the coin of their neighbor !
'T is looking downward that makes one dizzy.

"If you knew their work you would deal your dole."
May I take upon me to instruct you ?
When Greek Art ran and reached the goal,
Thus much had the world to boast in fructu —
The Truth of Man, as by God first spoken,
Which the actual generations garble,
Was re-uttered, and Soul (which Limbs betoken)
And Limbs (Soul informs) made new in marble.

So you saw yourself as you wished you were,
As you might have been, as you cannot be ;
Earth here, rebuked by Olympus there :
And grew content in your poor degree
With your little power, by those statues' god-
head,
And your little scope, by their eyes' full sway,
And your little grace, by their grace embodied,
And your little date, by their forms that stay.

You would fain be kinglier, say, than I am ?
Even so, you will not sit like Theseus.
You would prove a model ? The Son of Priam
Has yet the advantage in arms' and knees'
use.
You're wroth — can you slay your snake like Apollo ?
You're grieved — still Niobe's the grander !
You live — there's the Racers' frieze to follow :
You die — there's the dying Alexander.

So, testing your weakness by their strength,
Your meagre charms by their rounded beauty,
Measured by Art in your breadth and length,
You learned — to submit is a mortal's duty.

— When I say “you” ’t is the common soul,
The collective, I mean : the race of Man
That receives life in parts to live in a whole,
And grow here according to God’s clear plan.

Growth came when, looking your last on them
all,

You turned your eyes inwardly one fine day
And cried with a start — What if we so small
Be greater and grander the while than they ?
Are they perfect of lineament, perfect of stature ?

In both, of such lower types are we
Precisely because of our wider nature ;
For time, theirs — ours, for eternity.

To-day’s brief passion limits their range ;
It seethes with the morrow for us and more.
They are perfect — how else ? they shall never
change :

We are faulty — why not ? we have time in store.

The Artificer’s hand is not arrested
With us ; we are rough-hewn, nowise polished :

They stand for our copy, and, once invested
With all they can teach, we shall see them abolished.

’T is a life-long toil till our lump be leaven —
The better ! What’s come to perfection perishes.

Things learned on earth, we shall practise in
heaven :

Works done least rapidly, Art most cherishes.
Thyself shalt afford the example, Giotto !
Thy one work, not to decrease or diminish.
Done at a stroke, was just (was it not ?) “O !”
Thy great Campanile is still to finish.

Is it true that we are now, and shall be hereafter,

But what and where depend on life’s minute ?
Hails heavenly cheer or infernal laughter
Our first step out of the gulf or in it ?
Shall Man, such step within his endeavor,
Man’s face, have no more play and action
Than joy which is crystallized forever,
Or grief, an eternal petrification ?

On which I conclude, that the early painters,
To cries of “Greek Art and what more wish
you ?” —

Replied, “To become now self-acquainters,
And paint man, man, whatever the issue !
Make new hopes shine through the flesh they fray.

New fears aggrandize the rags and tatters :
To bring the invisible full into play !
Let the visible go to the dogs — what matters ?”

Give these, I exhort you, their guerdon and glory

For daring so much, before they well did it.
The first of the new, in our race’s story,
Beats the last of the old ; ’t is no idle quiddit.
The worthies began a revolution,

Which if on earth you intend to acknowledge,
Why, honor them now ! (ends my allocution)
Nor confer your degree when the folk leave college.

There’s a fancy some lean to and others hate —
That, when this life is ended, begins
New work for the soul in another state,
Where it strives and gets weary, loses and wins :

Where the strong and the weak, this world’s congeries,
Repeat in large what they practised in small,
Through life after life in unlimited series ;
Only the scale’s to be changed, that’s all.

Yet I hardly know. When a soul has seen
By the means of Evil that Good is best,
And, through earth and its noise, what is heaven’s serene, —

When our faith in the same has stood the test —

Why, the child grown man, you burn the rod,
The uses of labor are surely done ;
There remaineth a rest for the people of God :
And I have had troubles enough, for one.

But at any rate I have loved the season
Of Art’s spring-birth so dim and dewy ;
My sculptor is Nicolo the Pisan,
My painter — who but Cimabue ?
Nor ever was man of them all indeed,
From these to Ghiberti and Ghirlandajo,
Could say that he missed my critic-meed.
So, now to my special grievance — heigh-ho !

Their ghosts still stand, as I said before,
Watching each fresco flaked and rasped,
Blocked up, knocked out, or whitewashed o’er :
— No getting again what the church has grasped !

The works on the wall must take their chance ;
“Works never conceded to England’s thick clime !”

(I hope they prefer their inheritance
Of a bucketful of Italian quick-lime.)

When they go at length, with such a shaking
Of heads o’er the old delusion, sadly
Each master his way through the black streets taking,

Where many a lost work breathes though badly —
Why don’t they bethink them of who has merited ?

Why not reveal, while their pictures dree
Such doom, how a captive might be out-ferreted ?
Why is it they never remember me ?

Not that I expect the great Bigordi,
Nor Sandro to hear me, chivalric, bellicose ;
Nor the wronged Lippino ; and not a word I
Say of a scrap of Frà Angelico’s :

But are you too fine, Taddeo Gaddi,
To grant me a taste of your intonaco,
Some Jerome that seeks the heaven with a sad
eye ?

Not a churchly saint, Lorenzo Monaco ?

Could not the ghost with the close red cap,
My Pollajolo, the twice a craftsman,
Save me a sample, give me the hap
Of a muscular Christ that shows the draughts-
man?

No Virgin by him the somewhat petty,
Of finical touch and tempera crumbly —
Could not Alesso Baldovinetti
Contribute so much, I ask him humbly?

Margheritone of Arezzo,
With the grave-clothes garb and swaddling
barret,

(Why purse up mouth and beak in a pet so,
You bald old saturnine poll-clawed parrot?)
Not a poor glimmering Crucifixion,
Where in the foreground kneels the donor?
If such remain, as is my conviction,
The hoarding it does you but little honor.

They pass; for them the panels may thrill,
The tempera grow alive and tinglysh;
Their pictures are left to the mercies still
Of dealers and stealers, Jews and the English,
Who, seeing mere money's worth in their prize,
Will sell it to somebody calm as Zeno
At naked High Art, and in ecstasies
Before some clay-cold vile Carlino!

No matter for these! But Giotto, you,
Have you allowed, as the town-tongues babble
it, —

Oh, never! it shall not be counted true —
That a certain precious little tablet
Which Buonarroti eyed like a lover —
Was buried so long in oblivion's womb
And, left for another than I to discover,
Turns up at last! and to whom? — to whom?

I, that have haunted the dim San Spirito,
(Or was it rather the Ognissanti?)
Patient on altar-step planting a weary toe!
Nay, I shall have it yet! Detur amanti!
My Koh-i-noor — or (if that's a platitude)
Jewel of Giamschid, the Persian Sofi's eye;
So, in anticipative gratitude,
What if I take up my hope and prophesy?

When the hour grows ripe, and a certain dotard
Is pitched, no parcel that needs invoicing,
To the worse side of the Mont St. Gothard,
We shall begin by way of rejoicing;
None of that shooting the sky (blank cartridge),
Nor a civic guard, all plumes and lacquer,
Hunting Radetzky's soul like a partridge
Over Morello with squib and cracker.

This time we'll shoot better game and bag 'em hot —

No mere display at the stone of Dante,
But a kind of sober Witanagemot
(Ex: "Casa Guidi," quod videas ante)
Shall ponder, once Freedom restored to Florence,
How Art may return that departed with her.
Go, hated house, go each trace of the Lorraine's,
And bring us the days of Orgagna hither!

How we shall prologuize, how we shall perorate,
Utter fit things upon art and history,
Feel truth at blood-heat and falsehood at zero
rate,

Make of the want of the age no mystery;
Contrast the fructuous and sterile eras,
Show — monarchy ever its uncouth cub licks
Out of the bear's shape into Chimæra's,
While Pure Art's birth is still the republic's.

Then one shall propose in a speech (curt Tuscan, Expurgate and sober, with scarcely an
"issimo,")

To end now our half-told tale of Cambuscan.
And turn the bell-tower's alt to altissimo:
And fine as the beak of a young beccaccia
The Campanile, the Duomo's fit ally,
Shall soar up in gold full fifty braccia,
Completing Florence, as Florence Italy.

Shall I be alive that morning the scaffold
Is broken away, and the long-pent fire,
Like the golden hope of the world, unbaffled
Springs from its sleep, and up goes the spire
While "God and the People" plain for its motto,

Thence the new tricolor flaps at the sky?
At least to foresee that glory of Giotto
And Florence together, the first am I!

"DE GUSTIBUS —"

YOUR ghost will walk, you lover of trees,
(If our loves remain)
In an English lane,
By a cornfield-side a-flutter with poppies.
Hark, those two in the hazel coppice —
A boy and a girl, if the good fates please,
Making love, say, —
The happier they!

Draw yourself up from the light of the moon,
And let them pass, as they will too soon,
With the beanflowers' boon,
And the blackbird's tune,
And May, and June!

What I love best in all the world
Is a castle, precipice-encurled,
In a gash of the wind-grieved Apennine.
Or look for me, old fellow of mine,
(If I get my head from out the mouth
Of the grave, and loose my spirit's bands,
And come again to the land of lands) —
In a sea-side house to the farther South,
Where the baked cicala dies of drouth,
And one sharp tree — 't is a cypress — stands,
By the many hundred years red-rusted,
Rough iron-spiked, ripe fruit-o'ercrusted,
My sentinel to guard the sands
To the water's edge. For, what expands
Before the house, but the great opaque
Blue breadth of sea without a break?
While, in the house, forever crumbles
Some fragment of the frescoed walls,
From blisters where a scorpion sprawls.
A girl bare-footed brings, and tumbles
Down on the pavement, green-flesh melons,

And says there 's news to-day — the king
Was shot at, touched in the liver-wing,
Goes with his Bourbon arm in a sling:
— She hopes they have not caught the felons.
Italy, my Italy!

Queen Mary's saying serves for me —
(When fortune's malice Lost her, Calais)

Open my heart and you will see
Graved inside of it, "Italy."
Such lovers old are I and she:
So it always was, so shall ever be!

HOME-THOUGHTS, FROM ABROAD

This and the following poem were first published along with Beer, which bore the name Here's to Nelson's Memory, under the general heading Home-Thoughts, from Abroad. The final member of the group, Home-Thoughts, from the Sea, was written under the same circumstances as the poem, How They brought the Good News from Ghent to Aix.

OH, to be in England
Now that April's there,
And whoever wakes in England
Sees, some morning, unaware,
That the lowest boughs and the brush-wood sheaf
Round the elm-tree bole are in tiny leaf,
While the chaffinch sings on the orchard bough
In England — now!

And after April, when May follows,
And the whitethroat builds, and all the swallows!
Hark, where my blossomed pear-tree in the hedge
Leans to the field and scatters on the clover
Blossoms and dewdrops — at the bent spray's edge —
That's the wise thrush; he sings each song twice over,
Lest you should think he never could recapture
The first fine careless rapture!
And though the fields look rough with hoary
dew,
All will be gay when noontide wakes anew
The buttercups, the little children's dower
— Far brighter than this gaudy melon-flower!

HOME-THOUGHTS, FROM THE SEA

NOBLY, nobly Cape Saint Vincent to the Northwest died away;
Sunset ran, one glorious blood-red, reeking into Cadiz Bay;
Bluish 'mid the burning water, full in face Trafalgar lay;
In the dimmest Northeast distance dawned
Gibraltar grand and gray;
"Here and here did England help me; how can I help England?" — say,

Whoso turns as I, this evening, turn to God to praise and pray,
While Jove's planet rises yonder, silent over Africa.

SAUL

The first nine sections of this poem were printed under the same title in No. VII. of Bells and Pomegranates, in 1845. The poem as enlarged was published in Men and Women in 1855.

I

SAID Abner, "At last thou art come! Ere I tell, ere thou speak, Kiss my cheek, wish me well!" Then I wished it, and did kiss his cheek.
And he: "Since the King, O my friend, for thy countenance sent,
Neither drunken nor eaten have we; nor until
from his tent
Thou return with the joyful assurance the King
liveth yet,
Shall our lip with the honey be bright, with the water be wet.
For out of the black mid-tent's silence, a space
of three days,
Not a sound hath escaped to thy servants, of prayer nor of praise,
To betoken that Saul and the Spirit have ended
their strife,
And that, faint in his triumph, the monarch
sinks back upon life.

II

"Yet now my heart leaps, O beloved! God's child with his dew
On thy gracious gold hair, and those lilies still living and blue
Just broken to twine round thy harp-strings, as if no wild heat
Were now raging to torture the desert!"

III

Then I, as was meet,
Knelt down to the God of my fathers, and rose
on my feet,
And ran o'er the sand burnt to powder. The tent was unlooped;
I pulled up the spear that obstructed, and under I stooped;
Hands and knees on the slippery grass-patch,
all withered and gone,
That extends to the second enclosure, I groped
my way on Till I felt where the foldskirts fly open. Then once more I prayed,
And opened the foldskirts and entered, and was not afraid
But spoke, "Here is David, thy servant!"
And no voice replied.
At the first I saw naught but the blackness:
but soon I descried
A something more black than the blackness —
the vast, the upright
Main prop which sustains the pavilion: and slow into sight

Grew a figure against it, gigantic and blackest of all.
Then a sunbeam, that burst through the tent-roof, showed Saul.

IV

He stood as erect as that tent-prop, both arms stretched out wide
On the great cross-support in the centre, that goes to each side ;
He relaxed not a muscle, but hung there as, caught in his pangs
And waiting his change, the king-serpent all heavily hangs,
Far away from his kind, in the pine, till deliverance come
With the spring-time, — so agonized Saul, drear and stark, blind and dumb.

V

Then I tuned my harp, — took off the lilies we twine round its chords
Lest they snap 'neath the stress of the noontide — those sunbeams like swords !
And I first played the tune all our sheep know, as, one after one,
So docile they come to the pen-door till folding be done.
They are white and untorn by the bushes, for lo, they have fed
Where the long grasses stifle the water within the stream's bed ;
And now one after one seeks its lodging, as star follows star
Into eve and the blue far above us, — so blue and so far !

VI

— Then the tune for which quails on the cornland will each leave his mate
To fly after the player ; then, what makes the crickets elate
Till for boldness they fight one another ; and then, what has weight
To set the quick jerboa a-musing outside his sand house —
There are none such as he for a wonder, half bird and half mouse !
God made all the creatures and gave them our love and our fear,
To give sign, we and they are his children, one family here.

VII

Then I played the help-tune of our reapers, their wine-song, when hand
Grasps at hand, eye lights eye in good friendship, and great hearts expand
And grow one in the sense of this world's life.
— And then, the last song
When the dead man is praised on his journey —
“ Bear, bear him along,
With his few faults shut up like dead flowerets !
Are balm seeds not here
To console us ? The land has none left such as he on the bier.
Oh, would we might keep thee, my brother ! ”
— And then, the glad chaunt

Of the marriage, — first go the young maidens, next, she whom we vaunt
As the beauty, the pride of our dwelling. — And then, the great march
Wherein man runs to man to assist him and buttress an arch
Naught can break ; who shall harm them, our friends ? Then, the chorus intoned
As the Levites go up to the altar in glory enthroned.
But I stopped here : for here in the darkness Saul groaned.

VIII

And I paused, held my breath in such silence, and listened apart ;
And the tent shook, for mighty Saul shuddered : and sparkles 'gan dart
From the jewels that woke in his turban, at once with a start,
All its lordly male-sapphires, and rubies courageous at heart.
So the head : but the body still moved not, still hung there erect.
And I bent once again to my playing, pursued it unchecked,
As I sang : —

IX

“ Oh, our manhood's prime vigor ! No spirit feels waste,
Not a muscle is stopped in its playing nor sinew unbraced.
Oh, the wild joys of living ! the leaping from rock up to rock,
The strong rending of boughs from the fir-tree, the cool silver shock
Of the plunge in a pool's living water, the hunt of the bear,
And the sultriness showing the lion is couched in his lair.
And the meal, the rich dates yellowed over with gold dust divine,
And the locust-flesh steeped in the pitcher, the full draught of wine,
And the sleep in the dried river-channel where bulrushes tell
That the water was wont to go warbling so softly and well.
How good is man's life, the mere living ! how fit to employ
All the heart and the soul and the senses forever in joy !
Hast thou loved the white locks of thy father, whose sword thou didst guard
When he trusted thee forth with the armies, for glorious reward ?
Didst thou see the thin hands of thy mother, held up as men sung
The low song of the nearly-departed, and hear her faint tongue
Joining in while it could to the witness, ‘ Let one more attest.
I have lived, seen God's hand through a lifetime, and all was for best ’ ?
Then they sung through their tears in strong triumph, not much, but the rest.

And thy brothers, the help and the contest, the working whence grew
Such result as, from seething grape-bundles, the spirit strained true :
And the friends of thy boyhood — that boyhood of wonder and hope.
Present promise and wealth of the future beyond
the eye's scope, —
Till lo, thou art grown to a monarch ; a people is thine ;
And all gifts, which the world offers singly, on one head combine !
On one head, all the beauty and strength, love
and rage (like the throe
That, a-work in the rock, helps its labor and lets the gold go)
High ambition and deeds which surpass it, fame crowning them, — all
Brought to blaze on the head of one creature —
King Saul ! ”

X

And lo, with that leap of my spirit, — heart,
hand, harp and voice,
Each lifting Saul's name out of sorrow, each bidding rejoice
Saul's fame in the light it was made for — as when, dare I say,
The Lord's army, in rapture of service, strains
through its array,
And upsoareth the cherubim-chariot — “ Saul ! ”
cried I, and stopped,
And waited the thing that should follow. Then Saul, who hung propped
By the tent's cross-support in the centre, was struck by his name.
Have ye seen when Spring's arrowy summons goes right to the aim,
And some mountain, the last to withstand her,
that held (he alone,
While the vale laughed in freedom and flowers)
on a broad bust of stone
A year's snow bound about for a breastplate, — leaves grasp of the sheet ?
Fold on fold all at once it crowds thunderously
down to his feet,
And there fronts you, stark, black, but alive
yet, your mountain of old,
With his rents, the successive bequeathings of ages untold —
Yea, each harm got in fighting your battles,
each furrow and scar
Of his head thrust 'twixt you and the tempest
— all hail, there they are !
— Now again to be softened with verdure, again
hold the nest
Of the dove, tempt the goat and its young to the green on his crest
For their food in the ardors of summer. One long shudder thrilled
All the tent till the very air tingled, then sank and was stilled
At the King's self left standing before me, released and aware.
What was gone, what remained ? All to traverse 'twixt hope and despair.
Death was past, life not come : so he waited.
Awhile his right hand

Held the brow, helped the eyes left too vacant forthwith to remand
To their place what new objects should enter :
't was Saul as before.
I looked up and dared gaze at those eyes, nor was hurt any more Than by slow pallid sunsets in autumn, ye watch from the shore,
At their sad level gaze o'er the ocean — a sun's slow decline
Over hills which, resolved in stern silence, o'er-lap and entwine
Base with base to knit strength more intensely :
so, arm folded arm
O'er the chest whose slow heavings subsided.

XI

What spell or what charm,
(For awhile there was trouble within me,) what next should I urge
To sustain him where song had restored him ?
— Song filled to the verge
His cup with the wine of this life, pressing all that it yields
Of mere fruitage, the strength and the beauty :
beyond, on what fields,
Glean a vintage more potent and perfect to brighten the eye
And bring blood to the lip, and commend them
the cup they put by ?
He saith, “ It is good ; ” still he drinks not : he lets me praise life,
Gives assent, yet would die for his own part.

XII

Then fancies grew rife
Which had come long ago on the pasture, when round me the sheep
Fed in silence — above, the one eagle wheeled slow as in sleep ;
And I lay in my hollow and mused on the world that might lie
'Neath his ken, though I saw but the strip
'twixt the hill and the sky :
And I laughed — “ Since my days are ordained to be passed with my flocks,
Let me people at least, with my fancies, the plains and the rocks,
Dream the life I am never to mix with, and image the show
Of mankind as they live in those fashions I hardly shall know !
Schemes of life, its best rules and right uses,
the courage that gains,
And the prudence that keeps what men strive for.” And now these old trains Of vague thought came again ; I grew surer ;
so, once more the string
Of my harp made response to my spirit, as thus —

XIII

“ Yea, my King,”
I began — “ thou dost well in rejecting mere comforts that spring
From the mere mortal life held in common by man and by brute :
In our flesh grows the branch of this life, in our soul it bears fruit.

Thou hast marked the slow rise of the tree, —
 how its stem trembled first Till it passed the kid's lip, the stag's antler;
 then safely outburst
 The fan-branches all round; and thou mindest
 when these too, in turn,
 Broke a-bloom and the palm-tree seemed perfect:
 yet more was to learn,
 E'en the good that comes in with the palm-fruit.
 Our dates shall we slight,
 When their juice brings a cure for all sorrow?
 or care for the plight
 Of the palm's self whose slow growth produced them? Not so! stem and branch Shall decay, nor be known in their place, while the palm-wine shall stanch
 Every wound of man's spirit in winter. I pour thee such wine.
 Leave the flesh to the fate it was fit for! the spirit be thine!
 By the spirit, when age shall o'ercome thee,
 thou still shalt enjoy
 More indeed, than at first when unconscious, the life of a boy.
 Crush that life, and behold its wine running!
 Each deed thou hast done
 Dies, revives, goes to work in the world; until e'en as the sun
 Looking down on the earth, though clouds spoil him, though tempests efface,
 Can find nothing his own deed produced not,
 must everywhere trace
 The results of his past summer-prime, — so,
 each ray of thy will,
 Every flash of thy passion and prowess, long over, shall thrill
 Thy whole people, the countless, with ardor, till they too give forth
 A like cheer to their sons, who in turn, fill the South and the North
 With the radiance thy deed was the germ of.
 Carouse in the past!
 But the license of age has its limit; thou diest
 at last:
 As the lion when age dims his eyeball, the rose
 at her height,
 So with man — so his power and his beauty forever take flight.
 No! Again a long draught of my soul-wine!
 Look forth o'er the years!
 Thou hast done now with eyes for the actual;
 begin with the seer's!
 Is Saul dead? In the depth of the vale make his tomb — bid arise
 A gray mountain of marble heaped four-square,
 till, built to the skies,
 Let it mark where the great First King slumbers: whose fame would ye know?
 Up above see the rock's naked face, where the record shall go
 In great characters cut by the scribe, — Such was Saul, so he did;
 With the sages directing the work, by the populace child, —
 For not half, they'll affirm, is comprised there!
 Which fault to amend,
 In the grove with his kind grows the cedar,
 whereon they shall spend

(See, in tablets 't is level before them) their praise, and record
 With the gold of the graver, Saul's story,
 the statesman's great word
 Side by side with the poet's sweet comment.
 The river's a-wave
 With smooth paper-reeds grazing each other when prophet-winds rave:
 So the pen gives unborn generations their due and their part
 In thy being! Then, first of the mighty, thank God that thou art!"

XIV

And behold while I sang . . . but O Thou who didst grant me that day,
 And before it not seldom hast granted thy help
 to essay,
 Carry on and complete an adventure, — my shield and my sword
 In that act where my soul was thy servant.
 thy word was my word, —
 Still be with me, who then at the summit of human endeavor
 And scaling the highest, man's thought could,
 gazed hopeless as ever
 On the new stretch of heaven above me — till,
 mighty to save,
 Just one lift of thy hand cleared that distance
 — God's throne from man's grave!
 Let me tell out my tale to its ending — my voice to my heart
 Which can scarce dare believe in what marvels
 last night I took part,
 As this morning I gather the fragments, alone
 with my sheep,
 And still fear lest the terrible glory vanish
 like sleep!
 For I wake in the gray dewy covert, while Hebron upheaves
 The dawn struggling with night on his shoulder, and Kidron retrieves
 Slow the damage of yesterday's sunshine.

XV

I say then, — my song
 While I sang thus, assuring the monarch, and ever more strong
 Made a proffer of good to console him — he slowly resumed
 His old motions and habitudes kingly. The right hand replumed
 His black locks to their wonted composure, adjusted the swathes
 Of his turban, and see — the huge sweat that his countenance bathes,
 He wipes off with the robe; and he girds now
 his loins as of yore,
 And feels slow for the armlets of price, with the clasp set before.
 He is Saul, ye remember in glory, — ere error
 had bent
 The broad brow from the daily communion:
 and still, though much spent
 Be the life and the bearing that front you, the same, God did choose,
 To receive what a man may waste, desecrate never quite lose.

So sank he along by the tent-prop till, stayed by the pile
Of his armor and war-cloak and garments, he leaned there awhile,
And sat out my singing, — one arm round the tent-prop, to raise
His bent head, and the other hung slack — till
I touched on the praise
I foresaw from all men in all time, to the man patient there;
And thus ended, the harp falling forward.
Then first I was 'ware
That he sat, as I say, with my head just above his vast knees
Which were thrust out on each side around me, like oak roots which please
To encircle a lamb when it slumbers. I looked up to know
If the best I could do had brought solace: he spoke not, but slow
Lifted up the hand slack at his side, till he laid it with care
Soft and grave, but in mild settled will, on my brow: through my hair
The large fingers were pushed, and he bent back my head, with kind power —
All my face back, intent to peruse it, as men do a flower.
Thus held he me there with his great eyes that scrutinized mine —
And oh, all my heart how it loved him! but where was the sign?
I yearned — "Could I help thee, my father,
inventing a bliss,
I would add, to that life of the past, both the future and this;
I would give thee new life altogether, as good,
ages hence,
As this moment, — had love but the warrant,
love's heart to dispense!"

XVI

Then the truth came upon me. No harp more — no song more! outbroke —

XVII

"I have gone the whole round of creation: I saw and I spoke:
I, a work of God's hand for that purpose, received in my brain
And pronounced on the rest of his handwork — returned him again
His creation's approval or censure: I spoke as I saw:
I report, as a man may of God's work — all's
love, yet all's law.
Now I lay down the judgeship he lent me.
Each faculty tasked
To perceive him, has gained an abyss, where a dewdrop was asked.
Have I knowledge? confounded it shrivels at Wisdom laid bare.
Have I forethought? how purblind, how blank,
to the Infinite Care!
Do I task any faculty highest, to image success?
I but open my eyes, — and perfection, no more
and no less,

In the kind I imagined, full-fronts me, and God is seen God
In the star, in the stone, in the flesh, in the soul and the clod.
And thus looking within and around me, I ever renew (With that stoop of the soul which in bending upraises it too)
The submission of man's nothing-perfect to God's all-complete,
As by each new obeisance in spirit, I climb to his feet.
Yet with all this abounding experience, this deity known,
I shall dare to discover some province, some gift of my own.
There's a faculty pleasant to exercise, hard to hoodwink,
I am fain to keep still in abeyance, (I laugh as I think)
Lest, insisting to claim and parade in it, wot ye,
I worst
E'en the Giver in one gift. — Behold, I could love if I durst!
But I sink the pretension as fearing a man may o'ertake
God's own speed in the one way of love: I abstain for love's sake.
— What, my soul? see thus far and no farther?
when doors great and small,
Nine-and-ninety flew ope at our touch, should the hundredth appall?
In the least things have faith, yet distrust in
the greatest of all?
Do I find love so full in my nature, God's ultimate gift,
That I doubt his own love can compete with it? Here, the parts shift?
Here, the creature surpass the Creator, — the end, what Began?
Would I fain in my impotent yearning do all
for this man,
And dare doubt he alone shall not help him,
who yet alone can?
Would it ever have entered my mind, the bare will, much less power,
To bestow on this Saul what I sang of, the marvellous dower
Of the life he was gifted and filled with? to make such a soul,
Such a body, and then such an earth for inspher-
ing the whole?
And doth it not enter my mind (as my warm tears attest)
These good things being given, to go on, and give one more, the best?
Ay, to save and redeem and restore him, maintain at the height
This perfection, — succeed with life's day-spring, death's minute of night?
Interpose at the difficult minute, snatch Saul
the mistake,
Saul the failure, the ruin he seems now, — and bid him awake
From the dream, the probation, the prelude, to find himself set
Clear and safe in new light and new life, — a new harmony yet

To be run, and continued, and ended—who knows?—or endure!
 The man taught enough by life's dream, of the rest to make sure;
 By the pain-throb, triumphantly winning intensified bliss,
 And the next world's reward and repose, by the struggles in this.

XVIII

"I believe it! 'Tis thou, God, that givest,
 't is I who receive:
 In the first is the last, in thy will is my power to believe.
 All's one gift: thou canst grant it moreover, as prompt to my prayer
 As I breathe out this breath, as I open these arms to the air.
 From thy will stream the worlds, life and nature, thy dread Sabaoth:
 I will?—the mere atoms despise me! Why am I not loth
 To look that, even that in the face too? Why is it I dare Think but lightly of such impuissance? What stops my despair?
 This;—'t is not what man Does which exalts him, but what man Would do!
 See the King—I would help him but cannot, the wishes fall through.
 Could I wrestle to raise him from sorrow, grow poor to enrich,
 To fill up his life, starve my own out, I would—knowing which,
 I know that my service is perfect. Oh, speak through me now!
 Would I suffer for him that I love? So wouldst thou—so wilt thou!
 So shall crown thee the topmost, ineffablest, uttermost crown—
 And thy love fill infinitude wholly, nor leave up nor down
 One spot for the creature to stand in! It is by no breath,
 Turn of eye, wave of hand, that salvation joins issue with death!
 As thy Love is discovered almighty, almighty be proved Thy power, that exists with and for it, of being Beloved!
 He who did most, shall bear most; the strongest shall stand the most weak.
 'Tis the weakness in strength, that I cry for! my flesh, that I seek In the Godhead! I seek and I find it. O Saul, it shall be A Face like my face that receives thee; a Man like to me,
 Thou shalt love and be loved by, forever: a Hand like this hand Shall throw open the gates of new life to thee! See the Christ stand!"

XIX

I know not too well how I found my way home in the night.
 There were witnesses, cohorts about me, to left and to right.

Angels, powers, the unuttered, unseen, the alive, the aware:
 I repressed, I got through them as hardly, as strugglingly there,
 As a runner beset by the populace famished for news—
 Life or death. The whole earth was awakened, hell loosed with her crews;
 And the stars of night beat with emotion, and tingled and shot
 Out in fire the strong pain of pent knowledge: but I fainted not,
 For the Hand still impelled me at once and supported, suppressed
 All the tumult, and quenched it with quiet, and holy behest,
 Till the rapture was shut in itself, and the earth sank to rest.
 Anon at the dawn, all that trouble had withered from earth—
 Not so much, but I saw it die out in the day's tender birth;
 In the gathered intensity brought to the gray of the hills;
 In the shuddering forests' held breath; in the sudden wind-thrills;
 In the startled wild beasts that bore off, each with eye sidling still Though averted with wonder and dread; in the birds stiff and chill
 That rose heavily, as I approached them, made stupid with awe:
 E'en the serpent that slid away silent,—he felt the new law.
 The same stared in the white humid faces upturned by the flowers;
 The same worked in the heart of the cedar and moved the vine-bowers:
 And the little brooks witnessing murmured, persistent and low,
 With their obstinate, all but hushed voices—"E'en so, it is so!"

MY STAR

This poem has been held to refer pointedly to Mrs. Browning. An inference to this end may be drawn from the fact that it stands first in a volume of Selections from the Poetical Works of Robert Browning, published in 1872 and dedicated to Alfred Tennyson. "In Poetry—Il-lustrious and consummate: In Friendship—Noble and sincere." The selection was made under Browning's supervision and contains the following preface:—

"In the present selection from my poetry, there is an attempt to escape from the embarrassment of appearing to pronounce upon what myself may consider the best of it. I adopt another principle; and by simply stringing together certain pieces on the thread of an imagined personality, I present them in succession, rather as the natural development of a particular experience than because I account them the most noteworthy portion of my work. Such an attempt was made in the volume of selections from the poetry of Elizabeth Barrett Browning : to which — in outward uniformity, at least — my own would venture to become a companion.

"A few years ago, had such an opportunity presented itself, I might have been tempted to say a word in reply to the objections my poetry was used to encounter. Time has kindly coöperated with my disinclination to write the poetry and the criticism besides. The readers I am at last privileged to expect, meet me fully half-way ; and if, from the fitting stand-point, they must still 'censure me in their wisdom,' they have previously 'awakened their senses that they may the better judge.' Nor do I apprehend any more charges of being willfully obscure, unconscientiously careless, or perversely harsh. Having hitherto done my utmost in the art to which my life is a devotion, I cannot engage to increase the effort ; but I conceive that there may be helpful light, as well as reassuring warmth, in the attention and sympathy I gratefully acknowledge.

LONDON, May 14, 1872.

ALL that I know
Of a certain star
Is, it can throw
(Like the angled spar)
Now a dart of red,
Now a dart of blue ;
Till my friends have said
They would fain see, too,
My star that dartles the red and the blue !
Then it stops like a bird ; like a flower, hangs
furled :
They must solace themselves with the Saturn above it.
What matter to me if their star is a world ?
Mine has opened its soul to me ; therefore I love it.

BY THE FIRESIDE

The scene of the declaration in this poem is laid in a little mountain gorge adjacent to the Baths of Lucca, where the Brownings spent the summer of 1853.

How well I know what I mean to do
When the long dark autumn evenings come ;
And where, my soul, is thy pleasant hue ?
With the music of all thy voices, dumb
In life's November too !

I shall be found by the fire, suppose,
O'er a great wise book as besemeth age,
While the shutters flap as the cross-wind blows,
And I turn the page, and I turn the page,
Not verse now, only prose !

Till the young ones whisper, finger on lip,
"There he is at it, deep in Greek :
Now then, or never, out we slip
To cut from the hazels by the creek
A mainmast for our ship !"

I shall be at it indeed, my friends !
Greek puts already on either side
Such a branch-work forth as soon extends
To a vista opening far and wide,
And I pass out where it ends.

The outside-frame, like your hazel-trees —
But the inside-archway widens fast,
And a rarer sort succeeds to these,
And we slope to Italy at last
And youth, by green degrees.

I follow wherever I am led,
Knowing so well the leader's hand :
Oh woman-country, wooed not wed,
Loved all the more by earth's male-lands,
Laid to their hearts instead !

Look at the ruined chapel again
Half-way up in the Alpine gorge !
Is that a tower, I point you plain,
Or is it a mill, or an iron forge
Breaks solitude in vain ?

A turn, and we stand in the heart of things ;
The woods are round us, heaped and dim ;
From slab to slab how it slips and springs,
The thread of water single and slim,
Through the ravage some torrent brings !

Does it feed the little lake below ?
That speck of white just on its marge
Is Pella ; see, in the evening-glow,
How sharp the silver spear-heads charge
When Alp meets heaven in snow !

On our other side is the straight-up rock ;
And a path is kept 'twixt the gorge and it
By boulder-stones where lichens mock
The marks on a moth, and small ferns fit
Their teeth to the polished block.

Oh the sense of the yellow mountain-flowers,
And thorny balls, each three in one,
The chestnuts throw on our path in showers !
For the drop of the woodland fruit's begun,
These early November hours,

That crimson the creeper's leaf across
Like a splash of blood, intense, abrupt,
O'er a shield else gold from rim to boss,
And lay it for show on the fairy-cupped
Elf-neededled mat of moss,

By the rose-flesh mushrooms, undivulged
Last evening — nay, in to-day's first dew
Yon sudden coral nipple bulged,
Where a freaked fawn-colored flaky crew
Of toad-stools peep indulged.

And yonder, at foot of the fronting ridge
That takes the turn to a range beyond,

Is the chapel reached by the one-arched bridge
Where the water is stopped in a stagnant pond
Danced over by the midge.

The chapel and bridge are of stone alike,
Blackish-gray and mostly wet;
Cut hemp-stalks steep in the narrow dyke.
See here again, how the lichens fret
And the roots of the ivy strike!

Poor little place, where its one priest comes
On a festa-day, if he comes at all,
To the dozen folk from their scattered homes,
Gathered within that precinct small
By the dozen ways one roams —

To drop from the charcoal-burners' huts,
Or climb from the hemp-dressers' low shed,
Leave the grange where the woodman stores
his nuts,
Or the wattled cote where the fowlers spread
Their gear on the rock's bare juts.

It has some pretension too, this front,
With its bit of fresco half-moon-wise
Set over the porch, Art's early wont:
'Tis John in the Desert, I surmise,
But has borne the weather's brunt —

Not from the fault of the builder, though,
For a pent-house properly projects
Where three carved beams make a certain show,
Dating — good thought of our architect's —
'Five, six, nine, he lets you know.

And all day long a bird sings there,
And a stray sheep drinks at the pond at times;
The place is silent and aware;
It has had its scenes, its joys and crimes,
But that is its own affair.

My perfect wife, my Leonor,
Oh heart, my own, oh eyes, mine too,
Whom else could I dare look backward for,
With whom beside should I dare pursue
The path gray heads abhor?

For it leads to a crag's sheer edge with them;
Youth, flowery all the way, there stops —
Not they: age threatens and they contemn,
Till they reach the gulf wherein youth drops,
One inch from life's safe hem!

With me, youth led . . . I will speak now,
No longer watch you as you sit
Reading by fire-light, that great brow
And the spirit-small hand propping it,
Mutely, my heart knows how —

When, if I think but deep enough,
You are wont to answer, prompt as rhyme;
And you, too, find without rebuff
Response your soul seeks many a time
Piercing its fine flesh-stuff.

My own, confirm me! If I tread
This path back, is it not in pride
To think how little I dreamed it led

To an age so blest that, by its side,
Youth seems the waste instead?

My own, see where the years conduct!
At first, 't was something our two souls
Should mix as mists do; each is sucked
In each now: on, the new stream rolls,
Whatever rocks obstruct.

Think, when our one soul understands
The great Word which makes all things new,
When earth breaks up and heaven expands,
How will the change strike me and you
In the house not made with hands?

Oh, I must feel your brain prompt mine,
Your heart anticipate my heart,
You must be just before, in fine,
See and make me see, for your part,
New depths of the divine!

But who could have expected this
When we two drew together first
Just for the obvious human bliss,
To satisfy life's daily thirst
With a thing men seldom miss?

Come back with me to the first of all,
Let us lean and love it over again,
Let us now forget and now recall,
Break the rosary in a pearly rain
And gather what we let fall!

What did I say? — that a small bird sings
All day long, save when a brown pair
Of hawks from the wood float with wide wings
Strained to a bell: 'gainst noon-day glare
You count the streaks and rings.

But at afternoon or almost eve
'Tis better; then the silence grows
To that degree, you half believe
It must get rid of what it knows,
Its bosom does so heave.

Hither we walked then, side by side,
Arm in arm and cheek to cheek,
And still I questioned or replied,
While my heart, convulsed to really speak,
Lay choking in its pride.

Silent the crumbling bridge we cross,
And pity and praise the chapel sweet,
And care about the fresco's loss,
And wish for our souls a like retreat,
And wonder at the moss.

Stoop and kneel on the settle under,
Look through the window's grated square:
Nothing to see! For fear of plunder,
The cross is down and the altar bare,
As if thieves don't fear thunder.

We stoop and look in through the grate,
See the little porch and rustic door,
Read duly the dead builder's date;
Then cross the bridge that we crossed before
Take the path again — but wait!

Oh moment, one and infinite !

The water slips o'er stock and stone ;

The West is tender, hardly bright :

How gray at once is the evening grown —
One star, its chrysolite !

We two stood there with never a third,

But each by each, as each knew well :

The sights we saw and the sounds we heard,

The lights and the shades made up a spell
Till the trouble grew and stirred.

Oh, the little more, and how much it is !

And the little less, and what worlds away !

How a sound shall quicken content to bliss,

Or a breath suspend the blood's best play,
And life be a proof of this !

Had she willed it, still had stood the screen

So slight, so sure, 'twixt my love and her :

I could fix her face with a guard between,

And find her soul as when friends confer,
Friends — lovers that might have been.

For my heart had a touch of the woodland-
time,

Wanting to sleep now over its best,

Shake the whole tree in the summer-prime,

But bring to the last leaf no such test !

" Hold the last fast ! " runs the rhyme.

For a chance to make your little much,

To gain a lover and lose a friend,

Venture the tree and a myriad such,

When nothing you mar but the year can mend :

But a last leaf — fear to touch !

Yet should it unfasten itself and fall

Eddying down till it find your face

At some slight wind — best chance of all !

Be your heart henceforth its dwelling-place

You trembled to forestall !

Worth how well, those dark gray eyes,

That hair so dark and dear, how worth

That a man should strive and agonize,

And taste a veriest hell on earth

For the hope of such a prize !

You might have turned and tried a man,

Set him a space to weary and wear,

And prove which suited more your plan,

His best of hope or his worst despair,

Yet end as he began.

But you spared me this, like the heart you
are,

And filled my empty heart at a word.

If two lives join, there is oft a scar,

They are one and one, with a shadowy third ;

One near one is too far.

A moment after, and hands unseen

Were hanging the night around us fast ;

But we knew that a bar was broken between

Life and life : we were mixed at last

In spite of the mortal screen.

The forests had done it ; there they stood ;

We caught for a moment the powers at play :
They had mingled us so, for once and good,

Their work was done — we might go or stay,
They relapsed to their ancient mood.

How the world is made for each of us !

How all we perceive and know in it

Tends to some moment's product thus,

When a soul declares itself — to wit,
By its fruit, the thing it does !

Be hate that fruit or love that fruit,

It forwards the general deed of man,

And each of the Many helps to recruit

The life of the race by a general plan ;

Each living his own, to boot.

I am named and known by that moment's feat ;

There took my station and degree ;

So grew my own small life complete,

As nature obtained her best of me —

One born to love you, sweet !

And to watch you sink by the fireside now

Back again, as you mutely sit

Musing by fire-light, that great brow

And the spirit-small hand propping it,

Yonder, my heart knows how !

So, earth has gained by one man the more,

And the gain of earth must be heaven's gain
too ;

And the whole is well worth thinking o'er

When autumn comes : which I mean to do

One day, as I said before.

ANY WIFE TO ANY HUSBAND

My love, this is the bitterest, that thou —

Who art all truth, and who dost love me now

As thine eyes say, as thy voice breaks to say —

Shouldst love so truly, and couldst love me still

A whole long life through, had but love its will,

Would death that leads me from thee brook delay.

I have but to be by thee, and thy hand

Will never let mine go, nor heart withstand

The beating of my heart to reach its place.

When shall I look for thee and feel thee gone ?

When cry for the old comfort and find none ?

Never, I know ! Thy soul is in thy face.

Oh, I should fade — 't is willed so ! Might I
save,

Gladly I would, whatever beauty gave

Joy to thy sense, for that was precious too.

It is not to be granted. But the soul

Whence the love comes, all ravage leaves that
whole ;

Vainly the flesh fades ; soul makes all things
new.

It would not be because my eye grew dim

Thou couldst not find the love there, thanks to
Him

Who never is dishonored in the spark
He gave us from his fire of fires, and bade
Remember whence it sprang, nor be afraid
While that burns on, though all the rest grow dark.

So, how thou wouldst be perfect, white and clean

Outside as inside, soul and soul's demesne

Alike, this body given to show it by!

Oh, three-parts through the worst of life's abyss.

What plaudits from the next world after this.

Couldst thou repeat a stroke and gain the sky!

And is it not the bitterer to think

That disengage our hands and thou wilt sink

Although thy love was love in very deed?

I know that nature! Pass a festive day,

Thou dost not throw its relic-flower away

Nor bid its music's loitering echo speed.

Thou let'st the stranger's glove lie where it fell;
If old things remain old things all is well,

For thou art grateful as becomes man best:

And hadst thou only heard me play one tune,

Or viewed me from a window, not so soon

With thee would such things fade as with the
rest.

I seem to see! We meet and part; 'tis brief;
The book I opened keeps a folded leaf,

The very chair I sat on, breaks the rank;

That is a portrait of me on the wall —

Three lines, my face comes at so slight a call:

And for all this, one little hour to thank!

But now, because the hour through years was fixed,

Because our inmost beings met and mixed,

Because thou once hast loved me — wilt thou dare

Say to thy soul and Who may list beside,

"Therefore she is immortally my bride;

Chance cannot change my love, nor time impair.

"So, what if in the dusk of life that's left,

I, a tired traveller of my sun bereft,

Look from my path when, mimicking the
same,

The fire-fly glimpses past me, come and gone?

— Where was it till the sunset? Where anon

It will be at the sunrise! What's to blame?"

Is it so helpful to thee? Canst thou take

The mimic up, nor, for the true thing's sake,

Put gently by such efforts at a bean?

Is the remainder of the way so long,

Thou need'st the little solace, thou the strong?

Watch out thy watch, let weak ones doze and
dream!

Ah, but the fresher faces! "Is it true,"

Thou'lt ask, "some eyes are beautiful and
new?"

Some hair, — how can one choose but grasp such wealth?

And if a man would press his lips to lips

Fresh as the wilding hedge-rose-cup there slips

The dewdrop out of, must it be by stealth?

"It cannot change the love still kept for Her,
More than if such a picture I prefer

Passing a day with, to a room's bare side:

The painted form takes nothing she possessed,

Yet, while the Titian's Venus lies at rest,

A man looks. Once more, what is there to chide?"

So must I see, from where I sit and watch,

My own self sell myself, my hand attach

Its warrant to the very thefts from me —

Thy singleness of soul that made me proud,

Thy purity of heart I loved aloud,

Thy man's-truth I was bold to bid God see!

Love so, then, if thou wilt! Give all thou canst
Away to the new faces — disentranced,

(Say it and think it) obdurate no more:

Re-issue looks and words from the old mint,

Pass them afresh, no matter whose the print

Image and superscription once they bore!

Re-coin thyself and give it them to spend, —
It all comes to the same thing at the end,

Since mine thou wast, mine art and mine shalt be,

Faithful or faithless, sealing up the sum

Or lavish of my treasure, thou must come Back to the heart's place here I keep for thee!

Only, why should it be with stain at all?

Why must I, 'twixt the leaves of coronal,

Put any kiss of pardon on thy brow?

Why need the other women know so much,

And talk together, "Such the look and such

The smile he used to love with, then as now!"

Might I die last and show thee! Should I find

Such hardship in the few years left behind,

If free to take and light my lamp, and go

Into thy tomb, and shut the door and sit,

Seeing thy face on those four sides of it

The better that they are so blank, I know!

Why, time was what I wanted, to turn o'er

Within my mind each look, get more and more

By heart each word, too much to learn at
first:

And join thee all the fitter for the pause

'Neath the low doorway's lintel. That were cause

For lingering, though thou calledst, if I durst!

And yet thou art the nobler of us two:

What dare I dream of, that thou canst not do,

Outstripping my ten small steps with one stride?

I'll say then, here's a trial and a task —

Is it to bear? — if easy, I'll not ask:

Though love fail, I can trust on in thy pride

Pride? — when those eyes forestall the life behind
 The death I have to go through! — when I find,
 Now that I want thy help most, all of thee!
 What did I fear? Thy love shall hold me fast
 Until the little minute's sleep is past
 And I wake saved. — And yet it will not be!

TWO IN THE CAMPAGNA

I WONDER do you feel to-day
 As I have felt since, hand in hand,
 We sat down on the grass, to stray
 In spirit better through the land,
 This morn of Rome and May?

For me, I touched a thought, I know,
 Has tantalized me many times,
 (Like turns of thread the spiders throw Mocking across our path) for rhymes
 To catch at and let go.

Help me to hold it! First it left
 The yellowing fennel, run to seed
 There, branching from the brickwork's cleft,
 Some old tomb's ruin: yonder weed
 Took up the floating weft,

Where one small orange cup amassed
 Five beetles, — blind and green they grope
 Among the honey-meal: and last,
 Everywhere on the grassy slope
 I traced it. Hold it fast!

The champagne with its endless fleece
 Of feathery grasses everywhere!
 Silence and passion, joy and peace,
 An everlasting wash of air —
 Rome's ghost since her decease.

Such life here, through such lengths of hours,
 Such miracles performed in play,
 Such primal naked forms of flowers,
 Such letting nature have her way
 While heaven looks from its towers!

How say you? Let us, O my dove,
 Let us be unashamed of soul,
 As earth lies bare to heaven above!
 How is it under our control
 To love or not to love?

I would that you were all to me,
 You that are just so much, no more.
 Nor yours nor mine, nor slave nor free!
 Where does the fault lie? What the core
 O' the wound, since wound must be?

I would I could adopt your will,
 See with your eyes, and set my heart
 Beating by yours, and drink my fill
 At your soul's springs, — your part my part
 In life, for good and ill.

No. I yearn upward, touch you close,
 Then stand away. I kiss your cheek,

Catch your soul's warmth, — I pluck the rose
 And love it more than tongue can speak —
 Then the good minute goes.

Already how am I so far
 Out of that minute? Must I go
 Still like the thistle-ball, no bar,
 Onward, whenever light winds blow,
 Fixed by no friendly star?

Just when I seemed about to learn!
 Where is the thread now? Off again!
 The old trick! Only I discern —
 Infinite passion, and the pain
 Of finite hearts that yearn.

MISCONCEPTIONS

THIS is a spray the Bird clung to,
 Making it blossom with pleasure,
 Ere the high tree-top she sprung to,
 Fit for her nest and her treasure.
 Oh, what a hope beyond measure
 Was the poor spray's, which the flying feet hung to, —
 So to be singled out, built in, and sung to!

This is a heart the Queen leant on,
 Thrilled in a minute erratic,
 Ere the true bosom she bent on,
 Meet for love's regal dalmatic.
 Oh, what a fancy ecstatic
 Was the poor heart's, ere the wanderer went on —
 Love to be saved for it, proffered to, spent on!

A SERENADE AT THE VILLA

THAT was I, you heard last night,
 When there rose no moon at all,
 Nor, to pierce the strained and tight
 Tent of heaven, a planet small:
 Life was dead and so was light.

Not a twinkle from the fly,
 Not a glimmer from the worm;
 When the crickets stopped their cry,
 When the owls forebore a term,
 You heard music; that was I.

Earth turned in her sleep with pain,
 Sultrily suspired for proof:
 In at heaven and out again,
 Lightning! — where it broke the roof,
 Bloodlike, some few drops of rain.

What they could my words expressed,
 O my love, my all, my one!
 Singing helped the verses best,
 And when singing's best was done,
 To my lute I left the rest.

So wore night; the East was gray,
 White the broad-faced hemlock-flowers:
 There would be another day;

Ere its first of heavy hours
Found me, I had passed away.

What became of all the hopes,
Words and song and lute as well?
Say, this struck you — "When life gropes
Feebly for the path where fell
Light last on the evening slopes,

"One friend in that path shall be,
To secure my step from wrong;
One to count night day for me,
Patient through the watches long,
Serving most with none to see."

Never say — as something bodes —
"So, the worst has yet a worse!
When life halts 'neath double loads,
Better the task-master's curse
Than such music on the roads!

"When no moon succeeds the sun,
Nor can pierce the midnight's tent
Any star, the smallest one,
While some drops, where lightning rent,
Show the final storm begun —

"When the fire-fly hides its spot,
When the garden-voices fail
In the darkness thick and hot, —
Shall another voice avail,
That shape be where these are not?

"Has some plague a longer lease,
Proffering its help uncouth?
Can't one even die in peace?
As one shuts one's eyes on youth,
Is that face the last one sees?"

Oh, how dark your villa was,
Windows fast and obdurate!
How the garden grudged me grass
Where I stood — the iron gate
Ground its teeth to let me pass!

ONE WAY OF LOVE

ALL June I bound the rose in sheaves.
Now, rose by rose, I strip the leaves
And strew them where Pauline may pass.
She will not turn aside? Alas!
Let them lie. Suppose they die?
The chance was they might take her eye.

How many a month I strove to suit
These stubborn fingers to the lute!
To-day I venture all I know.
She will not hear my music? So!
Break the string; fold music's wing:
Suppose Pauline had bade me sing!

My whole life long I learned to love.
This hour my utmost art I prove
And speak my passion — heaven or hell?
She will not give me heaven? 'Tis well!
Lose who may — I still can say,
Those who win heaven, blest are they!

ANOTHER WAY OF LOVE

JUNE was not over
Though past the full,
And the best of her roses
Had yet to blow,
When a man I know
(But shall not discover,
Since ears are dull,
And time discloses)
Turned him and said with a man's true air,
Half sighing a smile in a yawn, as 't were, —
"If I tire of your June, will she greatly care?"

Well, dear, in-doors with you!
True! serene deadness
Tries a man's temper.
What's in the blossom
June wears on her bosom?
Can it clear scores with you?
Sweetness and redness,
Eadem semper!
Go, let me care for it greatly or slightly!
If June mend her bower now, your hand left unsightly
By plucking the roses, — my June will do rightly.

And after, for pastime,
If June be refulgent
With flowers in completeness,
All petals, no prickles,
Delicious as trickles
Of wine poured at mass-time, —
And choose One indulgent
To redness and sweetness:
Or if, with experience of man and of spider,
June use my June-lightning, the strong insect-rider,
And stop the fresh film-work, — why, June will consider.

A PRETTY WOMAN

THAT fawn-skin-dappled hair of hers,
And the blue eye
Dear and dewy,
And that infantine fresh air of hers!

To think men cannot take you, Sweet,
And enfold you,
Ay, and hold you,
And so keep you what they make you, Sweet!

You like us for a glance, you know —
For a word's sake
Or a sword's sake,
All's the same, whate'er the chance, you know.

And in turn we make you ours, we say —
You and youth too,
Eyes and mouth too,
All the face composed of flowers, we say.

All's our own, to make the most of, Sweet —
Sing and say for,

Watch and pray for,
Keep a secret or go boast of, Sweet!

But for loving, why, you would not, Sweet,
Though we prayed you,
Paid you, brayed you
In a mortar — for you could not, Sweet!

So, we leave the sweet face fondly there :
Be its sweet
Its sole duty!
Let all hope of grace beyond, lie there!

And while the face lies quiet there,
Who shall wonder
That I ponder
A conclusion? I will try it there.

As, — why must one, for the love foregone,
Scout mere liking?
Thunder-striking
Earth, — the heaven, we looked above for, gone!

Why, with beauty, needs there money be,
Love with liking?
Crush the fly-king
In his gauze, because no honey-bee?
May not liking be so simple-sweet,
If love grew there
'T would undo there
All that breaks the cheek to dimples sweet?

Is the creature too imperfect, say?
Would you mend it
And so end it?
Since not all addition perfects aye!

Or is it of its kind, perhaps,
Just perfection —
Whence, rejection
Of a grace not to its mind, perhaps?

Shall we burn up, tread that face at once
Into tinder,
And so hinder
Sparks from kindling all the place at once?

Or else kiss away one's soul on her?
Your love-fancies!
— A sick man sees
Truer, when his hot eyes roll on her!

Thus the craftsman thinks to grace the rose, —
Plucks a mould-flower
For his gold flower,
Uses fine things that efface the rose:

Rosy rubies make its cup more rose,
Precious metals
Ape the petals, —
Last, some old king locks it up, morose!

Then how grace a rose? I know a way!
Leave it, rather.
Must you gather?
Snell, kiss, wear it — at last, throw away!

RESPECTABILITY

DEAR, had the world in its caprice
Deigned to proclaim "I know you both,
Have recognized your plighted troth,
Am sponsor for you: live in peace!" —
How many precious months and years
Of youth had passed, that speed so fast,
Before we found it out at last,
The world, and what it fears!

How much of priceless life were spent
With men that every virtue decks,
And women models of their sex,
Society's true ornament, —
Ere we dared wander, nights like this,
Through wind and rain, and watch the Seine,
And feel the Boulevard break again
To warmth and light and bliss!

I know! the world proscribes not love;
Allows my finger to caress
Your lips' contour and downiness,
Provided it supply a glove.
The world's good word! — the Institute!
Guizot receives Montalembert!
Eh? Down the court three lampions flare:
Put forward your best foot!

LOVE IN A LIFE

ROOM after room,
I hunt the house through
We inhabit together.
Heart, fear nothing, for, heart, thou shalt find
her —
Next time, herself! — not the trouble behind
her
Left in the curtain, the couch's perfume!
As she brushed it, the cornice-wreath blossomed anew:
Yon looking-glass gleamed at the wave of her feather.

Yet the day wears,
And door succeeds door;
I try the fresh fortune —
Range the wide house from the wing to the centre.
Still the same chance! she goes out as I enter.
Spend my whole day in the quest, — who cares?
But 't is twilight, you see, — with such suites to explore,
Such closets to search, such alcoves to impor-
tune!

LIFE IN A LOVE

ESCAPE me?
Never — Beloved!
While I am I, and you are you,
So long as the world contains us both,
Me the loving and you the loth,
While the one eludes, must the other pursue.

My life is a fault at last, I fear:
 It seems too much like a fate, indeed!
 Though I do my best I shall scarce succeed.
 But what if I fail of my purpose here?
 It is but to keep the nerves at strain,
 To dry one's eyes and laugh at a fall,
 And baffled, get up and begin again, —
 So the chase takes up one's life, that's all.
 While, look but once from your farthest bound
 At me so deep in the dust and dark,
 No sooner the old hope goes to ground
 Than a new one, straight to the selfsame mark,
 I shape me —
 Ever
 Removed!

IN THREE DAYS

So, I shall see her in three days
 And just one night, but nights are short,
 Then two long hours, and that is morn.
 See how I come, unchanged, unworn!
 Feel, where my life broke off from thine,
 How fresh the splinters keep and fine, —
 Only a touch and we combine!

Too long, this time of year, the days!
 But nights, at least the nights are short.
 As night shows where her one moon is,
 A hand's-breadth of pure light and bliss,
 So life's night gives my lady birth
 And my eyes hold her! What is worth
 The rest of heaven, the rest of earth?

O loaded curls, release your store
 Of warmth and scent, as once before
 The tingling hair did, lights and darks
 Outbreking into fairy sparks,
 When under curl and curl I pried
 After the warmth and scent inside,
 Through lights and darks how manifold —
 The dark inspired, the light controlled!
 As early Art embrowns the gold.

What great fear, should one say, "Three days
 That change the world might change as well
 Your fortune; and if joy delays,
 Be happy that no worse befell!"
 What small fear, if another says,
 "Three days and one short night beside
 May throw no shadow on your ways;
 But years must teem with change untried,
 With chance not easily defied,
 With an end somewhere undescried."
 No fear! — or if a fear be born
 This minute, it dies out in scorn.
 Fear? I shall see her in three days
 And one night, now the nights are short,
 Then just two hours, and that is morn.

IN A YEAR

NEVER any more,
 While I live,
 Need I hope to see his face
 As before.

Once his love grown chill,
 Mine may strive:
 Bitterly we re-embrace,
 Single still.

Was it something said,
 Something done,
 Vexed him? Was it touch of hand,
 Turn of head?
 Strange! that very way
 Love begun:
 I as little understand
 Love's decay.

When I sewed or drew,
 I recall
 How he looked as if I sung,
 — Sweetly too.
 If I spoke a word,
 First of all
 Up his cheek the color sprung,
 Then he heard.

Sitting by my side,
 At my feet,
 So he breathed but air I breathed,
 Satisfied!
 I, too, at love's brim
 Touched the sweet:
 I would die if death bequeathed
 Sweet to him.

"Speak, I love thee best!"
 He exclaimed:
 "Let thy love my own foretell!"
 I confessed:
 "Clasp my heart on thine
 Now unblamed,
 Since upon thy soul as well
 Hangeth mine!"

Was it wrong to own,
 Being truth?
 Why should all the giving prove
 His alone?
 I had wealth and ease,
 Beauty, youth:
 Since my lover gave me love,
 I gave these.

That was all I meant,
 — To be just,
 And the passion I had raised,
 To content.
 Since he chose to change
 Gold for dust,
 If I gave him what he praised
 Was it strange?

Would he loved me yet,
 On and on,
 While I found some way undreamed
 — Paid my debt!
 Gave more life and more,
 Till, all gone,
 He should smile "She never seemed Mine before.

"What, she felt the while,
Must I think?
Love's so different with us men!"
He should smile:
"Dying for my sake—
White and pink!
Can't we touch these bubbles then
But they break?"

Dear, the pang is brief,
Do thy part,
Have thy pleasure! How perplexed
Grows belief!
Well, this cold clay clod
Was man's heart:
Crumble it, and what comes next?
Is it God?

WOMEN AND ROSES

Written on the suggestion of some roses sent
Mrs. Browning. At the time of writing,
Browning was carrying out a resolve to write a poem a day, a resolve which lasted a fortnight.

I

I DREAM of a red-rose tree.
And which of its roses three
Is the dearest rose to me?

II

Round and round, like a dance of snow
In a dazzling drift, as its guardians, go
Floating the women faded for ages,
Sculptured in stone, on the poet's pages.
Then follow women fresh and gay,
Living and loving and loved to-day,
Last, in the rear, flee the multitude of maidens,
Beauties yet unborn. And all, to one cadence,
They circle their rose on my rose tree.

III

Dear rose, thy term is reached,
Thy leaf hangs loose and bleached:
Bees pass it unimpeached.

IV

Stay then, stoop, since I cannot climb,
You, great shapes of the antique time!
How shall I fix you, fire you, freeze you,
Break my heart at your feet to please you?
Oh, to possess and be possessed!
Hearts that beat 'neath each pallid breast!
Once but of love, the poesy, the passion,
Drink but once and die!—In vain, the same fashion,
They circle their rose on my rose tree.

V

Dear rose, thy joy's undimmed,
Thy cup is ruby-rimmed,
Thy cup's heart nectar-brimmed.

VI

Deep, as drops from a statue's plinth
The bee sucked in by the hyacinth,

So will I bury me while burning,
Quench like him at a plunge my yearning,
Eyes in your eyes, lips on your lips!
Fold me fast where the cincture slips,
Prison all my soul in eternities of pleasure,
Girdle me for once! But no—the old measure,
They circle their rose on my rose tree.

VII

Dear rose without a thorn,
Thy bud's the babe unborn:
First streak of a new morn.

VIII

Wings, lend wings for the cold, the clear!
What is far conquers what is near.
Roses will bloom nor want beholders,
Sprung from the dust where our flesh moulders,
What shall arrive with the cycle's change?
A novel grace and a beauty strange.
I will make an Eve, be the artist that began her,
Shaped her to his mind!—Alas! in like manner
They circle their rose on my rose tree.

BEFORE

LET them fight it out, friend! things have gone too far.
God must judge the couple: leave them as they
are
—Whichever one's the guiltless, to his glory,
And whichever one the guilt's with, to my story!

Why, you would not bid men, sunk in such a slough,
Strike no arm out further, stick and stink as
now,
Leaving right and wrong to settle the embroil-
ment,
Heaven with snaky hell, in torture and entoi-
ment?

Who's the culprit of them? How must he conceive
God—the queen he caps to, laughing in his sleeve,
"Tis but decent to profess one's self beneath
her:
Still, one must not be too much in earnest, either!"

Better sin the whole sin, sure that God observes;
Then go live his life out! Life will try his nerves,
When the sky, which noticed all, makes no disclosure,
And the earth keeps up her terrible composure.

Let him pace at pleasure, past the walls of rose,
Pluck their fruits when grape-trees graze him
as he goes!
For he 'gins to guess the purpose of the garden,
With the sly mute thing, beside there, for a warden.

What's the leopard-dog-thing, constant at his side,
A leer and lie in every eye of its obsequious hide?
When will come an end to all the mock obeisance,
And the price appear that pays for the misfeasance?

So much for the culprit. Who's the martyred man?
Let him bear one stroke more, for be sure he can!
He that strove thus evil's lump with good to leaven,
Let him give his blood at last and get his heaven!

All or nothing, stake it! Trusts he God or no?
Thus far and no farther? farther? be it so!
Now, enough of your chicane of prudent pauses,
Sage provisos, sub-intents and saving-clauses!

Ah, "forgive" you bid him? While God's champion lives,
Wrong shall be resisted: dead, why, he forgives.
But you must not end my friend ere you begin him;
Evil stands not crowned on earth, while breath is in him.

Once more — Will the wronger, at this last of all,
Dare to say, "I did wrong," rising in his fall?
No? — Let go, then! Both the fighters to their places!
While I count three, step you back as many paces!

AFTER

TAKE the cloak from his face, and at first
Let the corpse do its worst!

How he lies in his rights of a man!
Death has done all death can.
And, absorbed in the new life he leads,
He recks not, he heeds
Nor his wrong nor my vengeance; both strike
On his senses alike,
And are lost in the solemn and strange
Surprise of the change.

Ha, what avails death to erase
His offence, my disgrace?
I would we were boys as of old
In the field, by the fold:
His outrage, God's patience, man's scorn
Were so easily borne!

I stand here now, he lies in his place:
Cover the face!

THE GUARDIAN-ANGEL

A PICTURE AT FANO

DEAR and great Angel, wouldst thou only leave
That child, when thou hast done with him,
for me!

Let me sit all the day here, that when eve
Shall find performed thy special ministry,
And time come for departure, thou, suspending,
Thy flight, may'st see another child for tending,
Another still, to quiet and retrieve.

Then I shall feel thee step one step, no more,
From where thou standest now, to where I gaze,
— And suddenly my head is covered o'er
With those wings, white above the child who prays
Now on that tomb — and I shall feel thee guarding
Me, out of all the world; for me, discarding
Yon heaven thy home, that waits and opes its door.

I would not look up thither past thy head
Because the door opes, like that child, I know,
For I should have thy gracious face instead,
Thou bird of God! And wilt thou bend me low
Like him, and lay, like his, my hands together,
And lift them up to pray, and gently tether
Me, as thy lamb there, with thy garment's spread?

If this was ever granted, I would rest
My head beneath thine, while thy healing hands
Close-covered both my eyes beside thy breast,
Pressing the brain, which too much thought expands,
Back to its proper size again, and smoothing
Distortion down till every nerve had soothing,
And all lay quiet, happy and suppressed.

How soon all worldly wrong would be repaired!
I think how I should view the earth and skies
And sea, when once again my brow was bared
After thy healing, with such different eyes.
O world, as God has made it! All is beauty:
And knowing this, is love, and love is duty.
What further may be sought for or declared?

Guercino drew this angel I saw teach
(Alfred, dear friend!) — that little child to pray,
Holding the little hands up, each to each
Pressed gently, — with his own head turned away
Over the earth where so much lay before him
Of work to do, though heaven was opening o'er him,
And he was left at Fano by the beach.

We were at Fano, and three times we went
To sit and see him in his chapel there,
And drink his beauty to our soul's content
— My angel with me too: and since I care
For dear Guercino's fame (to which in power
And glory comes this picture for a dower,
Fraught with a pathos so magnificent) —

And since he did not work thus earnestly
At all times, and has else endured some
wrong —

I took one thought his picture struck from
me,
And spread it out, translating it to song.
My love is here. Where are you, dear old
friend?
How rolls the Wairoa at your world's far end?
This is Ancona, yonder is the sea.

MEMORABILIA

AH, did you once see Shelley plain,
And did he stop and speak to you,
And did you speak to him again?
How strange it seems and new!

But you were living before that,
And also you are living after;
And the memory I started at —
My starting moves your laughter!

I crossed a moor, with a name of its own
And a certain use in the world no doubt,
Yet a hand's-breadth of it shines alone
'Mid the blank miles round about:

For there I picked up on the heather,
And there I put inside my breast
A moulted feather, an eagle-feather!
Well, I forget the rest.

POPULARITY

As the previous poem was an appreciation of Shelley, so this, of Keats.

STAND still, true poet that you are!
I know you; let me try and draw you.
Some night you'll fail us: when afar
You rise, remember one man saw you,
Knew you, and named a star!

My star, God's glow-worm! Why extend
That loving hand of his which leads you,
Yet locks you safe from end to end
Of this dark world, unless he needs you,
Just saves your light to spend?

His clenched hand shall unclose at last,
I know, and let out all the beauty:
My poet holds the future fast,
Accepts the coming ages' duty,
Their present for this past.

That day, the earth's feast-master's brow
Shall clear, to God the chalice raising;
"Others give best at first, but thou
Forever set'st our table praising,
Keep'st the good wine till now!"

Meantime, I'll draw you as you stand,
With few or none to watch and wonder:
I'll say — a fisher, on the sand
By Tyre the old, with ocean-plunder,
A netful, brought to land.

Who has not heard how Tyrian shells
Enclosed the blue, that dye of dyes
Whereof one drop worked miracles,
And colored like Astarte's eyes
Raw silk the merchant sells?

And each bystander of them all
Could criticise, and quote tradition
How depths of blue sublimed some pall
— To get which, pricked a king's ambition:
Worth sceptre, crown and ball.

Yet there 's the dye, in that rough mesh,
The sea has only just o'er-whispered!
Live whelks, each lip's beard dripping fresh,
As if they still the water's lisp heard
Through foam the rock-weeds thresh.

Enough to furnish Solomon
Such hangings for his cedar-house,
That, when gold-robed he took the throne
In that abyss of blue, the Spouse
Might swear his presence shone

Most like the centre-spike of gold
Which burns deep in the bluebell's womb
What time, with ardors manifold,
The bee goes singing to her groom,
Drunken and overbold.

Mere conchs! not fit for warp or woof!
Till cunning come to pound and squeeze
And clarify, — refine to proof
The liquor filtered by degrees,
While the world stands aloof.

And there 's the extract, flasked and fine,
And priced and salable at last!
And Hobbs, Nobbs, Stokes and Nokes combine
To paint the future from the past,
Put blue into their line.

Hobbs hints blue, — straight he turtle eats:
Nobbs prints blue, — claret crowns his cup:
Nokes outdares Stokes in azure feats, —
Both gorge. Who fished the nurex up?
What porridge had John Keats?

MASTER HUGUES OF SAXE-GOTHA

Whoever Browning may have had in mind, there was no historical figure with this name and place.

HIST, but a word, fair and soft!
Forth and be judged, Master Hugues!
Answer the question I've put you so oft:
What do you mean by your mountainous fugues?
See, we're alone in the loft, —

I, the poor organist here,
Hugues, the composer of note,
Dead though, and done with, this many a year:
Let's have a colloquy, something to quote.
Make the world prick up its ear!

See, the church empties apace :

Fast they extinguish the lights.

Hallo there, sacristan ! Five minutes' grace !

Here 's a crank pedal wants setting to rights,
Balks one of holding the base.

See, our huge house of the sounds,

Hushing its hundreds at once

Bids the last loiterer back to his bounds !

— O you may challenge them, not a response
Get the church-saints on their rounds !

(Saints go their rounds, who shall doubt ?

— March, with the moon to admire,

Up nave, down chancel, turn transept about,

Supervise all betwixt pavement and spire,

Put rats and mice to the rout —

Aloys and Jurien and Just —

Order things back to their place.

Have a sharp eye lest the candlesticks rust,

Rub the church-plate, darn the sacrament-
lace,

Clear the desk-velvet of dust.)

Here 's your book, younger folks shelve !

Played I not off-hand and runningly,

Just now, your masterpiece, hard number twelve ?

Here 's what should strike, could one handle
it cunningly :

Help the axe, give it a helve !

Page after page as I played,

Every bar's rest where one wipes

Sweat from one's brow, I looked up and surveyed,

O'er my three claviers, yon forest of pipes
Whence you still peeped in the shade.

Sure you were wishful to speak ?

You, with brow ruled like a score,

Yes, and eyes buried in pits on each cheek,

Like two great breves, as they wrote them
of yore,

Each side that bar, your straight beak !

Sure you said — " Good, the mere notes !

Still, couldst thou take my intent,

Know what procured me our Company's votes —

A master were lauded and sciolists shent,
Parted the sheep from the goats ! "

Well then, speak up, never flinch !

Quick, ere my candle 's a snuff

— Burnt, do you see ? to its uttermost inch —

I believe in you, but that 's not enough :

Give my conviction a clinch !

First you deliver your phrase

— Nothing propound, that I see,

Fit in itself for much blame or much praise —

Answered no less, where no answer needs be ;
Off start the Two on their ways.

Straight must a Third interpose,

Volunteer needlessly help ;

In strikes a Fourth, a Fifth thrusts in his nose.

So the cry 's open, the kennel 's a-yelp,

Argument 's hot to the close.

One dissertates, he is candid ;

Two must discept, — has distinguished ;

Three helps the couple, if ever yet man did ;

Four protests ; Five makes a dart at the thing wished :

Back to One, goes the case bandied.

One says his say with a difference ;

More of expounding, explaining !

All now is wrangle, abuse and vociferance ;

Now there 's a truce, all 's subdued, self-restraining :

Five, though, stands out all the stiffer hence.

One is incisive, corrosive ;

Two retorts, nettled, curt, crepitant ;

Three makes rejoinder, expansive, explosive ;

Four overbears them all, strident and strepi-
tant :

Five . . . O Danaides, O Sieve !

Now, they ply axes and crowbars ;

Now, they prick pins at a tissue

Fine as a skein of the casuist Escobar's

Worked on the bone of a lie. To what issue ?

Where is our gain at the Two-bars ?

Est fuga, volvitur rota.

On we drift : where looms the dim port ?

One, Two, Three, Four, Five, contribute their quota ;

Something is gained, if one caught but the import —

Show it us, Hugues of Saxe-Gotha !

What with affirming, denying,

Holding, risposting, subjoining,

All's like . . . it's like . . . for an instance
I'm trying . . .

There ! See our roof, its gilt moulding and groining

Under those spider-webs lying !

So your fugue broadens and thickens,

Greatens and deepens and lengthens,

Till we exclaim — " But where 's music, the dickens ?

Blot ye the gold, while your spider-web strengthens

— Blacked to the stoutest of tickens ? "

I for man's effort am zealous :

Prove me such censure unfounded !

Seems it surprising a lover grows jealous —

Hopes 't was for something, his organ-pipes sounded,

Tiring three boys at the bellows ?

Is it your moral of Life ?

Such a web, simple and subtle,

Weave we on earth here in impotent strife,

Backward and forward each throwing his shuttle,

Death ending all with a knife ?

Over our heads truth and nature —
 Still our life's zigzags and dodges,
 Ins and outs, weaving a new legislature —
 God's gold just shining its last where that lodges,
 Palled beneath man's usurpature.

So we o'ershroud stars and roses.
 Cherub and trophy and garland;
 Nothings grow something which quietly closes Heaven's earnest eye: not a glimpse of the far land
 Gets through our comments and glozes.

Ah, but traditions, inventions,
 (Say we and make up a visage)
 So many men with such various intentions,
 Down the past ages, must know more than this
 age!
 Leave we the web its dimensions!

Who thinks Hugues wrote for the deaf,
 Proved a mere mountain in labor?
 Better submit; try again; what's the clef?
 'Faith, 't is no trifle for pipe and for tabor —
 Four flats, the minor in F.

Friend, your fugue taxes the finger:
 Learning it once, who would lose it?
 Yet all the while a misgiving will linger,
 Truth's golden o'er us although we refuse
 it —
 Nature, through cobwebs we string her.

Hugues! I advise meû pœnâ
 (Counterpoint glares like a Gorgon)
 Bid One, Two, Three, Four, Five, clear the arena!
 Say the word, straight I unstop the full organ,
 Blare out the mode Palestrina.

While in the roof, if I'm right there,
 . . . Lo you, the wick in the socket!
 Hallo, you sacristan, show us a light there!
 Down it dips, gone like a rocket.
 What, you want, do you, to come unawares,
 Sweeping the church up for first morning-prayers,
 And find a poor devil has ended his cares
 At the foot of your rotten-runged rat-riddled stairs?
 Do I carry the moon in my pocket?

THE RETURN OF THE DRUSES

A TRAGEDY

Originally published as No. IV. of Bells and Pomegranates in 1843. The manuscript was first named Mansoor the Hierophant.

PERSONS

The Grand-Master's Prefect.
 The Patriarch's Nuncio.
 The Republic's Admiral.
 LOYS DE DREUX, Knight-Novice.

ACT I

Enter stealthily KARSHOOK, RAGHIB, AYOUB, and other initiated Druses, each as he enters casting off a robe that conceals his distinctive black vest and white turban; then, as giving a loose to exultation, —

Karshook. The moon is carried off in purple fire:

Day breaks at last! Break glory, with the day,
 On Djabal's dead incarnate mystery
 Now ready to resume its pristine shape
 Of Hakeem, as the Khalif vanished erst
 In what seemed death to uninstructed eyes,
 On red Mokattam's verge — our Founder's flesh,
 As he resumes our Founder's function!

Raghîb. — Death
 Sweep to the Christian Prefect that enslaved
 So long us sad Druse exiles o'er the sea!

Ayoub. — Most joy be thine, O Mother-mountain!
 Thy brood

Initiated Druses — DJABAL, KHALIL, ANAEL, MAANI, KARSHOOK, RAGHIB, AYOUB, and others.
 Uninitiated Druses, Prefect's Guard, Nuncio's Attendants, Admiral's Force.

TIME, 14—.

PLACE, An Islet of the Southern Sporades, colonized by Druses of Lebanon, and garrisoned by the Knights-Hospitallers of Rhodes.

SCENE, A Hall in the Prefect's Palace.

Returns to thee, no outcasts as we left,
 But thus — but thus! Behind, our Prefect's corpse;

Before, a presence like the morning — thine,
 Absolute Djabal late, — God Hakeem now
 That day breaks!

Kar. Off then, with disguise at last!
 As from our forms this hateful garb we strip,
 Lose every tongue its glozing accent too,
 Discard each limb the ignoble gesture! Cry,
 'T is the Druse Nation, warders on our Mount
 Of the world's secret, since the birth of time,
 — No kindred slips, no offsets from thy stock,
 No spawn of Christians are we, Prefect, we Who rise . . .

Ay. Who shout . . .

Ragh. Who seize, a first-fruits, ha —
 Spoil of the spoiler! Brave!

[They begin to tear down, and to dispute for, the decorations of the hall.]

Kar. Hold !
Ay. — Mine, I say ;
 And mine shall it continue !

Kar. Just this fringe !
 Take anything beside ! Lo, spire on spire,
 Curl serpentwise wreathed columns to the top
 O' the roof, and hide themselves mysteriously
 Among the twinkling lights and darks that haunt

Yon cornice ! Where the huge veil, they suspend
 Before the Prefect's chamber of delight,
 Floats wide, then falls again as if its slave,
 The scented air, took heart now, and anon
 Lost heart to buoy its breadths of gorgeous-
 ness

Above the gloom they droop in — all the porch
 Is jewelled o'er with frostwork character ;
 And, see, yon eight-point cross of white flame,
 winking
 Hoar - silvery like some fresh - broke marble
 stone :

Raze out the Rhodian cross there, so thou leav'st
 me

This single fringe !

Ay. Ha, wouldst thou, dog-fox ? Help !
 — Three hand-breadths of gold fringe, my son was set

To twist, the night he died !

Kar. Nay, hear the knave !
 And I could witness my one daughter borne,
 A week since, to the Prefect's couch, yet fold
 These arms, be mute, lest word of mine should mar

Our Master's work, delay the Prefect here
 A day, prevent his sailing hence for Rhodes —
 How know I else ? — Hear me denied my right
 By such a knave !

Ragh. [Interposing.] Each ravage for him-
 self !

Booty enough ! On, Druses ! Be there found
 Blood and a heap behind us ; with us, Djabal
 Turned Hakeem ; and before us, Lebanon !
 Yields the porch ? Spare not ! There his minions dragged

Thy daughter, Karshook, to the Prefect's couch !

Ayoob ! Thy son, to soothe the Prefect's
 pride,

Bent o'er that task, the death-sweat on his
 brow,

Carving the spice-tree's heart in scroll-work
 there !

Onward in Djabal's name !

(As the tumult is at height, enter KHALIL. A pause and silence.)

Khalil. Was it for this,
 Djabal hath summoned you ? Deserve you
 thus

A portion in to-day's event ? What, here —
 When most behoves your feet fall soft, your
 eyes

Sink low, your tongues lie still, — at Djabal's
 side,

Close in his very hearing, who, perchance,
 Assumes e'en now God Hakeem's dreaded shape, —

Dispute you for these gauds ?

Ay. How say'st thou, Khalil ?

Doubtless our Master prompts thee ! Take the fringe,

Old Karshook ! I supposed it was a day . . .

Kha. For pillage ?

Kar. Hearken, Khalil ! Never spoke
 A boy so like a song-bird ; we avouch thee

Prettiest of all our Master's instruments
 Except thy bright twin-sister ; thou and Anael

Challenge his prime regard ; but we may crave
 (Such nothings as we be) a portion too

Of Djabal's favor ; in him we believed,
 His bound ourselves, him moon by moon obeyed,

 Kept silence till this daybreak — so, may claim
 Reward : who grudges me my claim ?

Ay. To-day
 Is not as yesterday !

Ragh. Stand off !
Kha. Rebel you ?

Must I, the delegate of Djabal, draw
 His wrath on you, the day of our Return ?

Other Druses. Wrench from their grasp the fringe ! Hounds ! must the earth

Vomit her plagues on us through thee ? — and
 thee ?

Plague me not, Khalil, for their fault !
Kha. Oh, shame !

Thus breaks to-day on you, the mystic tribe
 Who, flying the approach of Osman, bore

Our faith, a merest spark, from Syria's ridge,
 Its birthplace, hither ! "Let the sea divide

These hunters from their prey," you said ;
 "and safe

In this dim islet's virgin solitude
 Tend we our faith, the spark, till happier time

Fan it to fire ; till Hakeem rise again,
 According to his word that, in the flesh

Which faded on Mokattam ages since,
 He, at our extreme need, would interpose,

And, reinstating all in power and bliss,
 Lead us himself to Lebanon once more."

Was 't not thus you departed years ago,
 Ere I was born ?

Druses. 'T was even thus, years ago.
Kha. And did you call — (according to old laws

 Which bid us, lest the sacred grow profane,
 Assimilate ourselves in outward rites

With strangers fortune makes our lords, and
 live

As Christian with the Christian, Jew with Jew
 Druse only with the Druses) — did you call

Or no, to stand 'twixt you and Osman's rage,
 (Mad to pursue e'en hither through the sea

The remnant of our tribe,) a race self vowed
 To endless warfare with his hordes and him,

The White-cross Knights of the adjacent Isle ?
Kar. And why else rend we down, wrench up, raise out ?

 These Knights of Rhodes we thus solicited

For help, bestowed on us a fiercer pest
 Than aught we fled — their Prefect ; who began

His promised mere paternal governance.
 By a prompt massacre of all our Sheikhs

Able to thwart the Order in its scheme
 Of crushing, with our nation's memory.

Each chance of our return, and taming us
 Bondslaves to Rhodes forever — all, he thinks

To end by this day's treason.

Kha. Say I not ?
You, fitted to the Order's purposes,
Your Sheikhs cut off, your rights, your garb
proscribed,
Must yet receive one degradation more ;
The Knights at last throw off the mask —
transfer,

As tributary now and appanage,
This islet they are but protectors of,
To their own ever-craving liege, the Church,
Who licenses all crimes that pay her thus.
You, from their Prefect, were to be consigned
(Pursuant of I know not what vile pact)
To the Knights' Patriarch, ardent to outvie
His predecessor in all wickedness.
When suddenly rose Djabal in the midst,
Djabal, the man in semblance, but our God
Confessed by signs and portents. Ye saw fire
Bicker round Djabal, heard strange music fit
Bird-like about his brow ?

Druses. We saw — we heard !
Djabal is Hakeem, the incarnate Dread,
The phantasm Khalif, King of Prodiges !

Kha. And as he said has not our Khalif
done,
And so disposed events (from land to land
Passing invisibly) that when, this morn,
The pact of villany complete, there comes
This Patriarch's Nuncio with this Master's Prefect

Their treason to consummate, — each will face
For a crouching handful, an uplifted nation ;
For simulated Christians, confessed Druses ;
And, for slaves past hope of the Mother-mountain,
Freedmen returning there 'neath Venice' flag ;
That Venice which, the Hospitaliers' foe,
Grants us from Candia escort home at price
Of our relinquished isle, Rhodes counts her
own —

Venice, whose promised argosies should stand
Toward harbor : is it now that you, and you,
And you, selected from the rest to bear
The burden of the Khalif's secret, further
To-day's event, entitled by your wrongs,
And witness in the Prefect's hall his fate —
That you dare clutch these gauds ? Ay, drop
them !

Kar. True,
Most true, all this ; and yet, may one dare hint,
Thou art the youngest of us ? — though employed

Abundantly as Djabal's confidant,
Transmitter of his mandates, even now.
Much less, when'er beside him Anael graces
The cedar throne, his queen-bride, art thou like
To occupy its lowest step that day !
Now, Khalil, wert thou checked as thou aspir-
est,

Forbidden such or such an honor, — say,
Would silence serve so amply ?

Kha. Karshook thinks
I covet honors ? Well, nor idly thinks !
Honors ? I have demanded of them all
The greatest !

Kar. I supposed so.

Kha. Judge, yourselves !
Turn, thus : 't is in the alcove at the back

Of yonder columned porch, whose entrance now
The veil hides, that our Prefect holds his state, Receives the Nuncio, when the one, from Rhodes,

The other lands from Syria ; there they meet.

Now, I have sued with earnest prayers . . .

Kar. For what Shall the Bride's brother vainly sue ?

Kha. That mine —
Avenge in one blow a myriad wrongs
— Might be the hand to slay the Prefect there !
Djabal reserves that office for himself.

[A silence.]
Thus far, as youngest of you all, I speak — Scarce more enlightened than yourselves ;
since, near

As I approach him, nearer as I trust
Soon to approach our Master, he reveals
Only the God's power, not the glory yet.
Therefore I reasoned with you : now, as servant
To Djabal, bearing his authority,
Hear me appoint your several posts ! Till noon
None see him save myself and Anael : once
The deed achieved, our Khalif, casting off
The embodied Awe's tremendous mystery,
The weakness of the flesh disguise, resumes
His proper glory, ne'er to fade again.

(Enter a Druse.)

The Druse. Our Prefect lands from Rhodes !
— without a sign

That he suspects aught since he left our Isle ;
Nor in his train a single guard beyond
The few he sailed with hence : so have we learned

From Loys.

Kar. Loys ? Is not Loys gone

Forever ?

Ay. Loys, the Frank Knight, returned ?

The Druse. Loys, the boy, stood on the leading prow

Conspicuous in his gay attire, and leapt
Into the surf the foremost. Since day-dawn
I kept watch to the Northward ; take but note
Of my poor vigilance to Djabal !

Kha. Peace !
Thou, Karshook, with thy company, receive
The Prefect as appointed : see, all keep
The wonted show of servitude : announce
His entry here by the accustomed peal
Of trumpets, then await the further pleasure
Of Djabal ! (Loys back, whom Djabal sent
To Rhodes that we might spare the single Knight Worth sparing !)

(Enter a second Druse.)

The Druse. I espied it first ! Say, I
First spied the Nuncio's galley from the South !
Said'st thou a Crossed-keys' flag would flap the mast ?

It nears apace ! One galley and no more.
If Djabal chance to ask who spied the flag,
Forget not, I it was !

Kha. Thou, Ayoob, bring
The Nuncio and his followers hither ! Break
One rule prescribed, ye wither in your blood,
Die at your fault !

(Enter a third Druse.)

The Druse. I shall see home, see home !
— Shall banquet in the sombre groves again !

Hail to thee, Khalil! Venice looms afar;
The argosies of Venice, like a cloud,
Bear up from Candia in the distance!

Kha. Joy!
Summon our people, Raghib! Bid all forth!
Tell them the long-kept secret, old and young!
Set free the captive, let the trampled raise
Their faces from the dust, because at length
The cycle is complete, God Hakeem's reign
Begins anew! Say, Venice for our guard,
Ere night we steer for Syria! Hear you, Druses?
Hear you this crowning witness to the claims
Of Djabal? Oh, I spoke of hope and fear,
Reward and punishment, because he bade
Who has the right: for me, what should I say
But, mar not those imperial lineaments,
No majesty of all that rapt regard
Vex by the least omission! Let him rise
Without a check from you!

Druses. Let Djabal rise!

(Enter Loys. — The Druses are silent.)

Loys. Who speaks of Djabal? — for I seek him, friends!

[Aside.] Tu Dieu! 'Tis as our Isle broke out in song

For joy, its Prefect-incubus drops off
To-day, and I succeed him in his rule!

But no — they cannot dream of their good fortune!

[Aloud.] Peace to you, Druses! I have tidings for you,

But first for Djabal: where's your tall bewitcher,

With that small Arab thin-lipped silver-mouth?

Kha. [Aside to KAR.] Loys, in truth! Yet Djabal cannot err!

Kar. [To KHA.] And who takes charge of Loys? That's forgotten,

Despite thy wariness! Will Loys stand

And see his comrades slaughtered?

Loys. [Aside.] How they shrink
And whisper, with those rapid faces! What?

The sight of me in their oppressors' garb Strikes terror to the simple tribe? God's

shame

On those that bring our Order ill repute!

But all's at end now; better days begin

For these mild mountaineers from over-sea:

The timidest shall have in me no Prefect

To cower at thus! [Aloud.] I asked for Djabal —

Kar. [Aside.] Better

One lured him, ere he can suspect, inside

The corridor; 't were easy to dispatch

A youngster. [To LOYS.] Djabal passed some minutes since

Through yonder porch, and . . .

Kha. [Aside.] Hold! What, him dispatch?

The only Christian of them all we charge

No tyranny upon? Who, — noblest Knight

Of all that learned from time to time their trade

Of lust and cruelty among us, — heir

To Europe's pomp, a truest child of pride, —

Yet stood between the Prefect and ourselves

From the beginning? Loys, Djabal makes

Account of, and precisely sent to Rhodes

For safety? I take charge of him!

[To LOYS.]

Sir Loys, —

Loys. There, cousins! Does Sir Loys strike you dead?

Kha. [Advancing.] Djabal has intercourse with few or none

Till noontide: but, your pleasure?

Loys.

"Intercourse

With few or none?" — (Ah, Khalil, when you spoke

I saw not your smooth face! All health! — and health

To Anael! How fares Anael?) — "Intercourse with few or none?" Forget you, I've been friendly

With Djabal long ere you or any Druse?

— Enough of him at Rennes, I think, beneath The Duke my father's roof! He'd tell by the hour,

With fixed white eyes beneath his swarthy brow, Plausibler stories . . .

Kha.

Stories, say you? — Ah,

The quaint attire!

Loys.

My dress for the last time!

How sad I cannot make you understand,

This ermine, o'er a shield, betokens me

Of Bretagne, ancientest of provinces

And noblest; and, what's best and oldest there, See, Dreux', our house's blazon, which the

Nuncio

Tacks to an Hospitaller's vest to-day!

Kha. The Nuncio v'e await? What brings you back

From Rhodes, Sir Loys?

Loys.

How you island-tribe

Forget the world's awake while here you drowse!

What brings me back? What should not bring me, rather!

Our Patriarch's Nuncio visits you to-day —

Is not my year's probation out? I come

To take the knightly vows.

Kha.

What's that you wear?

Loys. This Rhodian cross? The cross your Prefect wore.

You should have seen, as I saw, the full Chapter

Rise, to a man, while they transferred this cross From that unworthy Prefect's neck to . . .

(fool —

My secret will escape me!) In a word,

My year's probation passed, a Knight ere eve

Am I; bound, like the rest, to yield my wealth

To the common stock, to live in chastity,

(We Knights espouse alone our Order's fame)

— Change this gay weed for the black white-crossed gown,

And fight to death against the Infidel

— Not, therefore, against you, you Christians with

Such partial difference only as befits

The peacefullest of tribes. But Khalil, prithee,

Is not the Isle brighter than wont to-day?

Kha. Ah, the new sword!

Loys.

See now! You handle sword

As 't were a camel-staff! Pull! That's my motto,

Annealed "Pro fide," on the blade in blue.

Kha. No curve in it? Surely a blade should curve.

Loys. Straight from the wrist! Loose — it should poise itself!

Kha. [Waving with irrepressible exultation the sword.] We are a nation, Loys, of old fame Among the mountains! Rights have we to keep

With the sword too!

[Remembering himself.] But I forget — you bid me

Seek Djabal?

Loys. What! A sword's sight scares you not?

(The People I will make of him and them!

Oh let my Prefect-sway begin at once!)

Bring Djabal — say, indeed, that come he must!

Kha. At noon seek Djabal in the Prefect's Chamber,

And find . . . [Aside.] Nay, 't is thy cursed race's token,

Frank pride, no special insolence of thine!

[Aloud.] Tarry, and I will do your bidding, Loys!

[To the rest aside.] Now, forth you! I proceed to Djabal straight.

Leave this poor boy, who knows not what he says!

Oh will it not add joy to even thy joy,

Djabal, that I report all friends were true?

[KHALIL goes, followed by the Druses.

Loys. Tu Dieu! How happy I shall make these Druses!

Was 't not surpassingly contrived of me To get the long list of their wrongs by heart,

Then take the first pretence for stealing off

From these poor islanders, present myself

Sudden at Rhodes before the noble Chapter,

And (as best proof of ardor in its cause

Which ere to-night will have become, too, mine)

Acquaint it with this plague-sore in its body,

This Prefect and his villainous career?

The princely Synod! All I dared request

Was his dismissal; and they graciously

Consigned his very office to myself —

Myself may cure the Isle diseased!

And well

For them, they did so! Since I never felt

How lone a lot, though brilliant, I embrace,

Till now that, past retrieval, it is mine.

To live thus, and thus die! Yet, as I leapt

On shore, so home a feeling greeted me

That I could half believe in Djabal's story,

He used to tempt my father with, at Rennes —

And me, too, since the story brought me here —

Of some Count Dreux and ancestor of ours

Who, sick of wandering from Bouillon's war,

Left his old name in Lebanon.

Long days

At least to spend in the Isle! and, my news known

An hour hence, what if Anael turn on me

The great black eyes I must forget?

Why, fool,

Recall them, then? My business is with Djabal,

Not Anael! Djabal tarries: if I seek him? —

The Isle is brighter than its wont to-day!

ACT II

Enter DJABAL.

Dja. That a strong man should think himself a God!

I — Hakeem? To have wandered through the world,

Sown falsehood, and thence reaped now scorn, now faith,

For my one chant with many a change, my tale

Of outrage, and my prayer for vengeance — this Required, forsooth, no mere man's faculty,

Naught less than Hakeem's? The persuading Loys

To pass probation here: the getting access

By Loys to the Prefect; worst of all,

The gaining my tribe's confidence by fraud

That would disgrace the very Frank, — a few

Of Europe's secrets which subdue the flame,

The wave, — to ply a simple tribe with these,

Took Hakeem?

And I feel this first to-day!

Does the day break, is the hour imminent

When one deed, when my whole life's deed, my deed

Must be accomplished? Hakeem? Why the God?

Shout, rather, "Djabal, Youssof's child, thought slain

With his whole race, the Druses' Sheikhs, this Prefect

Endeavored to extirpate — saved, a child,

Returns from traversing the world, a man,

Able to take revenge, lead back the march

To Lebanon" — so shout, and who gainsays?

But now, because delusion mixed itself

Insensibly with this career, all's changed!

Have I brought Venice to afford us convoy?

"True — but my jugglings wrought that!"

Put I heart

Into our people where no heart lurked? — "Ah, What cannot an impostor do!"

Not this!

Not do this which I do! Not bid avaunt

Falsehood! Thou shalt not keep thy hold on me!

— Nor even get a hold on me! 'Tis now —

This day — hour — minute — 't is as here I stand

On the accursed threshold of the Prefect.

That I am found deceiving and deceived!

And now what do I? — hasten to the few

Deceived, ere they deceive the many — shout,

"As I professed, I did believe myself!

Say, Druses, had you seen a butchery —

If Ayoob, Karshook saw — Maani there

Must tell you how I saw my father sink;

My mother's arms twine still about my neck;

I hear my brother shriek, here's yet the scar

Of what was meant for my own death-blow —

say,

If you had woke like me, grown year by year

Out of the tumult in a far-off clime,

Would it be wondrous such delusion grew?

I walked the world, asked help at every hand;

Came help or no? Not this and this? Which helps

When I returned with, found the Prefect here,
The Druses here, all here but Hakeem's self,
The Khalif of the thousand prophecies,
Reserved for such a juncture, — could I call
My mission aught but Hakeem's? Promised
Hakeem

More than performs the Djabal — you absolve?
— Me, you will never shame before the crowd
Yet happily ignorant? — Me, both throngs surround,

The few deceived, the many unabused,
— Who, thus surrounded, slay for you and them
The Prefect, lead to Lebanon? No Khalif,
But Sheikh once more! Mere Djabal — not" . . .
(Enter KHALIL hastily.)

Kha. — God Hakeem!
'T is told! The whole Druse nation knows thee,
Hakeem,

As we! and mothers lift on high their babes
Who seem aware, so glisten their great eyes,
Thou hast not failed us; ancient brows are proud;

Our elders could not earlier die, it seems,
Than at thy coming! The Druse heart is thine!
Take it! my lord and theirs, be thou adored!

Dja. [Aside.] Adored! — but I renounce it utterly!

Kha. Already are they instituting choirs
And dances to the Khalif, as of old
'T is choricled thou bad'st them.

Dja. [Aside.] I abjure it!
'T is not mine — not for me!

Kha. Why pour they wine
Flavored like honey and bruised mountain-herbs,

Or wear those strings of sun-dried cedar-fruit?
Oh, let me tell thee — Esaad, we supposed
Doting, is carried forth, eager to see
The last sun rise on the Isle: he can see now!
The shamed Druse women never wept before:
They can look up when we reach home, they
say.

Smell! — sweet cane, saved in Lilith's breast
thus long —

Sweet! — it grows wild in Lebanon. And I
Alone do nothing for thee! 'T is my office
Just to announce what well thou know'st — but
thus

Thou bidst me. At this self-same moment tend
The Prefect, Nuncio and the Admiral
Hither by their three sea-paths: nor forget
Who were the trusty watchers! — thou forget?
Like me, who do forget that Anael bade . . .

Dja. [Aside.] Ay, Anael, Anael — is that said at last?

Louder than all, that would be said, I knew!
What does abjuring mean, confessing mean,
To the people? Till that woman crossed my path,

On went I, solely for my people's sake:
I saw her, and I then first saw myself,
And slackened pace: "If I should prove indeed Hakeem — with Anael by!"

Kha. [Aside.] Ah, he is rapt!
Dare I at such a moment break on him
Even to do my sister's bidding? Yes:
The eyes are Djabal's and not Hakeem's yet,
Though but till I have spoken this, perchance.

Dja. [Aside.] To yearn to tell her, and yet have no one Great heart's word that will tell her! I could gasp
Doubtless one such word out, and die.

[Aloud.] You said
That Anael . . .

Kha. . . . Fain would see thee, speak with
thee,
Before thou change, discard this Djabal's shape
She knows, for Hakeem's shape she is to know.
Something to say that will not from her mind!
I know not what — "Let him but come!" she
said.

Dja. [Half apart.] My nation — all my Druses — how fare they?

Those I must save, and suffer thus to save,
Hold they their posts? Wait they their Khalif
too?

Kha. All at the signal pant to flock around
That banner of a brow!

Dja. [Aside.] And when they flock,
Confess them this: and after, for reward,
Be chased with howlings to her feet perchance!
— Have the poor outraged Druses, deaf and blind,

Precede me there, forestall my story there,
Tell it in mocks and jeers!

I lose myself!
Who needs a Hakeem to direct him now?
I need the veriest child — why not this child?

[Turning abruptly to KHALIL.]
You are a Druse too, Khalil; you were nourished
Like Anael with our mysteries: if she Could vow, so nourished, to love only one Who should avenge the Druses, whence proceeds

Your silence? Wherefore made you no essay,
Who thus implicitly can execute
My bidding? What have I done, you could not?
Who, knowing more than Anael the prostration
Of our once lofty tribe, the daily life
Of this detested . . .

Does he come, you say,
This Prefect? All's in readiness?

Kha. The sword,
The sacred robe, the Khalif's mystic tiar,
Laid up so long, are all disposed beside
The Prefect's chamber.

Dja. — Why did you despair?

Kha. I know our nation's state? Too surely
know,

As thou who speak'st to prove me! Wrongs like ours

Should wake revenge: but when I sought the wronged

And spoke, — "The Prefect stabbed your son — arise!

Your daughter, while you starve, eats shameless
bread

In his pavilion — then arise!" — my speech
Fell idly: 't was, "Be silent, or worse fare!"

Endure till time's slow cycle prove complete!
Who may'st thou be that takest on thee to thrust

Into this peril — art thou Hakeem?" No!

Only a mission like thy mission renders
All these obedient at a breath, subdues

Their private passions, brings their wills to one!

Dja. You think so?

Kha. Even now — when they have witnessed Thy miracles — had I not threatened all With Hakeem's vengeance, they would mar the work,

And couch ere this, each with his special prize, Safe in his dwelling, leaving our main hope To perish. Feet! When these have kissed thy

At Lebanon, the past purged off, the present Clear, — for the future, even Hakeem's mission May end, and I perchance, or any youth, Shall rule them thus renewed. — I tutor thee!

Dja. And wisely. (He is Anael's brother, pure

As Anael's self.) Go say, I come to her. Haste! I will follow you. [KHALIL goes.

Oh, not confess

To these, the blinded multitude — confess, Before at least the fortune of my deed Half authorize its means! Only to her Let me confess my fault, who in my path Curled up like incense from a Mage-king's tomb

When he would have the wayfarer descend Through the earth's rift and bear hid treasure forth!

How should child's-carelessness prove man-hood's crime

Till now that I, whose lone youth hurried past, Letting each joy 'scape for the Druses' sake, At length recover in one Druse all joy?

Were her brow brighter, her eyes richer, still Would I confess! On the gulf's verge I pause. How could I slay the Prefect, thus and thus? Anael, be mine to guard me, not destroy! [Goes.

(Enter ANAEL, and MAANI who is assisting to array her in the ancient dress of the Druses.)

Anael. Those saffron vestures of the tabret-girls!

Comes Djabal, think you?

Maani. Doubtless Djabal comes.

An. Dost thou snow-swathe thee kinglier, Lebanon,

Than in my dreams? — Nay, all the tresses off My forehead! Look I lovely so? He says That I am lovely.

Maa. Lovely: nay, that hangs Awry.

An. You tell me how a khandjar hangs? The sharp side, thus, along the heart, see, marks

The maiden of our class. Are you content For Djabal as for me?

Maa. Content, my child.

An. Oh mother, tell me more of him! He comes

Even now — tell more, fill up my soul with him! Maa. And did I not . . . yes, surely . . . tell you all?

An. What will be changed in Djabal when the Change

Arrives? Which feature? Not his eyes!

Maa. 'Tis writ Our Hakeem's eyes rolled fire and clove the dark Superbly.

An. Not his eyes! His voice perhaps? Yet that's no change; for a grave current lived — Grandly beneath the surface ever lived, That, scattering, broke as in live silver spray While . . . ah, the bliss . . . he would dis-course to me

In that enforced still fashion, word on word! 'Tis the old current which must swell through that,

For what least tone, Maani, could I lose?

'Tis surely not his voice will change!

— If Hakeem

Only stood by! If Djabal, somehow, passed Out of the radiance as from out a robe;

Possessed, but was not it! He lived with you?

Well — and that morning Djabal saw me first And heard me vow never to wed but one Who saved my People — on that day . . . proceed!

Maa. Once more, then: from the time of his return

In secret, changed so since he left the Isle That I, who screened our Emir's last of sons, This Djabal, from the Prefect's massacre — Who bade him ne'er forget the child he was, — Who dreamed so long the youth he might become —

I knew not in the man that child; the man Who spoke alone of hope to save our tribe, How he had gone from land to land to save Our tribe — allies were sure, nor foes to dread; And much he mused, days, nights, alone he mused:

But never till that day when, pale and worn As by a persevering woe, he cried "Is there not one Druse left me?" — and I showed

The way to Khalil's and your hiding-place From the abhorred eye of the Prefect here, So that he saw you, heard you speak — till then, Never did he announce — (how the moon seemed To ope and shut, the while, above us both!) — His mission was the mission promised us; The cycle had revolved; all things renewing, He was lost Hakeem clothed in flesh to lead His children home anon, now veiled to work Great purposes: the Druses now would change!

An. And they have changed! And obstacles did sink,

And furtherances rose! And round his form Played fire, and music beat her angel wings! My people, let me more rejoice, oh more For you than for myself! Did I but watch Afar the pageant, feel our Khalif pass, One of the throng, how proud were I — though ne'er Singled by Djabal's glance! But to be chosen His own from all, the most his own of all, To be exalted with him, side by side, Lead the exulting Druses, meet . . . ah, how Worthily meet the maidens who await Ever beneath the cedars — how deserve This honor, in their eyes? So bright are they Who saffron-vested sound the tabret there, The girls who throng there in my dream! One hour

And all is over: how shall I do aught

That may deserve next hour's exalting? —
How? — [Suddenly to MAANI.]

Mother, I am not worthy him! I read it Still in his eyes! He stands as if to tell me
I am not, yet forbears. Why else revert
To one theme ever? — how mere human gifts
Suffice him in myself — whose worship fades,
Whose awe goes ever off at his approach,
As now, who when he comes . . .

(DJABAL enters.)

Oh why is it

I cannot kneel to you?

Dja. Rather, 'tis I
Should kneel to you, my Anael!

An. Even so!
For never seem you — shall I speak the truth? —
Never a God to me! 'Tis the Man's hand,
Eye, voice! Oh, do you veil these to our people,
Or but to me? To them, I think, to them!
And brightness is their veil, shadow — my truth!
You mean that I should never kneel to you
— So, thus I kneel!

Dja. [Preventing her.] No — no!

[Feeling the khandjar as he raises her.

Ha, have you chosen . . .

An. The khandjar with our ancient garb.

But, Djabal,

Change not, be not exalted yet! Give time
That I may plan more, perfect more! My blood Beats, beats!

[Aside.] Oh, must I then — since Loys leaves us

Never to come again, renew in me
These doubts so near effaced already — must
I needs confess them now to Djabal? — own
That when I saw that stranger, heard his voice,
My faith fell, and the woeful thought flashed
first

That each effect of Djabal's presence, taken
For proof of more than human attributes
In him, by me whose heart at his approach
Beat fast, whose brain while he was by swam
round,

Whose soul at his departure died away,
— That every such effect might have been
wrought

In other frames, though not in mine, by Loys
Or any merely mortal presence? Doubt
Is fading fast: shall I reveal it now?

How shall I meet the rapture presently,
With doubt unexpiated, undisclosed?

Dja. [Aside.] Avow the truth? I cannot!
In what words

Avow that all she loved in me was false?

— Which yet has served that flower-like love of hers

To climb by, like the clinging gourd, and clasp
With its divinest wealth of leaf and bloom.
Could I take down the prop-work, in itself
So vile, yet interlaced and overlaid
With painted cups and fruitage — might these
still

Bask in the sun, unconscious their own strength
Of matted stalk and tendril had replaced
The old support thus silently withdrawn!
But no; the beauteous fabric crushes too.
'Tis not for my sake but for Anael's sake
I leave her soul this Hakeem where it leans.

Oh could I vanish from her, quit the Isle!
And yet — a thought comes: here my work is
done

At every point; the Druses must return —
Have convoy to their birth-place back, whoe'er
The leader be, myself or any Druse —
Venice is pledged to that: 'tis for myself,
For my own vengeance in the Prefect's death,
I stay now, not for them: to slay or spare
The Prefect, whom imports it save myself?
He cannot bar their passage from the Isle;
What would his death be but my own reward?
Then, mine I will forego. It is foregone!
Let him escape with all my House's blood!
Ere he can reach land, Djabal disappears,
And Hakeem, Anael loved, shall, fresh as first,
Live in her memory, keeping her sublime
Above the world. She cannot touch that world
By ever knowing what I truly am,
Since Loys, — of mankind the only one
Able to link my present with my past,
My life in Europe with my Island life,
Thence, able to unmask me, — I've disposed Safely at last at Rhodes, and . . .

(Enter KHALIL.)

Kha. Loys greets thee!
Dja. Loys? To drag me back? It cannot
be!

An. [Aside.] Loys! Ah, doubt may not be stified so!

Kha. Can I have erred that thou so gazest?
Yes,

I told thee not in the glad press of tidings
Of higher import, Loys is returned
Before the Prefect, with, if possible,
Twice the light-heartedness of old. As though
On some inauguration he expects,
To-day, the world's fate hung!

Dja. — And asks for me?

Kha. Thou knowest all things. Thee in chief he greets,

But every Druse of us is to be happy
At his arrival, he declares: were Loys
Thou, Master, he could have no wider soul
To take us in with. How I love that Loys!

Dja. [Aside.] Shame winds me with her tether round and round!

An. [Aside.] Loys? I take the trial! it is meet,

The little I can do, be done; that faith,
All I can offer, want no perfecting
Which my own act may compass. Ay, this
way

All may go well, nor that ignoble doubt
Be chased by other aid than mine. Advance
Close to my fear, weigh Loys with my Lord.
The mortal with the more than mortal gifts!

Dja. [Aside.] Before, there were so few deceived! and now

There's doubtless not one least Druse in the Isle

But, having learned my superhuman claims,
And calling me his Khalif-God, will clash
The whole truth out from Loys at first word!
While Loys, for his part, will hold me up,
With a Frank's unimaginable scorn
Of such imposture, to my people's eyes!
Could I but keep him longer yet awhile

From them, amuse him here until I plan
How he and I at once may leave the Isle!
Khalil I cannot part with from my side—
My only help in this emergency:
There's Anael!

An. Please you?

Dja. Anael—none but she!

[To ANAEL.] I pass some minutes in the chamber there,

Ere I see Loys: you shall speak with him
Until I join you. Khalil follows me.

An. [Aside.] As I divined: he bids me save myself,

Offers me a probation—I accept!

Let me see Loys!

Loys. [Without.] Djabal!

An. [Aside.] 'Tis his voice.

The smooth Frank trifler with our people's wrongs,

The self-complacent boy-inquirer, loud

On this and that inflicted tyranny,

—Aught serving to parade an ignorance

Of how wrong feels, inflicted! Let me close

With what I viewed at distance: let myself

Probe this delusion to the core!

Dja. He comes.

Khalil, along with me! while Anael waits

Till I return once more—and but once more!

ACT III

ANAEL and LOYS.

An. Here leave me! Here I wait another.

'Twas

For no mad protestation of a love

Like this you say possesses you, I came.

Loys. Love? how protest a love I dare not feel?

Mad words may doubtless have escaped me: you

Are here—I only feel you here!

An. No more!

Loys. But once again, whom could you love? I dare,

Alas, say nothing of myself, who am

A Knight now, for when Knighthood we embrace,

Love we abjure: so, speak on safely: speak,

Lest I speak, and betray my faith! And yet

To say your breathing passes through me, changes

My blood to spirit, and my spirit to you,

As Heaven the sacrificer's wine to it—

This is not to protest my love! You said

You could love one . . .

An. One only! We are bent

To earth—who raises up my tribe, I love;

The Prefect bows us—who removes him; we

Have ancient rights—who gives them back to us,

I love. Forbear me! Let my hand go!

Loys. Him

You could love only? Where is Djabal?

Stay!

[Aside.] Yet wherefore stay? Who does this but myself?

Had I apprised her that I come to do

Just this, what more could she acknowledge?

No,

She sees into my heart's core! What is it Feeds either cheek with red, as June some rose?

Why turns she from me? Ah fool, over-fond

To dream I could call up . . .

. . . What never dream

Yet feigned! 'Tis love! Oh Anael, speak to me!

Djabal—

An. Seek Djabal by the Prefect's chamber
At noon! [She paces the room.]

Loys. [Aside.] And am I not the Prefect now?

Is it my fate to be the only one

Able to win her love, the only one

Unable to accept her love? The past

Breaks up beneath my footing: came I here

This morn as to a slave, to set her free

And take her thanks, and then spend day by day

Content beside her in the Isle? What works

This knowledge in me now? Her eye has broken

The faint disguise away: for Anael's sake

I left the Isle, for her espoused the cause

Of the Druses, all for her I thought, till now,

To live without!

—As I must live! To-day

Ordains me Knight, forbids me . . . never shall

Forbid me to profess myself, heart, arm,

Thy soldier!

An. Djabal you demanded, comes!

Loys. [Aside.] What wouldst thou, Loys? see him? Naught beside

Is wanting: I have felt his voice a spell

From first to last. He brought me here, made known

The Druses to me, drove me hence to seek

Redress for them; and shall I meet him now,

When naught is wanting but a word of his,

To—what?—induce me to spurn hope, faith, pride,

Honor away,—to cast my lot among

His tribe, become a proverb in men's mouths,

Breaking my high pact of companionship

With those who graciously bestowed on me

The very opportunities I turn

Against them! Let me not see Djabal now!

An. The Prefect also comes!

Loys. [Aside.] Him let me see,

Not Djabal! Him, degraded at a word,

To soothe me,—to attest belief in me—

And after, Djabal! Yes, ere I return

To her, the Nuncio's vow shall have destroyed

This heart's rebellion, and coerced this will Forever.

Anael, not before the vows

Irrevocably fix me . . .

Let me fly!

The Prefect, or I lose myself forever! [Goes.]

An. Yes, I am calm now; just one way remains—

One, to attest my faith in him: for, see,

I were quite lost else: Loys, Djabal, stand

On either side—two men! I balance looks

And words, give Djabal a man's preference,

No more. In Djabal, Hakeem is absorbed !
And for a love like this, the God who saves
My race, selects me for his bride ? One way ! —

(Enter DJABAL.)

Dja. [To himself.] No moment is to waste
then ; 't is resolved.

If Khalil may be trusted to lead back
My Druses, and if Loys can be lured
Out of the Isle — if I procure his silence,
Or promise never to return at least, —
All's over. Even now my bark awaits :
I reach the next wild islet and the next,
And lose myself beneath the sun forever.
And now, to Anael !

An. Djabal, I am thine !

Dja. Mine ? Djabal's ? — As if Hakeem had not been ?

An. Not Djabal's ? Say first, do you read my thought ?

Why need I speak, if you can read my thought ?

Dja. I do not, I have said a thousand times.

An. (My secret's safe, I shall surprise him
yet !)

Djabal, I knew your secret from the first :
Djabal, when first I saw you . . . (by our porch
You leant, and pressed the tinkling veil away,
And one fringe fell behind your neck — I
see !)

. . . I knew you were not human, for I said
" This dim secluded house where the sea beats
Is heaven to me — my people's huts are hell
To them ; this august form will follow me,
Mix with the waves his voice will, — I have
him ;

And they, the Prefect ! Oh, my happiness
Rounds to the full whether I choose or no !
His eyes met mine, he was about to speak,
His hand grew damp — surely he meant to
say

He let me love him : in that moment's bliss
I shall forget my people pine for home —
They pass and they repass with pallid eyes !"
I vowed at once a certain vow ; this vow —
Not to embrace you till my tribe was saved.
Embrace me !

Dja. [Apart.] And she loved me ! Naught remained

But that ! Nay, Anael, is the Prefect dead ?

An. Ah, you reproach me ! True, his death crowns all,

I know — or should know : and I would do
much,

Believe ! but, death ! Oh, you, who have known death,

Would never doom the Prefect, were death fearful

As we report !

Death ! — a fire curls within us
From the foot's palm, and fills up to the brain,
Up, out, then shatters the whole bubble-shell
Of flesh, perchance !

Death ! — witness, I would die,
Whate'er death be, would venture now to die
For Khalil, for Maani — what for thee ?
Nay, but embrace me, Djabal, in assurance
My vow will not be broken, for I must
Do something to attest my faith in you,
Be worthy you !

Dja. [Avoiding her.] I come for that — to
say

Such an occasion is at hand : 't is like
I leave you — that we part, my Anael, — part Forever !

An. We part ? Just so ! I have succumbed, —

I am, he thinks, unworthy — and naught less
Will serve than such approval of my faith.
Then, we part not ! Remains there no way short

Of that ? Oh, not that !

Death ! — yet a hurt bird
Died in my hands ; its eyes filmed — " Nay, it sleeps,"

I said, " will wake to-morrow well." 't was dead.

Dja. I stand here and time fleets. Anael
— I come

To bid a last farewell to you : perhaps
We never meet again. But, ere the Prefect
Arrive . . .

(Enter KHALIL, breathlessly.)

Kha. He's here ! The Prefect ! Twenty
guards,

No more — no sign he dreams of danger. All Awaits thee only. Ayooob, Karshook, keep Their posts — wait but the deed's accomplishment

To join us with thy Druses to a man.
Still holds his course the Nuncio — near and
near

The fleet from Candia steering.

Dja. [Aside.] All is lost !

— Or won ?

Kha. And I have laid the sacred robe,
The sword, the head-tiar, at the porch — the
place

Commanded. Thou wilt hear the Prefect's trumpet.

Dja. Then I keep Anael, — him then, past
recall,

I slay — 't is forced on me ! As I began
I must conclude — so be it !

Kha. For the rest,

Save Loys, our foe's solitary sword,
All is so safe that . . . I will ne'er entreat
Thy post again of thee : though danger none,
There must be glory only meet for thee
In slaying the Prefect !

An. [Aside.] And 't is now that Djabal
Would leave me ! — in the glory meet for him !

Dja. As glory, I would yield the deed to
you

Or any Druse ; what peril there may be,
I keep. [Aside.] All things conspire to hound me on !

Not now, my soul, draw back, at least ! Not
now !

The course is plain, howe'er obscure all else.

Once offer this tremendous sacrifice,

Prevent what else will be irreparable,

Secure these transcendental helps, regain

The Cedars — then let all dark clear itself !

I slay him !

Kha. Anael, and no part for us !

[To DJA.] Hast thou possessed her with . . .

Dja. [To AN.] Whom speak you to ?

What is it you behold there? Nay, this smile Turns stranger. Shudder you? The man
must die,
As thousands of our race have died through
him.

One blow, and I discharge his weary soul
From the flesh that pollutes it! Let him fill Straight some new expiatory form, of earth
Or sea, the reptile or some airy thing:
What is there in his death?

An. My brother said,
Is there no part in it for us?

Dja. For Khalil, —
The trumpet will announce the Nuncio's entry;
Here, I shall find the Prefect hastening
In the Pavilion to receive him — here
I slay the Prefect; meanwhile Ayoob leads
The Nuncio with his guards within: once these Secured in the outer hall, bid Ayoob bar
Entry or egress till I give the sign

Which waits the landing of the argosies
You will announce to me: this double sign
That justice is performed and help arrived,
When Ayoob shall receive, but not before,
Let him throw ope the palace doors, admit
The Druses to behold their tyrant, ere
We leave forever this detested spot.

Go, Khalil, hurry all! No pause, no pause!
Whirl on the dream, secure to wake anon!

Kha. What sign? and who the bearer?

Dja. Who shall show
My ring, admit to Ayoob. How she stands!
Have I not . . . I must have some task for her,
Anael, not that way! 'T is the Prefect's chamber!

Anael, keep you the ring — give you the sign!
(It holds her safe amid the stir.) You will Be faithful?

An. [Taking the ring.] I would fain be worthy. Hark! [Trumpet without.]

Kha. He comes!

Dja. And I too come.

An. One word, but one!

Say, shall you be exalted at the deed?

Then? On the instant?

Dja. I exalted? What?

He, there — we, thus — our wrongs revenged,
our tribe

Set free? Oh, then shall I, assure yourself,

Shall you, shall each of us, be in his death Exalted!

Kha. He is here!

Dja. Away — away! [They go.
(Enter the PREFECT with GUARDS, and LOYS.)

The Prefect. [To Guards.] Back, I say, to the galley every guard!

That's my sole care now; see each bench retains

Its complement of rowers; I embark

O' the instant, since this Knight will have it
so.

Alas me! Could you have the heart, my Loys!
[To a Guard who whispers.] Oh, bring the holy

Nuncio here forthwith! [The Guards go.]

Loys, a rueful sight, confess, to see

The gray discarded Prefect leave his post,

With tears i' the eye! So, you are Prefect
now?

You depose me — you succeed me? Ha, ha!

Loys. And dare you laugh, whom laughter less becomes

Than yesterday's forced meekness we beheld . . .

Pref. — When you so eloquently pleaded,
Loys,

For my dismissal from the post? Ah, meek
With cause enough, consult the Nuncio else!
And wish him the like meekness: for so stanch
A servant of the church can scarce have bought
His share in the Isle, and paid for it, hard pieces!

You've my successor to condole with, Nuncio!
I shall be safe by then i' the galley, Loys!

Loys. You make as you would tell me you rejoice

To leave your scene of . . .

Pref. Trade in the dear Druses?
Blood and sweat traffic? Spare what yesterday
We heard enough of! Drove I in the Isle
A profitable game? Learn wit, my son,
Which you'll need shortly! Did it never bred

Suspicion in you, all was not pure profit,

When I, the insatiate . . . and so forth — was bent

On having a partaker in my rule?

Why did I yield this Nuncio half the gain,

If not that I might also shift — what on him?

Half of the peril, Loys!

Loys.

Pref.

Hark you!
I'd love you if you'd let me — this for reason,
You save my life at price of . . . well, say risk

At least, of yours. I came a long time since
To the Isle; our Hospitaliers bade me tame
These savage wizards, and reward myself —

Loys. The Knights who so repudiate your crime?

Pref. Loys, the Knights! we doubtless understood

Each other; as for trusting to reward

From any friend beside myself . . . no, no!

I clutched mine on the spot, when it was sweet,

And I had taste for it. I felt these wizards

Alive — was sure they were not on me, only

When I was on them: but with age comes caution:

And stinging pleasures please less and sting
more.

Year by year, fear by fear! The girls were brighter

Than ever ('faith, there's yet one Anael' left,

I set my heart upon — Oh, prithee, let

That brave new sword lie still!) — These joys looked brighter,

But siltener the town, too, as I passed.

With this alcove's delicious memories

Began to mingle visions of gaunt fathers,

Quick-eyed sons, fugitives from the mine, the oar,

Stealing to catch me. Brief, when I began

To quake with fear — (I think I hear the Chapter

Solicited to let me leave, now all

Worth staying for was gained and gone!) — I
say,

Just when, for the remainder of my life,
All methods of escape seemed lost — that then
Up should a young hot-headed Loys spring,
Talk very long and loud, — in fine, compel
The Knights to break their whole arrangement, have me

Home for pure shame — from this safehold of
mine

Where but ten thousand Druses seek my life,
To my wild place of banishment, San Gines
By Murcia, where my three fat manors lying,
Purchased by gains here and the Nuncio's gold,
Are all I have to guard me, — that such fortune
Should fall to me, I hardly could expect.
Therefore I say, I'd love you.

Loys. Can it be?

I play into your hands then? Oh no, no!
The Venerable Chapter, the Great Order
Sunk o' the sudden into fiends of the pit?
But I will back — will yet unveil you!

Pref. Me?
To whom? — perhaps Sir Galeas, who in Chapter
Shook his white head thrice — and some dozen times

My hand next morning shook, for value paid!
To that Italian saint, Sir Cosimo? —
Indignant at my wringing year by year
A thousand bezants from the coral divers,
As you recounted; felt the saint aggrieved
Well might he — I allowed for his half-share Merely one hundred! To Sir . . .

Loys. See! you dare
Inculcate the whole Order; yet should I,
A youth, a sole voice, have the power to change
Their evil way, had they been firm in it?
Answer me!

Pref. Oh, the son of Bretagne's Duke,
And that son's wealth, the father's influence,
too,

And the young arm, we'll even say, my Loys,
— The fear of losing or diverting these
Into another channel, by gainsaying
A novice too abruptly, could not influence
The Order! You might join, for aught they cared,

Their red-cross rivals of the Temple! Well,
I thank you for my part, at all events.
Stay here till they withdraw you! You'll inhabit

My palace — sleep, perchance, in the alcove
Whither I go to meet our holy friend.
Good! and now disbelieve me if you can, —
This is the first time for long years I enter Thus [lifts the arras] without feeling just as if I lifted

The lid up of my tomb.

Loys. They share his crime!
God's punishment will overtake you yet.

Pref. Thank you it does not! Pardon this last flash:

I bear a sober visage presently
With the disinterested Nuncio here —
His purchase-money safe at Murcia, too!
Let me repeat — for the first time, no draught
Coming as from a sepulchre salutes me.

When we next meet, this folly may have passed.
We'll hope. Ha, ha! [Goes through the arras.]

Loys. Assure me but . . . he's gone!

He could not lie. Then what have I escaped.
I, who had so nigh given up happiness
Forever, to be linked with him and them!
Oh, opportunist of discoveries! I
Their Knight? I utterly renounce them all!
Hark! What, he meets by this the Nuncio!

Yes,
The same hyæna groan-like laughter! Quick —
To Djabal! I am one of them at last,
These simple-hearted Druses — Anael's tribe!
Djabal! She's mine at last. Djabal, I say!

[Goes.]

Enter DJABAL.

Dja. Let me but slay the Prefect. The end
now!

To-morrow will be time enough to pry
Into the means I took: suffice, they served,
Ignoble as they were, to hurl revenge
True to its object. [Seeing the robe, etc. disposed.]

Mine should never so
Have hurried to accomplishment! Thee,
Djabal,

Far other mood befitted! Calm the Robe
Should clothe this doom's awarder!

[Taking the robe.] Shall I dare
Assume my nation's Robe? I am at least
A Druse again, chill Europe's policy Drops from me: I dare take the Robe. Why
not

The Tiar? I rule the Druses, and what more
Betokens it than rule? — yet — yet —

[Lays down the tior.]
He comes!

[Taking the sword.]
If the Sword serve, let the Tiar lie! So, feet Clogged with the blood of twenty years can fall

Thus lightly! Round me, all ye ghosts! He'll lift . . .

Which arm to push the arras wide? — or both?
Stab from the neck down to the heart — there
stay!

Near he comes — nearer — the next footstep!
Now!

[As he dashes aside the arras, ANAEL is discovered.]
Ha! Anael! Nay, my Anael, can it be?

Heard you the trumpet? I must slay him
here,

And here you ruin all. Why speak you not?
Anael, the Prefect comes! [ANAEL screams.]

So slow to feel
'Tis not a sight for you to look upon?

A moment's work — but such work! Till you
go,

I must be idle — idle, I risk all!
[Pointing to her hair.]

Those locks are well, and you are beauteous
thus,

But with the dagger 't is, I have to do!
An. With mine!

Dja. Blood — Anael?
An. Djabal, 't is thy deed!

It must be! I had hoped to claim it mine —
Be worthy thee — but I must needs confess

'T was not I, but thyself . . . not I have . . .
Djabal!

Speak to me!

Dja. Oh my punishment!

An. Speak to me
While I can speak! touch me, despite the blood!
When the command passed from thy soul to
mine,

I went, fire leading me, muttering of thee,
And the approaching exaltation, — "make
One sacrifice!" I said, — and he sat there.
Bade me approach; and, as I did approach,
Thy fire with music burst into my brain.

'T was but a moment's work, thou saidst — per-
chance

It may have been so! Well, it is thy deed!

Dja. It is my deed!

An. His blood all this! — this! and . . .
And more! Sustain me, Djabal! Wait not —
now

Let flash thy glory! Change thyself and me!
It must be! Ere the Druses flock to us!
At least confirm me! Djabal, blood gushed
forth —

He was our tyrant — but I looked he 'd fall
Prone as asleep — why else is death called sleep?
Sleep? He bent o'er his breast! 'T is sin, I

know, —
Punish me, Djabal, but wilt thou let him?
Be it thou that punishest, not he — who creeps
On his red breast — is here! 'T is the small groan

Of a child — no worse! Bestow the new life,
then!

Too swift it cannot be, too strange, surpassing!
[Following him up as he retreats.]

Now! Change us both! Change me and change thou!

Dja. [Sinks on his knees.] Thus!
Behold my change! You have done nobly.
I! —

An. Can Hakeem kneel?
Dja. No Hakeem, and scarce Djabal!
I have dealt falsely, and this woe is come.

No — hear me ere scorn blast me! Once and
ever,

The deed is mine! Oh think upon the past!
An. [To herself.] Did I strike once, or twice,
or many times?

Dja. I came to lead my tribe where, bathed in glooms,

Doth Bahumid the Renovator sleep:
Anael, I saw my tribe: I said, "Without A miracle this cannot be" — I said
"Be there a miracle!" — for I saw you!

An. His head lies south the portal!
Dja. — Weighed with this

The general good, how could I choose my
own?

What matter was my purity of soul?
Little by little I engaged myself —
Heaven would accept me for its instrument,
I hoped: I said Heaven had accepted me!

An. Is it this blood breeds dreams in me?
— Who said

You were not Hakeem? And your miracles —
The fire that plays innocuous round your form?

[Again changing her whole manner.]

Ah, thou wouldst try me — thou art Hakeem
still!

Dja. Woe — woe! As if the Druses of the Mount

(Scarce Arabs, even there, but here, in the Isle.
Beneath their former selves) should comprehend
The subtle lore of Europe! A few secrets
That would not easily affect the meanest
Of the crowd there, could wholly subjugate
The best of our poor tribe. Again that eye?

An. [After a pause springs to his neck.] Djabal,
in this there can be no deceit!

Why, Djabal, were you human only, — think,
Maani is but human, Khalil human,
Loys is human even — did their words Haunt me, their looks pursue me? Shame on
you

So to have tried me! Rather, shame on me
So to need trying! Could I, with the Prefect
And the blood, there — could I see only you?
— Hang by your neck over this gulf of blood?
Speak, I am saved! Speak, Djabal! Am I
saved?

[As DJABAL slowly unclaspes her arms, and puts her silently from him.]

Hakeem would save me! Thou art Djabal!
Crouch!

Bow to the dust, thou basest of our kind!
The pile of thee, I reared up to the cloud —
Full, midway, of our fathers' trophied tombs,
Based on the living rock, devoured not by
The unstable desert's jaws of sand, — falls prone!

Fire, music, quenched: and now thou liest there
A ruin, obscene creatures would moan through!
— Let us come, Djabal!

Dja. Whither come?
An. At once —

Lest so it grow intolerable. Come!
Will I not share it with thee? Best at once!
So, feel less pain! Let them deride, — thy tribe
Now trusting in thee, — Loys shall deride!
Come to them, hand in hand, with me!

Dja. Where come?
An. Where? — to the Druses thou hast wronged! Confess,

Now that the end is gained — (I love thee now —)
That thou hast so deceived them — (perchance love thee

Better than ever!) Come, receive their doom
Of infamy! Oh, best of all I love thee!
Shame with the man, no triumph with the God,
Be mine! Come!

Dja. Never! More shame yet? and why?
Why? You have called this deed mine — it is
mine!

And with it I accept its circumstance.
How can I longer strive with fate? The past
Is past: my false life shall henceforth show
true.

Hear me! The argosies touch land by this;
They bear us to fresh scenes and happier skies
What if we reign together? — if we keep
Our secret for the Druses' good? — by means
Of even their superstition, plant in them
New life? I learn from Europe: all who seek Man's good must awe man, by such means as these.

We two will be divine to them — we are!
All great works in this world spring from the ruins

Of greater projects — ever, on our earth,
Babels men block out, Babylons they build.
I wrest the weapon from your hand! I claim
The deed! Retire! You have my ring — you bar
All access to the Nuncio till the forces
From Venice land!

An. Thou wilt feign Hakeem then?

Dja. [Putting the Tiara of Hakeem on his head.] And from this moment that I dare ope wide

Eyes that till now refused to see, begins
My true dominion: for I know myself,
And what am I to personate. No word?

[ANAEI goes.

'Tis come on me at last! His blood on her —
What memories will follow that! Her eye,
Her fierce distorted lip and ploughed black
brow!

Ah, fool! Has Europe then so poorly tamed
The Syrian blood from out thee? Thou, presume

To work in this foul earth by means not foul?
Scheme, as for heaven, — but, on the earth, be glad

If a least ray like heaven's be left thee!

Thus

I shall be calm — in readiness — no way Surprised.

[A noise without.

This should be Khalil and my Druses.
Venice is come then! Thus I grasp thee, sword!
Druses, 'tis Hakeem saves you! In! Behold
Your Prefect!

[Enter LOYS. DJABAL hides the khandjar in his robe.]

Loys. Oh, well found, Djabal! — but no time for words.

You know who waits there?

[Pointing to the alcove.

Well! — and that 't is there
He meets the Nuncio? Well? Now, a surprise —
He there —

Dja. I know —

Loys. — is now no mortal's lord,

Is absolutely powerless — call him, dead —
He is no longer Prefect — you are Prefect!
Oh, shrink not! I do nothing in the dark,
Nothing unworthy Breton blood, believe!
I understood at once your urgency
That I should leave this isle for Rhodes; I felt What you were loath to speak — your need of help.

I have fulfilled the task, that earnestness
Imposed on me: have, face to face, confronted
The Prefect in full Chapter, charged on him
The enormities of his long rule; he stood
Mute, offered no defence, no crime denied.
On which, I spoke of you, and of your tribe,
Your faith so like our own, and all you urged
Of old to me — I spoke, too, of your goodness,
Your patience — brief, I hold henceforth the Isle

In charge, am nominally lord, — but you,
You are associated in my rule —
Are the true Prefect! Ay, such faith had they
In my assurance of your loyalty
[For who insults an imbecile old man?]

That we assume the Prefecture this hour!
You gaze at me? Hear greater wonders yet —
I cast down all the fabric I have built!
These Knights, I was prepared to worship . . .
but

Of that another time; what's now to say,
Is — I shall never be a Knight! Oh, Djabal,
Here first I throw all prejudice aside,
And call you brother! I am Druse like you:
My wealth, my friends, my power, are wholly
yours,

Your people's, which is now my people: for
There is a maiden of your tribe, I love —
She loves me — Khalil's sister —

Dja. Aneel?

Loys. Start you?

Seems what I say, unknighly? Thus it chanced:
When first I came, a novice, to the isle . . .
[Enter one of the NUNCIO'S GUARDS from the alcove.]

Guard. Oh horrible! Sir Loys! Here is Loys!
And here — [Others enter from the alcove.

[Pointing to DJABAL.] Secure him, bind him —
this is he! [They surround DJABAL.

Loys. Madmen — what is 't you do? Stand from my friend,
And tell me!

Guard. Thou canst have no part in this — Surely no part! But slay him not! The Nuncio Commanded, slay him not!

Loys. Speak, or . . .

Guard. The Prefect
Lies murdered there by him thou dost embrace.

Loys. By Djabal? Miserable fools! How Djabal?

[A Guard lifts DJABAL'S robe; DJABAL flings down the khandjar.

Loys. [After a pause.] Thou hast received some insult worse than all,
Some outrage not to be endured —

[To the Guards.] Stand back!
He is my friend — more than my friend! Thou hast

Slain him upon that provocation!

Guard. No!

No provocation! 'T is a long devised
Conspiracy: the whole tribe is involved.
He is their Khalif — 't is on that pretence —
Their mighty Khalif who died long ago,
And now comes back to life and light again!
All is just now revealed, I know not how,
By one of his confederates — who, struck
With horror at this murder, first apprised
The Nuncio. As 't was said, we find this Djabal
Here where we take him.

Dja. [Aside.] Who broke faith with me?

Loys. [To DJABAL.] Hear'st thou? Speak!
Till thou speak I keep off these.

Or die with thee. Deny this story! Thou
A Khalif, an impostor? Thou, my friend,
Whose tale was of an inoffensive tribe,
With . . . but thou know'st — on that tale's truth I pledged

My faith before the Chapter: what art thou?

Dja. Loys, I am as thou hast heard. All's
true!

No more concealment! As these tell thee, all
Was long since planned. Our Druses are enough
To crush this handful: the Venetians land

Even now in our behalf. Loys, we part !
Thou, serving much, wouldst fain have served me more ;

It might not be. I thank thee. As thou hear-
est,

We are a separated tribe : farewell !

Loys. Oh, where will truth be found now ?
Canst thou so

Belie the Druses ? Do they share thy crime ?
Those thou professest of our Breton stock,
Are partners with thee ? Why, I saw but
now

Khalil, my friend — he spoke with me — no
word

Of this ! and Anael — whom I love, and who Loves me — she spoke no word of this !

Dja. Poor boy !
Anael, who loves thee ? Khalil, fast thy friend ?
We, offsets from a wandering Count of Dreux ?
No : older than the oldest, princelier
Than Europe's princeliest race, our tribe :
enough

For thine, that on our simple faith we found
A monarchy to shame your monarchies
At their own trick and secret of success.
The child of this our tribe shall laugh upon
The palace-step of him whose life ere night
Is forfeit, as that child shall know, and yet Shall laugh there ! What, we Druses wait forsooth

The kind interposition of a boy
— Can only save ourselves if thou concede ?
— Khalil admire thee ? He is my right hand,
My delegate ! — Anael accept thy love ?
She is my bride !

Loys. Thy bride ? She one of them ?
Dja. My bride !

Loys. And she retains her glorious eyes !
She, with those eyes, has shared this miscreant's guilt !

Ah — who but she directed me to find
Djabal within the Prefect's chamber ? Khalil
Bade me seek Djabal there, too ! All is truth !
What spoke the Prefect worse of them than
this ?

Did the Church ill to institute long since
Perpetual warfare with such serpentry ?
And I — have I desired to shift my part,
Evade my share in her design ? 'Tis well !

Dja. Loys, I wronged thee — but unwittingly :
I never thought there was in thee a virtue
That could attach itself to what thou deem-
est

A race below thine own. I wronged thee, Loys,
But that is over : all is over now,
Save the protection I ensure against

My people's anger. By their Khalif's side,
Thou art secure and may'st depart : so, come !
Loys. Thy side ? I take protection at thy hand ?

(Enter other Guards.)

Guards. Fly with him ! Fly, Sir Loys ! 'Tis too true !

And only by his side thou may'st escape !
The whole tribe is in full revolt : they flock
About the palace — will be here — on thee —
And there are twenty of us, we the Guards
O' the Nuncio, to withstand them ! Even we

Had stayed to meet our death in ignorance,
But that one Druse, a single faithful Druse,
Made known the horror to the Nuncio. Fly !
The Nuncio stands aghast. At least let us
Escape thy wrath, O Hakeem ! We are naught
In thy tribe's persecution ! [To Loys.] Keep by him !

They hail him Hakeem, their dead Prince returned :

He is their God, they shout, and at his beck
Are life and death !

[Loys, springing at the khandjar DJABAL had thrown down, seizes him by the throat.

Thus by his side am I !

Thus I resume my knighthood and its warfare,

Thus end thee, miscreant, in thy pride of place !
Thus art thou caught. Without, thy dupes may cluster.

Friends aid thee, foes avoid thee, — thou art
Hakeem,

How say they ? — God art thou ! but also here
Is the least, youngest, meanest the Church calls

Her servant, and his single arm avails
To aid her as she lists. I rise, and thou Art crushed ! Hordes of thy Druses flock with-
out :

Here thou hast me, who represent the Cross, Honor and Faith, 'gainst Hell, Mahound and
thee.

Die ! [DJABAL remains calm.] Implore my mercy, Hakeem, that my scorn
May help me ! Nay, I cannot ply thy trade ;
I am no Druse, no stabber : and thine eye,
Thy form, are too much as they were — my
friend

Had such ! Speak ! Beg for mercy at my foot !
[DJABAL still silent.

Heaven could not ask so much of me — not,
sure,

So much ! I cannot kill him so !

[After a pause.] Thou art
Strong in thy cause, then — dost outbrave us,
then.

Heardst thou that one of thine accomplices,
Thy very people, has accused thee ? Meet
His charge ! Thou hast not even slain the Prefect

As thy own vile creed warrants. Meet that Druse !

Come with me and disprove him — be thou tried
By him, nor seek appeal ! Promise me this,
Or I will do God's office ! What, shalt thou
Boast of assassins at thy beck, yet truth
Want even an executioner ? Consent,
Or I will strike — look in my face — I will !

Dja. Give me again my khandjar, if thou darest ! [Loys gives it.

Let but one Druse accuse me, and I plunge
This home. A Druse betray me ? Let us go !
[Aside.] Who has betrayed me ?

[Shouts without,

Hearst thou ? I hear

No plainer than long years ago I heard
That shout — but in no dream now ! They return !

Wilt thou be leader with me, Loys ? Well !

ACT V

The uninitiated Druses, filling the hall tumultuously, and speaking together.

Here flock we, obeying the summons. Lo, Hakeem hath appeared, and the Prefect is dead, and we return to Lebanon! My manufacture of goats' fleece must, I doubt, soon fall away there. Come, old Nasif — link thine arm in mine — we fight, if needs be. Come, what is a great fight-word? — "Lebanon?" (My daughter — my daughter!) — But is Khalil to have the office of Hamza? — Nay, rather, if he be wise, the monopoly of heima and cloves. Where is Hakeem? — The only prophet I ever saw, prophesied at Cairo once, in my youth: a little black Copht, dressed all in black too, with a great stripe of yellow cloth flapping down behind him like the back-fin of a water-serpent. Is this he? Biamrallah! Biamreh! HAKEEM!

(Enter the NUNCIO, with Guards.)

Nuncio. [To his Attendants.] Hold both, the sorcerer and this accomplice

Ye talk of, that accuseth him! And tell

Sir Loys he is mine, the Church's hope:

Bid him approve himself our Knight indeed!

Lo, this black disemboгуing of the Isle!

[To the Druses.] Ah, children, what a sight for these old eyes

That kept themselves alive this voyage through

To smile their very last on you! I came

To gather one and all you wandering sheep

Into my fold, as though a father came . . .

As though, in coming, a father should . . .

[To his Guards.] (Ten, twelve — Twelve guards of you, and not an outlet?

None?

The wizards stop each avenue? Keep close!)

[To the Druses.] As if one came to a son's house,

I say,

So did I come — no guard with me — to find . . .

Alas — alas!

A Druse. Who is the old man?

Another. Oh, ye are to shout!
Children, he styles you.

Druses. Ay, the Prefect's slain!

Glory to the Khalif, our Father!

Nuncio. Even so!

I find (ye prompt aright) your father slain!

While most he plotted for your good, that father

(Alas, how kind, ye never knew) — lies slain!

[Aside.] (And hell's worm gnaw the glozing knave — with me,

For being duped by his cajoleries!

Are these the Christians? These the docile crew

My bezants went to make me Bishop o'er?)

[To his Attendants, who whisper.] What say ye does this wizard style himself?

Hakeem? Biamrallah? The third Fatemite?

What is this jargon? He — the insane Khalif,

Dead near three hundred years ago, come back in flesh and blood again?

Druses. He mutters! Hear ye?

He is blaspheming Hakeem. The old man

Is our dead Prefect's friend. Tear him!

Nuncio.

Ye dare not!

I stand here with my five-and-seventy years, The Patriarch's power behind me, God's above! Those years have witnessed sin enough; ere now Misguided men arose against their lords, And found excuse; but ye, to be enslaved By sorceries, cheats — alas! the same tricks, tried

On my poor children in this nook o' the earth, Could triumph, that have been successively Exploded, laughed to scorn, all nations through: "Romaioi, Ioudaioi te kai proselutoi, Cretes and Arabians," — you are duped the last.

Said I, refrain from tearing me? I pray ye Tear me! Shall I return to tell the Patriarch That so much love was wasted — every gift Rejected, from his benison I brought, Down to the galley-full of bezants, sunk An hour since at the harbor's mouth, by that . . . That . . . never will I speak his hated name! [To his Servants.] What was the name his fellow slip-fetter

Called their arch-wizard by? [They whisper.]

Oh, Djabal was't?

Druses. But how a sorcerer? false wherein?

Nuncio. (Ay, Djabal!)

How false? Ye know not, Djabal has confessed . . .

Nay, that by tokens found on him we learn . . .

What I sailed hither solely to divulge —

How by his spells the demons were allured

To seize you: not that these be aught save lies

And mere illusions. Is this clear? I say,

By measures such as these, he would have led you

Into a monstrous ruin: follow ye?

Say, shall ye perish for his sake, my sons?

Druses. Hark ye!

Nuncio. — Be of one privilege amerced?

No! Infinite the Patriarch's mercies are!

No! With the Patriarch's license, still I bid

Tear him to pieces who misled you! Haste!

Druses. The old man's beard shakes, and his eyes are white fire! After all, I know nothing of Djabal beyond what Karshook says; he knows but what Khalil says, who knows just what Djabal says himself. Now, the little Copht Prophet, I saw at Cairo in my youth, began by promising each bystander three full measures of wheat . . .

(Enter KHALIL and the initiated Druses.)

Kha. Venice and her deliverance are at hand: Their fleet stands through the harbor! Hath he slain

The Prefect yet? Is Djabal's change come yet?

Nuncio. [To Attendants.] What's this of Venice? Who's this boy?

[Attendants whisper.] One Khalil?

Djabal's accomplice, Loys called, but now,

The only Druse, save Djabal's self, to fear?

[To the Druses.] I cannot hear ye with these aged ears;

Is it so? Ye would have my troops assist?

Doth he abet him in his sorceries?

Down with the cheat, guards, as my children bid!

[They spring at KHALIL; as he beats them back,

Stay! No more bloodshed! Spare deluded youth!

Whom seek'st thou? (I will teach him) — whom, my child?

Thou know'st not what these know, what these declare.

I am an old man, as thou seest — have done With life; and what should move me but the truth?

Art thou the only fond one of thy tribe?

'T is I interpret for thy tribe!

Kha. Oh, this Is the expected Nuncio! Druses, hear — Endure ye this? Unworthy to partake The glory Hakeem gains you! While I speak, The ships touch land: who makes for Lebanon? They plant the winged lion in these halls!

Nuncio. [Aside.] If it be true! Venice? Oh, never true!

Yet Venice would so gladly thwart our Knights, So fain get footing here, stand close by Rhodes! Oh, to be duped this way!

Kha. Ere he appear And lead you gloriously, repent, I say!

Nuncio. [Aside.] Nor any way to stretch the arch-wizard stark

Ere the Venetians come? Cut off the head, The trunk were easily stilled. [To the Druses.] He? Bring him forth!

Since so you needs will have it, I assent! You'd judge him, say you, on the spot? — confound

The sorcerer in his very circle? Where 's Our short black-bearded fallow friend who swore He 'd earn the Patriarch's guerdon by one stab? Bring Djabal forth at once!

Druses. Ay, bring him forth! The Patriarch drives a trade in oil and silk, And we're the Patriarch's children — true men, we!

Where is the glory? Show us all the glory!

Kha. You dare not so insult him! What, not see . . .

(I tell thee, Nuncio, these are uninstructed, Untrusted — they know nothing of our Khalif!) — Not see that if he lets a doubt arise

'T is but to give yourselves the chance of seeming

To have some influence in your own return!

That all may say ye would have trusted him

Without the all-convincing glory — ay, And did! Embrace the occasion, friends! For, think —

What wonder when his change takes place? But now

For your sakes, he should not reveal himself.

No — could I ask and have, I would not ask

The change yet!

(Enter DJABAL and LOYS.)

Spite of all, reveal thyself!

I had said, pardon them for me — for Anael —

For our sakes pardon these besotted men —

Ay, for thine own — they hurt not thee! Yet

now One thought swells in me and keeps down all else,

This Nuncio couples shame with thee, has called Imposture thy whole course, all bitter things

Has said: he is but an old fretful man!

Hakeem — nay, I must call thee Hakeem now — Reveal thyself! See! Where is Anael? See!

Loys. [To DJA.] Here are thy people! Keep thy word to me!

Dja. Who of my people hath accused me? Nuncio. So!

So this is Djabal, Hakeem, and what not?

A fit deed, Loys, for thy first Knight's day!

May it be augury of thy after-life!

Ever prove truncheon of the Church as now That, Nuncio of the Patriarch, having charge Of the Isle here, I claim thee [turning to DJA.] as these bid me,

Forfeit for murder done thy lawful prince, Thou conjure that peep'st and mutterest!

Why should I hold thee from their hands? (Spells, children?)

But hear how I dispose of all his spells! Thou art a prophet? — wouldst entice thy tribe

From me? — thou workest miracles? (Attend! Let him but move me with his spells!) I, Nuncio . . .

Dja. . . . Which how thou camest to be, I say not now,

Though I have also been at Stamboul, Luke! Ply thee with spells, forsooth! What need of spells?

If Venice, in her Admiral's person, stoop To ratify thy compact with her foe, The Hospitaliers, for this Isle — withdraw

Her warrant of the deed which reinstates My people in their freedom, tricked away By him I slew, — refuse to convoy us

To Lebanon and keep the Isle we leave — Then will be time to try what spells can do!

Dost thou dispute the Republic's power? Nuncio. Lo ye!

He tempts me too, the wily exorcist! No! The renowned Republic was and is

The Patriarch's friend: 't is not for courting Venice

That I — that these implore thy blood of me! Lo ye, the subtle miscreant! Ha, so subtle?

Ye Druses, hear him! Will ye be deceived? How he evades me! Where 's the miracle

He works? I bid him to the proof — fish up Your galley full of bezants that he sank!

That were a miracle! One miracle! Enough of trifling, for it chafes my years.

I am the Nuncio, Druses! I stand forth To save you from the good Republic's rage

When she shall find her fleet was summoned here To aid the mummeries of a knave like this!

[As the Druses hesitate, his Attendants whisper. Ah, well suggested! Why, we hold the while

One who, his close confederate till now, Confesses Djabal at the last a cheat,

And every miracle a cheat! Who throws me His head? I make three offers, once I offer, —

And twice . . . Dja. Let who moves perish at my foot!

Kha. Thanks, Hakeem, thanks! Oh, Anael, Maani,

Why tarry they? Druses. [To each other.] He can! He can!

Live fire —

[To the NUNCIO.] I say he can, old man!
Thou know'st him not.
Live fire like that thou seest now in his eyes,
Plays fawning round him. See! The change begins!

All the brow lightens as he lifts his arm!
Look not at me! It was not I!

Dja. What Druse
Accused me, as he saith? I bid each bone
Crumble within that Druse! None, Loys, none
Of my own people, as thou said'st, have raised
A voice against me.

Nuncio. [Aside.] Venice to come! Death!

Dja. [Continuing.] Confess and go unscathed,
however false!

Seest thou my Druses, Luke? I would submit
To thy pure malice did one Druse confess!

How said I, Loys?

Nuncio. [To his Attendants who whisper.] Ah, ye counsel so?

[Aloud.] Bring in the witness, then, who, first
of all,

Disclosed the treason! Now I have thee, wizard!

Ye hear that? If one speaks, he bids you tear
him

Joint after joint: well then, one does speak!
One,

Befooled by Djabal, even as yourselves,
But who hath voluntarily proposed

To expiate, by confessing thus, the fault
Of having trusted him.

[They bring in a veiled Druse.

Loys. Now, Djabal, now!

Nuncio. Friend, Djabal fronts thee! Make a ring, sons. Speak!

Expose this Djabal—what he was, and how;
The wiles he used, the aims he cherished; all,

Explicitly as late 't was spoken to these
My servants: I absolve and pardon thee.

Loys. Thou hast the dagger ready, Djabal?

Dja. Speak,

Recreant!

Druses. Stand back, fool! farther! Suddenly

You shall see some huge serpent glide from under

The empty vest, or down will thunder crash!

Back, Khalil!

Kha. I go back? Thus go I back!

[To AN.] Unveil! Nay, thou shalt face the Khalil! Thus!

[He tears away ANAEL's veil; DJABAL folds his arms and bows his head; the Druses fall back; LOYS springs from the side of DJABAL and the NUNCIO.

Loys. Then she was true—she only of them
all!

True to her eyes—may keep those glorious
eyes,

And now be mine, once again mine! Oh,
Anael!

Dared I think thee a partner in his crime—

That blood could soil that hand? nay, 'tis mine—Anael,

—Not mine?—Who offer thee before all these
My heart, my sword, my name—so thou wilt
say

That Djabal, who affirms thou art his bride,

Lies—say but that he lies!

Dja. Thou, Anael?

Loys. Nay, Djabal, nay, one chance for me
—the last!

Thou hast had every other; thou hast spoken
Days, nights, what falsehood listed thee—let
me

Speak first now; I will speak now!

Nuncio. Loys, pause!

Thou art the Duke's son, Bretagne's choicest stock,

Loys of Dreux, God's sepulchre's first sword:
This wilt thou spit on, this degrade, this trample

To earth?

Loys. [To AN.] Who had foreseen that one day, Loys

Would stake these gifts against some other good
In the whole world? I give them thee! I would

My strong will might bestow real shape on them,
That I might see, with my own eyes, thy foot

Tread on their very neck! 'Tis not by gifts
I put aside this Djabal: we will stand—

We do stand, see, two men! Djabal, stand
forth!

Who's worth her, I or thou? I—who for
Anael

Uprightly, purely kept my way, the long
True way—left thee each by-path, boldly lived

Without the lies and blood,—or thou, or thou?
Me! love me, Anael! Leave the blood and
him!

[To DJA.] Now speak—now, quick on this that I have said,—

Thou with the blood, speak if thou art a man!

Dja. [To AN.] And was it thou betrayedst me? 'Tis well!

I have deserved this of thee, and submit.
Nor 'tis much evil thou inflict: life

Ends here. The cedars shall not wave for us:
For there was crime, and must be punishment.

See fate! By thee I was seduced, by thee
I perish: yet do I—can I repent?

I with my Arab instinct, thwarted ever
By my Frank policy,—and with, in turn,

My Frank brain, thwarted by my Arab heart—
While these remained in equipoise, I lived

—Nothing; had either been predominant,
As a Frank schemer or an Arab mystic,

I had been something;—now, each has destroyed

The other—and behold, from out their crash,
A third and better nature rises up—

My mere man's-nature! And I yield to it:
I love thee, I who did not love before!

An. Djabal!

Dja. It seemed love, but it was not love:
How could I love while thou adoredst me?

Now thou despisest, art above me so
Inmeasurably! Thou, no other, doomest

My death now; this my steel shall execute
Thy judgment; I shall feel thy hand in it!

Oh, luxury to worship, to submit,
Transcended, doomed to death by thee!

An. My Djabal!

Dja. Dost hesitate? I force thee then!
Approach,

Druses ! for I am out of reach of fate ;
No further evil waits me. Speak the doom !
Hear, Druses, and hear, Nuncio, and hear,
Loys !

An. HAKEEM ! *[She falls dead.
[The Druses scream, grovelling before him.*

Druses. Ah, Hakeem ! — not on me thy wrath !

Biamrallah, pardon ! never doubted I !

Ha, dog, how sayest thou ?

*[They surround and seize the NUNCIO and his Guards.
Loys flings himself upon the body of ANAEL, on which DJABAL continues to gaze as stupefied.*

Nuncio, Caitiffs ! Have ye eyes ?
Whips, racks should teach you ! What, his fools ? his dupes ?

Leave me ! unhand me !

Kha. [Approaching DJABAL timidly.] Save her for my sake !

She was already thine ; she would have shared
To-day thine exaltation : think, this day
Her hair was plaited thus because of thee !

Yes, feel the soft bright hair — feel !

Nuncio. [Struggling with those who have seized him.] What, because

His leman dies for him ? You think it hard To die ? Oh, would you were at Rhodes, and choice

Of deaths should suit you !

Kha. [Bending over ANAEL'S body.] Just restore her life !

So little does it ! there — the eyelids tremble !
'T was not my breath that made them : and the
lips

Move of themselves. I could restore her life !
Hakeem, we have forgotten — have presumed
On our free converse : we are better taught.

See, I kiss — how I kiss thy garment's hem
For her ! She kisses it — Oh, take her deed
In mine ! Thou dost believe now, Anael ? —

See,
She smiles ! Were her lips open o'er the teeth
'Thus, when I spoke first ? She believes in
thee !

Go not without her to the cedars, lord !
Or leave us both — I cannot go alone !
I have obeyed thee, if I dare so speak :

Hath Hakeem thus forgot all Djabal knew ?
Thou feelst then my tears fall hot and fast
Upon thy hand, and yet thou speakest not ?

Ere the Venetian trumpet sound — ere thou
Exalt thyself, O Hakeem ! save thou her !

Nuncio. And the accursed Republic will arrive

And find me in their toils — dead, very like,
Under their feet !

What way — not one way yet
To foil them ? None ? [Observing DJABAL'S face.] What ails the Khalif ? Ah,

That ghastly face ! A way to foil them yet !
[To the Druses.] Look to your Khalif, Druses !
Is that face

God Hakeem's ? Where is triumph, — where is . . . what

Said he of exaltation — hath he promised
So much to-day ? Why then, exalt thyself !
Cast off that husk, thy form, set free thy soul

In splendor ! Now, bear witness ! here I
stand —

I challenge him exalt himself, and I
Become, for that, a Druse like all of you !

The Druses. Exalt thyself ! Exalt thyself,
O Hakeem !

Dja. [Advances.] I can confess now all from first to last.

There is no longer shame for me. I am . . .

[Here the Venetian trumpet sounds : the Druses shout, DJABAL'S eye catches the expression of those about him, and, as the old dream comes back, he is again confident and inspired.]

— Am I not Hakeem ? And ye would have crawled

But yesterday within these impure courts
Where now ye stand erect ! Not grand enough ?

— What more could be conceded to such beasts
As all of you, so sunk and base as you,
Than a mere man ? A man among such beasts

Was miracle enough : yet him you doubt,
Him you forsake, him fain would you destroy —
With the Venetians at your gate, the Nuncio

Thus — (see the baffled hypocrite ! ) and, best,
The Prefect there !

Druses. No, Hakeem, ever thine !

Nuncio. He lies — and twice he lies — and thrice he lies !

Exalt thyself, Mahound ! Exalt thyself !

Dja. Druses ! we shall henceforth be far away —

Out of mere mortal ken — above the cedars —
But we shall see ye go, hear ye return,
Repeopling the old solitudes, — through thee,

My Khalif ! Thou art full of me : I fill Thee full — my hands thus fill thee ! Yestereve,

— Nay, but this morn, I deemed thee ignorant

Of all to do, requiring word of mine
To teach it : now, thou hast all gifts in one,
With truth and purity go other gifts,

All gifts come clustering to that. Go, lead
My people home whate'er betide !

[Turning to the Druses.] Ye take
This Khalif for my delegate ? To him
Bow as to me ? He leads to Lebanon —

Ye follow ?

Druses. We follow ! Now exalt thyself !

Dja. [Raises Loys.] Then to thee, Loys !
How I wronged thee, Loys !

Yet, wronged, no less thou shalt have full revenge,

Fit for thy noble self, revenge — and thus.
Thou, loaded with such wrongs, the princely
soul,

The first sword of Christ's sepulchre — thou shalt

Guard Khalil and my Druses home again !
Justice, no less, God's justice and no more,
For those I leave ! — to seeking this, devote

Some few days out of thy Knight's brilliant
life :

And, this obtained them, leave their Lebanon,
My Druses' blessing in thine ears — (they shall Bless thee with blessing sure to have its way)

— One cedar-blossom in thy dual cap,
One thought of Anael in thy heart, — perchance,

One thought of him who thus, to bid thee speed,

His last word to the living speaks! This done,
Resume thy course, and, first amidst the first
In Europe, take my heart along with thee!
Go boldly, go serenely, go augustly —
What shall withstand thee then?

[He bends over ANAEL.] And last to thee!
Ah, did I dream I was to have, this day,
Exalted thee? A vain dream: hast thou not Won greater exaltation? What remains
But press to thee, exalt myself to thee?

Thus I exalt myself, set free my soul!

[He stabs himself. As he falls, supported by KHALIL and LOYS, the VENETIANS enter; the ADMIRAL advances.

Admiral. God and St. Mark for Venice!
Plant the Lion!

[At the clash of the planted standard, the DRUSES shout, and move tumultuously forward, LOYS drawing his sword.

Dja. [Leading them a few steps between KHALIL and LOYS.] On to the Mountain!
At the Mountain, Druses! [Dies.

A BLOT IN THE 'SCUTCHEON

A TRAGEDY

THIS play was written in 1843 at the request of Macready, and very rapidly, in four or five days. A misunderstanding with Macready, fully related in Mrs. Orr's Life and Letters of Robert Browning, I. 168-184, and in Mr. Gosse's Personalia, led to a breach between the two friends.

The play was received with great applause,

PERSONS

MILDRED TRESHAM.
GUENDOLEN TRESHAM.
PHOROLD, Earl Tresham.
AUSTIN TRESHAM.
HENRY, Earl Mertoun.
GERARD, and other Retainers of Lord Tresham.

Time, 17—

ACT I

SCENE I. The interior of a lodge in LORD TRESHAM'S park. Many Retainers crowded at the window, supposed to command a view of the entrance to his mansion. GERARD, the Warrener, his back to a table on which are flagons, etc.

1st Retainer. Ay, do! push, friends, and then you'll push down me!

— What for? Does any hear a runner's foot
Or a steed's trample or a coach-wheel's cry?
Is the Earl come or his least poursuivant?
But there's no breeding in a man of you
Save Gerard yonder: here's a half-place yet, Old Gerard!

Gerard. Save your courtesies, my friend.
Here is my place.

2d Ret. Now, Gerard, out with it!
What makes you sullen, this of all the days
I' the year? To-day that young rich bountiful Handsome Earl Mertoun, whom alone they match

With our Lord Tresham through the country-
side,

Is coming here in utmost bravery

but circumstances prevented it from being kept on the boards. It has, however, been reproduced both in England and in America, near the close of Browning's life and after his death. Helen Faucit, afterward Lady Martin, took the part of Mildred. The play was printed shortly after it first appeared, as No. V. of Bells and Pomegranates.

To ask our master's sister's hand?

Ger. What then? What then?
2d Ret. What then? Why, you, she speaks to, if she meets

Your worship, smiles on as you hold apart
The boughs to let her through her forest walks,
You, always favorite for your no-deserts,
You've heard, these three days, how Earl Mer-toun sues

To lay his heart and house and broad lands too
At Lady Mildred's feet: and while we squeeze
Ourselves into a mousehole lest we miss
One congee of the least page in his train,
You sit o' one side — "there's the Earl," say
I —

"What then?" say you!

3d Ret. I'll wager he has let
Both swans he tamed for Lady Mildred swim
Over the falls and gain the river!

Ger. Ralph,

Is not to-morrow my inspecting-day
For you and for your hawks?

4th Ret. Let Gerard be!
He's coarse-grained, like his carved black cross-bow stock.

Ha, look now, while we squabble with him,
look!

Well done, now — is not this beginning, now,
To purpose?

1st Ret. Our retainers look as fine —
That's comfort. Lord, how Richard holds himself

With his white staff! Will not a knave behind
Prick him upright?

4th Ret. He's only bowing, fool!
 The Earl's man bent us lower by this much.
 1st Ret. That's comfort. Here's a very cavalcade!
 3d Ret. I don't see wherefore Richard, and his troop
 Of silk and silver varlets there, should find
 Their perfumed selves so indispensable
 On high days, holidays! Would it so disgrace
 Our family, if I, for instance, stood —
 In my right hand a cast of Swedish hawks,
 A leash of greyhounds in my left? —
 Ger. — With Hugh
 The logman for supporter, in his right
 The bill-hook, in his left the brushwood-shears!
 3d Ret. Out on you, crab! What next, what next? The Earl!
 1st Ret. Oh Walter, groom, our horses, do they match
 The Earl's? Alas, that first pair of the six — They paw the ground — Ah, Walter! and that brute
 Just on his haunches by the wheel!
 6th Ret. Ay — Ay!
 You, Philip, are a special hand, I hear,
 At soups and sauces: what's a horse to you?
 D'ye mark that beast they've slid into the midst
 So cunningly? — then, Philip, mark this further;
 No leg has he to stand on!
 1st Ret. No? That's comfort.
 2d Ret. Peace, Cook! The Earl descends.
 — Well, Gerard, see
 The Earl at least! Come, there's a proper
 man,
 I hope! Why, Ralph, no falcon, Pole or Swede,
 Has got a starrier eye.
 3d Ret. His eyes are blue —
 But leave my hawks alone!
 4th Ret. So young, and yet
 So tall and shapely!
 5th Ret. Here's Lord Tresham's self!
 There now — there's what a nobleman should
 be!
 He's older, graver, loftier, he's more like
 A House's head!
 2d Ret. But you'd not have a boy — And what's the Earl beside? — possess too soon
 That stateliness?
 1st Ret. Our master takes his hand —
 Richard and his white staff are on the move —
 Back fall our people — (tsh!) — there's Timothy
 Sure to get tangled in his ribbon-ties,
 And Peter's cursed rosette's a-coming off!)
 — At last I see our lord's back and his friend's;
 And the whole beautiful bright company
 Close round them: in they go! [Jumping down from the window-bench, and making for the table and its jugs.] Good health, long life
 Great joy to our Lord Tresham and his House!
 6th Ret. My father drove his father first to court,
 After his marriage-day — ay, did he!
 2d Ret. God bless

Lord Tresham, Lady Mildred, and the Earl!
 Here, Gerard, reach your beaker!
 Ger. Drink, my boys!
 Don't mind me — all's not right about me —
 drink!
 2d Ret. [Aside.] He's vexed, now, that he let the show escape!
 [To GER.] Remember that the Earl returns
 this way.
 Ger. That way?
 2d Ret. Just so.
 Ger. Then my way's here. [Goes.
 2d Ret. Old Gerard
 Will die soon — mind, I said it! He was used
 To care about the pitifullest thing
 That touched the House's honor, not an eye
 But his could see wherein: and on a cause
 Of scarce a quarter this importance, Gerard
 Fairly had fretted flesh and bone away
 In cares that this was right, nor that was wrong,
 Such point decorous, and such square by rule —
 He knew such niceties, no herald more:
 And now — you see his humor: die he will!
 2d Ret. God help him! Who's for the great servants'-hall
 To hear what's going on inside? They'd follow
 Lord Tresham into the saloon.
 3d Ret. I! — I! —
 4th Ret. I! —
 Leave Frank alone for catching, at the door,
 Some hint of how the parley goes inside!
 Prosperity to the great House once more!
 Here's the last drop!
 1st Ret. Have at you! Boys, hurrah!

SCENE II. A saloon in the Mansion.

Enter LORD TRESHAM, LORD MERTOUN, AUSTIN, and GUENDOLEN.
 Tresham. I welcome you, Lord Mertoun, yet
 once more,
 To this ancestral roof of mine. Your name
 — Noble among the noblest in itself,
 Yet taking in your person, fame avers,
 New price and lustre, — (as that gem you wear,
 Transmitted from a hundred knightly breasts,
 Fresh chased and set and fixed by its last lord,
 Seems to rekindle at the core) — your name
 Would win you welcome!
 Mertoun. Thanks!
 Tresh. — But add to that,
 The worthiness and grace and dignity
 Of your proposal for uniting both
 Our Houses even closer than respect Unites them now — add these, and you must grant
 One favor more, nor that the least, — to think
 The welcome I should give; — 't is given! My lord,
 My only brother, Austin — he's the king's.
 Our cousin, Lady Guendolen — betrothed
 To Austin: all are yours.
 Mer. I thank you — less
 For the expressed commendings of your seal.
 And only that, authenticates — forbids
 My putting from me . . . to my heart I take

Your praise . . . but praise less claims my gratitude.

Than the indulgent insight it implies
Of what must needs be uppermost with one
Who comes, like me, with the bare leave to ask,

In weighed and measured unimpassioned words,
A gift, which, if as calmly 't is denied,
He must withdraw, content upon his cheek,
Despair within his soul. That I dare ask
Firmly, near boldly, near with confidence
That gift, I have to thank you. Yes, Lord
Tresham,

I love your sister — as you'd have one love
That lady . . . oh more, more I love her!
Wealth,

Rank, all the world thinks me, they're yours,
you know,

To hold or part with, at your choice — but grant
My true self, me without a rood of land,
A piece of gold, a name of yesterday,
Grant me that lady, and you . . . Death or life?

Guendolen. [Apart to Aus.] Why, this is loving, Austin!

Austin. He's so young!

Guen. Young? Old enough, I think, to half surmise

He never had obtained an entrance here,

Were all this fear and trembling needed.
Aus. Hush!

He reddens.

Guen. Mark him, Austin; that's true love!
Ours must begin again.

Tresh. We'll sit, my lord.

Ever with best desert goes diffidence.

I may speak plainly nor be misconceived.

That I am wholly satisfied with you

On this occasion, when a falcon's eye
Were dull compared with mine to search out faults,

Is somewhat. Mildred's hand is hers to give
Or to refuse.

Mer. But you, you grant my suit?
I have your word if hers?

Tresh. My best of words
If hers encourage you. I trust it will.

Have you seen Lady Mildred, by the way?

Mer. I . . . I . . . our two demesnes, remember, touch;

I have been used to wander carelessly

After my stricken game: the heron roused

Deep in my woods, has trailed its broken wing

Through thickets and glades a mile in yours, —
or else

Some eyass ill-reclaimed has taken flight

And lured me after her from tree to tree,

I marked not whither. I have come upon

The lady's wondrous beauty unaware,

And — and then . . . I have seen her.

Guen. [Aside to Aus.] Note that mode
Of faltering out that, when a lady passed,

He, having eyes, did see her! You had said —

"On such a day I scanned her, head to foot;

Observed a red, where red should not have
been,

Outside her elbow; but was pleased enough

Upon the whole." Let such irreverent talk

Be lessoned for the future!

Tresh. What's to say

May be said briefly. She has never known

A mother's care; I stand for father too.

Her beauty is not strange to you, it seems —

You cannot know the good and tender heart,

Its girl's trust and its woman's constancy.

How pure yet passionate, how calm yet kind,

How grave yet joyous, how reserved yet free

As light where friends are — how imbued with lore

The world most prizes, yet the simplest, yet
The . . . one might know I talked of Mildred
— thus

We brothers talk!

Mer. I thank you.

Tresh. In a word,
Control's not for this lady; but her wish

To please me outstrips in its subtlety

My power of being pleased: herself creates

The want she means to satisfy. My heart

Prefers your suit to her as 't were its own.

Can I say more?

Mer. No more — thanks, thanks — no more!

Tresh. This matter then discussed . . .

Mer. — We'll waste no breath
On aught less precious. I'm beneath the roof

Which holds her: while I thought of that, my
speech

To you would wander — as it must not do,

Since as you favor me I stand or fall.

I pray you suffer that I take my leave!

Tresh. With less regret 't is suffered, that
again

We meet, I hope, so shortly.

Mer. We? again? —

Ah yes, forgive me — when shall . . . you will crown

Your goodness by forthwith apprising me

When . . . if . . . the lady will appoint a day

For me to wait on you — and her.

Tresh. So soon

As I am made acquainted with her thoughts

On your proposal — howso'er they lean —

A messenger shall bring you the result.

Mer. You cannot bind me more to you, my lord.

Farewell till we renew . . . I trust, renew

A converse ne'er to disunite again.

Tresh. So may it prove!

Mer. You, lady, you, sir, take

My humble salutation!

Guen. and Aus. Thanks!

Tresh. Within there!

(Servants enter. TRESHAM conducts MERTOUN to the door. Meantime AUSTIN remarks)

Well,

Here I have an advantage of the Earl,

Confess now! I'd not think that all was safe

Because my lady's brother stood my friend!

Why, he makes sure of her — "do you say,
yes —

She'll not say, no," — what comes it to beside?

I should have prayed the brother, "speak this
speech,

For Heaven's sake urge this on her — put in
this —

Forget not, as you'd save me, t' other thing. —

Then set down what she says, and how she looks,
And if she smiles, and " (in an under breath)
"Only let her accept me, and do you
And all the world refuse me, if you dare!"

Guen. That way you'd take, friend Austin?
What a shame

I was your cousin, tamely from the first
Your bride, and all this fervor's run to waste!
Do you know you speak sensibly to-day?
The Earl's a fool.

Aus. Here's Thorold. Tell him so!

Tresh. [Returning.] Now, voices, voices! 'St!
The lady's first!

How seems he? — seems he not . . . come,
faith give fraud

The mercy-stroke whenever they engage!
Down with fraud, up with faith! How seems the Earl?

A name! a blazon! if you knew their worth,
As you will never! come — the Earl?

Guen. He's young.

Tresh. What's she? an infant save in heart and brain.

Young! Mildred is fourteen, remark! And
you . . .

Austin, how old is she?

Guen. There's tact for you!

I meant that being young was good excuse

If one should tax him . . .

Tresh. Well?

Guen. — With lacking wit.

Tresh. He lacked wit? Where might he lack wit, so please you?

Guen. In standing straighter than the steward's rod

And making you the tiresomest harangue,

Instead of slipping over to my side

And softly whispering in my ear, "Sweet lady,

Your cousin there will do me detriment

He little dreams of: he's absorbed, I see,

In my old name and fame — be sure he'll leave

My Mildred, when his best account of me

Is ended, in full confidence I wear

My grandsire's periwig down either cheek,

I'm lost unless your gentleness vouchsafes" . . .

Tresh. . . . "To give a best of best accounts,
yourself,

Of me and my demerits." You are right!

He should have said what now I say for him.

You golden creature, will you help us all?

Here's Austin means to vouch for much, but you

— You are . . . what Austin only knows!

Come up,

All three of us: she's in the library

No doubt, for the day's wearing fast. Precede!

Guen. Austin, how we must —!

Tresh. Must what? Must speak truth,

Malignant tongue! Detect one fault in him!

I challenge you!

Guen. Witchcraft's a fault in him,

For you're bewitched.

Tresh. What's urgent we obtain

Is, that she soon receive him — say, to-morrow —
Next day at furthest.

Guen. Ne'er instruct me!

Tresh. Come!

— He's out of your good graces, since forsooth,
He stood not as he'd carry us by storm

With his perfections! You're for the composed

Manly assured becoming confidence!

— Get her to say, "To-morrow," and I'll give
you . . .

I'll give you black Urganda, to be spoiled

With petting and snail-paces. Will you?
Come!

SCENE III. MILDRED'S Chamber. A painted window overlooks the Park. MILDRED and GUENDOLEN.

Guen. Now, Mildred, spare those pains. I have not left

Our talkers in the library, and climbed

The wearisome ascent to this your bower

In company with you, — I have not dared . . .

Nay, worked such prodigies as sparing you

Lord Mertoun's pedigree before the flood,

Which Thorold seemed in very act to tell

— Or bringing Austin to pluck up that most

Firm-rooted heresy — your suitor's eyes,

He would maintain, were gray instead of blue —

I think I brought him to contrition! — Well,

I have not done such things, (all to deserve

A minute's quiet cousins' talk with you,)

To be dismissed so coolly!

Mildred.

Guendolen!

What have I done? what could suggest . . .

Guen.

There, there!

Do I not comprehend you'd be alone

To throw those testimonies in a heap,

Thorold's enlargings, Austin's brevities,

With that poor silly heartless Guendolen's

Ill-timed misplaced attempted smartnesses —

And sift their sense out? now, I come to spare
you

Nearly a whole night's labor. Ask and have!

Demand, be answered! Lack I ears and eyes?

Am I perplexed which side of the rock-table

The Conqueror dined on when he landed first,

Lord Mertoun's ancestor was bidden take —

The bow-hand or the arrow-hand's great meed?

Mildred, the Earl has soft blue eyes!

Mil.

My brother —

Did he . . . you said that he received him well?

Guen. If I said only "well" I said not much.

Oh, stay — which brother?

Mil.

Thorold! who — who else?

Guen. Thorold (a secret) is too proud by half, —

Nay, hear me out — with us he's even gentler

Than we are with our birds. Of this great
House

The least retainer that e'er caught his glance

Would die for him, real dying — no mere talk:

And in the world, the court, if men would cite

The perfect spirit of honor, Thorold's name

Rises of its clear nature to their lips.

But he should take men's homage, trust in it,

And care no more about what drew it down.

He has desert, and that, acknowledgment;

Is he content?

Mil.

You wrong him, Guendolen.

Guen. He's proud, confess; so proud with brooding o'er

The light of his interminable line.

An ancestry with men all paladins,

And women all . . .

Mil. Dear Guendolen, 't is late !
When yonder purple pane the climbing moon
Pierces, I know 't is midnight.

Guen. Well, that Thorold
Should rise up from such musings, and receive
One come audaciously to graft himself
Into this peerless stock, yet find no flaw,
No slightest spot in such an one . . .

Mil. Who finds
A spot in Mertoun ?

Guen. Not your brother ; therefore,
Not the whole world.

Mil. I am weary, Guendolen.
Bear with me !

Guen. I am foolish.
Mil. Oh no, kind !

But I would rest.
Guen. Good night and rest to you !

I said how gracefully his mantle lay
Beneath the rings of his light hair ?

Mil. Brown hair.
Guen. Brown ? why, it is brown : how could you know that ?

Mil. How ? did not you — Oh, Austin 't was declared

His hair was light, not brown — my head ! —
and look,

The moon-beam purpling the dark chamber !
Sweet,

Good night !
Guen. Forgive me — sleep the soundlier for me ! [Going, she turns suddenly.]

Mildred !
Perdition ! all 's discovered ! Thorold finds — That the Earl's greatest of all grandmothers
Was grander daughter still — to that fair dame
Whose garter slipped down at the famous dance !

[Goes.]
Mil. Is she — can she be really gone at last ?
My heart ! I shall not reach the window.

Needs
Must I have sinned much, so to suffer !

She lifts the small lamp which is suspended before the Virgin's image in the window, and places it by the purple pane.

There !
[She returns to the seat in front.]

Mildred and Mertoun ! Mildred, with consent
Of all the world and Thorold, Mertoun's bride !
Too late ! 'T is sweet to think of, sweeter
still

To hope for, that this blessed end soothes up
The course of the beginning ; but I know
It comes too late : 't will sweetest be of all
To dream my soul away and die upon.

[A noise without.]
The voice ! Oh why, why glided sin the snake
Into the paradise Heaven meant us both ?

[The window opens softly. A low voice sings.]

There's a woman like a dew-drop, she's so purer
than the purest ;

And her noble heart's the noblest, yes, and her
sure faith's the surest :

And her eyes are dark and humid, like the depth
on depth of lustre

Hid i' the harebell, while her tresses, sunnier than the wild-grape cluster,

Gush in golden-tinted plenty down her neck's rosemisted marble ;
Then her voice's music . . . call it the well's bubbling, the bird's warble !

And this woman says, " My days were sunless
and my nights were moonless,

Parched the pleasant April herbage, and the lark's heart's outbreak tuneless,

If you loved me not ! " And I who — (ah, for words of flame !) adore her,

Who am mad to lay my spirit prostrate palpably before her —

[He enters, approaches her seat, and bends over her.]

I may enter at her portal soon, as now her lattice takes me,

And by noontide as by midnight make her mine.
as hers she makes me !

[The EARL throws off his slouched hat and long cloak.]
My very heart sings, so I sing, Beloved !

Mil. Sit, Henry — do not take my hand !
Mer. 'T is mine.

The meeting that appalled us both so much
Is ended.

Mil. What begins now ?
Mer. Happiness

Such as the world contains not.
Mil. That is it.

Our happiness would, as you say, exceed
The whole world's best of blisses : we — do we Deserve that ? Utter to your soul, what mine

Long since, Beloved, has grown used to hear,

Like a death-knell, so much regarded once,
And so familiar now ; this will not be !

Mer. Oh, Mildred, have I met your brother's
face ?

Compelled myself — if not to speak untruth,
Yet to disguise, to shun, to put aside

The truth, as — what had e'er prevailed on me
Save you, to venture ? Have I gained at last

Your brother, the one scarer of your dreams,
And waking thoughts' sole apprehension too ?

Does a new life, like a young sunrise, break
On the strange unrest of our night, confused

With rain and stormy flaw — and will you see
No dripping blossoms, no fire-tinted drops

On each live spray, no vapor steaming up,
And no expressless glory in the East ?

When I am by you, to be ever by you,
When I have won you and may worship you.

Oh, Mildred, can you say " this will not be " ?
Mil. Sin has surprised us, so will punishment.

Mer. No — me alone, who sinned alone !
Mil. The night

You likened our past life to — was it storm
Throughout to you then, Henry ?

Mer. Of your life
I spoke — what am I, what my life, to waste

A thought about when you are by me ? — you
It was, I said my folly called the storm

And pulled the night upon. 'T was day with
me —

Perpetual dawn with me.
Mil. Come what come will.

You have been happy : take my hand !

Mer. [After a pause.] How good
Your brother is! I figured him a cold —
Shall I say, haughty man?

Mil. They told me all.
I know all.

Mer. It will soon be over.
Mil. Over?
Oh, what is over? what must I live through
And say, " 't is over " ? Is our meeting over?
Have I received in presence of them all
The partner of my guilty love — with brow
Trying to seem a maiden's brow — with lips
Which make believe that when they strive to form

Replies to you and tremble as they strive,
It is the nearest ever they approached
A stranger's . . . Henry, yours that stranger's
. . . lip —

With cheek that looks a virgin's, and that is . . .
Ah God, some prodigy of thine will stop
This planned piece of deliberate wickedness
In its birth even! some fierce leprous spot
Will mar the brow's dissimulating! I Shall murmur no smooth speeches got by heart,
But, frenzied, pour forth all our woe's story,
The love, the shame, and the despair — with
them

Round me aghast as round some cursed fount
That should spirt water, and spouts blood. I'll
not
. . . Henry, you do not wish that I should draw

This vengeance down? I'll not affect a grace
That's gone from me — gone once, and gone
forever!

Mer. Mildred, my honor is your own. I'll share

Disgrace I cannot suffer by myself.
A word informs your brother I retract
This morning's offer; time will yet bring forth
Some better way of saving both of us.

Mil. I'll meet their faces, Henry!
Mer. When? to-morrow!
Get done with it!

Mil. Oh, Henry, not to-morrow!
Next day! I never shall prepare my words
And looks and gestures sooner. — How you must Despise me!

Mer. Mildred, break it if you choose,
A heart the love of you uplifted — still
Uplifts, through this protracted agony,
To heaven! but, Mildred, answer me, — first pace

The chamber with me — once again — now, say
Calmly the part, the . . . what it is of me
You see contempt (for you did say contempt)
— Contempt for you in! I would pluck it off
And cast it from me! — but no — no, you'll not Repeat that? — will you, Mildred, repeat that?

Mil. Dear Henry!

Mer. I was scarce a boy — e'en now
What am I more? And you were infantine
When first I met you; why, your hair fell loose
On either side! My fool's-cheek reddens now
Only in the recalling how it burned
That morn to see the shape of many a dream
— You know we boys are prodigal of charms

To her we dream of — I had heard of one,
Had dreamed of her, and I was close to her.
Might speak to her, might live and die her own,
Who knew? I spoke. Oh, Mildred, feel you
not

That now, while I remember every glance
Of yours, each word of yours, with power to test
And weigh them in the diamond scales of pride,
Resolved the treasure of a first and last Heart's love shall have been bartered at its
worth,

— That now I think upon your purity
And utter ignorance of guilt — your own
Or other's guilt — the girlish undisguised
Delight at a strange novel prize — (I talk
A silly language, but interpret, you!)
If I, with fancy at its full, and reason
Scarce in its germ, enjoined you secrecy,
If you had pity on my passion, pity
On my protested sickness of the soul
To sit beside you, hear you breathe, and watch
Your eyelids and the eyes beneath — if you
Accorded gifts and knew not they were gifts —
If I grew mad at last with enterprise
And must behold my beauty in her bower
Or perish — (I was ignorant of even My own desires — what then were you?) if sorrow —

Sin — if the end came — must I now renounce
My reason, blind myself to light, say truth
Is false and lie to God and my own soul?
Contempt were all of this!

Mil. Do you believe . . .
Or, Henry, I'll not wrong you — you believe
That I was ignorant. I scarce grieve o'er
The past! We'll love on; you will love me
still!

Mer. Oh, to love less what one has injured!
Dove,

Whose pinion I have rashly hurt, my breast — Shall my heart's warmth not nurse thee into strength?

Flower I have crushed, shall I not care for
thee?

Bloom o'er my crest, my fight-mark and device!
Mildred, I love you and you love me!

Mil. Go!
Be that your last word. I shall sleep to-night.

Mer. This is not our last meeting?
Mil. One night more.

Mer. And then — think, then!

Mil. Then, no sweet courtship-days,
No dawning consciousness of love for us,
No strange and palpitating births of sense
From words and looks, no innocent fears and
hopes,

Reserves and confidences: morning's over!

Mer. How else should love's perfected noon-tide follow?

All the dawn promised shall the day perform.

Mil. So may it be! but —

You are cautious, Love?
Are sure that unobserved you scaled the walls?
Mer. Oh, trust me! Then our final meeting's fixed

To-morrow night?

Mil. Farewell! Stay, Henry . . . wherefore?

His foot is on the yew-tree bough : the turf
Receives him : now the moonlight as he runs
Embraces him — but he must go — is gone.
Ah, once again he turns — thanks, thanks, my Love!

He's gone. Oh, I'll believe him every word !
I was so young, I loved him so, I had
No mother, God forgot me, and I fell.
There may be pardon yet : all's doubt beyond.
Surely the bitterness of death is past !

ACT II

SCENE. The Library.

Enter LORD TRESHAM, hastily.

Tresh. This way ! In, Gerard, quick !

[As GERARD enters, TRESHAM secures the door.

Now speak ! or, wait —

I'll bid you speak directly. [Seats himself.

Now repeat
Firmly and circumstantially the tale
You just now told me ; it eludes me ; either
I did not listen, or the half is gone Away from me. How long have you lived
here ?

Here in my house, your father kept our woods
Before you ?

Ger. — As his father did, my lord.
I have been eating, sixty years almost,
Your bread.

Tresh. Yes, yes. You ever were of all
The servant in my father's house, I know,
The trusted one. You'll speak the truth.

Ger. I'll speak
God's truth. Night after night . . .

Tresh. Since when ?
Ger. At least

A month — each midnight has some man access
To Lady Mildred's chamber.

Tresh. Tush, "access" —
No wide words like "access" to me !

Ger. He runs
Along the woodside, crosses to the south,
Takes the left tree that ends the avenue . . .

Tresh. The last great yew-tree ?

Ger. You might stand upon
The main boughs like a platform. Then
he . . .

Tresh. Quick !

Ger. Climbs up, and, where they lessen at the top,

— I cannot see distinctly, but he throws,
I think — for this I do not vouch — a line
That reaches to the lady's casement —

Tresh. — Which
He enters not ! Gerard, some wretched fool
Dares pry into my sister's privacy !
When such are young, it seems a precious thing
To have approached, — to merely have approached,

Got sight of, the abode of her they set Their frantic thoughts upon ! He does not enter ?

Gerard ?

Ger. There is a lamp that's full i' the midst,
Under a red square in the painted glass

Of Lady Mildred's . . .

Tresh. Leave that name out ! Well ?
That lamp ?

Ger. — Is moved at midnight higher up
To one pane — a small dark-blue pane : he waits
For that among the boughs : at sight of that,
I see him, plain as I see you, my lord,
Open the lady's casement, enter there . . .

Tresh. — And stay ?

Ger. An hour, two hours.

Tresh. And this you saw
Once ? — twice ? — quick !

Ger. Twenty times.

Tresh. And what brings you
Under the yew-trees ?

Ger. The first night I left
My range so far, to track the stranger stag
That broke the pale, I saw the man.

Tresh. Yet sent
No cross-bow shaft through the marauder ?

Ger. But
He came, my lord, the first time he was seen,
In a great moonlight, light as any day,
From Lady Mildred's chamber.

Tresh. [After a pause.] You have no cause
— Who could have cause to do my sister wrong ?
Ger. Oh, my lord, only once — let me this
once

Speak what is on my mind ! Since first I noted
All this, I've groaned as if a fiery net
Plucked me this way and that — fire if I turned
To her, fire if I turned to you, and fire
If down I flung myself and strove to die.
The lady could not have been seven years old
When I was trusted to conduct her safe
Through the deer-herd to stroke the snow-white fawn

I brought to eat bread from her tiny hand
Within a month. She ever had a smile
To greet me with — she . . . if it could undo
What's done, to lop each limb from off this trunk . . .

All that is foolish talk, not fit for you —
I mean, I could not speak and bring her hurt
For Heaven's compelling. But when I was fixed

To hold my peace, each morsel of your food
Eaten beneath your roof, my birth-place too,
Choked me. I wish I had grown mad in doubts
What it behoved me do. This morn it seemed Either I must confess to you, or die :
Now it is done, I seem the vilest worm
That crawls, to have betrayed my lady !

Tresh. No — No, Gerard !

Ger. Let me go !

Tresh. A man, you say :
What man ? Young ? Not a vulgar hind ?
What dress ?

Ger. A slouched hat and a large dark foreign cloak

Wraps his whole form ; even his face is hid ;
But I should judge him young : no hind, be
sure !

Tresh. Why ?

Ger. He is ever armed : his sword projects
Beneath the cloak.

Tresh. Gerard, — I will not say

No word, no breath of this!

Ger. Thanks, thanks, my lord! [Goes.]

TRESHAM paces the room. After a pause,
Oh, thought 's absurd! — as with some monstrous fact

Which, when ill thoughts beset us, seems to give

Merciful God that made the sun and stars,
The waters and the green delights of earth,
The lie! I apprehend the monstrous fact —
Yet know the maker of all worlds is good,
And yield my reason up inadequate
To reconcile what yet I do behold —
Blasting my sense! There 's cheerful day outside:

This is my library, and this the chair
My father used to sit in carelessly
After his soldier-fashion, while I stood
Between his knees to question him : and here
Gerard our gray retainer, — as he says,
Fed with our food, from sire to son, an age —
Has told a story — I am to believe!
That Mildred . . . oh, no, no! both tales are true,

Her pure cheek's story and the forester's!
Would she, or could she, err — much less, confound

All guilts of treachery, of craft, of . . . Heaven
Keep me within its hand! — I will sit here
Until thought settle and I see my course.
Avert, O God, only this woe from me!

[As he sinks his head between his arms on the table,
GUENDOLEN's voice is heard at the door.

Lord Tresham! [She knocks.] Is Lord Tresham there?

[TRESHAM, hastily turning, pulls down the first book above him and opens it.

Tresh. Come in! [She enters.
Ha. Guendolen! — good morning.

Guen. Nothing more?
Tresh. What should I say more?

Guen. Pleasant question! more?
This more. Did I besiege poor Mildred's brain
Last night till close on morning with "the Earl,"
"The Earl" — whose worth did I asseverate
Till I am very fain to hope that . . . Thorold,
What is all this? You are not well!

Tresh. Who, I?
You laugh at me.

Guen. Has what I'm fain to hope,
Arrived then? Does that huge tome show some blot

In the Earl's 'scutcheon come no longer back
Than Arthur's time?

Tresh. When left you Mildred's chamber?
Guen. Oh, late enough, I told you! The main thing

To ask is, how I left her chamber, — sure,
Content yourself, she'll grant this paragon
Of Earls no such ungacious . . .

Tresh. Send her here!

Guen. Thorold?

Tresh. I mean — acquaint her, Guendolen,
— But mildly!

Guen. Mildly?

Tresh. Ah, you guessed aright!
I am not well : there is no hiding it.
But tell her I would see her at her leisure —

That is, at once! here in the library!
The passage in that old Italian book
We hunted for so long is found, say, found —
And if I let it slip again . . . you see,
That she must come — and instantly!

Guen. I'll die
Piecemeal, record that, if there have not gloomed

Some blot i' the 'scutcheon!

Tresh. Go! or, Guendolen,
Be you at call, — with Austin, if you choose, —
In the adjoining gallery! There, go:

[GUENDOLEN goes.]

Another lesson to me! You might bid
A child disguise his heart's sore, and conduct
Some sly investigation point by point
With a smooth brow, as well as bid me catch
The inquisitorial cleverness some praise!
If you had told me yesterday, "There's one
You needs must circumvent and practise with,
Entrap by policies, if you would worm
The truth out: and that one is — Mildred!"

There,
There — reasoning is thrown away on it!
Prove she's unchaste . . . why, you may after prove

That she 's a poisoner, traitress, what you will!
Where I can comprehend naught, naught 's to say,

Or do, or think! Force on me but the first Abomination, — then outpour all plagues,
And I shall ne'er make count of them!

[Enter MILDRED.]

Mil. What book
Is it I wanted, Thorold? Guendolen
Thought you were pale; you are not pale.

That book?
That 's Latin surely.

Tresh. Mildred, here 's a line,
(Don't lean on me: I'll English it for you)
"Love conquers all things." What love conquers them?

What love should you esteem — best love?

Mil. True love.
Tresh. I mean, and should have said, whose love is best

Of all that love or that profess to love?
Mil. The list 's so long: there 's father's, mother's, husband's . . .

Tresh. Mildred, I do believe a brother's love
For a sole sister must exceed them all.

For see now, only see! there 's no alloy
Of earth that creeps into the perfect'st gold

Of other loves — no gratitude to claim;
You never gave her life, not even aught

That keeps life — never tended her, instructed,
Enriched her — so, your love can claim no right

O'er her save pure love's claim: that 's what I call

Freedom from earthliness. You'll never hope
To be such friends, for instance, she and you,

As when you hunted cowslips in the woods
Or played together in the meadow hay.

Oh yes — with age, respect comes, and your worth

Is felt, there 's growing sympathy of tastes,
There 's ripened friendship, there 's confirmed esteem:

— Much head these make against the new-comer!

The startling apparition, the strange youth — Whom one half-hour's conversing with, or, say, Mere gazing at, shall change (beyond all change This Ovid ever sang about) your soul

. . . Her soul, that is, — the sister's soul! With her

'T was winter yesterday; now, all is warmth, The green leaf's springing and the turtle's voice, "Arise and come away!" Come whither? — far Enough from the esteem, respect, and all The brother's somewhat insignificant Array of rights! All which he knows before, Has calculated on so long ago! I think such love, (apart from yours and mine,) Contented with its little term of life, Intending to retire betimes, aware How soon the background must be place for it, — I think, am sure, a brother's love exceeds All the world's love in its unworldliness.

Mil. What is this for?

Tresh. This, Mildred, is it for! Or, no, I cannot go to it so soon! That's one of many points my haste left out — Each day, each hour throws forth its silk-slight fin

Between the being tied to you by birth, And you, until those slender threads compose A web that shrouds her daily life of hopes And fears and fancies, all her life, from yours: So close you live and yet so far apart! And must I rend this web, tear up, break down The sweet and palpitating mystery That makes her sacred? You — for you I mean, Shall I speak, shall I not speak?

Mil. Speak!

Tresh. I will, Is there a story men could — any man Could tell of you, you would conceal from me? I'll never think there's falsehood on that lip. Say "There is no such story men could tell," And I'll believe you, though I disbelieve The world — the world of better men than I, And women such as I suppose you. Speak! [After a pause.] Not speak? Explain then!

Clear it up then! Move Some of the miserable weight away That presses lower than the grave! Not speak? Some of the dead weight, Mildred! Ah, if I Could bring myself to plainly make their charge Against you! Must I, Mildred? Silent still? [After a pause.] Is there a gallant that has night by night

Admittance to your chamber?

[After a pause.] Then, his name! Till now, I only had a thought for you: But now, — his name!

Mil. Thorold, do you devise Fit expiation for my guilt, if fit There be! 'T is naught to say that I'll endure And bless you, — that my spirit yearns to purge Her stains off in the fierce renewing fire: But do not plunge me into other guilt! Oh, guilt enough! I cannot tell his name.

Tresh. Then judge yourself! How should I act? Pronounce!

Mil. Oh, Thorold, you must never tempt me thus!

To die here in this chamber by that sword Would seem like punishment: so should I glide, Like an arch-cheat, into extremest bliss! 'T were easily arranged for me: but you — What would become of you?

Tresh. And what will now Become of me? I'll hide your shame and mine From every eye; the dead must heave their hearts

Under the marble of our chapel-floor; They cannot rise and blast you. You may wed Your paramour above our mother's tomb; Our mother cannot move from 'neath your foot. We too will somehow wear this one day out: But with to-morrow hastens here — the Earl! The youth without suspicion face can come From heaven, and heart from . . . whence proceed such hearts?

I have dispatched last night at your command A missive bidding him present himself To-morrow — here — thus much is said; the rest

Is understood as if 't were written down — "His suit finds favor in your eyes." Now dictate

This morning's letter that shall countermand Last night's — do dictate that!

Mil. But, Thorold — if I will receive him as I said?

Tresh. The Earl?

Mil. I will receive him.

Tresh. [Starting up.] Ho there! Guendolen! (GUENDOLEN AND AUSTIN enter.)

And, Austin, you are welcome, too! Look there!

The woman there!

Aus. and Guen. How? Mildred?

Tresh. Mildred once! Now the receiver night by night, when sleep Blesses the inmates of her father's house, — I say, the soft sly wanton that receives Her guilt's accomplice 'neath this roof which holds

You, Guendolen, you, Austin, and has held A thousand Treshams — never one like her! No lighter of the signal-lamp her quick Foul breath near quenches in hot eagerness To mix with breath as foul! no loosener O' the lattice, practised in the stealthy tread, The low voice and the noiseless come-and-go! Not one composer of the bacchant's mien Into — what you thought Mildred's, in a word! Know her!

Guen. Oh, Mildred, look to me, at least! Thorold — she's dead, I'd say, but that she stands Rigid as stone and whiter!

Tresh. You have heard . . . Guen. Too much! You must proceed no further.

Mil. Yes — Proceed! All's truth. Go from me!

Tresh. All is truth. She tells you! Well, you know, or ought to know, All this I would forgive in her. I'd con

Each precept the harsh world enjoins, I 'd take
Our ancestors' stern verdicts one by one,
I 'd bind myself before them to exact
The prescribed vengeance — and one word of
hers,

The sight of her, the bare least memory
Of Mildred, my one sister, my heart's pride
Above all prides, my all in all so long,
Would scatter every trace of my resolve.
What were it silently to waste away
And see her waste away from this day forth,
Two scathed things with leisure to repent,
And grow acquainted with the grave, and die
Tired out if not at peace, and be forgotten?
It were not so impossible to bear.
But this — that, fresh from last night's pledge renewed

Of love with the successful gallant there,
She calmly bids me help her to entice,
Inveigle an unconscious trusting youth
Who thinks her all that 's chaste and good and pure,

— Invites me to betray him . . . who so fit
As honor's self to cover shame's arch-deed?
— That she 'll receive Lord Mertoun — (her own phrase) —

This, who could bear? Why, you have heard of thieves,
Stabbers, the earth's disgrace, who yet have laughed,

“Talk not to me of torture — I 'll betray No comrade I 've pledged faith to!” — you have heard

Of wretched women — all but Mildreds — tied
By wild illicit ties to losels vile
You 'd tempt them to forsake; and they 'll reply

“Gold, friends, repute, I left for him, I find
In him, why should I leave him then for gold, Repute or friends?” — and you have felt your
heart

Respond to such poor outcasts of the world
As to so many friends; bad as you please,
You 've felt they were God's men and women
still,

So, not to be disowned by you. But she
That stands there, calmly gives her lover up
As means to wed the Earl that she may hide
Their intercourse the surelier: and, for this,
I curse her to her face before you all.

Shame hunt her from the earth! Then Heaven do right
To both! It hears me now — shall judge her
then!

[As MILDRED faints and falls, TRESHAM rushes out.

Aus. Stay, Tresham, we 'll accompany you!

Guen. We?

What, and leave Mildred? We? Why, where 's my place

But by her side, and where yours but by mine?
Mildred — one word! Only look at me, then!

Aus. No, Guendolen! I echo Thorold's
voice.

She is unworthy to behold . . .

Guen. Us two?

If you spoke on reflection, and if I
Approved your speech — if you (to put the thing
At lowest) you the soldier, bound to make

The king's cause yours and fight for it, and throw

Regard to others of its right or wrong,
— If with a death-white woman you can help,
Let alone sister, let alone a Mildred,
You left her — or if I, her cousin, friend
This morning, playfellow but yesterday,
Who said, or thought at least a thousand times,
“I 'd serve you if I could,” should now face
round

And say, “Ah, that 's to only signify
I 'd serve you while you 're fit to serve yourself
So long as fifty eyes await the turn
Of yours to forestall its yet half-formed wish,
I 'll proffer my assistance you 'll not need —
When every tongue is praising you, I 'll join
The praisers' chorus — when you 're hemmed
about

With lives between you and detraction — lives
To be laid down if a rude voice, rash eye,
Rough hand should violate the sacred ring
Their worship throws about you, — then indeed,
Who 'll stand up for you stout as I?” If so
We said, and so we did, — not Mildred there
Would be unworthy to behold us both,
But we should be unworthy, both of us,
To be beheld by — by — your meanest dog,
Which, if that sword were broken in your
face

Before a crowd, that badge torn off your breast,
And you cast out with hooting and contempt,
— Would push his way through all the hooters,
gain

Your side, go off with you and all your shame
To the next ditch you choose to die in! Austin, Do you love me? Here 's Austin, Mildred, — here 's

Your brother says he does not believe half —
No, nor half that — of all he heard! He says,
Look up and take his hand!

Aus.

Look up and take

My hand, dear Mildred!

Mil.

I — I was so young!

Beside, I loved him, Thorold — and I had
No mother; God forgot me: so, I fell.

Guen. Mildred!

Mil.

Require no further! Did I dream
That I could palliate what is done? All 's true.
Now, punish me! A woman takes my hand!
Let go my hand! You do not know, I see.

I thought that Thorold told you.

Guen.

What is this?

Where start you to?

Mil.

Oh, Austin, loosen me!

You heard the whole of it — your eyes were worse,

In their surprise, than Thorold's! Oh, unless
You stay to execute his sentence, loose

My hand! Has Thorold gone, and are you here?
Guen. Here, Mildred, we two friends of yours will wait

Your bidding; be you silent, sleep or muse!
Only, when you shall want your bidding done,
How can we do it if we are not by?

Here 's Austin waiting patiently your will!

One spirit to command, and one to love
And to believe in it and do its best,
Poor as that is, to help it — why, the world

Has been won many a time, its length and breadth,

By just such a beginning!

Mil. I believe
If once I threw my arms about your neck
And sunk my head upon your breast, that I Should weep again.

Guen. Let go her hand now, Austin!
Wait for me. Pace the gallery and think
On the world's seemings and realities,
Until I call you. [AUSTIN goes.]

Mil. No — I cannot weep.
No more tears from this brain — no sleep — no
tears!

O Guendolen, I love you!

Guen. Yes: and "love"
Is a short word that says so very much!
It says that you confide in me.

Mil. Confide!
Guen. Your lover's name, then! I've so much to learn,
Ere I can work in your behalf!

Mil. My friend,
You know I cannot tell his name.

Guen. At least

He is your lover? and you love him too?
Mil. Ah, do you ask me that? — but I am fallen

So low!

Guen. You love him still, then?
Mil. My sole prop

Against the guilt that crushes me! I say,
Each night ere I lie down, "I was so young —
I had no mother, and I loved him so!"
And then God seems indulgent, and I dare
Trust him my soul in sleep.

Guen. How could you let us
E'en talk to you about Lord Mertoun then?

Mil. There is a cloud around me.
Guen. But you said
You would receive his suit in spite of this?

Mil. I say there is a cloud . . .
Guen. No cloud to me!
Lord Mertoun and your lover are the same!

Mil. What maddest fancy . . .
Guen. [Calling aloud.] Austin! (spare your pains —

When I have got a truth, that truth I keep) —

Mil. By all you love, sweet Guendolen, forbear!

Have I confided in you . . .
Guen. Just for this!

Austin! — Oh, not to guess it at the first!
But I did guess it — that is, I divined,
Felt by an instinct how it was: why else
Should I pronounce you free from all that heap
Of sins which had been irredeemable?

I felt they were not yours — what other way
Than this, not yours? The secret's wholly
mine!

Mil. If you would see me die before his face . . .
Guen. I'd hold my peace! And if the Earl returns

To-night?

Mil. Ah Heaven, he's lost!

Guen. I thought so. Austin!
(Enter AUSTIN.)

Oh, where have you been hiding?

Aus. Thorold's gone,
I know not how, across the meadow-land.
I watched him till I lost him in the skirts
O' the beech-wood.

Guen. Gone? All thwarts us.

Mil. Thorold too?

Guen. I have thought. First lead this Mildred to her room.

Go on the other side; and then we'll seek
Your brother: and I'll tell you, by the way,
The greatest comfort in the world. You said
There was a clue to all. Remember, Sweet,
He said there was a clue! I hold it. Come!

ACT III

SCENE I. The end of the Yew-tree Avenue under MIL-DRED's window. A light seen through a central red pane.

Enter TRESHAM through the trees.

Tresh. Again here! But I cannot lose my-
self.

The heath — the orchard — I have traversed
glades

And dells and bosky paths which used to lead
Into green wild-wood depths, bewildering
My boy's adventurous step. And now they tend Hither or soon or late; the blackest shade Breaks up, the thronged trunks of the trees ope
wide,

And the dim turret I have fled from, fronts
Again my step; the very river put
Its arm about me and conducted me
To this detested spot. Why then, I'll shun
Their will no longer: do your will with me!

Oh, bitter! To have reared a towering scheme
Of happiness, and to behold it razed,
Were nothing; all men hope, and see their hopes
Frustrate, and grieve awhile, and hope anew.

But I . . . to hope that from a line like ours
No horrid prodigy like this would spring,
Were just as though I hoped that from these old
Confederates against the sovereign day,

Children of older and yet older sires,
Whose living coral berries dropped, as now
On me, on many a baron's surcoat once,
On many a beauty's wimple — would proceed

No poison-tree, to thrust, from hell its root,
Hither and thither its strange snaky arms.

Why came I here? What must I do? [A bell strikes.] A bell?

Midnight! and 'tis at midnight . . . Ah, I catch — Woods, river, plains, I catch your meaning
now.

And I obey you! Hist! This tree will serve.
[He retires behind one of the trees. After a pause, enter MERTOUN cloaked as before.]

Mer. Not time! Beat out thy last voluptuous beat

Of hope and fear, my heart! I thought the clock

I' the chapel struck as I was pushing through
The ferns. And so I shall no more see rise
My love-star! Oh, no matter for the past!
So much the more delicious task to watch
Mildred revive: to pluck out, thorn by thorn.
All traces of the rough forbidden path

My rash love lured her to! Each day must see
Some fear of hers effaced, some hope renewed:
Then there will be surprises, unforeseen
Delights in store. I'll not regret the past.

[The light is placed above in the purple pane.

And see, my signal rises, Mildred's star!
I never saw it lovelier than now
It rises for the last time. If it sets,
'T is that the reassuring sun may dawn.

[As he prepares to ascend the last tree of the avenue,
TRESHAM arrests his arm.

Unhand me — peasant, by your grasp! Here's gold.

'T was a mad freak of mine. I said I'd pluck
A branch from the white-blossomed shrub beneath

The casement there. Take this, and hold your peace.

Tresh. Into the moonlight yonder, come with
me!

Out of the shadow.

Mer. I am armed, fool!

Tresh. Yes,

Or no? You'll come into the light, or no?

My hand is on your throat — refuse! —

Mer. That voice!

Where have I heard . . . no — that was mild and slow.

I'll come with you. [They advance.

Tresh. You're armed: that's well. Declare
Your name: who are you?

Mer. (Tresham! — she is lost!)

Tresh. Oh, silent? Do you know, you bear
yourself

Exactly as, in curious dreams I've had
How felons, this wild earth is full of, look

When they're detected, still your kind has looked!

The bravo holds an assured countenance,
The thief is voluble and plausible,

But silently the slave of lust has crouched
When I have fancied it before a man.

Your name!

Mer. I do conjure Lord Tresham — ay,
Kissing his foot, if so I might prevail —

That he for his own sake forbear to ask
My name! As heaven's above, his future weal

Or woe depends upon my silence! Vain!

I read your white inexorable face.

Know me, Lord Tresham!

[He throws off his disguises.

Tresh. Mertoun!

[After a pause.] Draw now!

Mer. Hear me

But speak first!

Tresh. Not one least word on your life!

Be sure that I will strangle in your throat

The least word that informs me how you live

And yet seem what you seem! No doubt 't was
you

Taught Mildred still to keep that face and sin.

We should join hands in frantic sympathy

If you once taught me the unteachable,

Explained how you can live so, and so lie.

With God's help I retain, despite my sense,

The old belief — a life like yours is still

Impossible. Now draw!

Mer. Not for my sake,

Do I entreat a hearing — for your sake,
And most, for her sake!

Tresh. Ha ha, what should I Know of your ways? A miscreant like yourself,

How must one rouse his ire? A blow? — that's pride

No doubt, to him! One spurns him, does one
not?

Or sets the foot upon his mouth, or spits
Into his face! Come! Which, or all of these?

Mer. 'Twixt him and me and Mildred.
Heaven be judge!

Can I avoid this? Have your will, my lord!
[He draws and, after a few passes, falls.

Tresh. You are not hurt?

Mer. You'll hear me now!

Tresh. But rise!

Mer. Ah, Tresham, say I not "you'll hear me now!"

And what procures a man the right to speak
In his defence before his fellow man,

But — I suppose — the thought that presently
He may have leave to speak before his God

His whole defence?

Tresh. Not hurt? It cannot be!

You made no effort to resist me. Where Did my sword reach you? Why not have returned

My thrusts? Hurt where?

Mer. My lord —

Tresh. How young he is!

Mer. Lord Tresham, I am very young, and
yet

I have entangled other lives with mine.

Do let me speak, and do believe my speech!

That when I die before you presently, —

Tresh. Can you stay here till I return with help?

Mer. Oh, stay by me! When I was less than boy

I did you grievous wrong and knew it not —

Upon my honor, knew it not! Once known,

I could not find what seemed a better way

To right you than I took: my life — you feel

How less than nothing were the giving you

The life you've taken! But I thought my way

The better — only for your sake and hers:

And as you have decided otherwise,

Would I had an infinity of lives

To offer you! Now say — instruct me — think!

Can you, from the brief minutes I have left,

Eke out my reparation? Oh think — think!

For I must wring a partial — dare I say,

Forgiveness from you, ere I die?

Tresh. I do

Forgive you.

Mer. Wait and ponder that great word!

Because, if you forgive me, I shall hope

To speak to you of — Mildred!

Tresh. Mertoun, haste

And anger have undone us. 'T is not you

Should tell me for a novelty you're young,

Thoughtless, unable to recall the past.

Be but your pardon ample as my own!

Mer. Ah, Tresham, that a sword-stroke and a drop

Of blood or two, should bring all this about!

Why, 't was my very fear of you, my love

Of you — (what passion like a boy's for one Like you?) — that ruined me! I dream'd of
you —

You, all accomplished, courted everywhere,
The scholar and the gentleman. I burned
To knit myself to you : but I was young,
And your surpassing reputation kept me
So far aloof! Oh, wherefore all that love?
With less of love, my glorious yesterday
Of praise and gentlest words and kindest looks,
Had taken place perchance six months ago.
Even now, how happy we had been! And yet
I know the thought of this escaped you,
Tresham!

Let me look up into your face; I feel
'Tis changed above me: yet my eyes are glazed.
Where? where?

[As he endeavors to raise himself his eye catches the lamp.

Ah, Mildred! What will Mildred do?
Tresham, her life is bound up in the life That's bleeding fast away! I'll live — must live,

There, if you'll only turn me I shall live
And save her! Tresham — oh, had you but heard!

Had you but heard! What right was yours to set

The thoughtless foot upon her life and mine,
And then say, as we perish, "Had I thought,
All had gone otherwise?" We've sinned and
die:

Never you sin, Lord Tresham! for you'll die,
And God will judge you.

Tresh. Yes, be satisfied!
That process is begun.

Mer. And she sits there Waiting for me! Now, say you this to her —
You, not another — say, I saw him die
As he breathed this, "I love her" — you don't
know
What those three small words mean! Say, loving her

Lowers me down the bloody slope to death
With memories . . . I speak to her, not you,
Who had no pity, will have no remorse,
Perchance intend her . . . Die along with me,
Dear Mildred! 't is so easy, and you'll 'scape
So much unkindness! Can I lie at rest,
With rude speech spoken to you, ruder deeds Done to you? — heartless men shall have my
heart.

And I tied down with grave-clothes and the worm,

Aware, perhaps, of every blow — oh God! —
Upon those lips — yet of no power to tear
The felon stripe by stripe! Die, Mildred!
Leave

Their honorable world to them! For God
We're good enough, though the world casts us
out.

[A whistle is heard.

Tresh. Ho, Gerard!
(Enter GERARD, AUSTIN and GUENDOLEN, with lights.)
No one speak! You see what's done.
I cannot bear another voice.

Mer. There's light —
Light all about me, and I move to it.
Tresham, did I not tell you — did you not

Just promise to deliver words of mine
To Mildred?

Tresh. I will bear those words to her.

Mer. Now?

Tresh. Now. Lift you the body, and leave
me

The head.

[As they have half raised MERTOUN, he turns suddenly.

Mer. I knew they turned me: turn me not from her!

There! stay you! there! [Dies

Guen. [After a pause.] Austin, remain you
here

With Thorold until Gerard comes with help:

Then lead him to his chamber. I must go
To Mildred.

Tresh. Guendolen, I hear each word
You utter. Did you hear him bid me give His message? Did you hear my promise? I,
And only I, see Mildred.

Guen. She will die.

Tresh. Oh no, she will not die! I dare not hope
She'll die. What ground have you to think she'll die?

Why, Austin's with you!

Aus. Had we but arrived
Before you fought!

Tresh. There was no fight at all.
He let me slaughter him — the boy! I'll trust
The body there to you and Gerard — thus!
Now bear him on before me.

Aus. Whither bear him?

Tresh. Oh, to my chamber! When we meet there next,
We shall be friends.

[They bear out the body of MERTOUN.

Will she die, Guendolen?

Guen. Where are you taking me?
Tresh. He fell just here.
Now answer me. Shall you in your whole life
— You who have naught to do with Mertoun's
fate,

Now you have seen his breast upon the turf,
Shall you e'er walk this way if you can help?
When you and Austin wander arm-in-arm
Through our ancestral grounds, will not a shade
Be ever on the meadow and the waste —
Another kind of shade than when the night
Shuts the woodside with all its whispers up?
But will you ever so forget his breast
As carelessly to cross this bloody turf
Under the black yew avenue? That's well!
You turn your head: and I then? —

Guen. What is done
Is done. My care is for the living. Thorold,
Bear up against this burden: more remains
To set the neck to!

Tresh. Dear and ancient trees
My fathers planted, and I loved so well!
What have I done that, like some fabled crime
Of yore, lets loose a Fury leading thus
Her miserable dance amidst you all?
Oh, never more for me shall winds intone
With all your tops a vast antiphony,
Demanding and responding in God's praise!
Hers ye are now, not mine! Farewell — fare-
well!

SCENE II. MILDRED'S Chamber. MILDRED alone.

Mil. He comes not! I have heard of those who seemed Resourceless in prosperity, — you thought

Sorrow might slay them when she listed; yet
Did they so gather up their diffused strength
At her first menace, that they bade her strike,
And stood and laughed her subtlest skill to scorn.

Oh, 't is not so with me! The first woe fell,
And the rest fall upon it, not on me:
Else should I bear that Henry comes not? — fails

Just this first night out of so many nights?
Loving is done with. Were he sitting now,
As so few hours since, on that seat, we'd love
No more — contrive no thousand happy ways
To hide love from the loveless, any more.
I think I might have urged some little point
In my defence, to Thorold; he was breathless
For the least hint of a defence: but no,
The first shame over, all that would might fall.
No Henry! Yet I merely sit and think
The morrow's deed o'er and o'er. I must have crept

Out of myself. A Mildred that has lost
Her lover — oh, I dare not look upon Such woe! I crouch away from it! 'T is she, Mildred, will break her heart, not I! The
world

Forsakes me: only Henry's left me — left?
When I have lost him, for he does not come,
And I sit stupidly . . . Oh Heaven, break up
This worse than anguish, this mad apathy,
By any means or any messenger!

Tresh. [Without.] Mildred!

Mil. Come in! Heaven hears me!

[Enter TRESHAM.] You? alone?

Oh, no more cursing!

Tresh. Mildred, I must sit.

There — you sit!

Mil. Say it, Thorold — do not look
The curse! deliver all you come to say!
What must become of me? Oh, speak that
thought

Which makes your brow and cheeks so pale!

Tresh. My thought?

Mil. All of it!

Tresh. How we waded — years ago —
After those water-lilies, till the plash,
I know not how, surprised us; and you dared
Neither advance nor turn back: so, we stood Laughing and crying until Gerard came —
Once safe upon the turf, the loudest too,
For once more reaching the relinquished prize!
How idle thoughts are, some men's, dying men's!

Mildred, —

Mil. You call me kinder by my name
Than even yesterday: what is in that?

Tresh. It weighs so much upon my mind
that I

This morning took an office not my own!
I might . . . of course, I must be glad or
grieved,

Content or not, at every little thing

That touches you. I may with a wrung heart

Even reprove you, Mildred; I did more:
Will you forgive me?

Mil. Thorold? do you mock?
Or no . . . and yet you bid me . . . say that
word!

Tresh. Forgive me, Mildred! — are you silent,
Sweet?

Mil. [Starting up.] Why does not Henry
Mertoun come to-night?

Are you, too, silent?

[Dashing his mantle aside, and pointing to his scabbard, which is empty.

Ah, this speaks for you!

You've murdered Henry Mertoun! Now proceed!

What is it I must pardon? This and all?

Well, I do pardon you — I think I do.

Thorold, how very wretched you must be!

Tresh. He bade me tell you . . .

Mil. What I do forbid

Your utterance of! So much that you may tell
And will not — how you murdered him . . .
but, no!

You'll tell me that he loved me, never more
Than bleeding out his life there: must I say
"Indeed," to that? Enough! I pardon you.

Tresh. You cannot, Mildred! for the harsh words, yes:

Of this last deed Another's judge: whose doom
I wait in doubt, despondency and fear.

Mil. Oh, true! There's naught for me to pardon! True!

You loose my soul of all its cares at once.

Death makes me sure of him forever! You

Tell me his last words? He shall tell me them,
And take my answer — not in words, but reading

Himself the heart I had to read him late,

Which death . . .

Tresh. Death? You are dying too? Well
said

Of Guendolen! I dared not hope you'd die:

But she was sure of it.

Mil.

Tell Guendolen

I loved her, and tell Austin . . .

Tresh.

Him you loved:

And me?

Mil. Ah, Thorold! Was't not rashly done
To quench that blood, on fire with youth and hope

And love of me — whom you loved too, and yet
Suffered to sit here waiting his approach
While you were slaying him? Oh, doubtlessly
You let him speak his poor confused boy's-
speech

— Do his poor utmost to disarm your wrath

And respite me! — you let him try to give

The story of our love and ignorance,

And the brief madness and the long despair —

You let him plead all this, because your code

Of honor bids you hear before you strike:

But at the end, as he looked up for life

Into your eyes — you struck him down!

Tresh.

No! No!

Had I but heard him — had I let him speak

Half the truth — less — had I looked long on
him

I had desisted! Why, as he lay there,

The moon on his flushed cheek, I gathered all
The story ere he told it : I saw through
The troubled surface of his crime and yours
A depth of purity immovable ;
Had I but glanced, where all seemed turbidest
Had gleamed some inlet to the calm beneath ;
I would not glance : my punishment 's at hand.
There, Mildred, is the truth ! and you — say
on —

You curse me ?

Mil. As I dare approach that Heaven
Which has not bade a living thing despair,
Which needs no code to keep its grace from stain,

But bids the vilest worm that turns on it
Desist and be forgiven, — I — forgive not,
But bless you, Thorold, from my soul of souls !

[Falls on his neck.]

There ! Do not think too much upon the past !
The cloud that 's broke was all the same a cloud
While it stood up between my friend and you ;
You hurt him 'neath its shadow : but is that
So past retrieve ? I have his heart, you know ;
I may dispose of it : I give it you !

It loves you as mine loves ! Confirm me,
Henry !

[Dies.]

Tresh. I wish thee joy, Beloved ! I am glad
In thy full gladness !

Guen. [Without.] Mildred ! Tresham !

[Entering with AUSTIN.] Thorold,
I could desist no longer. Ah, she swoons !

That 's well.

Tresh. Oh, better far than that !

Guen. She 's dead !

Let me unlock her arms !

Tresh. She threw them thus
About my neck, and blessed me, and then died :
You 'll let them stay now, Guendolen !

Aus. Leave her

And look to him ! What ails you, Thorold ?

Guen. White
As she, and whiter ! Austin ! quick — this side !

Aus. A froth is oozing through his clenched
teeth ;

Both lips, where they 're not bitten through,
are black :

Speak, dearest Thorold !

Tresh. Something does weigh down
My neck beside her weight : thanks : I should fall

But for you, Austin, I believe ! — there, there,
'T will pass away soon ! — ah, — I had forgotten :

I am dying.

Guen. Thorold — Thorold — why was this ?

Tresh. I said, just as I drank the poison off,

The earth would be no longer earth to me,

The life out of all life was gone from me.

There are blind ways provided, the foredone

Heart-weary player in this pageant-world

Drops out by, letting the main masque defile

By the conspicuous portal : I am through — Just through !

Guen. Don't leave him, Austin ! Death is close.

Tresh. Already Mildred's face is peacefuller.

I see you, Austin — feel you : here 's my hand,

Put yours in it — you, Guendolen, yours too !

You 're lord and lady now — you 're Treshams ;
name

And fame are yours : you hold our 'scutcheon
up.

Austin, no blot on it ! You see how blood
Must wash one blot away : the first blot came

And the first blood came. To the vain world's eye

All 's gules again : no care to the vain world,

From whence the red was drawn !

Aus. No blot shall come !

Tresh. I said that : yet it did come. Should it come.

Vengeance is God's, not man's. Remember me !
[Dies.]

Guen. [Letting fall the pulseless arm.] Ah,
Thorold, we can but — remember you !

COLOMBE'S BIRTHDAY

A PLAY

" Ivy and violet, what do ye here
With blossom and shoot in the warm spring-weather, Hiding the arms of Monchenci and Vere ? "

HANMER.

NO ONE LOVES AND HONORS BARRY CORNWALL MORE THAN DOES
ROBERT BROWNING ;
WHO, HAVING NOTHING BETTER THAN THIS PLAY
TO GIVE HIM IN PROOF OF IT, MUST SAY SO.

BROWNING was stimulated by the enthusiastic reception of A Blot in the 'Scutcheon to write another play for the stage, but for some reason it was not performed for ten years or so. It was printed in 1844 as No. VI. of Belis and Pomegranates. Mr. Gosse in his Personalia

says : —

" I have before me at the present moment a copy of the first edition, marked for acting by the author, who has written: 'I made the alterations in this copy to suit some—I forget what—projected stage representation; not that of Miss Faucit, which was carried into effect long afterward.' The stage directions are numerous and minute, showing the science which the dramatist had gained since he first essayed to put his creations on the boards.

PERSONS

COLOMBE OF RAVESTEIN, Duchess of Juliers and Cleves.
SABYNE, ADOLF, her Attendants.
GUIBERT, GAUCELME, MAUFROY, CLUGNET, Courtiers.
VALENCE, Advocate of Cleves.
PRINCE BERTHOLD, Claimant of the Duchy.
MELCHIOR, his Confidant.

PLACE, The Palace at Juliers.

TIME, 16—.

ACT I

Morning. SCENE. A corridor leading to the Audience-chamber.

GAUCELME, CLUGNET, MAUFROY and other Courtiers, round GUIBERT who is silently reading a paper: as he drops it at the end—

Guibert. That this should be her birthday;
and the day

We all invested her, twelve months ago,
As the late Duke's true heiress and our liege;
And that this also must become the day . . .
Oh, miserable lady!

1st Courtier. Ay, indeed?

2d Court. Well, Guibert?

3d Court. But your news, my friend, your news!

The sooner, friend, one learns Prince Berthold's pleasure,

The better for us all: how writes the Prince?
Give me! I'll read it for the common good.

Gui. In time, sir,—but till time comes, pardon me!
Our old Duke just disclosed his child's retreat,

Declared her true succession to his rule,
And died: this birthday was the day, last year,
We convoyed her from Castle Ravestein—
That sleeps out trustfully its extreme age
On the Meuse's quiet bank, where she lived queen

Over the water-buds,—to Juliers' court
With joy and bustle. Here again we stand;
Sir Gaucelme's buckle's constant to his cap:
To-day's much such another sunny day!

Gaucelme. Come, Guibert, this outgrows a jest, I think!

You're hardly such a novice as to need
The lesson, you pretend.

Gui. What lesson, sir?

That everybody, if he'd thrive at court,
Should, first and last of all, look to himself?

Why, no: and therefore with your good example,

Some of the suggestions are characteristic enough. For instance: 'Unless a very good Valence is found, this extremely fine speech, [in Act IV. where Valence describes Berthold to Colombe], perhaps the jewel of the play, is to be left out.' In the present editions the verses run otherwise."

The play has recently [1895] been rearranged in three acts and brought again on the stage.

(—Ho, Master Adolf!)—to myself I'll look.

(Enter ADOLF.)

Gui. The Prince's letter; why, of all men else,

Comes it to me?

Adolf. By virtue of your place,
Sir Guibert! 'T was the Prince's express charge,

His envoy told us, that the missive there
Should only reach our lady by the hand
Of whosoever held your place.

Gui. Enough!

[ADOLF retires.

Then, gentles, who 'll accept a certain poor
Indifferently honorable place,

My friends, I make no doubt, have gnashed their teeth

At leisure minutes these half-dozen years,

To find me never in the mood to quit?
Who asks may have it, with my blessing, and—
This to present our lady. Who 'll accept?

You,—you,—you? There it lies, and may,
for me!

Maufroy. [A youth, picking up the paper, reads aloud.] "Prince Berthold, proved by titles following

Undoubted Lord of Juliers, comes this day
To claim his own, with license from the Pope,
The Emperor, the Kings of Spain and France" . . .

Gau. Sufficient "titles following," I judge!
Don't read another! Well,—"to claim his
own?"

Mau. —And take possession of the Duchy
held
Since twelve months, to the true heir's prejudice,

By" . . . Colombe, Juliers' mistress, so she thinks,

And Ravestein's mere lady, as we find!
Who wants the place and paper? Guibert's
right.

I hope to climb a little in the world,—
I'd push my fortunes,—but, no more than
he,

Could tell her on this happy day of days,
That, save the nosegay in her hand, perhaps,
There's nothing left to call her own. Sir
Clugnet,

You famish for promotion; what say you?

Clugnet. [An old man.] To give this letter
were a sort, I take it,

Of service: services ask recompense:

What kind of corner may be Ravestein?

Gui. The castle? Oh, you'd share her fortunes? Good!

Three walls stand upright, full as good as four,
With no such bad remainder of a roof.

Clug. Oh, — but the town?

Gai. Five houses, fifteen huts;
A church whereto was once a spire, 't is judged;
And half a dyke, except in time of thaw.

Clug. Still there 's some revenue?

Gai. Else Heaven forfend!

You hang a beacon out, should fogs increase;
So, when the Autumn floats of pine-wood steer
Safe 'mid the white confusion, thanks to you,
Their grateful raftsmen fling a guilder in;
— That 's if he mean to pass your way next
time.

Clug. If not?

Gai. Hang guilders, then! he blesses you.

Clug. What man do you suppose me? Keep your paper!

And, let me say, it shows no handsome spirit
To dally with misfortune: keep your place!

Gau. Some one must tell her.

Gai. Some one may: you may!

Gau. Sir Guibert, 't is no trifle turns me sick
Of court-hypocrisy at years like mine,
But this goes near it. Where 's there news at
all?

Who 'll have the face, for instance, to affirm
He never heard, e'en while we crowned the girl,

That Juliers' tenure was by Salic law;
That one, confessed her father's cousin's child,
And, she away, indisputable heir,
Against our choice protesting and the Duke's, Claimed Juliers? — nor, as he preferred his
claim,

That first this, then another potentate,
Inclined to its allowance? — I or you,
Or any one except the lady's self?
Oh, it had been the direst cruelty
To break the business to her! Things might
change:

At all events, we'd see next masque at end,
Next mummery over first: and so the edge
Was taken off sharp tidings as they came,
Till here 's the Prince upon us, and there 's
she

— Wreathing her hair, a song between her lips,
With just the faintest notion possible
That some such claimant earns a livelihood
About the world, by feigning grievances —
Few pay the story of, but grudge its price,
And fewer listen to, a second time.

Your method proves a failure; now try mine!
And, since this must be carried . . .

Gai. [Snatching the paper from him.] By your leave!

Your zeal transports you! 'T will not serve the Prince

So much as you expect, this course you 'd take.
If she leaves quietly her palace, — well;
But if she died upon its threshold, — no:
He'd have the trouble of removing her.
Come, gentles, we're all — what the devil
knows!

You, Gancelme, won't lose character, beside —
You broke your father's heart superiorly
To gather his succession — never blush!
You're from my province, and, be comforted,

They tell of it with wonder to this day.

You can afford to let your talent sleep.

We'll take the very worst supposed, as true:
There, the old Duke knew, when he hid his
child

Among the river-flowers at Ravestein,
With whom the right lay! Call the Prince our Duke!

There, she 's no Duchess, she 's no anything
More than a young maid with the bluest eyes:
And now, sirs, we'll not break this young maid's heart

Coolly as Gancelme could and would! No
haste!

His talent 's full-blown, ours but in the bud:

We'll not advance to his perfection yet —

Will we, Sir Maufroy? See, I've retired Maufroy

Forever as a courtier!

Gau. Here 's a coil!

And, count us, will you? Count its residue,
This boasted convoy, this day last year's crowd!
A birthday, too, a gratulation day!
I'm dumb: bid that keep silence!

Mau. and others. Eh, Sir Guibert?
He's right: that does say something: that 's bare truth.

Ten — twelve, I make: a perilous dropping off!

Gai. Pooh — is it audience hour? The vestibule

Swarms too, I wager, with the common sort

That want our privilege of entry here.

Gau. Adolf! [Re-enter ADOLF.] Who 's outside?

Gai. Oh, your looks suffice!

Nobody waiting?

Mau. [Looking through the door-folds.] Scarce
our number!

Gai. 'Sdeath!

Nothing to beg for, to complain about?

It can't be! All news spreads, but not so fast
As thus to frighten all the world!

Gau. The world
Lives out of doors, sir — not with you and me
By presence-chamber porches, state-room stairs,
Wherever warmth 's perpetual: outside 's free
To every wind from every compass-point
And who may get nipped needs be weatherwise.

The Prince comes and the lady's People go;
The snow-geese settles down, the swallows flee —

Why should they wait for winter-time? 'T is instinct:

Don't you feel somewhat chilly?

Gai. That 's their craft?
And last year's crowders-round and criers-forth
That strewed the garlands, overarched the roads,

Lighted the bonfires, sang the loyal songs!
Well 't is my comfort, you could never call me
The People's Friend! The People keep their
word —

I keep my place: don't doubt I'll entertain
The People when the Prince comes, and the People

Are talked of! Then, their speeches — no one
tongue

Found respite, not a pen had holiday
— For they wrote, too, as well as spoke, these knaves!

Now see : we tax and tithe them, pill and poll,
They wince and fret enough, but pay they must
— We manage that, — so, pay with a good grace
They might as well, it costs so little more.
But when we've done with taxes, meet folk next

Outside the toll-booth and the rating-place,
In public — there they have us if they will,
We're at their mercy after that, you see!
For one tax not ten devils could extort —
Over and above necessity, a grace;
This prompt disbosoming of love, to wit —
Their vine-leaf wrappage of our tribute penny,
And crowning attestation, all works well.
Yet this precisely do they thrust on us!
These cappings quick, these crook-and-cringings
low,

Hand to the heart, and forehead to the knee,
With grin that shuts the eyes and opes the
mouth —

So tender they their love; and, tender made,
Go home to curse us, the first do it we ask.
As if their souls were any longer theirs!
As if they had not given ample warrant
To who should clap a collar on their neck,
Rings in their nose, a goad to either flank,
And take them for the brute they boast themselves!

Stay — there's a bustle at the outer door —
And somebody entreating . . . that's my name!
Adolf, — I heard my name!

Adolf. 'T was probably
The suitor.

Gui. Oh, there is one?

Adolf. With a suit

He'd fain enforce in person.

Gui. The good heart
— And the great fool! Just ope the mid-door's fold!

Is that a lappet of his cloak, I see?

Adolf. If it bear plenteous sign of travel
. . . ay,

The very cloak my comrades tore!

Gui. Why tore?

Adolf. He seeks the Duchess' presence in that trim:

Since daybreak, was he posted hereabouts
Lest he should miss the moment.

Gui. Where's he now?

Adolf. Gone for a minute possibly, not more:
They have ado enough to thrust him back.

Gui. Ay — but my name, I caught?

Adolf. Oh, sir — he said
— What was it? — You had known him formerly,

And, he believed, would help him did you
guess

He waited now; you promised him as much:
The old plea! 'Faith, he's back, — renews the charge!

[Speaking at the door.] So long as the man
parleys, peace outside —

Nor be too ready with your halberts, there!

Gau. My horse bespattered, as he blocked the path

A thin sour man, not unlike somebody.

Adolf. He holds a paper in his breast, whereon

He glances when his cheeks flush and his brow
At each repulse —

Gau. I noticed he'd a brow.

Adolf. So glancing, he grows calmer, leans awhile

Over the balustrade, adjusts his dress,
And presently turns round, quiet again,
With some new pretext for admittance. —
Back!

[To GUIBERT.] — Sir, he has seen you! Now cross halberts! Ha —

Pascal is prostrate — there lies Fabian too!

No passage! Whither would the madman press?

Close the doors quick on me!

Gui. Too late! He's here.

(Enter, hastily and with discomposed dress, VALENCE.)

Valence. Sir Guibert, will you help me? —
Me, that come

Charged by your townsmen, all who starve at Cleves,

To represent their heights and depths of woe
Before our Duchess and obtain relief!

Such errands barricade such doors, it seems:

But not a common hindrance drives me back

On all the sad yet hopeful faces, lit

With hope for the first time, which sent me
forth.

Cleves, speak for me! Cleves' men and women, speak!

Who followed me — your strongest — many a mile

That I might go the fresher from their ranks,

— Who sit — your weakest — by the city gates,

To take me fuller of what news I bring

As I return — for I must needs return!

— Can I? 'T were hard, no listener for their wrongs,

To turn them back upon the old despair —

Harder, Sir Guibert, than imploring thus —

So, I do — any way you please — implore!

If you . . . but how should you remember
Cleves?

Yet they of Cleves remember you so well!

Ay, comment on each trait of you they keep,

Your words and deeds caught up at second
hand, —

Proud, I believe, at bottom of their hearts,

O' the very levity and recklessness

Which only prove that you forget their wrongs,

Cleves, the grand town, whose men and women starve,

Is Cleves forgotten? Then, remember me!

You promised me that you would help me once

For other purpose: will you keep your word?

Gui. And who may you be, friend?

Val. Valence of Cleves.

Gui. Valence of . . . not the advocate of Cleves,

I owed my whole estate to, three years back?

Ay, well may you keep silence! Why, my lords,

You've heard, I'm sure, how, Pentecost three
years,

I was so nearly ousted of my land

By some knave's-pretext — (eh? when you refused me
Your ugly daughter, Clugnet!) — and you've heard

How I recovered it by miracle
— (When I refused her!) Here's the very friend,
— Valence of Cleves, all parties have to thank!

Nay, Valence, this procedure's vile in you!
I'm no more grateful than a courtier should,
But politic am I — I bear a brain,
Can cast about a little, might require
Your services a second time. I tried To tempt you with advancement here to court
— "No!" — well, for curiosity at least
To view our life here — "No!" — our Duchess,
then, —

A pretty woman's worth some pains to see,
Nor is she spoiled, I take it, if a crown
Complete the forehead pale and tresses
pure . . .

Val. Our city trusted me its miseries,
And I am come.

Gai. So much for taste! But "come," —
So may you be, for anything I know,
To beg the Pope's cross, or Sir Clugnet's daughter.

And with an equal chance you get all three!
If it was ever worth your while to come,
Was not the proper way worth finding too?

Val. Straight to the palace-portal, sir, I
came —

Gai. — And said? —

Val. — That I had brought the miseries
Of a whole city to relieve.

Gai. — Which saying
Won your admittance? You saw me, indeed,
And here, no doubt, you stand: as certainly,
My intervention, I shall not dispute,
Procures you audience; which, if I procure, —
That paper's closely written — by Saint Paul,
Here flock the Wrongs, follow the Remedies,
Chapter and verse, One, Two, A, B and C!
Perhaps you'd enter, make a reverence,
And launch these "miseries" from first to
last?

Val. How should they let me pause or turn aside?

Gai. [To VALENCE.] My worthy sir, one question! You've come straight
From Cleves, you tell us: heard you any talk
At Cleves about our lady?

Val. Much.

Gai. And what?
Val. Her wish was to redress all wrongs she knew.

Gai. That, you believed?

Val. You see me, sir!

Gai. — Nor stopped
Upon the road from Cleves to Juliers here,
For any — rumors you might find afloat?

Val. I had my townsmen's wrongs to busy
me,

Gai. This is the lady's birthday, do you
know?

— Her day of pleasure?

Val. — That the great, I know,

For pleasure born, should still be on the watch
To exclude pleasure when a duty offers:

Even as, for duty born, the lowly too

May ever snatch a pleasure if in reach:

Both will have plenty of their birthright, sir!

Gai. [Aside to GUIBERT.] Sir Guibert, here's your man! No scruples now —

You'll never find his like! Time presses hard,
I've seen your drift and Adolf's too, this while,

But you can't keep the hour of audience back
Much longer, and at noon the Prince arrives.

[Pointing to VALENCE.] Entrust him with it — fool no chance away!

Gai. Him?

Gai. — With the missive! What's the man to her?

Gai. No bad thought! — Yet, 'tis yours, who ever played

The tempting serpent: else 't were no bad
thought!

I should — and do — mistrust it for your sake,

Or else . . .

(Enter an Official who communicates with ADOLF.)

Adolf. The Duchess will receive the court!

Gai. Give us a moment, Adolf! Valence,
friend,

I'll help you. We of the service, you're to mark,

Have special entry, while the herd . . . the folk
Outside, get access through our help alone;

— Well, it is so, was so, and I suppose

So ever will be: your natural lot is, therefore,

To wait your turn and opportunity,

And probably miss both. Now, I engage

To set you, here and in a minute's space,

Before the lady, with full leave to plead

Chapter and verse, and A, and B, and C,

To heart's content.

Val. I grieve that I must ask, —

This being, yourself admit, the custom here, —

To what the price of such a favor mounts?

Gai. Just so! You're not without a courtier's tact.

Little at court, as your quick instinct prompts,

Do such as we without a recompense.

Val. Yours is?

Gai. A trifle: here's a document

'T is some one's duty to present her Grace —

I say, not mine — these say, not theirs — such points

Have weight at court. Will you relieve us all

And take it? Just say, "I am bidden lay

This paper at the Duchess' feet!"

Val. No more?

I thank you, sir!

Adolf. Her Grace receives the court!

Gai. [Aside.] Now, sursum corda, quoth
the mass-priest! Do —

Whoever's my kind saint, do let alone

These pushings to and fro, and pullings back;

Peaceably let me hang o' the devil's arm

The downward path, if you can't pluck me off

Completely! Let me live quite his, or yours!

[The Courtiers begin to range themselves, and move toward the door.

After me, Valence! So, our famous Cleves

Lacks bread? Yet don't we gallants buy their lace?

And dear enough — it beggars me, I know,
To keep my very gloves fringed properly.
This, Valence, is our Great State Hall you cross ;
You gray urn's veritable marcasite,
The Pope's gift : and those salvers testify
The Emperor. Presently you 'll set your foot
... But you don't speak, friend Valence !

Val. I shall speak.
Gau. [Aside to GUIBERT.] Guibert — it were no ungraceful thing
If you and I, at first, seemed horror-struck With the bad news. Look here, what you shall
do !

Suppose you, first, clap hand to sword and cry
"Yield strangers our allegiance ? First I 'll
perish

Beside your Grace !" — and so give me the cue
To ...

Gul. — Clap your hand to note-book and jot
down

That to regale the Prince with ? I conceive.
[To VALENCE.] Do, Valence, speak, or I shall half suspect

You 're plotting to supplant us, me the first,
I 'the lady's favor ! Is 't the grand harangue
You mean to make, that thus engrosses you ?
— Which of her virtues you 'll apostrophize ?
Or is 't the fashion you aspire to start,
Of that close-curl'd, not unbecoming hair ?
Or what else ponder you ?

Val. My townsmen's wrongs.

ACT II

Noon. SCENE. The Presence-chamber.

The DUCHESS and SABYNE.

Duchess. Announce that I am ready for the court !

Sabyné. 'T is scarcely audience-hour, I think ;
your Grace

May best consult your own relief, no doubt,
And shun the crowd : but few can have arrived.

Duch. Let those not yet arrived, then, keep away !

'T was me, this day last year at Ravestein,
You hurried. It has been full time, beside,
This half-hour. Do you hesitate ?

Sab. Forgive me !

Duch. Stay, Sabyné ; let me hasten to make
sure

Of one true thanker : here with you begins
My audience, claim you first its privilege !

It is my birth's event they celebrate :
You need not wish me more such happy days,

But — ask some favor ! Have you none to ask ?
Has Adolf none, then ? this was far from least

Of much I waited for impatiently,
Assure yourself ! It seemed so natural

Your gift, beside this bunch of river-bells,
Should be the power and leave of doing good

To you, and greater pleasure to myself.
You ask my leave to-day to marry Adolf ?

The rest is my concern.

Sab. Your Grace is ever
Our lady of dear Ravestein, — but, for Adolf ...

Duch. "But" ? You have not, sure, changed in your regard
And purpose towards him ?

Sab. We change ?

Duch. Well then ? Well ?

Sab. How could we two be happy, and, most like,

Leave Juliers, when — when ... but 't is audience-time !

Duch. "When, if you left me, I were left indeed !" —

Would you subjoin that ? Bid the court approach !

— Why should we play thus with each other,
Sabyne ?

Do I not know, if courtiers prove remiss,
If friends detain me, and get blame for it,
There is a cause ? Of last year's fervid throng
Scarce one half comes now.

Sab. [Aside.] One half ? No, alas !

Duch. So can the mere suspicion of a cloud
Over my fortunes, strike each loyal heart.

They 've heard of this Prince Berthold ; and,
forsooth,

Some foolish arrogant pretence he makes,
May grow more foolish and more arrogant,

They please to apprehend ! I thank their love.
Admit them !

Sab. [Aside.] How much has she really learned ?

Duch. Surely, whoever's absent, Tristan waits ?

— Or at least Romuald, whom my father raised
From nothing — come, he's faithful to me,
come !

(Sabyne, I should but be the prouder — yes,
The fitter to comport myself aright)

Not Romuald ? Xavier — what said he to that ?
For Xavier hates a parasite, I know !

[SABYNE goes out.]

Duch. Well, sunshine's everywhere, and summer too.

Next year 't is the old place again, perhaps —
The water-breeze again, the birds again.

— It cannot be ! It is too late to be !
What part had I, or choice in all of it ?

Hither they brought me ; I had not to think
Nor care, concern myself with doing good

Or ill, my task was just — to live, — to live,
And, answering ends there was no need explain,

To render Juliers happy — so they said.
All could not have been falsehood : some was
love,

And wonder and obedience. I did all
They looked for : why then cease to do it now ?

Yet this is to be calmly set aside,
And — ere next birthday's dawn, for aught I
know,

Things change, a claimant may arrive, and
I ...

It cannot nor it shall not be ! His right ?
Well then, he has the right, and I have not,

— But who bade all of you surround my life
And close its growth up with your ducal crown

Which, plucked off rudely, leaves me perishing ?
I could have been like one of you, — loved, hoped,

Feared, lived and died like one of you — but
you

Would take that life away and give me this,
And I will keep this! I will face you! Come!
(Enter the Courtiers and VALENCE.)

The Courtiers. Many such happy mornings to your Grace!

Duch. [Aside, as they pay their devoir.] The same words, the same faces, — the same
love!

I have been overfearful. These are few;
But these, at least, stand firmly: these are
mine.

As many come as may; and if no more,
'Tis that these few suffice — they do suffice!
What succor may not next year bring me?

Plainly,

I feared too soon. [To the Courtiers.] I thank you, sirs: all thanks!

Val. [Aside, as the DUCHESS passes from one group to another, conversing.] 'Tis she — the vision this day last year brought,

When, for a golden moment at our Cleves,
She tarried in her progress hither. Cleves Chose me to speak its welcome, and I spoke
— Not that she could have noted the recluse
— Ungainly, old before his time — who gazed.
Well, Heaven's gifts are not wasted, and that gaze

Kept, and shall keep me to the end, her own!
She was above it — but so would not sink
My gaze to earth! The People caught it, hers —
Thenceforward, mine; but thus entirely mine,
Who shall affirm, had she not raised my soul
Ere she retired and left me — them? She turns —

There's all her wondrous face at once! The ground

Reels and . . .
[Suddenly occupying himself with his paper.]

These wrongs of theirs I have to plead!

Duch. [To the Courtiers.] Nay, compliment enough! and kindness' self

Should pause before it wish me more such years.
'Twas fortunate that thus, ere youth escaped,
I tasted life's pure pleasure — one such, pure,
Is worth a thousand, mixed — and youth's for
pleasure:

Mine is received; let my age pay for it.

Gau. So, pay, and pleasure paid for, thinks
your Grace,

Should never go together?

Gui. How, Sir Gaucelme?

Hurry one's feast down unenjoyingly

At the snatched breathing-intervals of work?

As good you saved it till the dull day's-end

When, stiff and sleepy, appetite is gone.

Eat first, then work upon the strength of food!

Duch. True: you enable me to risk my future,

By giving me a past beyond recall.

I lived, a girl, one happy leisure year:

Let me endeavor to be the Duchess now!

And so, — what news, Sir Guibert, spoke you of?

[As they advance a little, and GUIBERT speaks —

— That gentleman?

Val. [Aside.] I feel her eyes on me.

Gui. [TO VALENCE.] The Duchess, sir, inclines to hear your suit.

Advance! He is from Cleves.

Val. [Coming forward.] [Aside.] Their wrongs — their wrongs!

Duch. And you, sir, are from Cleves? How fresh in mind,

The hour or two I passed at queenly Cleves!

She entertained me bravely, but the best

Of her good pageant seemed its standers-by

With insuppressive joy on every face!

What says my ancient famous happy Cleves?

Val. Take the truth, lady — you are made for truth!

So think my friends: nor do they less deserve

The having you to take it, you shall think,

When you know all — nay, when you only know

How, on that day you recollect at Cleves,

When the poor acquiescing multitude

Who thrust themselves with all their woes apart

Into unnoticed corners, that the few,

Their means sufficed to muster trappings for,

Might fill the foreground, occupy your sight

With joyous faces fit to bear away

And boast of as a sample of all Cleves

— How, when to daylight these crept out once
more,

Clutching, unconscious, each his empty rags

Whence the scant coin, which had not half bought bread,

That morn he shook forth, counted piece by piece,

And, well-advisedly, on perfumes spent them

To burn, or flowers to strew, before your path

— How, when the golden flood of music and bliss

Ebb'd, as their moon retreated, and again

Left the sharp black-point rocks of misery bare

— Then I, their friend, had only to suggest

"Saw she the horror as she saw the pomp!"

And as one man they cried, "He speaks the
truth:

Show her the horror! Take from our own mouths

Our wrongs and show them, she will see them
too!"

This they cried, lady! I have brought the wrongs.

Duch. Wrongs? Cleves has wrongs — apparent now and thus?

I thank you! In that paper? Give it me!

Val. (There, Cleves!) In this! (What did
I promise, Cleves?)

Our weavers, clothiers, spinners are reduced

Since . . . Oh, I crave your pardon! I forget

I buy the privilege of this approach,

And promptly would discharge my debt. I lay

This paper humbly at the Duchess' feet.

[Presenting GUIBERT's paper.

Gui. Stay! for the present . . .

Duch. Stay, sir? I take aught

That teaches me their wrongs with greater pride

Than this your ducal circlet. Thank you, sir!

[The DUCHESS reads hastily; then, turning to the Courtiers —

What have I done to you? Your deed or mine

Was it, this crowning me? I gave myself

No more a title to your homage, no,

Than church-flowers, born this season, wrote

the words

In the saint's-book that sanctified them first.

For such a flower, you plucked me ; well, you erred —
Well, 'twas a weed ; remove the eye-sore
quick !

But should you not remember it has lain
Steeped in the candles' glory, palely shrined,
Nearer God's Mother than most earthly things ?
— That if 't be faded 'tis with prayer's sole
breath —

That the one day it boasted was God's day ?
Still, I do thank you ! Had you used respect,
Here might I dwindle to my last white leaf,
Here lose life's latest freshness, which even yet
May yield some wandering insect rest and food :
So, fling me forth, and — all is best for all !

[After a pause.] Prince Berthold, who art Juliers' Duke it seems —
The King's choice, and the Emperor's, and the Pope's —

Be mine, too ! Take this People ! Tell not me
Of rescripts, precedents, authorities,
— But take them, from a heart that yearns to give !

Find out their love, — I could not ; find their
fear, —

I would not ; find their like, — I never shall,
Among the flowers ! [Taking off her coronet.

Colombe of Ravestein
Thanks God she is no longer Duchess here !

Val. [Advancing to GUIBERT.] Sir Guibert, knight, they call you — this of mine
Is the first step I ever set at court.

You dared make me your instrument, I find ;
For that, so sure as you and I are men,
We reckon to the utmost presently :

But as you are a courtier and I none,
Your knowledge may instruct me. I, already,
Have too far outraged, by my ignorance
Of courtier-ways, this lady, to proceed
A second step and risk addressing her :

— I am degraded — you let me address !
Out of her presence, all is plain enough
What I shall do — but in her presence, too,
Surely there 's something proper to be done.

[To the others.] You, gentles, tell me if I guess
aright —

May I not strike this man to earth ?
The Courtiers. [As GUIBERT springs forward, withholding him.] Let go !

— The clothiers' spokesman, Guibert ? Grace a churl ?

Duch. [To VALENCE.] Oh, be acquainted with your party, sir !

He 's of the old-st lineage Juliers boasts ;
A lion crests him for a cognizance ;
"Scorning to waver" — that 's his 'scutcheon's
word ;

His office with the new Duke — probably
The same in honor as with me ; or more,
By so much as this gallant turn deserves.
He 's now, I dare say, of a thousand times
The rank and influence that remain with her
Whose part you take ! So, lest for taking it
You suffer . . .

Val. I may strike him then to earth ?
Gui. [Falling on his knee.] Great and dear lady, pardon me ! Hear once !

Believe me and be merciful — be just !

I could not bring myself to give that paper
Without a keener pang than I dared meet
— And so felt Clugnet here, and Manfroy here
— No one dared meet it. Protestation's cheap, —
But, if to die for you did any good,
[To GAUCELME.] Would not I die, sir ? Say your worst of me !

But it does no good, that 's the mournful truth.
And since the hint of a resistance, even,
Would just precipitate, on you the first,
A speedier ruin — I shall not deny,
Saying myself indubitable pain,

I thought to give you pleasure (who might say ?)
By showing that your only subject found
To carry the sad notice was the man

Precisely ignorant of its contents ;
A nameless, mere provincial advocate ;

One whom 't was like you never saw before,
Never would see again. All has gone wrong :
But I meant right, God knows, and you, I trust !

Duch. A nameless advocate, this gentleman ?
— (I pardon you, Sir Guibert !)

Gui. [Rising, to VALENCE.] Sir, and you ?

Val. — Rejoice that you are lightened of a load.

Now, you have only me to reckon with.

Duch. One I have never seen, much less obliged ?

Val. Dare I speak, lady ?

Duch. Dare you ! Heard you not

I rule no longer ?

Val. Lady, if your rule

Were based alone on such a ground as these

Could furnish you, — abjure it ! They have hidden

A source of true dominion from your sight.

Duch. You hear them — no such source is left . . .

Val. Hear Cleves !

Whose haggard craftsmen rose to starve this
day,

Starve now, and will lie down at night to starve,

Sure of a like to-morrow — but as sure

Of a most unlike morrow-after-that,

Since end things must, end howsoever things

may.

What curbs the brute-force instinct in its hour ?

What makes — instead of rising, all as sure,

And teaching fingers, so expert to wield

Their tool, the broadsword's play or carbine's trick,

— What makes that there 's an easier help, they

think,

For you, whose name so few of them can spell,

Whose face scarce one in every hundred saw, —

You simply have to understand their wrongs,

And wrongs will vanish — so, still trades are plied,

And swords lie rusting, and myself stand here ?

There is a vision in the heart of each

Of justice, mercy, wisdom, tenderness

To wrong and pain, and knowledge of its cure :

And these embodied in a woman's form

That best transmits them, pure as first received,

From God above her, to mankind below.

Will you derive your rule from such a ground,

Or rather hold it by the suffrage, say,

Of this man — this — and this ?

Duch. [After a pause.] You come from Cleves : How many are at Cleves of such a mind ?

Val. [From his paper.] "We, all the manufacturers of Cleves —"

Duch. Or stay, sir — lest I seem too covetous —

Are you my subject ? such as you describe, Am I to you, though to no other man ?

Val. [From his paper.] — "Valence, ordained your Advocate at Cleves" —

Duch. [Replacing the coronet.] Then I remain Cleves' Duchess ! Take you note, While Cleves but yields one subject of this stamp,

I stand her lady till she waves me off ! For her sake, all the Prince claims I withhold : Laugh at each menace ; and, his power defying, Return his missive with its due contempt !

[Casting it away.]

Gui. [Picking it up.] — Which to the Prince I will deliver, lady, (Note it down, Gaucehne) — with your message too !

Duch. I think the office is a subject's, sir ! — Either . . . how style you him ? — my special guarder

The Marshal's — for who knows but violence May follow the delivery ? — Or, perhaps, My Chancellor's — for law may be to urge On its receipt ! — Or, even my Chamberlain's — For I may violate established form !

[To VALENCE.] Sir, — for the half-hour till this service ends,

Will you become all these to me ?

Val. [Falling on his knee.] My liege !

Duch. Give me !

[The Courtiers present their badges of office.]

[Putting them by.] Whatever was their virtue once,

They need new consecration. [Raising VALENCE.] Are you mine ?

I will be Duchess yet ! [She retires.]

The Courtiers. Our Duchess yet !

A glorious lady ! Worthy love and dread !

I'll stand by her, — and I, whate'er betide !

Gui. [To VALENCE.] Well done, well done, sir ! I care not who knows,

You have done nobly and I envy you —

Though I am but unfairly used, I think :

For when one gets a place like this I hold,

One gets too the remark that its mere wages,

The pay and the preferment, make our prize.

Talk about zeal and faith apart from these,

We're laughed at — much would zeal and faith subsist

Without these also ! Yet, let these be stopped,

Our wages discontinue, — then, indeed,

Our zeal and faith, (we hear on every side,)

Are not released — having been pledged away

I wonder, for what zeal and faith in turn ?

Hard money purchased me my place ! No, no —

I'm right, sir — but your wrong is better still,

If I had time and skill to argue it.

Therefore, I say, I'll serve you, how you please —

If you like, — fight you, as you seem to wish — (The kinder of me that, in sober truth, I never dreamed I did you any harm) . . .

Gau. — Or, kinder still, you'll introduce, no doubt,

His merits to the Prince who's just at hand, And let no hint drop he's made Chancellor And Chamberlain and Heaven knows what beside !

Clug. [To VALENCE.] You stare, young sir, and threaten ! Let me say,

That at your age, when first I came to court, I was not much above a gentleman ;

While now . . .

Val. — You are Head-Lackey ? With your office

I have not yet been graced, sir !

Other Courtiers. [To Clugnet.] Let him talk !

Fidelity, disinterestedness,

Excuse so much ! Men claim my worship ever

Who stanchly and steadfastly . . .

(Enter ADOLF.)

The Prince arrives.

Courtiers. Ha ? How ?

Adolf. He leaves his guard a stage behind At Aix, and enters almost by himself.

1st Court. The Prince ! This foolish business puts all out.

2d Court. Let Gaucehne speak first !

3d Court. Better I began

About the state of Juliers : should one say

All's prosperous and inviting him ?

4th Court. — Or rather,

All's prostrate and imploring him ?

5th Court. That's best.

Where's the Cleves' paper, by the way ?

4th Court. [To VALENCE.] Sir — sir —

If you'll but lend that paper — trust it me,

I'll warrant . . .

5th Court. Softly, sir — the Marshal's duty !

Clug. Has not the Chamberlain a hearing first

By virtue of his patent ?

Gau. Patents ? — Duties ?

All that, my masters, must begin again !

One word composes the whole controversy :

We're simply now — the Prince's !

The Others. Ay — the Prince's !

(Enter SABYNE.)

Sab. Adolf ! Bid . . . Oh, no time for ceremony !

Where's whom our lady calls her only subject ?

She needs him. Who is here the Duchess's ?

Val. [Starting from his reverie.] Most gratefully I follow to her feet.

ACT III

Afternoon. SCENE. The Vestibule.

Enter PRINCE BERTHOLD and MELCHIOR.

Berthold. A thriving little burgh this Juliers looks.

[Half-apart.] Keep Juliers, and as good you kept Cologne :

Better try Aix, though ! —

Melchior. Please 't your Highness speak ?

Berth. [As before.] Aix, Cologne, Frankfort, — Milan; — Rome! —

Mel. The Grave.

More weary seems your Highness, I remark,
Than sundry conquerors whose path I've watched

Through fire and blood to any prize they gain.
I could well wish you, for your proper sake,
Had met some shade of opposition here
— Found a blunt seneschal refuse unlock,
Or a scared usher lead your steps astray.
You must not look for next achievement's palm
So easily: this will hurt your conquering.

Berth. My next? Ay, as you say, my next and next!

Well, I am tired, that's truth, and moody too,
This quiet entrance-morning: listen why!
Our little burgh, now, Juliens — 't is indeed
One link, however insignificant,
Of the great chain by which I reach my hope,
— A link I must secure; but otherwise,
You'd wonder I esteem it worth my grasp.
Just see what life is, with its shifts and turns!
It happens now — this very nook — to be
A place that once . . . not a long while since, neither —

When I lived an ambiguous hanger-on
Of foreign courts, and bore my claims about,
Discarded by one kinsman, and the other
A poor priest merely, — then, I say, this place
Shone my ambition's object; to be Duke —
Seemed then, what to be Emperor seems now.
My rights were far from judged as plain and
sure

In those days as of late, I promise you:
And 't was my day-dream, Lady Colombe here
Might e'en compound the matter, pity me,
Be struck, say, with my chivalry and grace
(I was a boy!) — bestow her hand at length,
And make me Duke, in her right if not mine.
Here am I, Duke confessed, at Juliens now.
Hearken: if ever I be Emperor,
Remind me what I felt and said to-day!

Mel. All this consoles a bookish man like
me.

— And so will weariness cling to you. Wrong, Wrong! Had you sought the lady's court your-
self, —

Faced the redoubtables composing it,
Flattered this, threatened that man, bribed the other, —

Pleaded by writ and word and deed, your
cause, —

Conquered a footing inch by painful inch, —
And, after long years' struggle, pounced at last
On her for prize, — the right life had been lived,
And justice done to divers faculties

Shut in that brow. Yourself were visible
As you stood victor, then; whom now — (your pardon!)

I am forced narrowly to search and see,
So are you hid by helps — this Pope, your uncle —

Your cousin, the other King! You are a mind, —
They, body: too much of mere legs-and-arms Obstructs the mind so! Match these with their
like:

Match mind with mind!

Berth. And where's your mind to match?
They show me legs-and-arms to cope withal!
I'd subjugate this city — where's its mind?

[The Courtiers enter slowly.]

Mel. Got out of sight when you came troops and all!

And in its stead, here greets you flesh-and-blood:
A snug economy of both, this first!

[As CLUGNET bows obsequiously.]

Well done, gout, all considered! — I may go?

Berth. Help me receive them!

Mel. Oh, they just will say

What yesterday at Aix their fellows said, —
At Treves, the day before! Sir Prince, my
friend,

Why do you let your life slip thus? — Meantime,
I have my little Juliens to achieve —

The understanding this tough Platonist,

Your holy uncle disinterred, Amelius:

Lend me a company of horse and foot,

To help me through his tractate — gain my Duchy!

Berth. And Empire, after that is gained, will
be — ?

Mel. To help me through your uncle's comment, Prince! [Goes.]

Berth. Ah? Well: he o'er-refines — the scholar's fault!

How do I let my life slip? Say, this life,
I lead now, differs from the common life

Of other men in mere degree, not kind,

Of joys and griefs, — still there is such degree

Mere largeness in a life is something, sure, —

Enough to care about and struggle for,

In this world: for this world, the size of things;

The sort of things, for that to come, no doubt.

A great is better than a little aim:

And when I wooed Priscilla's rosy mouth

And failed so, under that gray convent-wall,

Was I more happy than I should be now

[By this time, the Courtiers are ranged before him.]

If failing of my Empire? Not a whit.

— Here comes the mind, it once had tasked me sore

To baffle, but for my advantages!

All's best as 't is: these scholars talk and talk.

[Seats himself.]

The Courtiers. Welcome our Prince to Juliens!

— to his heritage!

Our dutifullest service proffer we!

Clug. I, please your Highness, having exercised

The function of Grand Chamberlain at court,

With much acceptance, as men testify . . .

Berth. I cannot greatly thank you, gentle-
men!

The Pope declares my claim to the Duchy founded

On strictest justice — you concede it, therefore,
I do not wonder: and the kings my friends

Protest they mean to see such claim enforced, —
You easily may offer to assist.

But there's a slight discretionary power

To serve me in the matter, you've had long,

Though late you use it. This is well to say —

But could you not have said it months ago?

I'm not denied my own Duke's truncheon,
true —

'Tis flung me—I stoop down, and from the ground

Pick it, with all you placid standers-by:
And now I have it, gems and mire at once,
Grace go with it to my soiled hands, you say!

Gui. (By Paul, the advocate our doughty friend Cuts the best figure!)

Gau. If our ignorance

May have offended, sure our loyalty . . .

Berth. Loyalty? Yours? Oh—of yourselves you speak!

I mean the Duchess all this time, I hope!
And since I have been forced repeat my claims
As if they never had been urged before,
As I began, so must I end, it seems.

The formal answer to the grave demand!

What says the lady?

Courtiers. [One to another.] 1st Court. Marshal!
2d Court. Orator!

Gui. A variation of our mistress's way!

Wipe off his boots' dust, Clugnet!—that, he waits!

1st Court. Your place!

2d Court. Just now it was your own!

Gui. The devil's!

Berth. [To GUIBERT.] Come forward, friend—
—you with the paper, there!

Is Juliers the first city I've obtained?

By this time, I may boast proficiency

In each decorum of the circumstance.

Give it me as she gave it—the petition,

Demand, you style it! What's required, in brief?

What title's reservation, appanage's

Allowance? I heard all at Treves, last week.

Gau. [To GUIBERT.] "Give it him as she gave it!"

Gui. And why not?

[To BERTHOLD.] The lady crushed your summons thus together,

And bade me, with the very greatest scorn

So fair a frame could hold, inform you . . .

Courtiers. Stop—Idiot!

Gui.—Inform you she denied your claim,
Defied yourself! (I tread upon his heel,
The blustering advocate!)

Berth. By heaven and earth!

Dare you jest, sir?

Gui. Did they at Treves, last week?

Berth. [Starting up.] Why then, I look much bolder than I knew,

And you prove better actors than I thought:

Since, as I live, I took you as you entered

For just so many dearest friends of mine,

Fled from the sinking to the rising power

—The sneaking'st crew, in short, I e'er despised!

Whereas, I am alone here for the moment,

With every soldier left behind at Aix!

Silence? That means the worst? I thought as much!

What follows next?

Courtiers. Gracious Prince—he raves!

Gui. He asked the truth and why not get the truth?

Berth. Am I a prisoner? Speak, will somebody?

—But why stand paltering with imbeciles?

Let me see her, or . . .

Gui. Her, without her leave, Shall no one see: she's Duchess yet!

Courtiers. [Footsteps without, as they are disputing.] Good chance!

She's here—the Lady Colombe's self!

Berth. 'Tis well!

[Aside.] Array a handful thus against my world?

Not ill done, truly! Were not this a mind To match one's mind with? Colombe! Let us wait!

I failed so, under that gray convent wall!

She comes.

Gui. The Duchess! Strangers, range yourselves!

[As the DUCHESS enters in conversation with VALENCE, BERTHOLD and the Courtiers fall back a little.]

Duch. Presagefully it beats, presagefully, My heart: the right is Berthold's and not mine.

Val. Grant that he has the right, dare I mistrust

Your power to acquiesce so patiently

As you believe, in such a dream-like change

Of fortune—change abrupt, profound, complete?

Duch. Ah, the first bitterness is over now!

Bitter I may have felt it to confront

The truth, and ascertain those natures' value

I had so counted on; that was a pang:

But I did bear it, and the worst is over.

Let the Prince take them!

Val. And take Juliers too?

—Your people without crosses, wands and chains—

Only with hearts?

Duch. There I feel guilty, sir!

I cannot give up what I never had:

For I ruled these, not them—these stood between.

Shall I confess, sir? I have heard by stealth Of Berthold from the first; more news and more:

Closer and closer swam the thunder cloud, But I was safely housed with these, I knew.

At times when to the casement I would turn, At a bird's passage or a flower-trail's play,

I caught the storm's red glimpses on its edge— Yet I was sure some one of all these friends

Would interpose: I followed the bird's flight Or plucked the flower—some one would interpose!

Val. Not one thought on the People—and Cleves there!

Duch. Now, sadly conscious my real sway was missed,

Its shadow goes without so much regret: Else could I not again thus calmly bid you, Answer Prince Berthold!

Val. Then you acquiesce?

Duch. Remember over whom it was I ruled!

Gui. [Stepping forward.] Prince Berthold, yonder, craves an audience, lady!

Duch. [To VALENCE.] I only have to turn, and I shall face

Prince Berthold! Oh, my very heart is sick!
It is the daughter of a line of Dukes
This scornful insolent adventurer
Will bid depart from my dead father's halls!
I shall not answer him — dispute with him —
But, as he bids, depart! Prevent it, sir!
Sir — but a mere day's respite! Urge for me
— What I shall call to mind I should have urged

When time's gone by — 't will all be mine, you urge!

A day — an hour — that I myself may lay
My rule down! 'Tis too sudden — must not be!
The world's to hear of it! Once done — forever!

How will it read, sir? How be sung about?
Prevent it!

Berth. [Approaching.] Your frank indignation,
lady,

Cannot escape me. Overbold I seem;
But somewhat should be pardoned my surprise
At this reception, — this defiance, rather.
And if, for their and your sake, I rejoice
Your virtues could inspire a trusty few
To make such gallant stand in your behalf,
I cannot but be sorry, for my own,
Your friends should force me to retrace my steps:

Since I no longer am permitted speak
After the pleasant peaceful course prescribed
No less by courtesy than relationship —
Which I remember, if you once forgot.
But never must attack pass unrepelled.
Suffer that, through you, I demand of these,
Who controverts my claim to Juliers?

Duch. — Me

You say, you do not speak to —
Berth. Of your subjects
I ask, then: whom do you accredit? Where Stand those should answer?

Val. [Advancing.] The lady is alone.
Berth. Alone, and thus? So weak and yet so bold?

Val. I said she was alone —

Berth. And weak, I said.
Val. When is man strong until he feels alone?

It was some lonely strength at first, be sure,
Created organs, such as those you seek,
By which to give its varied purpose shape:
And, naming the selected ministrants,
Took sword, and shield, and sceptre, — each, a
man!

That strength performed its work and passed
its way:

You see our lady: there, the old shapes stand!
— A Marshal, Chamberlain, and Chancellor —
"Be helped their way, into their death put life
And find advantage!" — so you counsel us.
But let strength feel alone, seek help itself, —
And, as the inland-hatched sea-creature hunts
The sea's breast out, — as, littered 'mid the waves

The desert-brute makes for the desert's joy,
So turns our lady to her true resource,
Passing o'er hollow fictions, worn-out types,
— And I am first her instinct fastens on.
And prompt I say, as clear as heart can speak,

The People will not have you; nor shall have!
It is not merely I shall go bring Cleves
And fight you to the last, — though that does
much,

And men and children, — ay, and women too,
Fighting for home, are rather to be feared
Than mercenaries fighting for their pay —
But, say you beat us, since such things have
been,

And, where this Juliers laughed, you set your foot

Upon a steaming bloody plash — what then?
Stand you the more our lord that there you
stand?

Lord it o'er troops whose force you concentrate,
A pillared flame whereto all ardors tend —
Lord it 'mid priests whose schemes you amplify,
A cloud of smoke 'neath which all shadows brood —

But never, in this gentle spot of earth,
Can you become our Colombe, our play-queen,
For whom, to furnish lilies for her hair,
We 'd pour our veins forth to enrich the soil!
— Our conqueror? Yes! — Our despot? Yes!
— Our Duke?

Know yourself, know us!

Berth. [Who has been in thought.] Know your lady, also!

[Very deferentially.] — To whom I needs must exculpate myself

For having made a rash demand, at least.

Wherefore to you, sir, who appear to be

Her chief adviser, I submit my claims,

[Giving papers.]

But, this step taken, take no further step,
Until the Duchess shall pronounce their worth.
Here be our meeting-place; at night, its time:
Till when I humbly take the lady's leave!

[He withdraws. As the DUCHESS turns to VALENCE, the Courtiers interchange glances and come forward a little.]

1st Court. So, this was their device!

2d Court. No bad device!

3d Court. You'd say they love each other,
Guibert's friend

From Cleves, and she, the Duchess!

4th Court. — And moreover,

That all Prince Berthold comes for, is to help
Their loves!

5th Court. Pray, Guibert, what is next to do?

Gui. [Advancing.] I laid my office at the Duchess' foot —

Others. And I — and I — and I!

Duch. I took them, sirs.

Gui. [Apart to VALENCE.] And now, sir, I am simple knight again —

Guibert, of the great ancient house, as yet
That never bore affront; whate'er your birth, —
As things stand now, I recognize yourself
(If you'll accept experience of some date)
As like to be the leading man o' the time,
Therefore as much above me now, as I Seemed above you this morning. Then, I offered

To fight you: will you be as generous

And now fight me?

Val. Ask when my life is mine!

Gui. ('Tis hers now!)

Clug. [Apart to VALENCE, as GUIBERT turns from him.] You, sir, have insulted me grossly, — will grant me, too, the selfsame favor You 've granted him, just now, I make no question?

Val. I promise you, as him, sir.

Clug. Do you so? Handsomely said! I hold you to it, sir. You'll get me reinstated in my office As you will Guibert!

Duch. I would be alone!
[They begin to retire slowly: as VALENCE is about to follow —

Alone, sir — only with my heart: you stay!

Gau. You hear that? Ah, light breaks upon me! Cleves —

It was at Cleves some man harangued us all — With great effect, — so those who listened said, My thoughts being busy elsewhere: was this he? Guibert, — your strange, disinterested man! Your uncorrupted, if uncourtly friend!

The modest worth you mean to patronize!

He cares about no Duchesses, not he!

His sole concern is with the wrongs of Cleves!

What, Guibert? What, it breaks on you at last?

Gui. Would this hall's floor were a mine's roof! I'd back

And in her very face . . .

Gau. Apply the match That fired the train, — and where would you be, pray?

Gui. With him!

Gau. Stand, rather, safe outside with me! The mine's charged: shall I furnish you the match

And place you properly? To the antechamber!

Gui. Can you?

Gau. Try me! Your friend's in fortune!

Gui. Quick —

To the antechamber! He is pale with bliss!

Gau. No wonder! Mark her eyes!

Gui. To the antechamber!

[The Courtiers retire.

Duch. Sir, could you know all you have done for me

You were content! You spoke, and I am saved.

Val. Be not too sanguine, lady! Ere you dream,

That transient flush of generosity

Fades off, perchance! The man, beside, is gone, —

Him we might bend; but see, the papers here —

Inalterably his requirement stays,

And cold hard words have we to deal with now.

In that large eye there seemed a latent pride,

To self-denial not incompetent,

But very like to hold itself dispensed

From such a grace: however, let us hope!

He is a noble spirit in noble form.

I wish he less had bent that brow to smile

As with the fancy how he could subject

Himself upon occasion to — himself!

From rudeness, violence, you rest secure;

But do not think your Duchy rescued yet!

Duch. You, who have opened a new world to me,

Will never take the faded language up

Of that I leave? My Duchy — keeping it, Or losing it — is that my sole world now?

Val. Ill have I spoken if you thence despise Juliers; although the lowest, on true grounds. Be worth more than the highest rule, on false: Aspire to rule, on the true grounds!

Duch. Nay, hear —

False, I will never — rash, I would not be!

This is indeed my birthday — soul and body,

Its hours have done on me the work of years.

You hold the requisition: ponder it!

If I have right, my duty's plain: if he —

Say so, nor ever change a tone of voice!

At night you meet the Prince; meet me at eve!

Till when, farewell! This discomposes you?

Believe in your own nature, and its force

Of renovating mine! I take my stand

Only as under me the earth is firm:

So, prove the first step stable, all will prove.

That first, I choose — [Laying her hand on his]

— the next to take, choose you!

[She withdraws.

Val. [After a pause.] What drew down this on me? — on me, dead once,

She thus bids live, — since all I hitherto

Thought dead in me, youth's ardors and emprise.

Burst into life before her, as she bids

Who needs them. Whither will this reach, where end?

Her hand's print burns on mine . . . Yet she's above —

So very far above me! All's too plain:

I served her when the others sank away,

And she rewards me as such souls reward! —

The changed voice, the suffusion of the cheek,

The eye's acceptance, the expressive hand,

— Reward, that's little, in her generous thought,

Though all to me . . .

I cannot so disclaim

Heaven's gift, nor call it other than it is!

She loves me!

[Looking at the Prince's papers.] — Which love, these, perchance, forbid.

Can I decide against myself — pronounce

She is the Duchess and no mate for me?

— Cleves, help me! Teach me, — every haggard face, —

To sorrow and endure! I will do right

Whatever be the issue. Help me, Cleves!

ACT IV

Evening. SCENE. An Antechamber.

Enter the Courtiers.

Mau. Now, then, that we may speak — how spring this mine?

Gau. Is Guibert ready for its match? He cools!

Not so friend Valence with the Duchess there!

"Stay, Valence! Are not you my better self?"

And her cheek mantled —

Gui. Well, she loves him, sir.

And more, — since you will have it I grow cool, —

She's right : he's worth it.

Gau. For his deeds to-day ?

Say so !

Gui. What should I say beside ?

Gau. Not this —

For friendship's sake leave this for me to say —

That we're the dupes of an egregious cheat !

This plain unpractised suitor, who found way

To the Duchess through the merest die's turn-

up,

A year ago had seen her and been seen,

Loved and been loved.

Gui. Impossible !

Gau. — Nor say,

How sly and exquisite a trick, moreover,

Was this which — taking not their stand on facts

Boldly, for that had been endurable,

But worming on their way by craft, they

choose

Resort to, rather, — and which you and we,

Sheep-like, assist them in the playing-off !

The Duchess thus parades him as preferred,

Not on the honest ground of preference,

Seeing first, liking more, and there an end —

But as we all had started equally,

And at the close of a fair race he proved

The only valiant, sage and loyal man.

Herself, too, with the pretty fits and starts, —

The careless, winning, candid ignorance

Of what the Prince might challenge or forego —

She had a hero in reserve ! What risk

Ran she ? This deferential easy Prince

Who brings his claims for her to ratify

— He's just her puppet for the nonce ! You'll

see, —

Valence pronounces, as is equitable,

Against him : off goes the confederate :

As equitably, Valence takes her hand !

The Chancellor. You run too fast : her hand, no subject takes.

Do not our archives hold her father's will ?

That will provides against such accident,

And gives next heir, Prince Berthold, the reversion

Of Juliers, which she forfeits, wedding so.

Gau. I know that, well as you, — but does the Prince ?

Knows Berthold, think you, that this plan, he

helps,

For Valence's ennoblement, — would end,

If crowned with the success which seems its due,

In making him the very thing he plays,

The actual Duke of Juliers ? All agree

That Colombe's title waived or set aside,

He is next heir.

The Chan. Incontrovertibly.

Gau. Guibert, your match, now, to the train !

Gui. Enough !

I'm with you : selfishness is best again.

I thought of turning honest — what a dream

Let's wake now !

Gau. Selfish, friend, you never were :

'T was but a series of revenges taken

On your unselfishness for prospering ill.

But now that you're grown wiser, what's our

course ?

Gui. — Wait, I suppose, till Valence weds our lady,

And then, if we must needs revenge ourselves, Apprise the Prince.

Gau. — The Prince, ere then dismissed

With thanks for playing his mock part so well ?

Tell the Prince now, sir ! Ay, this very night,

Ere he accepts his dolo and goes his way,

Explain how such a marriage makes him Duke,

Then trust his gratitude for the surprise !

Gui. — Our lady wedding Valence all the same

As if the penalty were undisclosed ?

Good ! If she loves, she'll not disown her love,

Throw Valence up. I wonder you see that.

Gau. The shame of it — the suddenness and shame !

Within her, the inclining heart — without,

A terrible array of witnesses —

And Valence by, to keep her to her word,

With Berthold's indignation or disgust !

We'll try it ! — Not that we can venture much.

Her confidence we've lost forever : Berthold's

Is all to gain.

Gui. To-night, then, venture we !

Yet — if lost confidence might be renewed ?

Gau. Never in noble natures ! With the base ones, —

Twist off the crab's claw, wait a smarting-while,

And something grows and grows and gets to be

A mimic of the lost joint, just so like

As keeps in mind it never, never will Replace its predecessor ! Crabs do that :

But lop the lion's foot — and . . .

Gui. To the Prince !

Gau. [Aside.] And come what will to the lion's foot, I pay you,

My cat's paw, as I long have yearned to pay !

[Aloud.] Footsteps ! Himself ! 'T is Valence

breaks on us,

Exulting that their scheme succeeds. We'll

hence —

And perfect ours ! Consult the archives,

first —

Then, fortified with knowledge, seek the Hall !

Chug. [TO GAUCELME as they retire.] You have not smiled so since your father died !

(As they retire, enter VALENCE with papers.)

Val. So must it be ! I have examined these

With scarce a palpitating heart — so calm,

Keeping her image almost wholly off,

Setting upon myself determined watch,

Repelling to the uttermost his claims :

And the result is — all men would pronounce,

And not I, only, the result to be —

Berthold is heir ; she has no shade of right

To the distinction which divided us,

But, suffered to rule first, I know not why,

Her rule connived at by those Kings and Popes,

To serve some devil's-purpose, — now 't is

gained,

Whatever it was, the rule expires as well.

— Valence, this rapture . . . selfish can it be ?

Eject it from your heart, her home ! — It stays !

Ah, the brave world that opens on us both !

— Do my poor townsmen so esteem it ?

Cleves, —

I need not your pale faces ! This, reward
For service done to you ? Too horrible !
I never served you : 't was myself I served — Nay, served not — rather saved from punishment

Which, had I failed you then, would plague me
now !

My life continues yours, and your life, mine.
But if, to take God's gift, I swerve no step — Clevés ! If I breathe no prayer for it — if she,

[Footsteps without.]

Colombe, that comes now, freely gives herself —
Will Clevés require, that, turning thus to her,
I . . .

(Enter PRINCE BERTHOLD.)

Pardon, sir ! I did not look for you
Till night, i' the Hall ; nor have as yet declared
My judgment to the lady.

Berth. So I hoped.

Val. And yet I scarcely know why that should check

The frank disclosure of it first to you —
What her right seems, and what, in consequence,

She will decide on.

Berth. That I need not ask.

Val. You need not : I have proved the lady's mind :

And, justice being to do, dare act for her.

Berth. Doubtless she has a very noble mind.

Val. Oh, never fear but she'll in each conjuncture

Bear herself bravely ! She no whit depends
On circumstance ; as she adorns a throne,
She had adorned . . .

Berth. A cottage — in what book
Have I read that, of every queen that lived ?
A throne ! You have not been instructed, sure,
To forestall my request ?

Val. 'T is granted, sir !

My heart instructs me. I have scrutinized
Your claims . . .

Berth. Ah — claims, you mean, at first preferred ?

I come, before the hour appointed me.
To pray you let those claims at present rest,
In favor of a new and stronger one.

Val. You shall not need a stronger : on the part

O' the lady, all you offer I accept,
Since one clear right suffices : yours is clear.
Propose !

Berth. I offer her my hand.

Val. Your hand ?

Berth. A Duke's, yourself say ; and, at no far time,

Something here whispers me — an Emperor's.
The lady's mind is noble : which induced
This seizure of occasion : ere my claims
Were — settled, let us amicably say !

Val. Your hand !

Berth. (He will fall down and kiss it next !)
Sir, this astonishment's too flattering,
Nor must you hold your mistress' worth so cheap.

Enhance it, rather, — urge that blood is blood —
The daughter of the Burgraves, Landgraves, Markgraves,

Remains their daughter ! I shall scarce gain-
say.

Elsewhere, or here, the lady needs must rule :
Like the imperial crown's great chrysoprase,
They talk of — somewhat out of keeping there,
And yet no jewel for a meaner cap.

Val. You wed the Duchess ?

Berth. Cry you mercy, friend !

Will the match also influence fortunes here ?

A natural solicitude enough.

Be certain, no bad chance it proves for you !

However high you take your present stand,

There's prospect of a higher still remove —

For Juliers will not be my resting-place,

And, when I have to choose a substitute

To rule the little burgh, I'll think of you

Who need not give your mates a character.

And yet I doubt your fitness to supplant

The gray smooth Chamberlain : he'd hesitate

A doubt his lady could demean herself

So low as to accept me. Courage, sir !

I like your method better : feeling's play

Is franker much, and flatters me beside.

Val. I am to say, you love her ?

Berth.

Say that too !

Love has no great concernment, thinks the

world,

With a Duke's marriage. How go precedents

In Juliers' story — how use Juliers' Dukes ?

I see you have them here in goodly row ;

You must be Luitpold — ay, a stalwart sire !

Say, I have been arrested suddenly

In my ambition's course, its rocky course,

By this sweet flower : I fain would gather it

And then proceed : so say and speedily

— (Nor stand there like Duke Luitpold's brazen

self !)

Enough, sir : you possess my mind, I think.

This is my claim, the others being withdrawn,

And to this be it that, i' the Hall to-night,

Your lady's answer comes : till when, farewell !

[He retires.]

Val. [After a pause.] The heavens and earth stay as they were ; my heart

Beats as it beat : the truth remains the truth.

What falls away, then, if not faith in her ?

Was it my faith, that she could estimate

Love's value, and, such faith still guiding me,

Dare I now test her ? Or grew faith so strong

Solely because no power of test was mine ?

(Enter the DUCHESS.)

Duch. My fate, sir ! Ah, you turn away.

All's over.

But you are sorry for me ? Be not so !

What I might have become, and never was,

Regret with me ! What I have merely been,

Rejoice I am no longer ! What I seem

Beginning now, in my new state, to be,

Hope that I am ! — for, once my rights proved void,

This heavy roof seems easy to exchange

For the blue sky outside — my lot henceforth.

Val. And what a lot is Berthold's !

Duch.

How of him ?

Val. He gathers earth's whole good into his arms ;

Standing, as man now, stately, strong and wise,

Marching to fortune, not surprised by her.

One great aim, like a guiding-star, above —
Which tasks strength, wisdom, stateliness, to lift
His manhood to the height that takes the prize;
A prize not near — lest overlooking earth
He rashly spring to seize it — nor remote,
So that he rest upon his path content:
But day by day, while shimmering orbs shine,
And the faint circlet prophesies the orb,
He sees so much as, just evolving these,
The stateliness, the wisdom and the strength,
To due completion, will suffice this life,
And lead him at his grandest to the grave.
After this star, out of a night he springs;
A beggar's cradle for the throne of thrones
He quits; so, mounting, feels each step he

mounts,
Nor, as from each to each exultingly
He passes, overleaps one grade of joy.
This, for his own good: — with the world, each

gift
Of God and man, — reality, tradition,
Fancy and fact — so well environ him,
That as a mystic panoply they serve —
Of force, untenanted, to awe mankind,
And work his purpose out with half the world,
While he, their master, dexterously slipt
From such encumbrance, is meantime employed

With his own prowess on the other half.
Thus shall he prosper, every day's success
Adding, to what is he, a solid strength —
An airy might to what encircles him,
Till at the last, so life's routine lends help,
That as the Emperor only breathes and moves,
His shadow shall be watched, his step or stalk
Become a comfort or a portent, how
He trails his ermine take significance, —
Till even his power shall cease to be most

power,
And men shall dread his weakness more, nor
dare
Peril their earth its bravest, first and best,
Its typified invincibility.

Thus shall he go on, threatening, till he ends —
The man of men, the spirit of all flesh,
The fiery centre of an earthly world!

Duch. Some such a fortune I had dreamed should rise

Out of my own — that is, above my power
Seemed other, greater potencies to stretch —

Val. For you?
Duch. It was not I moved there, I think:
But one I could, — though constantly beside,
And aye approaching, — still keep distant from,
And so adore. 'Twas a man moved there.

Val. Who?
Duch. I felt the spirit, never saw the face.

Val. See it! 'Tis Berthold's! He enables
you

To realize your vision.

Duch. Berthold?

Val. Duke —
Emperor to be: he proffers you his hand.

Duch. Generous and princely!

Val. He is all of this.

Duch. Thanks, Berthold, for my father's sake. No hand

Degrades me!

Val. You accept the proffered hand?
Duch. That he should love me!

Val. "Loved" I did not say.
Had that been — love might so incline the

Prince
To the world's good, the world that's at his

foot, —
I do not know, this moment, I should dare

Desire that you refused the world — and Cleves —

The sacrifice he asks.
Duch. Not love me, sir?

Val. He scarce affirmed it.

Duch. May not deeds affirm?

Val. What does he? . . . Yes, yes, very much he does!

All the shame saved, he thinks, and sorrow
saved —

Immitigable sorrow, so he thinks, —
Sorrow that's deeper than we dream, per-

chance!
Duch. Is not this love?

Val. So very much he does!
For look, you can descend now gracefully:

All doubts are banished, that the world might
have,

Or worst, the doubts yourself, in after-time,
May call up of your heart's sincereness now.

To such, reply, "I could have kept my rule —
Increased it to the utmost of my dreams —

Yet I abjured it." This, he does for you:
It is munificently much.

Duch. Still "much!"

But why is it not love, sir? Answer me!
Val. Because not one of Berthold's words and looks

Had gone with love's presentment of a flower

To the beloved: because bold confidence,
Open superiority, free pride —

Love owns not, yet were all that Berthold owned:

Because where reason, even, finds no flaw,
Unerringly a lover's instinct may.

Duch. You reason, then, and doubt?

Val. I love, and know.

Duch. You love? How strange! I never cast a thought

On that! Just see our selfishness! You seemed So much my own . . . I had no ground — and

yet,
I never dreamed another might divide

My power with you, much less exceed it.

Val. Lady,
I am yours wholly.

Duch. Oh, no, no, not mine!

'T is not the same now, never more can be.

— Your first love, doubtless. Well, what's gone from me?

What have I lost in you?

Val. My heart replies —
No loss there! So, to Berthold back again:

This offer of his hand, he bids me make —

Its obvious magnitude is well to weigh

Duch. She's . . . yes, she must be very fair for you!

Val. I am a simple advocate of Cleves.

Duch. You! With the heart and brain that so helped me,

I fancied them exclusively my own,
Yet find are subject to a stronger sway!
She must be . . . tell me, is she very fair?

Val. Most fair, beyond conception or belief.

Duch. Black eyes? — no matter! Colombe, the world leads

Its life without you, whom your friends professed

The only woman — see how true they spoke!
One lived this while, who never saw your face,
Nor heard your voice — unless . . . Is she from Cleves?

Val. Cleves knows her well.

Duch. Ah — just a fancy, now!

When you poured forth the wrongs of Cleves, —
I said,

— Thought, that is, afterward . . .

Val. You thought of me?

Duch. Of whom else? Only such great cause, I thought,

For such effect: see what true love can do!

Cleves is his love. I almost fear to ask

. . . And will not. This is idling: to our work!

Admit before the Prince, without reserve,

My claims misgrounded; then may follow
better

. . . When you poured out Cleves' wrongs impetuously,

Was she in your mind?

Val. All done was done for her — To humble me!

Duch. She will be proud at least.

Val. She?

Duch. When you tell her.

Val. That will never be.

Duch. How — are there sweeter things you hope to tell?

No, sir! You counselled me, — I counsel you

In the one point I — any woman — can.

Your worth, the first thing; let her own come
next —

Say what you did through her, and she through
you —

The praises of her beauty afterward!

Will you?

Val. I dare not.

Duch. Dare not?

Val. She I love

Suspects not such a love in me.

Duch. You jest.

Val. The lady is above me and away.

Not only the brave form, and the bright mind,

And the great heart, combine to press me low —

But all the world calls rank divides us.

Duch. Rank!

Now grant me patience! Here's a man declares

Oracularly in another's case —

Sees the true value and the false, for them —

Nay, bids them see it, and they straight do see.

You called my court's love worthless — so it
turned:

I threw away as dross my heap of wealth,

And here you stickle for a piece or two!

First — has she seen you?

Val. Yes.

Duch. She loves you, then.

Val. One flash of hope burst; then succeeded
night:

And all's at darkest now. Impossible!

Duch. We'll try: you are — so to speak —
my subject yet?

Val. As ever — to the death.

Duch.

Val. I must.

Duch. Approach her, and . . . no! first of
all

Get more assurance. "My instructress," say,

"Was great, descended from a line of kings,

And even fair" — (wait why I say this folly) —

"She said, of all men, none for eloquence,

Courage, and" (what cast even these to shade)

"The heart they sprung from, — none deserved like him

Who saved her at her need: if she said this,

What should not one I love, say?"

Val. Heaven — this hope —

Oh, lady, you are filling me with fire!

Duch. Say this! — nor think I bid you cast
aside

One touch of all the awe and reverence;

Nay, make her proud for once to heart's content

That all this wealth of heart and soul's her
own!

Think you are all of this, — and, thinking it,

. . . (Obey!)

Val. I cannot choose.

Duch. Then, kneel to her!

[VALENCE sinks on his knee.]

I dream!

Val. Have mercy! Yours, unto the death, —

I have obeyed. Despise, and let me die!

Duch. Alas, sir, is it to be ever thus?

Even with you as with the world? I know

This morning's service was no vulgar deed

Whose motive, once it dares avow itself,

Explains all done and infinitely more,

So, takes the shelter of a nobler cause.

Your service named its true source, — loyalty!

The rest's unsaid again. The Duchess bids you,

Rise, sir! The Prince's words were in debate.

Val. [Rising.] Rise? Truth, as ever, lady, comes from you!

I should rise — I who spoke for Cleves, can
speak

For Man — yet tremble now, who stood firm
then.

I laughed — for 't was past tears — that Cleves should starve

With all hearts beating loud the infamy,

And no tongue daring trust as much to air:

Yet here, where all hearts speak, shall I be mute?

Oh, lady, for your own sake look on me!

On all I am, and have, and do — heart, brain,

Body and soul, — this Valence and his gifts!

I was proud once: I saw you, and they sank,

So that each, magnified a thousand times,

Were nothing to you — but such nothingness,

Would a crown gild it, or a sceptre prop,

A treasure speed, a laurel-wreath enhance?

What is my own desert? But should your love

Have . . . there's no language helps here . . .
singled me, —

Then — oh, that wild word "then!" — be just to love,

In generosity its attribute!

Love, since you pleased to love! All's cleared — a stage

For trial of the question kept so long:

Judge you — Is love or vanity the best?

You, solve it for the world's sake — you, speak first

What all will shout one day — you, vindicate

Our earth and be its angel! All is said.

Lady, I offer nothing — I am yours:

But, for the cause' sake, look on me and him, And speak!

Duch. I have received the Prince's message:

Say, I prepare my answer!

Val. Take me, Cleves!

[He withdraws.]

Duch. Mournful — that nothing's what it calls itself!

Devotion, zeal, faith, loyalty — mere love!

And, love in question, what may Berthold's be?

I did ill to mistrust the world so soon:

Already was this Berthold at my side.

The valley-level has its hawks, no doubt:

May not the rock-top have its eagles, too?

Yet Valence . . . let me see his rival then!

ACT V

Night. SCENE. The Hall.

Enter BERTHOLD and MELCHIOR.

Mel. And here you wait the matter's issue?

Berth. Here.

Mel. I don't regret I shut Amelius, then.

But tell me, on this grand disclosure, — how

Behaved our spokesman with the forehead?

Berth. Oh,

Turned out no better than the foreheadless —

Was dazzled not so very soon, that's all!

For my part, this is scarce the hasty showy

Chivalrous measure you give me credit of.

Perhaps I had a fancy, — but 't is gone.

— Let her commence the unfriended innocent

And carry wrongs about from court to court?

No, truly! The least shake of fortune's sand,

— My uncle-Pope chokes in a coughing fit,

King-cousin takes a fancy to blue eyes, —

And wondrously her claims would brighten up;

Forth comes a new gloss on the ancient law,

O'er-looked provisos, o'er-past premises,

Follow in plenty. No: 't is the safe step.

The hour beneath the convent-wall is lost:

Juliers and she, once mine, are ever mine.

Mel. Which is to say, you, losing heart already,

Elope the adventure.

Berth. Not so — or, if so —

Why not confess at once that I advise

None of our kingly craft and guile just now

To lay, one moment, down their privilege

With the notion they can any time at pleasure

Retake it: that may turn out hazardous.

We seem, in Europe, pretty well at end

O' the night, with our great masque: those favored few

Who keep the chamber's top, and honor's chance

Of the early evening, may retain their place

And figure as they list till out of breath.

But it is growing late: and I observe

A dim grim kind of tipstaves at the doorway

Not only bar new-comers entering now,

But caution those who left, for any cause,

And would return, that morning draws too near;

The ball must die off, shut itself up. We —

I think, may dance lights out and sunshine in,

And sleep off headache on our frippery:

But friend the other, who cunningly stole out,

And, after breathing the fresh air outside,

Means to re-enter with a new costume,

Will be advised go back to bed, I fear.

I stick to privilege, on second thoughts.

Mel. Yes — you evade the adventure: and, beside,

Give yourself out for colder than you are.

King Philip, only, notes the lady's eyes?

Don't they come in for somewhat of the motive

With you too?

Berth. Yes — no: I am past that now.

Gone 't is: I cannot shut my soul to fact.

Of course, I might by forethought and contrivance

Reason myself into a rapture. Gone:

And something better come instead, no doubt.

Mel. So be it! Yet, all the same, proceed my way,

Though to your ends; so shall you prosper best!

The lady — to be won for selfish ends —

Will be won easier my unselfish . . . call it,

Romantic way.

Berth. Won easier?

Mel. Will not she?

Berth. There I profess humility until bound:

Ill cannot speed — not I — the Emperor.

Mel. And I should think the Emperor best waived.

From your description of her mood and way,

You could look, if it pleased you, into hearts;

But are too indolent and fond of watching

Your own — you know that, for you study it.

Berth. Had you but seen the orator her friend,

So bold and voluble an hour before,

Abashed to earth at aspect of the change!

Make her an Empress? Ah, that changed the case!

Oh, I read hearts! 'T is for my own behoof,

I court her with my true worth: wait the event!

I learned my final lesson on that head

When years ago, — my first and last essay —

Before the priest my uncle could by help

Of his superior raise me from the dirt —

Priscilla left me for a Brabant lord

Whose cheek was like the topaz on his thumb.

I am past illusion on that score.

Mel. Here comes

The lady —

Berth. — And there you go. But do not!

Give me

Another chance to please you! Hear me plead!

Mel. You 'll keep, then, to the lover, to the man?

(Enter the DUCHESS — followed by ADOLF and SABYNE, and, after an interval, by the Courtiers.)

Berth. Good auspice to our meeting!

Duch. May it prove!

— And you, sir, will be Emperor one day?

Berth. (Ay, that 's the point!) I may be Emperor.

Duch. 'T is not for my sake only, I am proud

Of this you offer: I am prouder far

That from the highest state should duly spring

The highest, since most generous, of deeds.

Berth. (Generous — still that!) You under-rate yourself.

You are, what I, to be complete, must gain —

Find now, and may not find, another time.

While I career on all the world for stage,

There needs at home my representative.

Duch. — Such, rather, would some warrior-woman be —

One dowered with lands and gold, or rich in friends —

One like yourself.

Berth. Lady, I am myself,

And have all these: I want what 's not myself,

Nor has all these. Why give one hand two swords?

Here 's one already: be a friend's next gift

A silk glove, if you will — I have a sword.

Duch. You love me, then?

Berth. Your lineage I revere,

Honor your virtue, in your truth believe,

Do homage to your intellect, and bow

Before your peerless beauty.

Duch. But, for love —

Berth. A further love I do not understand.

Our best course is to say these hideous truths,

And see them, once said, grow endurable:

Like waters shuddering from their central bed,

Black with the midnight bowels of the earth,

That, once up-spouted by an earthquake's throe,

A portent and a terror — soon subside,

Freshen apace, take gold and rainbow hues

In sunshine, sleep in shadow, and at last

Grow common to the earth as hills or trees —

Accepted by all things they came to scare.

Duch. You cannot love, then?

Berth. — Charlemagne, perhaps!

Are you not over-curious in love-love?

Duch. I have become so, very recently.

It seems, then, I shall best deserve esteem

Respect, and all your candor promises,

By putting on a calculating mood —

Asking the terms of my becoming yours?

Berth. Let me not do myself injustice, neither.

Because I will not condescend to fictions

That promise what my soul can ne'er acquit,

It does not follow that my guarded phrase

May not include far more of what you seek,

Than wide profession of less scrupulous men.

You will be Empress, once for all: with me

The Pope disputes supremacy — you stand,

And none gainsays, the earth's first woman.

Duch. That —

Or simple Lady of Ravestein again?

Berth. The matter 's not in my arbitrament:

Now I have made my claims — which I regret —
Cede one, cede all.

Duch. This claim then, you enforce?

Berth. The world looks on.

Duch. And when must I decide?

Berth. When, lady? Have I said thus much so promptly

For nothing? — Poured out, with such pains
at once

What I might also have suffered to ooze forth

Droplet by droplet in a lifetime long —

For aught less than as prompt an answer.
too?

All 's fairly told now: who can teach you more?

Duch. I do not see him.

Berth.

I shall ne'er deceive.

This offer should be made befittingly

Did time allow the better setting forth

The good of it, with what is not so good,

Advantage, and disparagement as well:

But as it is, the sum of both must serve.

I am already weary of this place;

My thoughts are next stage on to Rome.

Decide!

The Empire — or, — not even Juliers now!

Hail to the Empress — farewell to the Duchess!

[The Courtiers, who have been drawing nearer and nearer, interpose.

Gau. — "Farewell," Prince? when we break in at our risk —

Clug. Almost upon court-license trespassing —

Gau. — To point out how your claims are valid yet!

You know not, by the Duke her father's will.

The lady, if she weds beneath her rank,

Forfeits her Duchy in the next heir's favor —

So 't is expressly stipulate. And if

It can be shown 't is her intent to wed

A subject, then yourself, next heir, by right

Succeed to Juliers.

Berth. What insanity? —

Gui. Sir, there 's one Valence, the pale fiery
man

You saw and heard this morning — thought, no
doubt,

Was of considerable standing here:

I put it to your penetration, Prince,

If aught save love, the truest love for her

Could make him serve the lady as he did!

He 's simply a poor advocate of Cleves

— Creeps here with difficulty, finds a place

With danger, gets in by a miracle,

And for the first time meets the lady's face —

So runs the story: is that credible?

For, first — no sooner in, than he 's apprised

Fortunes have changed; you are all-powerful
here,

The lady as powerless: he stands fast by her!

Duch. [Aside.] And do such deeds spring up from love alone?

Gui. But here occurs the question, does the lady

Love him again? I say, how else can she?

Can she forget how he stood singly forth

In her defence, dared outrage all of us,

Insult yourself — for what, save love 's reward?

Duch. [Aside.] And is love then the sole reward of love?

Gui. But, love him as she may and must — you ask,
Means she to wed him? “Yes,” both natures answer!

Both, in their pride, point out the sole result;
Naught less would he accept nor she propose.
For each conjecture was she great enough
— Will be, for this.

Clug. Though, now that this is known,
Policy, doubtless, urges she deny . . .

Duch. — What, sir, and wherefore? — since I am not sure

That all is any other than you say!
You take this Valence, hold him close to me,
Him with his actions: can I choose but look?
I am not sure, love trulier shows itself
Than in this man, you hate and would degrade,
Yet, with your worst abatement, show me thus.
Nor am I — (thus made look within myself, Ere I had dared) — now that the look is dared —
Sure that I do not love him!

Gui. Hear you, Prince?

Berth. And what, sirs, please you, may this prattle mean

Unless to prove with what alacrity
You give your lady's secrets to the world?
How much indebted, for discovering
That quality, you make me, will be found
When there's a keeper for my own to seek.

Courtiers. “Our lady?”

Berth. — She assuredly remains.

Duch. Ah, Prince — and you too can be generous?

You could renounce your power, if this were so,
And let me, as these phrase it, wed my love
Yet keep my Duchy? You perhaps exceed Him, even, in disinterestedness!

Berth. How, lady, should all this affect my purpose?

Your will and choice are still as ever, free.
Say, you have known a worthier than myself
In mind and heart, of happier form and face —
(Others must have their birthright: I have gifts,
To balance theirs, not blot them out of sight.
Against a hundred alien qualities,
I lay the prize I offer. I am nothing:
Wed you the Empire?

Duch. And my heart away?

Berth. When have I made pretension to your heart?

I give none. I shall keep your honor safe;
With mine I trust you, as the sculptor trusts
Yon marble woman with the marble rose,
Loose on her hand, she never will let fall,
In graceful, slight, silent security.
You will be proud of my world-wide career,
And I content in you the fair and good.
What were the use of planting a few seeds
The thankless climate never would mature —
Affections all repelled by circumstance?
Enough: to these no credit I attach. —
To what you own, find nothing to object.
Write simply on my requisition's face
What shall content my friends — that you admit,

As Colombe of Ravestein, the claims therein,
Or never need admit them, as my wife —
And either way, all 's ended!

Duch. Let all end!

Berth. The requisition!

Gui. — Valence holds, of course!

Berth. Desire his presence! [ADOLF goes out.]

Courtiers. [To each other.] Out it all comes yet;

He 'll have his word against the bargain yet;
He 's not the man to tamely acquiesce.

One passionate appeal — upbraiding even,
May turn the tide again. Despair not yet!

[They retire a little.]

Berth. [To MELCHIOR.] The Empire has its old success, my friend!

Mel. You've had your way: before the spokesman speaks

Let me, but this once, work a problem out,
And ever more be dumb! The Empire wins?
To better purpose have I read my books!

[Enter VALENCE.]

Mel. [To the Courtiers.] Apart, my masters!
[To VALENCE.] Sir, one word with you!

I am a poor dependant of the Prince's —
Pitched on to speak, as of slight consequence.

You are no higher, I find: in other words,
We two, as probably the wisest here,
Need not hold diplomatic talk like fools.
Suppose I speak, divesting the plain fact
Of all their tortuous phrases, fit for them?
Do you reply so, and what trouble saved!

The Prince, then — an embroiled strange heap
of news

This moment reaches him — if true or false,
All dignity forbids he should inquire
In person, or by worthier deputy;
Yet somehow must inquire, lest slander come:
And so, 't is I am pitched on. You have heard
His offer to your lady?

Val. Yes.

Mel. — Conceive

Her joy thereat?

Val. I cannot.

Mel. No one can.

All draws to a conclusion, therefore.

Val. [Aside.] So!

No after-judgment — no first thought revised —
Her first and last decision! — me, she leaves,
Takes him; a simple heart is flung aside,
The ermine o'er a heartless breast embraced.
Oh Heaven, this mockery has been played too oft!

Once, to surprise the angels — twice, that fiends.
Recording, might be proud they chose not so —
Thrice, many thousand times, to teach the world
All men should pause, misdoubt their strength,
since men

Can have such chance yet fail so signally

— But ever, ever this farewell to Heaven,

Welcome to earth — this taking death for life —
This spurning love and kneeling to the world —
Oh Heaven, it is too often and too old!

Mel. Well, on this point, what but an absurd rumor

Arises — these, its source — its subject, you!
Your faith and loyalty misconstruing,
They say, your service claims the lady's hand!
Of course, nor Prince nor lady can respond:
Yet something must be said: for, were it true
You made such claim, the Prince would . . .

Val. Well, sir, — would?
Mel. — Not only probably withdraw his suit,
 But, very like, the lady might be forced Accept your own. Oh, there are reasons why!
 But you'll excuse at present all save one, —
 I think so. What we want is, your own witness,
 For, or against — her good, or yours: decide!

Val. [Aside.] Be it her good if she accounts
 it so!
 [After a contest.] For what am I but hers, to choose as she?

Who knows how far, beside, the light from her
 May reach, and dwell with, what she looks upon?

Mel. [To the Prince.] Now to him, you!

Berth. [To VALENCE.] My friend acquaints you, sir,
 The noise runs . . .

Val. — Prince, how fortunate are you,
 Wedding her as you will, in spite of noise,
 To show belief in love! Let her but love you,
 All else you disregard! What else can be?
 You know how love is incompatible
 With falsehood — purifies, assimilates
 All other passions to itself.

Mel. Ay, sir:
 But softly! Where, in the object we select,
 Such love is, perchance, wanting?

Val. Then indeed,
 What is it you can take?

Mel. Nay, ask the world!
 Youth, beauty, virtue, an illustrious name,
 An influence o'er mankind.

Val. When man perceives . . .
 — Ah, I can only speak as for myself!

Duch. Speak for yourself!

Val. May I? — no, I have spoken,
 And time's gone by. Had I seen such an one,
 As I loved her — weighing thoroughly that
 word —

So should my task be to evolve her love:
 If for myself! — if for another — well.

Berth. Heroic truly! And your sole reward, —

The secret pride in yielding up love's right?

Val. Who thought upon reward? And yet how much

Comes after — oh, what amplest recompense!
 Is the knowledge of her, naught? the memory,
 naught?

— Lady, should such an one have looked on
 you,

Ne'er wrong yourself so far as quote the world
 And say, love can go unrequited here!

You will have blessed him to his whole life's
 end —

Low passions hindered, baser cares kept back,
 All goodness cherished where you dwelt — and dwell.

What would he have? He holds you — you,
 both form

And mind, in his, — where self-love makes such room

For love of you, he would not serve you now

The vulgar way, — repulse your enemies,

Win you new realms, or best, to save the old

Die blissfully — that's past so long ago!

He wishes you no need, thought, care of him —

Your good, by any means, himself unseen,
 Away, forgotten! — He gives that life's task
 up,

As it were . . . but this charge which I return —

[Offers the requisition, which she takes.]

Wishing your good.

Duch. [Having subscribed it.] And opportunely, sir —

Since at a birthday's close, like this of mine,
 Good wishes gentle deeds reciprocate.
 Most on a wedding-day, as mine is too,
 Should gifts be thought of: yours comes first by right.

Ask of me!

Berth. He shall have whate'er he asks,
 For your sake and his own.

Val. [Aside.] If I should ask —
 The withered bunch of flowers she wears — perhaps,

One last touch of her hand, I never more Shall see!

[After a pause, presenting his paper to the Prince.
Cleves' Prince, redress the wrongs of Cleves!

Berth. I will, sir!

Duch. [As VALENCE prepares to retire.] —

Nay, do out your duty, first!

You bore this paper; I have registered
 My answer to it: read it and have done!

[VALENCE reads it.]

I take him — give up Juliers and the world.
 This is my Birthday.

Mel. Berthold, my one hero
 Of the world she gives up, one friend worth my
 books,

Sole man I think it pays the pains to watch, —
 Speak, for I know you through your Popes and Kings!

Berth. [After a pause.] Lady, well rewarded!
 Sir, as well deserved!

I could not imitate — I hardly envy —
 I do admire you. All is for the best.
 Too costly a flower were this, I see it now,
 To pluck and set upon my barren helm
 To wither — any garish plume will do.
 I'll not insult you and refuse your Duchy —
 You can so well afford to yield it me,
 And I were left, without it, sadly lorn.
 As it is — for me — if that will flatter you,
 A somewhat wearier life seems to remain
 Than I thought possible where . . . 'faith, their life

Begins already! They're too occupied
 To listen: and few words content me best.

[Abruptly to the Courtiers.] I am your Duke, though! Who obey me here?

Duch. Adolf and Sabyne follow us —
Gui. [Starting from the Courtiers.] — And I?

Do I not follow them, if I may n't you?

Shall not I get some little duties up
 At Ravestein and emulate the rest?

God save you, Gaucelme! 'Tis my Birthday,

too!
Berth. You happy handful that remain with
 me

. . . That is, with Dietrich the black Barna-bite

I shall leave over you — will earn your wages

Or Dietrich has forgot to ply his trade !
 Meantime, — go copy me the precedents
 Of every installation, proper styles
 And pedigrees of all your Juliers' Dukes —
 While I prepare to plod on my old way,

And somewhat wearily, I must confess !
Duch. [ With a light joyous laugh as she turns from them. ] Come, Valence, to our friends, God's earth . . .
Val. [ As she falls into his arms. ] — And thee !

DRAMATIC ROMANCES

THE seventh number of Bells and Pomegranates was entitled Dramatic Romances and Lyrics. In the redistribution of his shorter poems when he collected his writings, Browning having already a group of Dramatic Lyrics made a second of Dramatic Romances, taking the occasion to make a little nicer discrimination. Thus some of the poems originally included under the combined title were distributed among the Lyrics, and some at first grouped under Lyrics were transferred to this division of Romances. The first poem in the group was originally contained in Dramatic Lyrics along with Soliloquy of the Spanish Cloister under the general title of Camp and Cloister, this poem representing the camp.

INCIDENT OF THE FRENCH CAMP

YOU know, we French stormed Ratisbon :
 A mile or so away,
 On a little mound, Napoleon
 Stood on our storming-day ;
 With neck out-thrust, you fancy how,
 Legs wide, arms locked behind,
 As if to balance the prone brow
 Oppressive with its mind.

Just as perhaps he mused " My plans
 That soar, to earth may fall,
 Let once my army-leader Lannes
 Waver at yonder wall, " —
 Out 'twixt the battery-smokes there flew
 A rider, bound on bound
 Full-galloping ; nor bridle drew
 Until he reached the mound.

Then off there flung in smiling joy,
 And held himself erect
 By just his horse's mane, a boy :
 You hardly could suspect —
 (So tight he kept his lips compressed, Scarce any blood came through)
 You looked twice ere you saw his breast
 Was all but shot in two.

" Well, " cried he, " Emperor, by God's grace
 We've got you Ratisbon !
 The Marshal's in the market-place,
 And you'll be there anon
 To see your flag-bird flap his vans
 Where I, to heart's desire, Perched him ! " The chief's eye flashed ; his plans
 Soared up again like fire.

The chief's eye flashed ; but presently
 Softened itself, as sheathes
 A film the mother-eagle's eye
 When her bruised eaglet breathes ;

" You're wounded ! " " Nay, " the soldier's pride
 Touched to the quick, he said :
 " I'm killed, Sir ! " And his chief beside,
 Smiling the boy fell dead.

THE PATRIOT

AN OLD STORY

Mr. Browning has denied that this poem refers to Arnold of Brescia. It is imaginative, not historical in its dramatic action. It was possibly to relieve the poem of its apparent distinct reference to history that he removed the name of Brescia, which was used in the poem in its first form.

It was roses, roses, all the way,
 With myrtle mixed in my path like mad :
 The house-roofs seemed to heave and sway,
 The church-spires flamed, such flags they had,
 A year ago on this very day.

The air broke into a mist with bells,
 The old walls rocked with the crowd and cries.
 Had I said, " Good folk, mere noise repels —
 But give me your sun from yonder skies ! " —
 They had answered, " And afterward, what else ? "

Alack, it was I who leaped at the sun
 To give it my loving friends to keep !
 Naught man could do, have I left undone :
 And you see my harvest, what I reap
 This very day, now a year is run.

There's nobody on the house-tops now —
 Just a palsied few at the windows set ;
 For the best of the sight is, all allow,

At the Shambles' Gate — or, better yet,
By the very scaffold's foot, I trow.

I go in the rain, and, more than needs,

A rope cuts both my wrists behind;
And I think, by the feel, my forehead bleeds,

For they fling, whoever has a mind,
Stones at me for my year's misdeeds.

Thus I entered, and thus I go!

In triumphs, people have dropped down dead.

"Paid by the world, what dost thou owe

Me?" — God might question; now instead,

'Tis God shall repay: I am safer so.

MY LAST DUCHESS

FERRARA

In Dramatic Lyrics this was entitled Italy, and grouped with Count Gismond under the head
Italy and France.

THAT's my last Duchess painted on the wall,
Looking as if she were alive. I call
That piece a wonder, now: Frà Pandolf's hands
Worked busily a day, and there she stands.

Will't please you sit and look at her? I said

"Frà Pandolf" by design, for never read

Strangers like you that pictured countenance,

The depth and passion of its earnest glance,

But to myself they turned (since none puts by

The curtain I have drawn for you, but I)

And seemed as they would ask me, if they
durst,

How such a glance came there; so, not the first

Are you to turn and ask thus. Sir, 't was not

Her husband's presence only, called that spot

Of joy into the Duchess' cheek: perhaps

Frà Pandolf chanced to say, "Her mantle laps

Over my lady's wrist too much," or "Paint

Must never hope to reproduce the faint

Half-flush that dies along her throat:" such stuff

Was courtesy, she thought, and cause enough

For calling up that spot of joy. She had

A heart — how shall I say? — too soon made
glad,

Too easily impressed: she liked whate'er

She looked on, and her looks went everywhere.

Sir, 't was all one! My favor at her breast,

The dropping of the daylight in the West,

The bough of cherries some officious fool

Broke in the orchard for her, the white mule

She rode with round the terrace — all and each

Would draw from her alike the approving
speech,

Or blush, at least. She thanked men, — good!
but thanked

Somehow — I know not how — as if she ranked

My gift of a nine-hundred-years-old name

With anybody's gift. Who'd stoop to blame

This sort of trifling? Even had you skill

In speech — (which I have not) — to make your will

Quite clear to such an one, and say, "Just this
Or that in you disgusts me; here you miss,

Or there exceed the mark" — and if she let

Herself be lessened so, nor plainly set

Her wits to yours, forsooth, and made excuse,

— E'en then would be some stooping; and I choose

Never to stoop. Oh sir, she smiled, no doubt,

Whene'er I passed her; but who passed without Much the same smile? This grew; I gave commands;

Then all smiles stopped together. There she stands

As if alive. Will't please you rise? We'll meet

The company below, then. I repeat,

The Count your master's known munificence

Is ample warrant that no just pretence

Of mine for dowry will be disallowed;

Though his fair daughter's self, as I avowed

At starting, is my object. Nay, we'll go

Together down, sir. Notice Neptune, though,

Taming a sea-horse, thought a rarity,

Which Claus of Innsbruck cast in bronze for
me!

COUNT GISMOND

AIX IN PROVENCE

CHRIST GOD who savest man, save most

Of men Count Gismond who saved me!

Count Ganthier, when he chose his post,

Chose time and place and company

To suit it; when he struck at length

My honor, 't was with all his strength.

And doubtlessly ere he could draw

All points to one, he must have schemed!

That miserable morning saw

Few half so happy as I seemed,

While being dressed in queen's array

To give our tourney prize away.

I thought they loved me, did me grace

To please themselves; 't was all their deed

God makes, or fair or foul, our face;

If showing mine so caused to bleed

My cousins' hearts, they should have dropped

A word, and straight the play had stopped.

They, too, soauteous! Each a queen

By virtue of her brow and breast;

Not needing to be crowned, I mean,

As I do. E'en when I was dressed,

Had either of them spoke, instead

Of glancing sideways with still head!

But no: they let me laugh, and sing

My birthday song quite through, adjust

The last rose in my garland, fling

A last look on the mirror, trust

My arms to each an arm of theirs,

And so descend the castle-stairs —

And come out on the morning-troop

Of merry friends who kissed my cheek,

And called me queen, and made me stoop

Under the canopy — (a streak

That pierced it, of the outside sun,
Powdered with gold its gloom's soft dun) —

And they could let me take my state

And foolish throne amid applause

Of all come there to celebrate

My queen's-day — Oh I think the cause

Of much was, they forgot no crowd

Makes up for parents in their shroud !

How'er that be, all eyes were bent

Upon me, when my cousins cast

Theirs down ; 't was time I should present

The victor's crown, but . . . there, 't will last

No long time . . . the old mist again

Blinds me as then it did. How vain !

See ! Gismond 's at the gate, in talk

With his two boys : I can proceed.

Well, at that moment, who should stalk

Forth boldly — to my face, indeed —

But Gauthier, and he thundered, "Stay !"

And all stayed. "Bring no crowns, I say !

"Bring torches ! Wind the penance-sheet

About her ! Let her shun the chaste,

Or lay herself before their feet !

Shall she whose body I embraced

A night long, queen it in the day ?

For honor's sake no crowns, I say !"

I ? What I answered ? As I live,

I never fancied such a thing

As answer possible to give.

What says the body when they spring

Some monstrous torture-engine's whole

Strength on it ? No more says the soul.

Till out strode Gismond ; then I knew

That I was saved. I never met

His face before, but, at first view,

I felt quite sure that God had set

Himself to Satan ; who would spend

A minute's mistrust on the end ?

He strode to Gauthier, in his throat

Gave him the lie, then struck his mouth

With one back-handed blow that wrote

In blood men's verdict there. North, South,

East, West, I looked. The lie was dead,

And damned, and truth stood up instead.

This glads me most, that I enjoyed

The heart of the joy, with my content

In watching Gismond unalloyed

By any doubt of the event :

God took that on him — I was bid

Watch Gismond for my part : I did.

Did I not watch him while he let

His armor just brace his greaves,

Rivet his hauberk, on the fret

The while ! His foot . . . my memory leaves

No least stamp out, nor how anon

He pulled his ringing gauntlets on.

And e'en before the trumpet's sound

Was finished, prone lay the false knight,

Prone as his lie, upon the ground :

Gismond flew at him, used no sleight

O' the sword, but open-breasted drove,

Cleaving till out the truth he clove.

Which done, he dragged him to my feet

And said, "Here die, but end thy breath

In full confession, lest thou fleet

From my first, to God's second death !

Say, hast thou lied ?" And, "I have lied

To God and her," he said, and died.

Then Gismond, kneeling to me, asked

— What safe my heart holds, though no word

Could I repeat now, if I tasked

My powers forever, to a third

Dear even as you are. Pass the rest

Until I sank upon his breast.

Over my head his arm he flung

Against the world ; and scarce I felt

His sword (that dripped by me and swung)

A little shifted in its belt :

For he began to say the while

How South our home lay many a mile.

So 'mid the shouting multitude

We two walked forth to never more

Return. My cousins have pursued

Their life, untroubled as before

I vexed them. Gauthier's dwelling-place

God lighten ! May his soul find grace !

Our elder boy has got the clear

Great brow ; though when his brother's black

Full eye shows scorn, it . . . Gismond here ?

And have you brought my tercel back ?

I just was telling Adela

How many birds it struck since May.

THE BOY AND THE ANGEL

First published in Hood's Magazine, August,

1844. It was rewritten, with five new couplets, and was published in 1845, in Dramatic

Romances and Lyrics, or No. VII. of Bells and

Pomegranates. When it appeared in the Poetical

Works of 1868, a fresh verse was added.

In 1844 the poem ended as follows : —

"Go back and praise again

The early way, while I remain.

"Be again the boy all curl'd ;

I will finish with the world."

Theocrite grew old at home,

Gabriel dwelt in Peter's dome.

MORNING, evening, noon and night,

"Praise God !" sang Theocrite.

Then to his poor trade he turned,

Whereby the daily meal was earned.

Hard he labored, long and well ;

O'er his work the boy's curls fell.

But ever, at each period,
He stopped and sang, "Praise God!"

Then back again his curls he threw,
And cheerful turned to work anew.

Said Blaise, the listening monk, "Well done;
I doubt not thou art heard, my son:

"As well as if thy voice to-day
Were praising God, the Pope's great way.

"This Easter Day, the Pope at Rome
Praises God from Peter's dome."

Said Theocrite, "Would God that I Might praise him that great way, and die!"

Night passed, day shone,
And Theocrite was gone.

With God a day endures alway,
A thousand years are but a day.

God said in heaven, "Nor day nor night
Now brings the voice of my delight."

Then Gabriel, like a rainbow's birth,
Spread his wings and sank to earth;

Entered, in flesh, the empty cell,
Lived there, and played the craftsman well;

And morning, evening, noon and night,
Praised God in place of Theocrite.

And from a boy, to youth he grew:
The man put off the stripling's hue:

The man matured and fell away
Into the season of decay:

And ever o'er the trade he bent,
And ever lived on earth content.

(He did God's will; to him, all one
If on the earth or in the sun.)

God said, "A praise is in mine ear;
There is no doubt in it, no fear:

"So sing old worlds, and so
New worlds that from my footstool go.

"Clearer loves sound other ways:
I miss my little human praise."

Then forth sprang Gabriel's wings, off fell
The flesh disguise, remained the cell.

'T was Easter Day: he flew to Rome,
And paused above Saint Peter's dome.

In the thing-room close by
The great outer gallery,

With his holy vestments dight,
Stood the new Pope, Theocrite:

And all his past career
Came back upon him clear,

Since when, a boy, he plied his trade,
Till on his life the sickness weighed;

And in his cell, when death drew near,
An angel in a dream brought cheer:

And rising from the sickness drear,
He grew a priest, and now stood here.

To the East with praise he turned,
And on his sight the angel burned.

"I bore thee from thy craftsman's cell,
And set thee here; I did not well.

"Vainly I left my angel-sphere,
Vain was thy dream of many a year.

"Thy voice's praise seemed weak; it dropped—
Creation's chorus stopped!

"Go back and praise again
The early way, while I remain.

"With that weak voice of our disdain,
Take up creation's pausing strain.

"Back to the cell and poor employ:
Resume the craftsman and the boy!"

Theocrite grew old at home;
A new Pope dwelt in Peter's dome.

One vanished as the other died:
They sought God side by side.

INSTANS TYRANNUS

I

Of the million or two, more or less,
I rule and possess,
One man, for some cause undefined,
Was least to my mind.

II

I struck him, he grovelled of course—
For, what was his force?
I pinned him to earth with my weight
And persistence of hate:
And he lay, would not moan, would not curse,
As his lot might be worse.

III

"Were the object less mean, would he stand
At the swing of my hand!
For obscurity helps him and blots
The hole where he squats."
So, I set my five wits on the stretch
To inveigle the wretch.
All in vain! Gold and jewels I threw,
Still he couched there perdue;
I tempted his blood and his flesh,
Hid in roses my mesh.

Choicest eates and the flagon's best spilth :
Still he kept to his filth.

IV

Had he kith now or kin, were access
To his heart, did I press :
Just a son or a mother to seize !
No such booty as these.
Were it simply a friend to pursue
'Mid my million or two,
Who could pay me in person or pelf
What he owes me himself !
No : I could not but smile through my chafe :
For the fellow lay safe
As his mates do, the midge and the nit,
— Through minuteness, to wit.

V

Then a humor more great took its place
At the thought of his face,
The droop, the low cares of the mouth,
The trouble uncouth
'Twixt the brows, all that air one is fain
To put out of its pain.
And, "no !" I admonished myself,
"Is one mocked by an elf,
Is one baffled by toad or by rat ?
The gravamen 's in that !
How the lion, who crouches to suit
His back to my foot,
Would admire that I stand in debate !
But the small turns the great
If it vexes you, — that is the thing !
Toad or rat vex the king ?
Though I waste half my realm to unearth
Toad or rat, 't is well worth !"

VI

So, I soberly laid my last plan
To extinguish the man.
Round his creep-hole, with never a break,
Ran my fires for his sake ;
Over-head, did my thunder combine
With my underground mine :
Till I looked from my labor content
To enjoy the event.

VII

When sudden . . . how think ye, the end ?
Did I say "without friend" ?
Say rather, from marge to blue marge
The whole sky grew his target
With the sun's self for visible boss,
While an Arm ran across
Which the earth heaved beneath like a breast
Where the wretch was safe prest !
Do you see ? Just my vengeance complete,
The man sprang to his feet,
Stood erect, caught at God's skirts, and prayed !
— So, I was afraid !

MESMERISM

ALL I believed is true !
I am able yet
All I want, to get

By a method as strange as new :
Dare I trust the same to you ?

If at night, when doors are shut,
And the wood-worm picks,
And the death-watch ticks,
And the bar has a flag of smut,
And a cat 's in the water-butt —

And the socket floats and flares,
And the house-beams groan,
And a foot unknown
Is surmised on the garret-stairs,
And the locks slip unawares —

And the spider, to serve his ends,
By a sudden thread,
Arms and legs outspread,
On the table's midst descends,
Comes to find, God knows what friends ! —

If since eve drew in, I say,
I have sat and brought
(So to speak) my thought
To bear on the woman away,
Till I felt my hair turn gray —

Till I seemed to have and hold,
In the vacancy
'Twixt the wall and me,
From the hair-plait's chestnut-gold
To the foot in its muslin fold —

Have and hold, then and there,
Her, from head to foot,
Breathing and mute,
Passive and yet aware,
In the grasp of my steady stare —

Hold and have, there and then,
All her body and soul
That completes my whole,
All that women add to men,
In the clutch of my steady ken —

Having and holding, till
I imprint her fast
On the void at last
As the sun does whom he will
By the calotypist's skill —

Then, — if my heart's strength serve,
And through all and each
Of the veils I reach
To her soul and never swerve,
Knitting an iron nerve —

Command her soul to advance
And inform the shape
Which has made escape
And before my countenance
Answers me glance for glance —

I, still with a gesture fit
Of my hands that best
Do my soul's behest,
Pointing the power from it,
While myself do steadfast sit —

Steadfast and still the same
 On my object bent,
 While the hands give vent
 To my ardor and my aim
 And break into very flame —

Then I reach, I must believe,
 Not her soul in vain,
 For to me again
 It reaches, and past retrieve
 Is wound in the toils I weave ;

And must follow as I require,
 As befits a thrall,
 Bringing flesh and all,
 Essence and earth-attire,
 To the source of the tractile fire :

Till the house called hers, not mine,
 With a growing weight
 Seems to suffocate
 If she break not its leaden line
 And escape from its close confine.

Out of doors into the night !
 On to the maze
 Of the wild wood-ways,
 Not turning to left nor right
 From the pathway, blind with sight —

Making through rain and wind
 O'er the broken shrubs,
 'Twixt the stems and stubs,
 With a still, composed, strong mind,
 Nor a care for the world behind —

Swifter and still more swift,
 As the crowding peace
 Doth to joy increase
 In the wide blind eyes uplift
 Through the darkness and the drift !

While I — to the shape, I too
 Feel my soul dilate
 Nor a whit abate,
 And relax not a gesture due,
 As I see my belief come true.

For, there ! have I drawn or no
 Life to that lip ?
 Do my fingers dip
 In a flame which again they throw
 On the cheek that breaks aglow ?

Ha ! was the hair so first ?
 What, unfilleted,
 Made alive, and spread
 Through the void with a rich outburst,
 Chestnut gold-interspersed ?

Like the doors of a casket-shrine,
 See, on either side,
 Her two arms divide
 Till the heart betwixt makes sign,
 Take me, for I am thine !

“ Now — now ” — the door is heard !
 Hark, the stairs ! and near —

Nearer — and here —
 “ Now ! ” and at call the third
 She enters without a word.

On doth she march and on
 To the fancied shape ;
 It is, past escape,
 Herself, now : the dream is done
 And the shadow and she are one.

First I will pray. Do Thou
 That ownest the soul,
 Yet wilt grant control
 To another, nor disallow
 For a time, restrain me now !

I admonish me while I may,
 Not to squander guilt,
 Since require Thou wilt
 At my hand its price one day !
 What the price is, who can say ?

THE GLOVE

(PETER RONSARD loquitur.)

“ HEIGHO,” yawned one day King Francis,
 “ Distance all value enhances !
 When a man's busy, why, leisure
 Strikes him as wonderful pleasure :
 'Faith, and at leisure once is he ?
 Straightway he wants to be busy.
 Here we've got peace ; and aghast I'm Caught thinking war the true pastime.
 Is there a reason in metre ?
 Give us your speech, master Peter ! ”
 I who, if mortal dare say so,
 Ne'er am at loss with my Naso,
 “Sire,” I replied, “ joys prove cloudlets :
 Men are the merest Ixions ” —
 Here the King whistled aloud, “ Let's — Heigho — go look at our lions ! ”
 Such are the sorrowful chances
 If you talk fine to King Francis.

And so, to the courtyard proceeding
 Our company, Francis was leading,
 Increased by new followers tenfold
 Before he arrived at the penfold ;
 Lords, ladies, like clouds which bedizen
 At sunset the western horizon.
 And Sir De Lorge pressed 'mid the foremost
 With the dame he professed to adore most.
 Oh, what a face ! One by fits eyed
 Her, and the horrible pitside ;
 For the penfold surrounded a hollow
 Which led where the eye scarce dared follow,
 And shelved to the chamber secluded
 Where Bluebeard, the great lion, brooded.
 The King hailed his keeper, an Arab
 As glossy and black as a scarab,
 And bade him make sport and at once stir
 Up and out of his den the old monster.
 They opened a hole in the wire-work
 Across it, and dropped there a firework,
 And fled : one's heart's beating redoubled ;
 A pause, while the pit's mouth was troubled,
 The blackness and silence so utter.

By the firework's slow sparkling and sputter ;
Then earth in a sudden contortion
Gave out to our gaze her abortion.
Such a brute ! Were I friend Clement Marot (Whose experience of nature 's but narrow,
And whose faculties move in no small mist
When he versifies David the Psalmist)
I should study that brute to describe you
Illum Juda Leonem de Tribu.

One's whole blood grew curdling and creepy
To see the black mane, vast and heapy,
The tail in the air stiff and straining,
The wide eyes, nor waxing nor waning,
As over the barrier which bounded
His platform, and us who surrounded
The barrier, they reached and they rested
On space that might stand him in best stead :
For who knew, he thought, what the amazement,
The eruption of clatter and blaze meant,
And if, in this minute of wonder,
No outlet, 'mid lightning and thunder,
Lay broad, and, his shackles all shivered,
The lion at last was delivered ?
Ay, that was the open sky o'erhead !
And you saw by the flash on his forehead,
By the hope in those eyes wide and steady,
He was leagues in the desert already,
Driving the flocks up the mountain,
Or catlike couched hard by the fountain
To waylay the date-gathering negress :
So guarded he entrance or egress.
"How he stands !" quoth the King : "we may well swear,

(No novice, we've won our spurs elsewhere
And so can afford the confession.)
We exercise wholesome discretion
In keeping aloof from his threshold,
Once hold you, those jaws want no fresh hold,
Their first would too pleasantly purloin
The visitor's brisket or surloin :
But who 's he would prove so fool-hardy ?
Not the best man of Marignan, pardie !"

The sentence no sooner was uttered,
Than over the rails a glove fluttered,
Fell close to the lion, and rested :
The dame 't was, who flung it and jested
With life so, De Lorge had been wooing
For months past ; he sat there pursuing
His suit, weighing out with nonchalance
Fine speeches like gold from a balance.

Sound the trumpet, no true knight 's a tarrier !
De Lorge made one leap at the barrier,
Walked straight to the glove, — while the lion
Ne'er moved, kept his far-reaching eye on
The palm-tree-edged desert-spring's sapphire,
And the musky oiled skin of the Kaffir, —
Picked it up, and as calmly retreated,
Leaped back where the lady was seated,
And full in the face of its owner
Flung the glove.

"Your heart's queen, you dethrone her ?
So should I !" — cried the King — " 't was mere vanity,
Not love, set that task to humanity !"

Lords and ladies alike turned with loathing
From such a proved wolf in sheep's clothing.

Not so, I ; for I caught an expression
In her brow's undisturbed self-possession
Amid the Court's scoffing and merriment, —
As if from no pleasing experiment
She rose, yet of pain not much heedful
So long as the process was needful, —
As if she had tried in a crucible,
To what "speeches like gold" were reducible,
And, finding the finest prove copper,
Felt the smoke in her face was but proper ;
To know what she had not to trust to,
Was worth all the ashes and dust too.
She went out 'mid hooting and laughter ;
Clement Marot stayed ; I followed after,
And asked, as a grace, what it all meant ?
If she wished not the rash deed's recallment ?
"For I" — so I spoke — "am a poet :
Human nature, — behoooves that I know it !"

She told me, "Too long had I heard
Of the deed proved alone by the word :
For my love — what De Lorge would not dare !
With my scorn — what De Lorge could compare !

And the endless descriptions of death
He would brave when my lip formed a breath,
I must reckon as braved, or, of course,
Doubt his word — and moreover, perforce,
For such gifts as no lady could spurn,
Must offer my love in return.
When I looked on your lion, it brought
All the dangers at once to my thought,
Encountered by all sorts of men,
Before he was lodged in his den, —
From the poor slave whose club or bare hands
Dug the trap, set the snare on the sands,
With no King and no Court to applaud,
By no shame, should he shrink, overawed,
Yet to capture the creature made shift,
That his rude boys might laugh at the gift,
— To the page who last leaped o'er the fence
Of the pit, on no greater pretence
Than to get back the bonnet he dropped,
Lest his pay for a week should be stopped.
So, wiser I judged it to make
One trial what 'death for my sake'
Really meant, while the power was yet mine,
Than to wait until time should define
Such a phrase not so simply as I,
Who took it to mean just 'to die.'
The blow a glove gives is but weak :
Does the mark yet discolor my cheek ?
But when the heart suffers a blow,
Will the pain pass so soon, do you know ?"

I looked, as away she was sweeping,
And saw a youth eagerly keeping
As close as he dared to the doorway.
No doubt that a noble should more weigh
His life than befits a plebeian ;
And yet, had our brute been Nemean —
(I judge by a certain calm fervor
The youth stepped with, forward to serve her) — He'd have scarce thought you did him the worst turn

If you whispered, "Friend, what you'd get,
first earn!"

And when, shortly after, she carried
Her shame from the Court, and they married,
To that marriage some happiness, maugre
The voice of the Court, I dared augur.

For De Lorge, he made women with men vie,
Those in wonder and praise, these in envy;
And in short stood so plain a head taller
That he wooed and won . . . how do you call
her?

The beauty, that rose in the sequel
To the King's love, who loved her a week well.
And 't was noticed he never would honor
De Lorge (who looked daggers upon her)
With the easy commission of stretching
His legs in the service, and fetching
His wife, from her chamber, those straying
Sad gloves she was always mislaying,
While the King took the closet to chat in, —
But of course this adventure came pat in.
And never the King told the story,
How bringing a glove brought such glory,
But the wife smiled — "His nerves are grown firmer:

Mine he brings now and utters no murmur."

With which moral I drop my theorbos.

TIME'S REVENGES

I've a Friend, over the sea;
I like him, but he loves me.
It all grew out of the books I write;
They find such favor in his sight
That he slaughters you with savage looks
Because you don't admire my books.
He does himself though, — and if some vein
Were to snap to-night in this heavy brain,
To-morrow month, if I lived to try,
Round should I just turn quietly,
Or out of the bedclothes stretch my hand
Till I found him, come from his foreign land
To be my nurse in this poor place,
And make my broth and wash my face
And light my fire and, all the while,
Bear with his old good-humored smile
That I told him "Better have kept away
Than come and kill me, night and day,
With, worse than fever throbs and shoots,
The creaking of his clumsy boots."
I am as sure that this he would do,
As that Saint Paul's is striking two.
And I think I rather . . . woe is me!

— Yes, rather should see him than not see,
If lifting a hand could seat him there
Before me in the empty chair
To-night, when my head aches indeed,
And I can neither think nor read,
Nor make these purple fingers hold
The pen; this garret's freezing cold!

And I've a Lady — there he wakes,
The laughing fiend and prince of snakes

Within me, at her name, to pray
Fate send some creature in the way
Of my love for her, to be down-torn,
Upthrust and outward-borne,
So I might prove myself that sea
Of passion which I needs must be!
Call my thoughts false and my fancies quaint
And my style infirm and its figures faint,
All the critics say, and more blame yet,
And not one angry word you get.
But, please you, wonder I would put
My cheek beneath that lady's foot
Rather than trample under mine
The laurels of the Florentine,
And you shall see how the devil spends
A fire God gave for other ends!
I tell you, I stride up and down
This garret, crowned with love's best crown,
And feasted with love's perfect feast,
To think I kill for her, at least,
Body and soul and peace and fame,
Alike youth's end and manhood's aim,
— So is my spirit, as flesh with sin,
Filled full, eaten out and in
With the face of her, the eyes of her,
The lips, the little chin, the stir
Of shadow round her mouth; and she
— I'll tell you — calmly would decree
That I should roast at a slow fire,
If that would compass her desire
And make her one whom they invite
To the famous ball to-morrow night.

There may be heaven; there must be hell;
Meantime, there is our earth here — well!

THE ITALIAN IN ENGLAND

Both this poem and the following were written after Browning's visit to Italy in 1844. A originally published they were entitled Italy, in England and England in Italy. The dramatic incident in the former poem was not a rescript of a particular historic incident.

THAT second time they hunted me
From hill to plain, from shore to sea,
And Austria, hounding far and wide
Her blood-hounds through the country-side,
Breathed hot and instant on my trace, —
I made six days a hiding-place
Of that dry green old aqueduct
Where I and Charles, when boys, have plucked
The fire-flies from the roof above,
Bright creeping through the moss they love:
— How long it seems since Charles was lost!
Six days the soldiers crossed and crossed
The country in my very sight;
And when that peril ceased at night,
The sky broke out in red dismay
With signal fires; well, there I lay
Close covered o'er in my recess,
Up to the neck in ferns and cress,
Thinking on Metternich our friend,
And Charles's miserable end,
And much beside, two days; the third,

Hunger o'ercame me when I heard
 The peasants from the village go
 To work among the maize ; you know,
 With us in Lombardy, they bring
 Provisions packed on mules, a string
 With little bells that cheer their task,
 And casks, and boughs on every cask
 To keep the sun's heat from the wine ;
 These I let pass in jingling line,
 And, close on them, dear noisy crew,
 The peasants from the village, too ;
 For at the very rear would troop
 Their wives and sisters in a group
 To help, I knew. When these had passed,
 I threw my glove to strike the last,
 Taking the chance : she did not start,
 Much less cry out, but stooped apart,
 One instant rapidly glanced round,
 And saw me beckon from the ground ;
 A wild bush grows and hides my crypt ;
 She picked my glove up while she stripped
 A branch off, then rejoined the rest
 With that ; my glove lay in her breast.
 Then I drew breath : they disappeared :
 It was for Italy I feared.

An hour, and she returned alone
 Exactly where my glove was thrown.
 Meanwhile came many thoughts ; on me
 Rested the hopes of Italy ;
 I had devised a certain tale
 Which, when 't was told her, could not fail
 Persuade a peasant of its truth ;
 I meant to call a freak of youth
 This hiding, and give hopes of pay,
 And no temptation to betray.
 But when I saw that woman's face,
 Its calm simplicity of grace,
 Our Italy's own attitude
 In which she walked thus far, and stood,
 Planting each naked foot so firm,
 To crush the snake and spare the worm —
 At first sight of her eyes, I said,
 " I am that man upon whose head
 They fix the price, because I hate
 The Austrians over us : the State
 Will give you gold — oh, gold so much ! —
 If you betray me to their clutch,
 And be your death, for aught I know,
 If once they find you saved their foe.
 Now, you must bring me food and drink,
 And also paper, pen and ink,
 And carry safe what I shall write
 To Padua, which you 'll reach at night
 Before the duomo shuts ; go in,
 And wait till Tenebræ begin ;
 Walk to the third confessional,
 Between the pillar and the wall,
 And kneeling whisper, Whence comes peace ?
 Say it a second time, then cease ;
 And if the voice inside returns,
 From Christ and Freedom ; what concerns
 The cause of Peace ? — for answer, slip
 My letter where you placed your lip ;
 Then come back happy we have done
 Our mother service — I, the son,
 As you the daughter of our land ! "

Three mornings more, she took her stand
 In the same place, with the same eyes :
 I was no surer of sunrise
 Than of her coming. We conferred
 Of her own prospects, and I heard
 She had a lover — stout and tall,
 She said — then let her eyelids fall,
 " He could do much " — as if some doubt
 Entered her heart, — then, passing out,
 " She could not speak for others, who Had other thoughts ; herself she knew : "
 And so she brought me drink and food.
 After four days, the scouts pursued
 Another path ; at last arrived
 The help my Paduan friends contrived
 To furnish me : she brought the news.
 For the first time I could not choose
 But kiss her hand, and lay my own
 Upon her head — " This faith was shown
 To Italy, our mother ; she Uses my hand and blesses thee."
 She followed down to the sea-shore ;
 I left and never saw her more.

How very long since I have thought
 Concerning — much less wished for — aught
 Beside the good of Italy,
 For which I live and mean to die !
 I never was in love ; and since
 Charles proved false, what shall now convince
 My inmost heart I have a friend ?
 However, if I pleased to spend
 Real wishes on myself — say, three —
 I know at least what one should be.
 I would grasp Mettemnich until
 I felt his red wet throat distil
 In blood through these two hands. And next,
 — Nor much for that am I perplexed —
 Charles, perjured traitor, for his part,
 Should die slow of a broken heart
 Under his new employers. Last — Ah, there, what should I wish ? For fast
 Do I grow old and out of strength.
 If I resolved to seek at length
 My father's house again, how scared
 They all would look, and unprepared !
 My brothers live in Austria's pay
 — Disowned me long ago, men say ;
 And all my early mates who used
 To praise me so — perhaps induced
 More than one early step of mine —
 Are turning wise : while some opine
 " Freedom grows license," some suspect
 " Haste breeds delay," and recollect
 They always said, such premature
 Beginnings never could endure !
 So, with a sullen " All's for best,"
 The land seems settling to its rest.
 I think then, I should wish to stand
 This evening in that dear, lost land,
 Over the sea the thousand miles,
 And know if yet that woman smiles
 With the calm smile ; some little farm
 She lives in there, no doubt : what harm
 If I sat on the door-side bench,
 And, while her spindle made a trench
 Fantastically in the dust,
 Inquired of all her fortunes — just

Her children's ages and their names,
And what may be the husband's aims
For each of them. I'd talk this out,
And sit there, for an hour about,
Then kiss her hand once more, and lay
Mine on her head, and go my way.

So much for idle wishing — how
It steals the time! To business now.

THE ENGLISHMAN IN ITALY

PIANO DI SORRENTO

FORTÙ, Fortù, my beloved one,
Sit here by my side,
On my knees put up both little feet!
I was sure, if I tried,
I could make you laugh spite of Scirocco.
Now, open your eyes,
Let me keep you amused till he vanish
In black from the skies,
With telling my memories over
As you tell your beads;
All the Plain saw me gather, I garland
— The flowers or the weeds.
Time for rain! for your long hot dry Autumn
Had net-worked with brown
The white skin of each grape on the bunches,
Marked like a quail's crown,
Those creatures you make such account of,
Whose heads, — speckled white
Over brown like a great spider's back,
As I told you last night, —
Your mother bites off for her supper.
Red-ripe as could be,
Pomegranates were chapping and splitting
In halves on the tree:
And betwixt the loose walls of great flintstone,
Or in the thick dust
On the path, or straight out of the rock-side,
Wherever could thrust
Some burnt sprig of bold hardy rock-flower
Its yellow face up,
For the prize were great butterflies fighting,
Some five for one cup.
So, I guessed, ere I got up this morning,
What change was in store,
By the quick rustle-down of the quail-nets
Which woke me before
I could open my shutter, made fast
With a bough and a stone,
And look through the twisted dead vine-twigs,
Sole lattice that's known.
Quick and sharp rang the rings down the net-poles,
While, busy beneath,
Your priest and his brother tugged at them,
The rain in their teeth.
And out upon all the flat house-roofs
Where split figs lay drying,
The girls took the frails under cover:
Nor use seemed in trying
To get out the boats and go fishing,
For, under the cliff,
Fierce the black water frothed o'er the blind-
rock,
No seeing our skiff

Arrive about noon from Amalfi,
— Our fisher arrive,
And pitch down his basket before us,
All trembling alive
With pink and gray jellies, your sea-fruit;
You touch the strange lumps,
And mouths gape there, eyes open, all manner
Of horns and of humps,
Which only the fisher looks grave at,
While round him like imps
Cling screaming the children as naked
And brown as his shrimps;
Himself too as bare to the middle
— You see round his neck
The string and its brass coin suspended,
That saves him from wreck.
But to-day not a boat reached Salerno,
So back, to a man,
Came our friends, with whose help in the vineyards
Grape-harvest began.
In the vat, halfway up in our house-side,
Like blood the juice spins,
While your brother all bare-legged is dancing
Till breathless he grins
Dead-beaten in effort on effort
To keep the grapes under,
Since still when he seems all but master,
In pours the fresh plunder
From girls who keep coming and going
With basket on shoulder,
And eyes shut against the rain's driving;
Your girls that are older, —
For under the hedges of aloe,
And where, on its bed
Of the orchard's black mould, the love-apple
Lies pulpy and red,
All the young ones are kneeling and filling
Their laps with the snails
Tempted out by this first rainy weather, —
Your best of regales,
As to-night will be proved to my sorrow,
When, supping in state,
We shall feast our grape-gleaners (two dozen,
Three over one plate)
With lasagne so tempting to swallow
In slippery ropes,
And gourds fried in great purple slices,
That color of popes.
Meantime, see the grape bunch they've brought
you:
The rain-water slips
O'er the heavy blue bloom on each globe
Which the wasp to your lips
Still follows with fretful persistence:
Nay, taste, while awake,
This half of a curd-white smooth che se-ball
That peels, flake by flake,
Like an onion, each smoother and whiter;
Next, sip this weak wine
From the thin green glass flask, with its stopper,
A leaf of the vine;
And end with the prickly-pear's red flesh
That leaves through its juice
The stony black seeds on your pearl-teeth.
Scirocco is loose!
Hark, the quick, whistling pelt of the olives

Which, thick in one's track,
Tempt the stranger to pick up and bite them,
Though not yet half black !
How the old twisted olive trunks shudder,
The medlars let fall
Their hard fruit, and the brittle great fig-
trees
Snap off, figs and all,
For here comes the whole of the tempest !
No refuge, but creep
Back again to my side and my shoulder,
And listen or sleep.

Oh, how will your country show next week,
When all the vine-boughs
Have been stripped of their foliage to pasture
The mules and the cows ?
Last eve, I rode over the mountains ;
Your brother, my guide,
Soon left me, to feast on the myrtles
That offered, each side,
Their fruit-balls, black, glossy and luscious, —
Or strip from the sorbs
A treasure, or, rosy and wondrous,
Those hairy gold orbs !
But my mule picked his sure sober path out,
Just stopping to neigh
When he recognized down in the valley
His mates on their way
With the faggots and barrels of water ;
And soon we emerged
From the plain, where the woods could scarce
follow ;
And still as we urged
Our way, the woods wondered, and left us,
As up still we trudged,
Though the wild path grew wilder each instant,
And place was e'en grudged
'Mid the rock-chasms and piles of loose stones
Like the loose broken teeth
Of some monster which climbed there to die
From the ocean beneath —
Place was grudged to the silver-gray fume-weed
That clung to the path,
And dark rosemary ever a-dying
That, 'spite the wind's wrath,
So loves the salt rock's face to seaward,
And lentisks as stanch
To the stone where they root and bear berries,
And . . . what shows a branch
Coral-colored, transparent, with circlets
Of pale seagreen leaves ;
Over all trod my mule with the caution
Of gleaners o'er sheaves,
Still, foot after foot like a lady,
Till, round after round,
He climbed to the top of Calvano,
And God's own profound
Was above me, and round me the mountains,
And under, the sea,
And within me my heart to bear witness
What was and shall be.
Oh, heaven and the terrible crystal !
No rampart excludes
Your eye from the life to be lived
In the blue solitudes.
Oh, those mountains, their infinite movement !
Still moving with you ;

For, ever some new head and breast of them
Thrusts into view
To observe the intruder ; you see it
If quickly you turn
And, before they escape you, surprise them.
They grudge you should learn
How the soft plains they look on, lean over
And love (they pretend)
— Cower beneath them, the flat sea-pine crouches,
The wild fruit-trees bend,
E'en the myrtle-leaves curl, shrink and shut :
All is silent and grave :
'T is a sensual and timorous beauty,
How fair ! but a slave.
So, I turned to the sea ; and there slumbered
As greenly as ever
Those isles of the siren, your Galli ;
No ages can sever
The Three, nor enable their sister
To join them, — halfway
On the voyage, she looked at Ulysses —
No farther to-day,
Though the small one, just launched in the wave
Watches breast-high and steady
From under the rock, her bold sister
Swum halfway already.
Forth, shall we sail there together
And see from the sides
Quite new rocks show their faces, new haunts
Where the siren abides ?
Shall we sail round and round them, close over
The rocks, though unseen,
That ruffle the gray glassy water
To glorious green ?
Then scramble from splinter to splinter,
Reach land and explore,
On the largest, the strange square black turret
With never a door,
Just a loop to admit the quick lizards ;
Then, stand there and hear
The birds' quiet singing, that tells us
What life is, so clear ?
— The secret they sang to Ulysses
When, ages ago,
He heard and he knew this life's secret
I hear and I know.

Ah, see ! The sun breaks o'er Calvano ;
He strikes the great gloom
And flutters it o'er the mount's summit
In airy gold fume.
All is over. Look out, see the gypsy,
Our tinker and smith,
Has arrived, set up bellows and forge,
And down-squatted forthwith
To his hammering, under the wall there ;
One eye keeps aloof
The urchins that itch to be putting
His jews'-harps to proof,
While the other, through locks of curled wire,
Is watching how sleek
Shines the hog, come to share in the windfall
— Chew abbot's own cheek !
All is over. Wake up and come out now,
And down let us go,
And see the fine things got in order
At church for the show

Of the Sacrament, set forth this evening ;
 To-morrow 's the Feast
 Of the Rosary's Virgin, by no means
 Of Virgins the least,
 As you 'll hear in the off-hand discourse
 Which (all nature, no art)
 The Dominican brother, these three weeks,
 Was getting by heart.
 Not a pillar nor post but is dizen'd
 With red and blue papers ;
 All the roof waves with ribbons, each altar
 Ablaze with long tapers ;
 But the great masterpiece is the scaffold
 Rigged glorious to hold
 All the fiddlers and fifers and drummers
 And trumpeters bold,
 Not afraid of Bellini nor Auber,
 Who, when the priest's hoarse,
 Will strike us up something that's brisk
 For the feast's second course.
 And then will the flaxen-wigged Image
 Be carried in pomp
 Through the plain, while in gallant procession
 The priests mean to stomp.
 All round the glad church lie old bottles
 With gunpowder stopped,
 Which will be, when the Image re-enters,
 Religiously popped ;
 And at night from the crest of Calvano
 Great bonfires will hang,
 On the plain will the trumpets join chorus,
 And more proppers bang.
 At all events, come — to the garden
 As far as the wall ;
 See me tap with a hoe on the plaster
 Till out there shall fall
 A scorpion with wide angry nippers !

— "Such trifles !" you say ?
 Forth, in my England at home,
 Men meet gravely to-day
 And debate, if abolishing Corn-laws
 Be righteous and wise
 — If 't were proper, Scirocco should vanish
 In black from the skies !

IN A GONDOLA

In a letter to Miss Haworth, Browning writes,
 "I am getting to love painting as I did once.
 . . . I chanced to call on Forster the other day, and he pressed me into committing verse on the instant, not the minute, in Maclise's behalf, who has wrought a divine Venetian work, it seems, for the British Institution. Forster described it well — but I could do nothing better than this wooden ware — (all the 'properties,' as we say, were given and the problem was how to catalogue them in rhyme and unreason.)"
 Thereupon followed the first stanza of the following poem ; but after seeing the picture he was moved to go on and carry the poem through to a real end.

He sings.

I SEND my heart up to thee, all my heart
 In this my singing.
 For the stars help me, and the sea bears part ;
 The very night is clinging
 Closer to Venice' streets to leave one space
 Above me, whence thy face
 May light my joyous heart to thee its dwelling-
 place.

She speaks.

Say after me, and try to say
 My very words, as if each word
 Came from you of your own accord,
 In your own voice, in your own way :
 "This woman's heart and soul and brain
 Are mine as much as this gold chain
 She bids me wear ; which " (say again)
 "A precious to make by cherishing
 A precious thing, or choose to fling
 Over the boat-side, ring by ring."
 And yet once more say . . . no word more !
 Since words are only words. Give o'er !

Unless you call me, all the same,
 Familiarly by my pet name,
 Which if the Three should hear you call,
 And me reply to, would proclaim
 At once our secret to them all.
 Ask of me, too, command me, blame —
 Do, break down the partition-wall
 'Twixt us, the daylight world beholds
 Curtained in dusk and splendid folds !
 What's left but — all of me to take ?
 I am the Three's : prevent them, slake
 Your thirst ! 'T is said, the Arab sage,
 In practising with gems, can loose
 Their subtle spirit in his cruce
 And leave but ashes : so, sweet mage,
 Leave them my ashes when thy use
 Sucks out my soul, thy heritage !

He sings.

Past we glide, and past, and past !
 What's that poor Agnese doing
 Where they make the shutters fast ?
 Gray Zanobi's just a-wooing
 To his couch the purchased bride :
 Past we glide !

Past we glide, and past, and past !
 Why 's the Pucci Palace flaring
 Like a beacon to the blast ?
 Guests by hundreds, not one caring
 If the dear host's neck were wried :
 Past we glide !

She sings.

The moth's kiss, first !
 Kiss me as if you made believe
 You were not sure, this eve,
 How my face, your flower, had purs'd
 Its petals up ; so, here and there
 You brush it, till I grow aware
 Who wants me, and wide ope I burst.

The bee's kiss, now !
 Kiss me as if you entered gay

My heart at some noonday,
A bud that dares not disallow
The claim, so all is rendered up,
And passively its shattered cup
Over your head to sleep I bow.

He sings.

What are we two?
I am a Jew,
And carry thee, farther than friends can pursue,
To a feast of our tribe;
Where they need thee to bribe
The devil that blasts them unless he imbibe Thy . . . Scatter the vision forever! And
now,
As of old, I am I, thou art thou!

Say again, what we are?
The sprite of a star,
I lure thee above where the destinies bar
My plumes their full play
Till a ruddier ray
Than my pale one announce there is withering
away
Some . . . Scatter the vision forever! And
now,
As of old, I am I, thou art thou!

He muses.

Oh, which were best, to roam or rest?
The land's lap or the water's breast?
To sleep on yellow millet-sheaves,
Or swim in lucid shallows just
Eluding water-lily leaves,
An inch from Death's black fingers, thrust
To lock you, whom release he must;
Which life were best on Summer eves?

He speaks, musing.

Lie back; could thought of mine improve you?
From this shoulder let there spring
A wing; from this, another wing;
Wings, not legs and feet, shall move you!
Snow-white must they spring, to blend
With your flesh, but I intend
They shall deepen to the end,
Broader, into burning gold,
Till both wings crescent-wise enfold
Your perfect self, from 'neath your feet
To o'er your head, where, lo, they meet
As if a million sword-blades hurled
Defiance from you to the world!

Rescue me thou, the only real!
And scare away this mad ideal
That came, nor motions to depart!
Thanks! Now, stay ever as thou art!

Still he muses.

What if the Three should catch at last
Thy serenader? While there's cast
Paul's cloak about my head, and fast
Gian pinions me, Himself has past
His stylet through my back; I reel;
And . . . is it thou I feel?

They trail me, these three godless knaves,
Past every church that saints and saves,

Nor stop till, where the cold sea raves
By Lido's wet accursed graves,
They scoop mine, roll me to its brink,
And . . . on thy breast I sink!

She replies, musing.

Dip your arm o'er the boat-side, elbow-deep,
As I do: thus: were death so unlike sleep,
Caught this way? Death's to fear from flame or steel,
Or poison doubtless; but from water—feel!

Go find the bottom! Would you stay me?
There!

Now pluck a great blade of that ribbon-grass
To plait in where the foolish jewel was,
I flung away: since you have praised my hair,
'T is proper to be choice in what I wear.

He speaks.

Row home? must we row home? Too surely Know I where its front's demurely
Over the Giudecca piled;
Window just with window mating,
Door on door exactly waiting,
All's the set face of a child:
But behind it, where's a trace
Of the staidness and reserve,
And formal lines without a curve,
In the same child's playing-face?
No two windows look one way
O'er the small sea-water thread
Below them. Ah, the autumn day
I, passing, saw you overhead!
First, out a cloud of curtain blew,
Then a sweet cry, and last came you—
To catch your lory that must needs
Escape just then, of all times then,
To peck a tall plant's fleecy seeds,
And make me happiest of men.
I scarce could breathe to see you reach
So far back o'er the balcony
To catch him ere he climbed too high
Above you in the Smyrna peach,
That quick the round smooth cord of gold,
This coiled hair on your head, unrolled,
Fell down you like a gorgeous snake
The Roman girls were wont, of old,
When Rome there was, for coolness' sake
To let lie curling o'er their bosoms.
Dear lory, may his beak retain
Ever its delicate rose stain
As if the wounded lotus-blossoms
Had marked their thief to know again!

Stay longer yet, for others' sake
Than mine! What should your chamber do?
— With all its rarities that ache
In silence while day lasts, but wake
At night-time and their life renew,
Suspended just to pleasure you
Who brought against their will together
These objects, and, while day lasts, weave
Around them such a magic tether
That dumb they look: your harp, believe,
With all the sensitive tight strings
Which dare not speak, now to itself
Breathes slumberously, as if some elf

Went in and out the chords, his wings
 Make murmur wheresoe'er they graze,
 As an angel may, between the maze
 Of midnight palace-pillars, on
 And on, to sow God's plagues, have gone
 Through guilty glorious Babylon.
 And while such murmurs flow, the nymph
 Bends o'er the harp-top from her shell
 As the dry limpet for the lymph
 Come with a tune he knows so well.
 And how your statues' hearts must swell !
 And how your pictures must descend
 To see each other, friend with friend !
 Oh, could you take them by surprise,
 You 'd find Schidone's eager Duke
 Doing the quaintest courtesies
 To that prim saint by Haste-thee-Luke !
 And, deeper into her rock den,
 Bold Castelfranco's Magdalen
 You 'd find retreated from the ken
 Of that robbed counsel-keeping Ser —
 As if the Tizian thinks of her,
 And is not, rather, gravely bent
 On seeing for himself what toys
 Are these, his progeny invent.
 What litter now the board employs
 Whereon he signed a document
 That got him murdered ! Each enjoys
 Its night so well, you cannot break
 The sport up, so, indeed must make
 More stay with me, for others' sake.

She speaks.

To-morrow, if a harp-string, say,
 Is used to tie the jasmine back
 That overfloods my room with sweets,
 Contrive your Zorzi somehow meets
 My Zanze ! If the ribbon's black,
 The Three are watching : keep away !

Your gondola — let Zorzi wreathe
 A mesh of water-weeds about
 Its prow, as if he unaware
 Had struck some quay or bridge-foot stair !
 That I may throw a paper out
 As you and he go underneath.

There's Zanze's vigilant taper ; safe are we,
 Only one minute more to-night with me ?
 Resume your past self of a month ago !
 Be you the bashful gallant, I will be
 The lady with the colder breast than snow.
 Now bow you, as becomes, nor touch my hand
 More than I touch yours when I step to land,
 And say, " All thanks, Siora ! " —

Heart to heart

And lips to lips ! Yet once more, ere we part,
 Clasp me and make me thine, as mine thou art !

He is surprised, and stabbed.

It was ordained to be so, sweet ! — and best Comes now, beneath thine eyes, upon thy breast.

Still kiss me ! Care not for the cowards ! Care
 Only to put aside thy beauteous hair
 My blood will hurt ! The Three, I do not scorn
 To death, because they never lived : but I Have lived indeed, and so — (yet one more kiss) — can die !

WARING

An account of Alfred Domett, Browning's early friend, who was the occasion of this poem, will be found in the notes.

I

I

WHAT 's become of Waring
 Since he gave us all the slip,
 Chose land-travel or seafaring,
 Boots and chest or staff and scrip,
 Rather than pace up and down
 Any longer London town ?

II

Who 'd have guessed it from his lip
 Or his brow's accustomed bearing,
 On the night he thus took ship
 Or started landward ? — little caring
 For us, it seems, who supped together
 (Friends of his too, I remember)
 And walked home through the merry weather,
 The snowiest in all December.
 I left his arm that night myself
 For what 's-his-name's, the new prose-poet
 Who wrote the book there, on the shelf —
 How, forsooth, was I to know it
 If Waring meant to glide away
 Like a ghost at break of day ?
 Never looked he half so gay !

III

He was prouder than the devil :
 How he must have cursed our revel !
 Ay and many other meetings,
 Indoor visits, outdoor greetings,
 As up and down he paced this London,
 With no work done, but great works undone,
 Where scarce twenty knew his name.
 Why not, then, have earlier spoken,
 Written, bustled ? Who 's to blame
 If your silence kept unbroken ?
 " True, but there were sundry jottings,
 Stray-leaves, fragments, blurs and blottings,
 Certain first steps were achieved
 Already which " — (is that your meaning ?)
 " Had well borne out who'er believed In more to come ! " But who goes gleaning Hedgeside chance-blades, while full-sheaved
 Stand cornfields by him ? Pride, o'erweening
 Pride alone, puts forth such claims
 O'er the day's distinguished names.

IV

Meantime, how much I loved him,
 I find out now I've lost him,
 I who cared not if I moved him,
 Who could so carelessly accost him,
 Henceforth never shall get free
 Of his ghostly company.
 His eyes that just a little wink
 As deep I go into the merit
 Of this and that distinguished spirit —
 His cheeks' raised color, soon to sink,

As long I dwell on some stupendous
And tremendous (Heaven defend us!)
Monstr'-inform'-ingens-horrend-ous
Demoniaco-seraphic
Penman's latest piece of graphic.
Nay, my very wrist grows warm
With his dragging weight of arm.
E'en so, swimmingly appears,
Through one's after-supper musings,
Some lost lady of old years
With her beauteous vain endeavor
And goodness unrepaid as ever;
The face, accustomed to refusings,
We, puppies that we were . . . Oh never Surely, nice of conscience, scrupled
Being aught like false, forsooth, to?
Telling aught but honest truth to?
What a sin, had we centupled
Its possessor's grace and sweetness!
No! she heard in its completeness
Truth, for truth's a weighty matter,
And truth, at issue, we can't flatter!
Well, 't is done with; she's exempt
From damning us through such a sally;
And so she glides, as down a valley,
Taking up with her contempt,
Past our reach; and in, the flowers
Shut her unregarded hours.

V

Oh, could I have him back once more,
This Waring, but one half-day more!
Back, with the quiet face of yore,
So hungry for acknowledgment
Like mine! I'd fool him to his bent.
Feed, should not he, to heart's content?
I'd say, "to only have conceived,
Planned your great works, apart from progress,
Surpasses little works achieved!"
I'd lie so, I should be believed.
I'd make such havoc of the claims
Of the day's distinguished names
To feast him with, as feasts an ogress
Her feverish sharp-toothed gold-crowned child!
Or as one feasts a creature rarely
Captured here, unreconciled
To capture; and completely gives
Its pettish humors license, barely
Requiring that it lives.

VI

Ichabod, Ichabod,
The glory is departed!
Travels Waring East away?
Who, of knowledge, by hearsay,
Reports a man upstarted
Somewhere as a god,
Hordes grown European-hearted,
Millions of the wild made tame
On a sudden at his fame?
In Vishnu-land what Avatar?
Or who in Moscow, toward the Czar,
With the demurest of footfalls
Over the Kremlin's pavement bright
With serpentine and syenite,
Steps, with five other Generals
That simultaneously take snuff,
For each to have pretext enough

And kerchiefwise unfold his sash
Which, softness' self, is yet the staff
To hold fast where a steel chain snaps,
And leave the grand white neck no gash?
Waring in Moscow, to those rough
Cold northern natures born perhaps,
Like the lambwhite maiden dear
From the circle of mute kings
Unable to repress the tear,
Each as his sceptre down he flings,
To Dian's fane at Taurica,
Where now a captive priestess, she alway
Mingles her tender grave Hellenic speech
With theirs, tuned to the hailstone-beaten beach
As pours some pigeon, from the myrrhy lands
Rapt by the whirlblast to fierce Scythian strands

Where breed the swallows, her melodious cry
Amid their barbarous twitter!
In Russia? Never! Spain were fitter!
Ay, most likely 't is in Spain
That we and Waring meet again
Now, while he turns down that cool narrow lane
Into the blackness, out of grave Madrid
All fire and shine, abrupt as when there's slid
Its stiff gold blazing pall
From some black coffin-lid.
Or, best of all,
I love to think

The leaving us was just a feint;
Back here to London did he slink,
And now works on without a wink
Of sleep, and we are on the brink
Of something great in fresco-paint:
Some garret's ceiling, walls and floor,
Up and down and o'er and o'er
He splashes, as none splashed before
Since great Caldara Polidore.
Or Music means this land of ours
Some favor yet, to pity won
By Purcell from his Rosy Bowers, —
"Give me my so-long promised son,
Let Waring end what I begun!"
Then down he creeps and out he steals
Only when the night conceals
His face; in Kent 't is cherry-time,
Or hops are picking: or at prime
Of March he wanders as, too happy,
Years ago when he was young,
Some mild eve when woods grew sappy
And the early moths had sprung
To life from many a trembling sheath
Woven the warm boughs beneath;
While small birds said to themselves
What should soon be actual song,
And young gnats, by tens and twelves,
Made as if they were the throng
That crowd around and carry aloft
The sound they have nursed, so sweet and pure,
Out of a myriad noises soft,
Into a tone that can endure
Amid the noise of a July noon
When all God's creatures crave their boon,
All at once and all in tune,
And get it, happy as Waring then,
Having first within his ken
What a man might do with men:
And far too glad, in the even-glow.

To mix with the world he meant to take
 Into his hand, he told you, so —
 And out of it his world to make,
 To contract and to expand
 As he shut or oped his hand.
 O Waring, what 's to really be ?
 A clear stage and a crowd to see !
 Some Garrick, say, out shall not he
 The heart of Hamlet's mystery pluck ?
 Or, where most unclean beasts are rife,
 Some Junius — am I right ? — shall tuck
 His sleeve, and forth with flaying-knife !
 Some Chatterton shall have the luck
 Of calling Rowley into life !
 Some one shall somehow run a-muck
 With this old world for want of strife
 Sound asleep. Contrive, contrive
 To rouse us, Waring ! Who 's alive ?
 Our men scarce seem in earnest now.
 Distinguished names ! — but 't is, somehow,
 As if they played at being names
 Still more distinguished, like the games
 Of children. Turn our sport to earnest
 With a visage of the sternest !
 Bring the real times back, confessed
 Still better than our very best !

II

I

"When I last saw Waring . . ."
 (How all turned to him who spoke !
 You saw Waring ? Truth or joke ?
 In land-travel or sea-faring ?)

II

"We were sailing by Triest
 Where a day or two we harbored :
 A sunset was in the West,
 When, looking over the vessel's side,
 One of our company espied
 A sudden speck to larboard.
 And as a sea-duck flies and swims
 At once, so came the light craft up,
 With its sole lateen sail that trims
 And turns (the water round its rims Dancing, as round a sinking cup)
 And by us like a fish it curled,
 And drew itself up close beside,
 Its great sail on the instant furled,
 And o'er its thwarts a shrill voice cried,
 (A neck as bronzed as a Lascar's)
 'Buy wine of us, you English brig ?
 Or fruit, tobacco and cigars ?
 A pilot for you to Triest ?
 Without one, look you ne'er so big,
 They 'll never let you up the bay !
 We natives should know best.'
 I turned, and 'just those fellows' way,
 Our captain said, 'The 'long-shore thieves
 Are laughing at us in their sleeves.'

III

"In truth, the boy leaned laughing back ;
 And one, half-hidden by his side
 Under the furled sail, soon I spied,
 With great grass hat and kerchief black,

Who looked up with his kingly throat
 Said somewhat, while the other shook
 His hair back from his eyes to look
 Their longest at us ; then the boat,
 I know not how, turned sharply round,
 Laying her whole side on the sea
 As a leaping fish does ; from the lee
 Into the weather, cut somehow
 Her sparkling path beneath our bow
 And so went off, as with a bound,
 Into the rosy and golden half
 O' the sky, to overtake the sun
 And reach the shore, like the sea-calf
 Its singing cave ; yet I caught one
 Glance ere away the boat quite passed,
 And neither time nor toil could mar
 Those features : so I saw the last
 Of Waring ! " — You ? Oh, never star
 Was lost here but it rose afar !
 Look East, where whole new thousands are !
 In Vishnu-land what Avatar ?

THE TWINS

"Give" and "It-shall-be-given-unto-you"

Originally published in 1854, in connection with a poem by Mrs. Browning, A Plea for the Ragged Schools of London, in a volume issued for a bazaar to benefit the "Refuge for Young Destitute Girls."

GRAND rough old Martin Luther Bloomed fables — flowers on furze,
 The better the uncouth :
 Do roses stick like burrs ?

A beggar asked an alms
 One day at an abbey-door,
 Said Luther ; but, seized with qualms,
 The Abbot replied, "We 're poor !

"Poor, who had plenty once,
 When gifts fell thick as rain :
 But they give us naught, for the nonce,
 And how should we give again ?"

Then the beggar, "See your sins !
 Of old, unless I err,
 Ye had brothers for inmates, twins,
 Date and Dabitur.

"While Date was in good case
 Dabitur flourished too :
 For Dabitur's lenten face
 No wonder if Date rue.

"Would ye retrieve the one ?
 Try and make plump the other !
 When Date's penance is done,
 Dabitur helps his brother.

"Only, beware relapse !"
 The Abbot hung his head.
 This beggar might be perhaps
 An angel, Luther said.

A LIGHT WOMAN

So far as our story approaches the end,
Which do you pity the most of us three? —
My friend, or the mistress of my friend
With her wanton eyes, or me?

My friend was already too good to lose,
And seemed in the way of improvement
yet,
When she crossed his path with her huntingnoose,
And over him drew her net.

When I saw him tangled in her toils,
A shame, said I, if she adds just him
To her nine-and-ninety other spoils,
The hundredth for a whim!

And before my friend be wholly hers,
How easy to prove to him, I said,
An eagle's the game her pride prefers,
Though she snaps at a wren instead!

So, I gave her eyes my own eyes to take,
My hand sought hers as in earnest need,
And round she turned for my noble sake,
And gave me herself indeed.

The eagle am I, with my fame in the world,
The wren is he, with his maiden face.
— You look away and your lip is curled?
Patience, a moment's space!

For see, my friend goes shaking and white;
He eyes me as the basilisk:
I have turned, it appears, his day to night,
Eclipsing his sun's disk.

And I did it, he thinks, as a very thief:
"Though I love her — that, he compre-hends —
One should master one's passions, (love, in chief)
And be loyal to one's friends!"

And she, — she lies in my hand as tame
As a pear late basking over a wall;
Just a touch to try and off it came;
'Tis mine, — can I let it fall?

With no mind to eat it, that's the worst!
Were it thrown in the road, would the case assist?

'T was quenching a dozen blue-flies' thirst
When I gave its stalk a twist.

And I, — what I seem to my friend, you see:
What I soon shall seem to his love, you
guess:
What I seem to myself, do you ask of me?
No hero, I confess.

'T is an awkward thing to play with souls,
And matter enough to save one's own:
Yet think of my friend, and the burning coals
He played with for bits of stone!

One likes to show the truth for the truth;
That the woman was light is very true:
But suppose she says, — Never mind that youth!
What wrong have I done to you?

Well, anyhow, here the story stays,
So far at least as I understand;
And, Robert Browning, you writer of plays,
Here's a subject made to your hand!

THE LAST RIDE TOGETHER

I SAID — Then, dearest, since 'tis so,
Since now at length my fate I know,
Since nothing all my love avails,
Since all, my life seemed meant for, fails,
Since this was written and needs must be —
My whole heart rises up to bless
Your name in pride and thankfulness!
Take back the hope you gave, — I claim
Only a memory of the same,
— And this beside, if you will not blame,
Your leave for one more last ride with me.

My mistress bent that brow of hers;
Those deep dark eyes where pride demurs
When pity would be softening through,
Fixed me a breathing-while or two
With life or death in the balance: right!
The blood replenished me again;
My last thought was at least not vain:
I and my mistress, side by side
Shall be together, breathe and ride,
So, one day more am I deified.
Who knows but the world may end to-night?

Hush! if you saw some western cloud
All billowy-bosomed, over-bowed
By many benedictions — sun's
And moon's and evening-star's at once —
And so, you, looking and loving best,
Conscious grew, your passion drew
Cloud, sunset, moonrise, star-shine too,
Down on you, near and yet more near,
Till flesh must fade for heaven was here! —
Thus leant she and lingered — joy and fear!
Thus lay she a moment on my breast.

Then we began to ride. My soul
Smoothed itself out, a long-cramped scroll
Freshening and fluttering in the wind.
Past hopes already lay behind.

What need to strive with a life awry?
Had I said that, had I done this,
So might I gain, so might I miss.
Might she have loved me? just as well
She might have hated, who can tell!
Where had I been now if the worst befell?
And here we are riding, she and I.

Fail I alone, in words and deeds?
Why, all men strive, and who succeeds?
We rode; it seemed my spirit flew,
Saw other regions, cities new,
As the world rushed by on either side.

I thought, — All labor, yet no less
 Bear up beneath their unsuccess.
 Look at the end of work, contrast
 The petty done, the undone vast,
 This present of theirs with the hopeful past !
 I hoped she would love me ; here we ride.

What hand and brain went ever paired ?
 What heart alike conceived and dared ?
 What act proved all its thought had been ?
 What will but felt the fleshly screen ?
 We ride and I see her bosom heave.
 There 's many a crown for who can reach.
 Ten lines, a statesman's life in each !
 The flag stuck on a heap of bones,
 A soldier's doing ! what atones ?
 They scratch his name on the Abbey-stones.
 My riding is better, by their leave.

What does it all mean, poet ? Well,
 Your brains beat into rhythm, you tell
 What we felt only ; you expressed
 You hold things beautiful the best,
 And place them in rhyme so, side by side.
 'Tis something, nay 't is much : but then,
 Have you yourself what 's best for men ?
 Are you — poor, sick, old ere your time —
 Nearer one whit your own sublime
 Than we who never have turned a rhyme ?
 Sing, riding 's a joy ! For me, I ride.

And you, great sculptor — so, you gave
 A score of years to Art, her slave,
 And that 's your Venus, whence we turn
 To yonder girl that fords the burn !
 You acquiesce, and shall I repine ?
 What, man of music, you grown gray
 With notes and nothing else to say,
 Is this your sole praise from a friend,
 " Greatly his opera's strains intend,
 But in music we know how fashions end ! "
 I gave my youth ; but we ride, in fine.

Who knows what 's fit for us ? Had fate
 Proposed bliss here should sublimate
 My being — had I signed the bond —
 Still one must lead some life beyond,
 Have a bliss to die with, dim-described.
 This foot once planted on the goal,
 This glory-garland round my soul,
 Could I desecr such ? Try and test !
 I sink back shuddering from the quest.
 Earth being so good, would heaven seem best ?
 Now, heaven and she are beyond this ride.

And yet — she has not spoke so long !
 What if heaven be that, fair and strong
 At life's best, with our eyes upturned
 Whither life's flower is first discerned,
 We, fixed so, ever should so abide ?
 What if we still ride on, we two,
 With life forever old yet new,
 Changed not in kind but in degree,
 The instant made eternity, —
 And heaven just prove that I and she Ride, ride together, forever ride ?

THE PIED PIPER OF HAMELIN

A CHILD'S STORY

(Written for, and inscribed to, W. M. the Younger)

Macready's eldest son when a child was confined to the house by illness, and Browning wrote this jeu d'esprit to amuse the child and give him a subject for illustrative drawings.

I

HAMELIN Town 's in Brunswick,
 By famous Hanover city ;
 The river Weser, deep and wide,
 Washes its wall on the southern side ;
 A pleasanter spot you never spied ;
 But, when begins my ditty,
 Almost five hundred years ago,
 To see the townsfolk suffer so
 From vermin, was a pity.

II

Rats !
 They fought the dogs and killed the cats,
 And bit the babies in the cradles,
 And ate the cheeses out of the vats,
 And licked the soup from the cooks' own
 ladles,
 Split open the kegs of salted sprats,
 Made nests inside men's Sunday hats,
 And even spoiled the women's chatts
 By drowning their speaking
 With shrieking and squeaking
 In fifty different sharps and flats.

III

At last the people in a body
 To the Town Hall came flocking :
 " 'T is clear," cried they, " our Mayor 's a noddy ;
 And as for our Corporation — shocking
 To think we buy gowns lined with ermine
 For dolts that can't or won't determine
 What 's best to rid us of our vermin !
 You hope, because you 're old and obese,
 To find in the furry civic robe ease ?
 Rouse up, sirs ! Give your brains a racking
 To find the remedy we 're lacking,
 Or, sure as fate, we 'll send you packing ! "
 At this the Mayor and Corporation
 Quaked with a mighty consternation.

IV

An hour they sat in council ;
 At length the Mayor broke silence :
 " For a guilder I 'd my ermine gown sell,
 I wish I were a mile hence !
 It 's easy to bid one rack one's brain —
 I 'm sure my poor head aches again,
 I 've scratched it so, and all in vain.
 Oh for a trap, a trap, a trap ! "
 Just as he said this, what should hap
 At the chamber-door but a gentle tap ?
 " Bless us," cried the Mayor, " what 's that ? "
 (With the Corporation as he sat,

Looking little though wondrous fat ;
Nor brighter was his eye, nor moister
Than a too-long-opened oyster,
Save when at noon his paunch grew mutinous
For a plate of turtle green and glutinous)
" Only a scraping of shoes on the mat ?
Anything like the sound of a rat
Makes my heart go pit-a-pat ! "

" Come in ! " — the Mayor cried, looking bigger :

And in did come the strangest figure !
His queer long coat from heel to head
Was half of yellow and half of red,
And he himself was tall and thin,
With sharp blue eyes, each like a pin,
And light loose hair, yet swarthy skin,
No tuft on cheek nor beard on chin,
But lips where smiles went out and in ;
There was no guessing his kith and kin :
And nobody could enough admire
The tall man and his quaint attire.
Quoth one : " It 's as my great-grandsire,
Starting up at the Trump of Doom 's tone,
Had walked this way from his painted tombstone ! "

VI

He advanced to the council-table :
And, " Please your honors," said he, " I 'm able,

By means of a secret charm, to draw
All creatures living beneath the sun,
That creep or swim or fly or run,
After me so as you never saw !
And I chiefly use my charm
On creatures that do people harm,
The mole and toad and newt and viper ;
And people call me the Pied Piper."
And here they noticed round his neck
A scarf of red and yellow stripe,
To match with his coat of the self-same cheque ;
And at the scarf 's end hung a pipe ;
And his fingers, they noticed, were ever stray-
ing

As if impatient to be playing
Upon this pipe, as low it dangled
Over his vesture so old-fangled.)
" Yet," said he, " poor piper as I am,
In Tartary I freed the Cham,
Last June, from his huge swarms of gnats ;
I eased in Asia the Nizam
Of a monstrous brood of vampire-bats ;
And as for what your brain bewilders,
If I can rid your town of rats
Will you give me a thousand guilders ? "
" One ? fifty thousand ! " — was the exclamation

Of the astonished Mayor and Corporation.

VII

Into the street the Piper stept,
Smiling first a little smile,
As if he knew what magic slept
In his quiet pipe the while ;
Then, like a musical adept,
To blow the pipe his lips he wrinkled,

And green and blue his sharp eyes twinkled,
Like a candle-flame where salt is sprinkled ;
And ere three shrill notes the pipe uttered,
You heard as if an army muttered ;
And the muttering grew to a grumbling ;
And the grumbling grew to a mighty rumbling ;
And out of the houses the rats came tumbling.
Great rats, small rats, lean rats, brawny rats,
Brown rats, black rats, gray rats, tawny rats,
Grave old plodders, gay young friskers,

Fathers, mothers, uncles, cousins,
Cocking tails and pricking whiskers,

Families by tens and dozens,
Brothers, sisters, husbands, wives —
Followed the Piper for their lives.
From street to street he piped advancing,
And step for step they followed dancing,
Until they came to the river Weser,
Wherein all plunged and perished !
— Save one who, stout as Julius Cæsar,
Swam across and lived to carry
(As he, the manuscript he cherished)
To Rat-land home his commentary :
Which was, " At the first shrill notes of the pipe,

I heard a sound as of scraping tripe,
And putting apples, wondrous ripe,
Into a cider-press 's gripe :
And a moving away of pickle-tub-boards,
And a leaving ajar of conserve-cupboards,
And a drawing the corks of train-oil-flasks,
And a breaking the hoops of butter-casks :
And it seemed as if a voice
(Sweeter far than by harp or by psaltery
Is breathed) called out, ' Oh rats, rejoice !
The world is grown to one vast dysaltory !
So munch on, crunch on, take your muncheon,
Breakfast, supper, dinner, luncheon ! '
And just as a bulky sugar-puncheon,
All ready staved, like a great sun shone
Glorious scarce an inch before me,
Just as methought it said, ' Come, bore me ! '
— I found the Weser rolling o'er me."

VIII

You should have heard the Hamelin people
Ringing the bells till they rocked the steeple.
" Go," cried the Mayor, " and get long poles,
Poke out the nests and block up the holes !
Consult with carpenters and builders,
And leave in our town not even a trace
Of the rats ! " — when suddenly, up the face
Of the Piper perked in the market-place,
With a, " First, if you please, my thousand guilders ! "

IX

A thousand guilders ! The Mayor looked blue ;
So did the Corporation too.
For council dinners made rare havoc
With Claret, Moselle, Vin-de-Grave, Hock ;
And half the money would replenish
Their cellar 's biggest butt with Rhenish.
To pay this sum to a wandering fellow
With a gypsy coat of red and yellow !
" Beside," quoth the Mayor with a knowing
wink,
" Our business was done at the river 's brink ;

We saw with our eyes the vermin sink,
And what's dead can't come to life, I think.
So, friend, we're not the folks to shrink
From the duty of giving you something for drink,

And a matter of money to put in your poke;
But as for the guilders, what we spoke
Of them, as you very well know, was in joke.
Beside, our losses have made us thrifty.
A thousand guilders! Come, take fifty!"

X

The Piper's face fell, and he cried,
"No trifling! I can't wait, beside!
I've promised to visit by dinner time
Bagdat, and accept the prime
Of the Head-Cook's pottage, all he's rich in,
For having left, in the Caliph's kitchen,
Of a nest of scorpions no survivor:
With him I proved no bargain-driver,
With you, don't think I'll bate a stiver!
And folks who put me in a passion
May find me pipe after another fashion."

XI

"How?" cried the Mayor, "d'ye think I brook
Being worse treated than a Cook?
Insulted by a lazy ribald
With idle pipe and vesture piebald?
You threaten us, fellow? Do your worst,
Blow your pipe there till you burst!"

XII

Once more he stepped into the street,
And to his lips again
Laid his long pipe of smooth straight cane;
And ere he blew three notes (such sweet
Soft notes as yet musician's cunning
Never gave the enraptured air)
There was a rustling that seemed like a bustling
Of merry crowds justling at pitching and hust-
ling;
Small feet were pattering, wooden shoes clat-tering,
Little hands clapping and little tongues chat-
tering,
And, like fowls in a farm-yard when barley is scattering,
Out came the children running.
All the little boys and girls,
With rosy cheeks and flaxen curls,
And sparkling eyes and teeth like pearls,
Tripping and skipping, ran merrily after
The wonderful music with shouting and laughter.

XIII

The Mayor was dumb, and the Council stood
As if they were changed into blocks of wood,
Unable to move a step, or cry
To the children merrily skipping by,
— Could only follow with the eye
That joyous crowd at the Piper's back.
But how the Mayor was on the rack,
And the wretched Council's bosoms beat,
As the Piper turned from the High Street
To where the Weser rolled its waters
Right in the way of their sons and daughters!
However, he turned from South to West,

And to Koppelberg Hill his steps addressed,
And after him the children pressed;
Great was the joy in every breast.
"He never can cross that mighty top!
He's forced to let the piping drop,
And we shall see our children stop!"
When, lo, as they reached the mountain-side,
A wondrous portal opened wide.
As if a cavern was suddenly hollowed;
And the Piper advanced and the children followed,

And when all were in to the very last,
The door in the mountain-side shut fast.
Did I say, all? No! One was lame,
And could not dance the whole of the way;
And in after years, if you would blame
His sadness, he was used to say, —
"It's dull in our town since my playmates left!
I can't forget that I'm bereft
Of all the pleasant sights they see,
Which the Piper also promised me.
For he led us, he said, to a joyous land,
Joining the town and just at hand,
Where waters gushed and fruit-trees grew
And flowers put forth a fairer hue,
And everything was strange and new;
The sparrows were brighter than peacocks here,
And their dogs outran our fallow deer,
And honey-bees had lost their stings,
And horses were born with eagles' wings:
And just as I became assured
My lame foot would be speedily cured,
The music stopped and I stood still,
And found myself outside the hill,
Left alone against my will,
To go now limping as before,
And never hear of that country more!"

XIV

Alas, alas for Hamelin!
There came into many a burgher's pate
A text which says that heaven's gate
Opens to the rich at as easy rate
As the needle's eye takes a camel in!
The Mayor sent East, West, North and South,
To offer the Piper, by word of mouth,
Wherever it was men's lot to find him,
Silver and gold to his heart's content,
If he'd only return the way he went,
And bring the children behind him.
But when they saw 'twas a lost endeavor,
And Piper and dancers were gone forever,
They made a decree that lawyers never Should think their records dated duly
If, after the day of the month and year,
These words did not as well appear,
"And so long after what happened here
On the Twenty-second of July,
Thirteen hundred and seventy six:"
And the better in memory to fix
The place of the children's last retreat,
They called it, the Pied Piper's Street —
Where any one playing on pipe or tabor
Was sure for the future to lose his labor.
Nor suffered they hostelry or tavern
To shock with mirth a street so solemn;
But opposite the place of the cavern
They wrote the story on a column,

And on the great church-window painted
 The same, to make the world acquainted
 How their children were stolen away,
 And there it stands to this very day.
 And I must not omit to say
 That in Transylvania there's a tribe
 Of alien people who ascribe
 The outlandish ways and dress
 On which their neighbors lay such stress,
 To their fathers and mothers having risen
 Out of some subterraneous prison
 Into which they were trepanned
 Long time ago in a mighty band
 Out of Hamelin town in Brunswick land,
 But how or why, they don't understand.

XV

So, Willy, let me and you be wipers
 Of scores out with all men — especially pipers !
 And, whether they pipe us free from rats or
     from mice,
 If we've promised them aught, let us keep our promise !

THE FLIGHT OF THE DUCHESS

The first nine sections of this poem were printed in Hood's Magazine for April, 1845.

The poem took its rise from a line — "Following the Queen of the Gypsies, O!" the burden of a song which the poet, when a boy, heard a woman singing on a Guy Fawkes' Day. As Browning was writing it, he was interrupted by the arrival of a friend on some important business, which drove all thoughts of the Duchess, and the scheme of her story, out of the poet's head. But some months after the publication of the first part, when he was staying at Bettisfield Park, in Shropshire, a guest, speaking of early winter, said, "The deer had already to break the ice in the pond." On this a fancy struck the poet, and, returning home, he worked it up into the conclusion of the poem as it now stands.

I

You're my friend :
 I was the man the Duke spoke to ;
 I helped the Duchess to cast off his yoke, too ;
 So, here's the tale from beginning to end,
 My friend !

II

Ours is a great wild country :
 If you climb to our castle's top,
 I don't see where your eye can stop ;
 For when you've passed the cornfield country,
 Where vineyards leave off, flocks are packed,
 And sheep-range leads to cattle-tract,
 And cattle-tract to open-chase,
 And open-chase to the very base
 Of the mountain where, at a funeral pace,
 Round about, solemn and slow,
 One by one, row after row,

Up and up the pine-trees go,
 So, like black priests up, and so
 Down the other side again
 To another greater, wilder country,
 That's one vast red drear burnt-up plain,
 Branched through and through with many a vein

Whence iron's dug, and copper's dealt ;
 Look right, look left, look straight before, —
 Beneath they mine, above they smelt,
 Copper-ore and iron-ore,
 And forge and furnace mould and melt,
 And so on, more and ever more,
 Till at the last, for a bounding belt,
 Comes the salt sand hoar of the great sea-shore,
 — And the whole is our Duke's country.

III

I was born the day this present Duke was —
 (And O, says the song, ere I was old !)
 In the castle where the other Duke was —
 (When I was happy and young, not old !)
 I in the kennel, he in the bower :
 We are of like age to an hour.
 My father was huntsman in that day ;
 Who has not heard my father say
 That, when a boar was brought to bay,
 Three times, four times out of five,
 With his huntspear he'd contrive
 To get the killing-place transfixed,
 And pin him true, both eyes betwixt ?
 And that's why the old Duke would rather
 He lost a salt-pit than my father,
 And loved to have him ever in call ;
 That's why my father stood in the hall
 When the old Duke brought his infant out
 To show the people, and while they passed
 The wondrous bantling round about,
 Was first to start at the outside blast
 As the Kaiser's courier blew his horn,
 Just a month after the babe was born.
 "And," quoth the Kaiser's courier, "since
 The Duke has got an heir, our Prince
 Needs the Duke's self at his side :"
 The Duke looked down and seemed to wince,
 But he thought of wars o'er the world wide,
 Castles a-fire, men on their march,
 The toppling tower, the crashing arch ;
 And up he looked, and awhile he eyed
 The row of crests and shields and banners
 Of all achievements after all manners,
 And "ay," said the Duke with a surly pride.
 The more was his comfort when he died
 At next year's end, in a velvet suit,
 With a gilt glove on his hand, his foot
 In a silken shoe for a leather boot,
 Petticoated like a herald,
 In a chamber next to an ante-room,
 Where he breathed the breath of page and
     groom,
 What he called stink, and they, perfume :
 — They should have set him on red Berold
 Mad with pride, like fire to manage !
 They should have got his cheek fresh tannage
 Such a day as to-day in the merry sunshine !
 Had they stuck on his fist a rough-foot merlin !
 (Hark, the wind's on the heath at its game !
 Oh for a noble falcon-lanner

To flap each broad wing like a banner,
And turn in the wind, and dance like flame !
Had they broached a white-beer cask from Berlin

— Or if you incline to prescribe mere wine
Put to his lips, when they saw him pine,
A cup of our own Moldavia fine,
Cotnar for instance, green as May sorrel
And rosy with sweet, — we shall not quarrel.

IV

So, at home, the sick tall yellow Duchess
Was left with the infant in her clutches,
She being the daughter of God knows who :
And now was the time to revisit her tribe.
Abroad and afar they went, the two,
And let our people rail and gibe
At the empty hall and extinguished fire,
As loud as we liked, but ever in vain,
Till after long years we had our desire,
And back came the Duke and his mother again.

V

And he came back the pertest little ape
That ever affronted human shape ;
Full of his travel, struck at himself.
You 'd say, he despised our bluff old ways ?
— Not he ! For in Paris they told the elf
Our rough North land was the Land of Lays,
The one good thing left in evil days ;
Since the Mid-Age was the Heroic Time,
And only in wild nooks like ours
Could you taste of it yet as in its prime,
And see true castles, with proper towers,
Young-hearted women, old-minded men,
And manners now as manners were then.
So, all that the old Dukes had been, without knowing it,

This Duke would fain know he was, without being it ;

'T was not for the joy's self, but the joy of his showing it.

Nor for the pride's self, but the pride of our seeing it.

He revived all usages thoroughly worn-out,
The souls of them fumed-forth, the hearts of them torn-out :

And chief in the chase his neck he perilled,
On a lathy horse, all legs and length,
With blood for bone, all speed, no strength ;
— They should have set him on red Berold
With the red eye slow consuming in fire,
And the thin stiff ear like an abbey spire !

VI

Well, such as he was, he must marry, we heard :
And out of a convent, at the word,
Came the lady, in time of spring.

— Oh, old thoughts they cling, they cling !

That day, I know, with a dozen oaths
I clad myself in thick hunting-clothes

Fit for the chase of urochs or buffle

In winter-time when you need to muffle.

But the Duke had a mind we should cut a figure,

And so we saw the lady arrive :

My friend, I have seen a white crane bigger !

She was the smallest lady alive,

Made in a piece of nature's madness,
Too small, almost, for the life and gladness
That over-filled her, as some hive
Out of the bears' reach on the high trees
Is crowded with its safe merry bees :
In truth, she was not hard to please !
Up she looked, down she looked, round at the mead,

Straight at the castle, that's best indeed

To look at from outside the walls :

As for us, styled the "serfs and thralls,"

She as much thanked me as if she had said it,
(With her eyes, do you understand ?)

Because I patted her horse while I led it ;

And Max, who rode on her other hand,

Said, no bird flew past but she inquired

What its true name was, nor ever seemed tired —

If that was an eagle she saw hover,

And the green and gray bird on the field was the plover.

When suddenly appeared the Duke :

And as down she sprung, the small foot pointed

On to my hand, — as with a rebuke,

And as if his backbone were not jointed,

The Duke stepped rather aside than forward,

And welcomed her with his grandest smile ;

And, mind you, his mother all the while

Chilled in the rear, like a wind to Nor'ward ;

And up, like a weary yawn, with its pulleys

Went, in a shriek, the rusty portecullis ;

And, like a glad sky the north-wind sullies,

The lady's face stopped its play,

As if her first hair had grown gray ;

For such things must begin some one day.

VII

In a day or two she was well again ;

As who should say, "You labor in vain !

This is all a jest against God, who meant

I should ever be, as I am, content

And glad in his sight ; therefore, glad I will
be."

So, smiling as at first went she.

VIII

She was active, stirring, all fire —

Could not rest, could not tire —

To a stone she might have given life !

(I myself loved once, in my day)

— For a shepherd's, miner's, huntsman's wife,

(I had a wife, I know what I say)

Never in all the world such an one !

And here was plenty to be done,

And she that could do it, great or small,

She was to do nothing at all.

There was already this man in his post,

This in his station, and that in his office,

And the Duke's plan admitted a wife, at most,

To meet his eye, with the other trophies,

Now outside the hall, now in it,

To sit thus, stand thus, see and be seen,

At the proper place in the proper minute,

And die away the life between.

And it was amusing enough, each infraction

Of rule — (but for after-sadness that came)

To hear the consummate self-satisfaction

With which the young Duke and the old dame

Would let her advise, and criticise,
And, being a fool, instruct the wise,
And, child-like, parcel out praise or blame :
They bore it all in complacent guise,
As though an artificer, after contriving
A wheel-work image as if it were living,
Should find with delight it could motion to strike him !

So found the Duke, and his mother like him :
The lady hardly got a rebuff —
That had not been contemptuous enough,
With his cursed smirk, as he nodded applause,
And kept off the old mother-cat's claws.

IX

So, the little lady grew silent and thin,

Paling and ever paling,
As the way is with a hid chagrin ;

And the Duke perceived that she was ailing,
And said in his heart, "'T is done to spite me,
But I shall find in my power to right me !"
Don't swear, friend ! The old one, many a year,

Is in hell, and the Duke's self . . . you shall hear.

X

Well, early in autumn, at first winter-warning,
When the stag had to break with his foot, of a morning,

A drinking-hole out of the fresh tender ice
That covered the pond till the sun, in a trice,
Loosening it, let out a ripple of gold,
And another and another, and faster and faster,
Till, dimpling to blindness, the wide water rolled :

Then it so chanced that the Duke our master
Asked himself what were the pleasures in season,

And found, since the calendar bade him be hearty,

He should do the Middle Age no treason
In resolving on a hunting-party.

Always provided, old books showed the way of
it !

What meant old poets by their strictures ?
And when old poets had said their say of it,
How taught old painters in their pictures ?
We must revert to the proper channels,
Workings in tapestry, paintings on panels,
And gather up woodcraft's authentic traditions :

Here was food for our various ambitions,
As on each case, exactly stated —
To encourage your dog, now, the properest
chirrup,

Or best prayer to Saint Hubert on mounting your stirrup —

We of the household took thought and debated.

Blessed was he whose back ached with the jerkin
His sire was wont to do forest-work in ;

Blesseder he who nobly sunk "ohs"
And "ahs" while he tugged on his grandsire's
trunk-hose ;

What signified hats if they had no rims on,
Each slouching before and behind like the scallop,

And able to serve at sea for a shallop,
Loaded with lacquer and looped with crimson ?
So that the deer now, to make a short rhyme
on 't,

What with our Venerers, Prickers and Verder-
ers,

Might hope for real hunters at length and not murderers.

And oh the Duke's tailor, he had a hot time
on 't !

XI

Now you must know that when the first dizziness

Of flap-hats and buff-coats and jack-boots subsided,

The Duke put this question, "The Duke's part provided,

Had not the Duchess some share in the business ?"

For out of the mouth of two or three witnesses
Did he establish all fit-or-unfitnesses :

And, after much laying of heads together,
Somebody's cap got a notable feather

By the announcement with proper unction
That he had discovered the lady's function ;

Since ancient authors gave this tenet,
"When horns wind a mort and the deer is at siege,

Let the dame of the castle prick forth on her jennet.

And, with water to wash the hands of her liege
In a clean ewer with a fair towelling,

Let her preside at the disembowelling."

Now, my friend, if you had so little religion
As to catch a hawk, some falcon-lanner,

And thrust her broad wings like a banner
Into a coop for a vulgar pigeon ;

And if day by day and week by week
You cut her claws, and sealed her eyes,

And clipped her wings, and tied her beak,
Would it cause you any great surprise

If, when you decided to give her an airing,
You found she needed a little preparing ?

— I say, should you be such a curmudgeon,
If she clung to the perch, as to take it in dudgeon ?

Yet when the Duke to his lady signified,
Just a day before, as he judged most dignified,

In what a pleasure she was to participate, —
And, instead of leaping wide in flashes,

Her eyes just lifted their long lashes,
As if pressed by fatigue even he could not dissipate,

And duly acknowledged the Duke's fore-
thought,

But spoke of her health, if her health were worth aught,

Of the weight by day and the watch by night,
And much wrong now that used to be right,

So, thanking him, declined the hunting, —
Was conduct ever more affronting ?

With all the ceremony settled —
With the towel ready, and the sewer

Polishing up his oldest ewer,
And the jennet pitched upon, a piebald,

Black-barred, cream-coated and pink eyeballed, —

No wonder if the Duke was nettled !
 And when she persisted nevertheless, —
 Well, I suppose here 's the time to confess
 That there ran half round our lady's chamber
 A balcony none of the hardest to clamber ;
 And that Jacynth the tire-woman, ready in waiting,
 Stayed in call outside, what need of relating ?
 And since Jacynth was like a June rose, why, a fervent
 Adorer of Jacynth of course was your servant ;
 And if she had the habit to peep through the casement,
 How could I keep at any vast distance ?
 And so, as I say, on the lady's persistence,
 The Duke, dumb-stricken with amazement,
 Stood for a while in a sultry smother,
 And then, with a smile that partook of the awful,
 Turned her over to his yellow mother
 To learn what was held decorous and lawful ;
 And the mother smelt blood with a cat-like
 instinct,
 As her cheek quick whitened through all its quince-tinct.
 Oh, but the lady heard the whole truth at once !
 What meant she ? — Who was she ? — Her duty and station,
 The wisdom of age and the folly of youth, at
 once,
 Its decent regard and its fitting relation —
 In brief, my friend, set all the devils in hell
 free
 And turn them out to carouse in a belfry
 And treat the priests to a fifty-part canon,
 And then you may guess how that tongue of hers ran on !
 Well, somehow or other it ended at last
 And, licking her whiskers, out she passed ;
 And after her, — making (he hoped) a face
 Like Emperor Nero or Sultan Saladin,
 Stalked the Duke's self with the austere grace
 Of ancient hero or modern paladin,
 From door to staircase — oh such a solemn Unbending of the vertebral column !

XII

However, at sunrise our company mustered ;
 And here was the huntsman bidding unkennel,
 And there 'neath his bonnet the prickier blus-
 tered,
 With feather dank as a bough of wet fennel ;
 For the court-yard walls were filled with fog
 You might have cut as an axe chops a log —
 Like so much wool for color and bulkiness ;
 And out rode the Duke in a perfect sulkiness,
 Since, before breakfast, a man feels but queasily,
 And a sinking at the lower abdomen
 Begins the day with indifferent omen.
 And lo, as he looked around uneasily,
 The sun ploughed the fog up and drove it asunder
 This way and that from the valley under ;
 And, looking through the court-yard arch,
 Down in the valley, what should meet him
 But a troop of Gypsies on their march ?
 No doubt with the annual gifts to greet him.

XIII

Now, in your land, Gypsies reach you, only
 After reaching all lands beside ;
 North they go, South they go, trooping or lonely,
 And still, as they travel far and wide,
 Catch they and keep now a trace here, a trace
 there,
 That puts you in mind of a place here, a place
 there.
 But with us, I believe they rise out of the
 ground,
 And nowhere else, I take it, are found
 With the earth-tint yet so freshly embrowned :
 Born, no doubt, like insects which breed on
 The very fruit they are meant to feed on.
 For the earth — not a use to which they don't turn it,
 The ore that grows in the mountain's womb,
 Or the sand in the pits like a honeycomb,
 They sift and soften it, bake it and burn it —
 Whether they weld you, for instance, a snaffle
 With side-bars never a brute can baffle ;
 Or a lock that's a puzzle of wards within wards ;
 Or, if your colt's forefoot inclines to curve inwards,
 Horseshoes they hammer which turn on a swivel
 And won't allow the hoof to shrivel.
 Then they cast bells like the shell of the winkle
 That keep a stout heart in the ram with their tinkle ;
 But the sand — they pinch and pound it like otters ;
 Commend me to Gypsy glass-makers and pot-
 ters !
 Glasses they'll blow you, crystal-clear,
 Where just a faint cloud of rose shall appear,
 As if in pure water you dropped and let die
 A bruised black-blooded mulberry ;
 And that other sort, their crowning pride,
 With long white threads distinct inside,
 Like the lake-flower's fibrous roots which dangle
 Loose such a length and never tangle,
 Where the bold sword-lily cuts the clear waters,
 And the cup-lily couches with all the white daughters :
 Such are the works they put their hand to,
 The uses they turn and twist iron and sand to,
 And these made the troop, which our Duke saw sally
 Toward his castle from out of the valley,
 Men and women, like new-hatched spiders,
 Come out with the morning to greet our riders.
 And up they wound till they reached the ditch,
 Whereat all stopped save one, a witch
 That I knew, as she hobbled from the group,
 By her gait directly and her stoop,
 I, whom Jacynth was used to importune
 To let that same witch tell us our fortune,
 The oldest Gypsy then above ground ;
 And, sure as the autumn season came round,
 She paid us a visit for profit or pastime,
 And every time, as she swore, for the last time
 And presently she was seen to sidle
 Up to the Duke till she touched 'his bridle,
 So that the horse of a sudden reared up
 As under its nose the old witch peered up

With her worn-out eyes, or rather eye-holes
Of no use now but to gather brine,
And began a kind of level whine
Such as they use to sing to their viols
When their ditties they go grinding
Up and down with nobody minding:
And then, as of old, at the end of the humming
Her usual presents were forthcoming
— A dog-whistle blowing the fiercest of trebles,
(Just a sea-shore stone holding a dozen fine pebbles.)

Or a porcelain mouthpiece to screw on a pipe-
end, —
And so she awaited her annual stipend.
But this time, the Duke would scarcely vouchsafe

A word in reply; and in vain she felt
With twitching fingers at her belt
For the purse of sleek pine-marten pelt,
Ready to put what he gave in her pouch safe, —
Till, either to quicken his apprehension,
Or possibly with an after-intention,
She was come, she said, to pay her duty
To the new Duchess, the youthful beauty.
No sooner had she named his lady,
Than a shine lit up the face so shady,
And its smirk returned with a novel meaning —
For it struck him, the babe just wanted wean-
ing;

If one gave her a taste of what life was and
sorrow,

She, foolish to-day, would be wiser to-morrow;
And who so fit a teacher of trouble
As this sordid crone bent well-nigh double?
So, glancing at her wolf-skin vesture,
(If such it was, for they grow so hirsute
That their own fleece serves for natural fursuit)

He was contrasting, 't was plain from his gesture,

The life of the lady so flower-like and delicate
With the loathsome squalor of this helicat.
I, in brief, was the man the Duke beckoned
From out of the throng, and while I drew near
He told the crone — as I since have reckoned
By the way he bent and spoke into her ear
With circumspection and mystery —

The main of the lady's history,
Her frowardness and ingratitude:
And for all the crone's submissive attitude
I could see round her mouth the loose plaits tightening,

And her brow with assenting intelligence
brightening,

As though she engaged with hearty goodwill
Whatever he now might enjoin to fulfil,
And promised the lady a thorough frightening.
And so, just giving her a glimpse
Of a purse, with the air of a man who imps
The wing of the hawk that shall fetch the hernshaw,

He bade me take the Gypsy mother
And set her telling some story or other
Of hill or dale, oak-wood or fernshaw,
To while away a weary hour
For the lady left alone in her bower,
Whose mind and body craved exertion
And yet shrank from all better diversion.

XIV

Then clapping heel to his horse, the mere curveter,

Out rode the Duke, and after his hollo
Horses and hounds swept, huntsman and servi-tor,

And back I turned and bade the crone follow.
And what makes me confident what's to be told you

Had all along been of this crone's devising,
Is, that, on looking round sharply, behold you,
There was a novelty quick as surprising:
For first, she had shot up a full head in stature,
And her step kept pace with mine nor faltered,
As if age had foregone its usurpature,
And the ignoble mien was wholly altered,
And the face looked quite of another nature,
And the change reached too, whatever the change meant,

Her shaggy wolf-skin cloak's arrangement:
For where its tatters hung loose like sedges,
Gold coins were glittering on the edges,
Like the band-roll strung with tomons
Which proves the veil a Persian woman's:
And under her brow, like a snail's horns newly
Come out as after the rain he paces,
Two unmistakable eye-points duly
Live and aware looked out of their places.

So, we went and found Jacynth at the entry
Of the lady's chamber standing sentry;
I told the command and produced my companion,

And Jacynth rejoiced to admit any one,
For since last night, by the same token,
Not a single word had the lady spoken:
They went in both to the presence together,
While I in the balcony watched the weather.

xv

And now, what took place at the very first of all,

I cannot tell, as I never could learn it:
Jacynth constantly wished a curse to fall
On that little head of hers and burn it,
If she knew how she came to drop so soundly
Asleep of a sudden and there continue
The whole time sleeping as profoundly
As one of the boars my father would pin you
'Twixt the eyes where life holds garrison,
— Jacynth forgive me the comparison!

But where I begin my own narration
Is a little after I took my station
To breathe the fresh air from the balcony,
And, having in those days a falcon eye,
To follow the hunt through the open country,
From where the bushes thinlier crested
The hillocks, to a plain where 's not one tree.
When, in a moment, my ear was arrested
By — was it singing, or was it saying,
Or a strange musical instrument playing
In the chamber? — and to be certain
I pushed the lattice, pulled the curtain,
And there lay Jacynth asleep,
Yet as if a watch she tried to keep,
In a rosy sleep along the floor
With her head against the door;
While in the midst, on the seat of state,
Was a queen — the Gypsy woman late.

With head and face downbent
 On the lady's head and face intent :
 For, coiled at her feet like a child at ease,
 The lady sat between her knees,
 And o'er them the lady's clasped hands met,
 And on those hands her chin was set,
 And her upturned face met the face of the crone
 Wherein the eyes had grown and grown
 As if she could double and quadruple
 At pleasure the play of either pupil
 — Very like, by her hands' slow fanning,
 As up and down like a gor-crow's flappers
 They moved to measure, or bell clappers.
 I said, "Is it blessing, is it banning,
 Do they applaud you or burlesque you —
 Those hands and fingers with no flesh on?"
 But, just as I thought to spring in to the rescue,
 At once I was stopped by the lady's expression :
 For it was life her eyes were drinking
 From the crone's wide pair above unwinking,
 — Life's pure fire received without shrinking,
 Into the heart and breast whose heaving
 Told you no single drop they were leaving,
 — Life, that filling her, passed redundant
 Into her very hair, back swerving
 Over each shoulder, loose and abundant,
 As her head thrown back showed the white throat curving ;
 And the very tresses shared in the pleasure,
 Moving to the mystic measure,
 Bounding as the bosom bounded.
 I stopped short, more and more confounded,
 As still her cheeks burned and eyes glistened,
 As she listened and she listened :
 When all at once a hand detained me,
 The selfsame contagion gained me,
 And I kept time to the wondrous chime,
 Making out words and prose and rhyme,
 Till it seemed that the music furred
 Its wings like a task fulfilled, and dropped
 From under the words it first had propped,
 And left them midway in the world :
 Word took word as hand takes hand,
 I could hear at last, and understand,
 And when I held the unbroken thread,
 The Gypsy said : —

"And so at last we find my tribe.
 And so I set thee in the midst,
 And to one and all of them describe
 What thou saidst and what thou didst,
 Our long and terrible journey through,
 And all thou art ready to say and do
 In the trials that remain :
 I trace them the vein and the other vein
 That meet on thy brow and part again,
 Making our rapid mystic mark ;
 And I bid my people prove and probe
 Each eye's profound and glorious globe
 Till they detect the kindred spark
 In those depths so dear and dark,
 Like the spots that snap and burst and flee,
 Circling over the midnight sea.
 And on that round young cheek of thine
 I make them recognize the tinge,
 As when of the costly scarlet wine
 They drip so much as will impinge
 And spread in a thinnest scale afloat

One thick gold drop from the olive's coat
 Over a silver plate whose sheen
 Still through the mixture shall be seen.
 For so I prove thee, to one and all,
 Fit, when my people ope their breast,
 To see the sign, and hear the call,
 And take the vow, and stand the test
 Which adds one more child to the rest —
 When the breast is bare and the arms are wide,
 And the world is left outside.
 For there is probation to decree,
 And many and long must the trials be
 Thou shalt victoriously endure,
 If that brow is true and those eyes are sure ;
 Like a jewel-finder's fierce assay
 Of the prize he dug from its mountain tomb —
 Let once the vindicating ray
 Leap out amid the anxious gloom,
 And steel and fire have done their part
 And the prize falls on its finder's heart ;
 So, trial after trial past,
 Wilt thou fall at the very last
 Breathless, half in trance
 With the thrill of the great deliverance,
 Into our arms forevermore ;
 And thou shalt know, those arms once curled
 About thee, what we knew before,
 How love is the only good in the world.
 Henceforth be loved as heart can love,
 Or brain devise, or hand approve !
 Stand up, look below,
 It is our life at thy feet we throw
 To step with into light and joy ;
 Not a power of life but we employ
 To satisfy thy nature's want ;
 Art thou the tree that props the plant,
 Or the climbing plant that seeks the tree —
 Canst thou help us, must we help thee ?
 If any two creatures grew into one,
 They would do more than the world has done ;
 Though each apart were never so weak,
 Ye vainly through the world should seek
 For the knowledge and the might
 Which in such union grew their right :
 So, to approach at least that end,
 And blend, — as much as may be, blend
 Thee with us or us with thee, —
 As climbing plant or propping tree,
 Shall some one deck thee, over and down,
 Up and about, with blossoms and leaves ?
 Fix his heart's fruit for thy garland-crown,
 Cling with his soul as the gourd-vine cleaves,
 Die on thy boughs and disappear
 While not a leaf of thine is ere ?
 Or is the other fate in store,
 And art thou fitted to adore,
 To give thy wondrous self away,
 And take a stronger nature's sway ?
 I foresee and could foretell
 Thy future portion, sure and well :
 But those passionate eyes speak true, speak
 true,
 Let them say what thou shalt do !
 Only be sure thy daily life,
 In its peace or in its strife,
 Never shall be unobserved ;
 We pursue thy whole career,
 And hope for it, or doubt, or fear, —

Lo, hast thou kept thy path or swerved,
 We are beside thee in all thy ways,
 With our blame, with our praise,
 Our shame to feel, our pride to show,
 Glad, angry — but indifferent, no!
 Whether it be thy lot to go,
 For the good of us all, where the haters meet
 In the crowded city's horrible street;
 Or thou step alone through the morass
 Where never sound yet was
 Save the dry quick clap of the stork's bill,
 For the air is still, and the water still,
 When the blue breast of the dipping coot
 Dives under, and all is mute.
 So, at the last shall come old age,
 Decrepit as befits that stage;
 How else wouldst thou retire apart
 With the hoarded memories of thy heart,
 And gather all to the very least
 Of the fragments of life's earlier feast,
 Let fall through eagerness to find
 The crowning dainties yet behind?
 Ponder on the entire past
 Laid together thus at last,
 When the twilight helps to fuse
 The first fresh with the faded hues,
 And the outline of the whole,
 As round eve's shades their framework roll,
 Grandly fronts for once thy soul.
 And then as, 'mid the dark, a gleam
 Of yet another morning breaks,
 And like the hand which ends a dream,
 Death, with the might of his sunbeam,
 Touches the flesh and the soul awakes,
 Then " —

Ay, then indeed something would happen!
 But what? For here her voice changed like a bird's;
 There grew more of the music and less of the
 words;
 Had Jacynth only been by me to clap pen
 To paper and put you down every syllable
 With those clever clerkly fingers,
 All I've forgotten as well as what lingers
 In this old brain of mine that's but ill able
 To give you even this poor version
 Of the speech I spoil, as it were, with stammer-
 ing

— More fault of those who had the hammering
 Of prosody into me and syntax,
 And did it, not with hobnails but tints!
 But to return from this excursion, —
 Just, do you mark, when the song was sweetest,
 The peace most deep and the charm completest,
 There came, shall I say, a snap —
 And the charm vanished!
 And my sense returned, so strangely banished,
 And, starting as from a nap,
 I knew the crone was bewitching my lady,
 With Jacynth asleep; and but one spring made I
 Down from the casement, round to the portal,
 Another minute and I had entered, —
 When the door opened, and more than mortal
 Stood, with a face where to my mind centred
 All beauties I ever saw or shall see,
 The Duchess: I stopped as if struck by palsy.
 She was so different, happy and beautiful,
 I felt at once that all was best,

And that I had nothing to do, for the rest,
 But wait her commands, obey and be dutiful.
 Not that, in fact, there was any commanding;
 I saw the glory of her eye,
 And the brow's height and the breast's expand-
 ing,

And I was hers to live or to die.
 As for finding what she wanted,
 You know God Almighty granted
 Such little signs should serve wild creatures
 To tell one another all their desires,
 So that each knows what his friend requires,
 And does its bidding without teachers.
 I preceded her; the crone
 Followed silent and alone;
 I spoke to her, but she merely jabbered
 In the old style; both her eyes had slunk
 Back to their pits; her stature shrunk;
 In short, the soul in its body sunk
 Like a blade sent home to its scabbard.
 We descended, I preceding;
 Crossed the court with nobody heeding;
 All the world was at the chase,
 The court-yard like a desert-place,
 The stable emptied of its small fry;
 I saddled myself the very palfrey
 I remember patting while it carried her,
 The day she arrived and the Duke married her.
 And, do you know, though it's easy deceiving
 One's self in such matters, I can't help believing
 The lady had not forgotten it either,
 And knew the poor devil so much beneath her
 Would have been only too glad for her service
 To dance on hot ploughshares like a Turk dervise,

But, unable to pay proper duty where owing it.
 Was reduced to that pitiful method of showing
 it:

For though the moment I began setting
 His saddle on my own nag of Berold's begetting,
 (Not that I meant to be obtrusive)
 She stopped me, while his rug was shifting,
 By a single rapid finger's lifting,
 And, with a gesture kind but conclusive,
 And a little shake of the head, refused me, —
 I say, although she never used me,
 Yet when she was mounted, the Gypsy behind
 her,

And I ventured to remind her,
 I suppose with a voice of less steadiness
 Than usual, for my feeling exceeded me,
 — Something to the effect that I was in readiness
 Whenever God should please she needed me, —
 Then, do you know, her face looked down on me
 With a look that placed a crown on me,
 And she felt in her bosom, — mark, her bosom —
 And, as a flower-tree drops its blossom,
 Dropped me . . . ah, had it been a purse
 Of silver, my friend, or gold that's worse,
 Why, you see, as soon as I found myself
 So understood, — that a true heart so may gain
 Such a reward, — I should have gone home
 again,

Kissed Jacynth, and soberly drowned myself!
 It was a little plait of hair
 Such as friends in a convent make
 To wear, each for the other's sake, —
 This, see, which at my breast I wear,

Ever did (rather to Jacynth's grudgment),
And ever shall, till the Day of Judgment.
And then, — and then, — to cut short, — this is idle,
These are feelings it is not good to foster, —
I pushed the gate wide, she shook the bridle,
And the palfrey bounded, — and so we lost her.

XVI

When the liquor's out why clink the cannikin?
I did think to describe you the panic in
The redoubtable breast of our master the man-nikin,
And what was the pitch of his mother's yellow-
ness,
How she turned as a shark to snap the spare-rib
Clean off, sailors say, from a pearl-diving Carib,
When she heard, what she called the flight of the feloness

— But it seems such child's play,
What they said and did with the lady away!
And to dance on, when we've lost the music,
Always made me — and no doubt makes you —
sick.

Nay, to my mind, the world's face looked so stern

As that sweet form disappeared through the postern,

She that kept it in constant good-humor,
It ought to have stopped; there seemed nothing to do more.

But the world thought otherwise and went on,
And my head's one that its spite was spent on:
Thirty years are fled since that morning,
And with them all my head's adorning.
Nor did the old Duchess die outright,
As you expect, of suppressed spite,
The natural end of every adder

Not suffered to empty its poison-bladder:
But she and her son agreed, I take it,
That no one should touch on the story to wake
it,

For the wound in the Duke's pride rankled fiery,
So, they made no search and small inquiry —
And when fresh Gypsies have paid us a visit,
I've

Noticed the couple were never inquisitive,
But told them they're folks the Duke don't want here,

And bade them make haste and cross the frontier.

Brief, the Duchess was gone and the Duke was glad of it,

And the old one was in the young one's stead,
And took, in her place, the household's head,
And a blessed time the household had of it!
And were I not, as a man may say, cautious
How I trench, more than needs, on the nauseous,
I could favor you with sundry touches
Of the paint-smutches with which the Duchess Heightened the mellowness of her cheek's yellowness

(To get on faster) until at last her
Cheek grew to be one master-plaster
Of mucus and fucus from mere use of ceruse:
In short, she grew from scalp to udder
Just the object to make you shudder.

You're my friend —
What a thing friendship is, world without end!
How it gives the heart and soul a stir-up
As if somebody broached you a glorious runlet,
And poured out, all lovely, sparklingly, sunlit,
Our green Moldavia, the streaky syrup,
Cotnar as old as the time of the Druids — Friendship may match with that monarch of fluids;

Each supple a dry brain, fills you its ins-and-outs,

Gives your life's hour-glass a shake when the thin sand doubts

Whether to run on or stop short, and guarantees
Age is not all made of stark sloth and arrant ease.

I have seen my little lady once more,
Jacynth, the Gypsy, Berold, and the rest of it,
For to me spoke the Duke, as I told you before;
I always wanted to make a clean breast of it:
And now it is made — why, my heart's blood,
that went trickle,

Trickle, but anon, in such muddy dribblets,
Is pumped up brisk now, through the main ventricle,

And genially floats me about the giblets.

I'll tell you what I intend to do:

I must see this fellow his sad life through —
He is our Duke, after all,

And I, as he says, but a serf and thrall.

My father was born here, and I inherit

His fame, a chain he bound his son with;

Could I pay in a lump I should prefer it,

But there's no mine to blow up and get done
with:

So, I must stay till the end of the chapter,

For, as to our middle-age-manners-adapter,

Be it a thing to be glad on or sorry on,

Some day or other, his head in a morion

And breast in a hauberk, his heels he'll kick up,

Slain by an onslaught fierce of hiccup.

And then, when red doth the sword of our Duke rust,

And its leathern sheath lie o'ergrown with a blue crust,

Then I shall scrape together my earnings;

For, you see, in the churchyard Jacynth reposes,

And our children all went the way of the roses:

It's a long lane that knows no turnings.

One needs but little tackle to travel in;

So, just one stout cloak shall I indue:

And for a staff, what beats the javelin

With which his boars my father pinned you?

And then, for a purpose you shall hear presently,

Taking some Cotnar, a tight plump skinful,

I shall go journeying, who but I, pleasantly!

Sorrow is vain and despondency sinful.

What's a man's age? He must hurry more,
that's all;

Cram in a day, what his youth took a year to
hold:

When we mind labor, then only, we're too old —

What age had Methusalem when he begat Saul?

And at last, as its haven some buffeted ship sees,

(Come all the way from the north-parts with sperm oil)

I hope to get safely out of the turmoil
 And arrive one day at the land of the Gypsies,
 And find my lady, or hear the last news of her
 From some old thief and son of Lucifer,
 His forehead chapleted green with wreathy hop,
 Sunburned all over like an Æthiop.
 And when my Cotnar begins to operate
 And the tongue of the rogue to run at a proper
     rate,
 And our wine-skin, tight once, shows each flac-
     cid dent,
 I shall drop in with — as if by accident —
 “You never knew, then, how it all ended,
 What fortune good or bad attended
 The little lady your Queen befriended?”
 — And when that’s told me, what’s remaining?
 This world’s too hard for my explaining.
 The same wise judge of matters equine
 Who still preferred some slim four-year-old
 To the big-boned stock of mighty Berold,
 And, for strong Cotnar, drank French weak
     wine,
 He also must be such a lady’s scorner!
 Smooth Jacob still robs homely Esau:
 Now up, now down, the world’s one see-saw.
 — So, I shall find out some snug corner
 Under a hedge, like Orson the wood-knight,
 Turn myself round and bid the world good-
     night;
 And sleep a sound sleep till the trumpet’s blowing
 Wakes me (unless priests cheat us laymen)
 To a world where will be no further throwing
 Pearls before swine that can’t value them.
 Amen!

A GRAMMARIAN'S FUNERAL

SHORTLY AFTER THE REVIVAL OF LEARNING
 IN EUROPE

LET us begin and carry up this corpse,
     Singing together.
 Leave we the common crofts, the vulgar thorpes
     Each in its tether
 Sleeping safe on the bosom of the plain,
     Cared-for till cock-crow:
 Look out if yonder he not day again
     Rimming the rock-row!
 That’s the appropriate country; there, man’s
     thought,
     Rarer, intenser,
 Self-gathered for an outbreak, as it ought,
     Chafes in the censor.
 Leave we the unlettered plain its herd and crop;
     Seek we sepulture
 On a tall mountain, citied to the top,
     Crowded with culture!
 All the peaks soar, but one the rest excels;
     Clouds overcome it;
 No! yonder sparkle is the citadel’s
     Circling its summit.
 Thither our path lies; wind we up the heights;
     Wait ye the warning?
 Our low life was the level’s and the night’s;
     He’s for the morning.

Step to a tune, square chests, erect each head, ‘Ware the beholders!
 This is our master, famous, calm and dead,
     Borne on our shoulders.

Sleep, crop and herd! sleep, darkling thorpe and croft,
     Safe from the weather!
 He, whom we convoy to his grave aloft,
     Singing together,
 He was a man born with thy face and throat,
     Lyric Apollo!
 Long he lived nameless: how should Spring take note
     Winter would follow?
 Till lo, the little touch, and youth was gone!
     Cramped and diminished,
 Moaned he, “New measures, other feet anon!
     My dance is finished?”
 No, that’s the world’s way: (keep the mountain-side,
     Make for the city!)
 He knew the signal, and stepped on with pride
     Over men’s pity;
 Left play for work, and grappled with the
     world
     Bent on escaping:
 “What’s in the scroll,” quoth he, “thou keapest furred?
     Show me their shaping,
 Theirs who most studied man, the bard and sage, —
     Give!” — So, he gowned him,
 Straight got by heart that book to its last page:
     Learned, we found him.
 Yea, but we found him bald too, eyes like lead,
     Accents uncertain:
 “Time to taste life,” another would have said,
     “Up with the curtain!”
 This man said rather, “Actual life comes next?
     Patience a moment!
 Grant I have mastered learning’s crabbed text,
     Still there’s the comment.
 Let me know all! Prate not of most or least,
     Painful or easy!
 Even to the crumbs I’d fain eat up the feast.
     Ay, nor feel queasy.”
 Oh, such a life as he resolved to live,
     When he had learned it,
 When he had gathered all books had to give!
     Sooner, he spurned it.
 Image the whole, then execute the parts —
     Fancy the fabric
 Quite, ere you build, ere steel strike fire from quartz,
     Ere mortar dab brick!

(Here’s the town-gate reached: there’s the market-place
     Gaping before us.)
 Yea, this in him was the peculiar grace
     (Hearten our chorus!)
 That before living he’d learn how to live —
     No end to learning:
 Earn the means first — God surely will contrive
     Use for our earning.
 Others mistrust and say, “But time escapes:
     Live now or never!”

He said, "What 's time? Leave Now for dogs and apes!

Man has Forever."

Back to his book then: deeper drooped his head:
Calculus racked him:

Lead en before, his eyes grew dross of lead:

Tussis attacked him.

"Now, master, take a little rest!" — not he!
(Caution redoubled,

Step two abreast, the way winds narrowly!)

Not a whit troubled,

Back to his studies, fresher than at first,
Fierce as a dragon

He (soul-hydroptic with a sacred thirst)

Sucked at the flagon.

Oh, if we draw a circle premature,

Heedless of far gain,

Greedy for quick returns of profit, sure

Bad is our bargain!

Was it not great? did not he throw on God,
(He loves the burthen) —

God's task to make the heavenly period

Perfect the earthen?

Did not he magnify the mind, show clear

Just what it all meant?

He would not discount life, as fools do here,
Paid by instalment.

He ventured neck or nothing — heaven's success
Found, or earth's failure:

"Wilt thou trust death or not?" He answered
"Yes!

Hence with life's pale lure!"

That low man seeks a little thing to do,
Sees it and does it:

This high man, with a great thing to pursue,
Dies ere he knows it.

That low man goes on adding one to one,
His hundred 's soon hit:

This high man, aiming at a million,
Misses an unit.

That, has the world here — should he need the
next,

Let the world mind him!

This, throws himself on God, and unperplexed
Seeking shall find him.

So, with the throttling hands of death at strife,
Ground he at grammar;

Still, through the rattle, parts of speech were rife:

While he could stammer

He settled Hoti's business — let it be! — Properly based Oun —

Gave us the doctrine of the enclitic De,
Dead from the waist down.

Well, here 's the platform, here 's the proper
place:

Hail to your purlieus,

All ye highfliers of the feathered race,
Swallows and curlews!

Here 's the top-peak; the multitude below
Live, for they can, there:

This man decided not to Live but Know —
Bury this man there?

Here — here 's his place, where meteors shoot,
clouds form,

Lightnings are loosened,

Stars come and go! Let joy break with the storm,

Peace let the dew send!

Lofty designs must close in like effects:

Loftily lying,

Leave him — still loftier than the world suspects,
Living and dying.

THE HERETIC'S TRAGEDY

A MIDDLE-AGE INTERLUDE

*Rosa Mundi; seu, fulcite me Floribus. A Conceit of Master Gysbrecht, Canon-Regular of Saint Yodocusby-the-Bar, Ypres City. Cantuque, Virgilius. And hath often been sung at Hock-tide and Festivals.
Gavisus eram, Jessides.*

(It would seem to be a glimpse from the burning of Jacques du Bourg-Molay, at Paris,
A. D. 1314; as distorted by the refraction from Flemish brain to brain, during the course of a couple of centuries. R. B.)

PREADMONISHETH THE ABBOT DEODAET

THE Lord, we look to once for all,

Is the Lord we should look at, all at once:

He knows not to vary, saith Saint Paul,

Nor the shadow of turning, for the nonce.

See him no other than as he is!

Give both the infinitudes their due —

Infinite mercy, but, I wis,

As infinite a justice too. [Organ: plagal-cadence.

As infinite a justice too.

ONE SINGETH

John, Master of the Temple of God,

Falling to sin the Unknown Sin,

What he bought of Emperor Aldabrod,

He sold it to Sultan Saladin:

Till, caught by Pope Clement, a-buzzing there,

Hornet-prince of the mad wasps' hive,

And clipt of his wings in Paris square,

They bring him now to be burned alive.

[And wanteth there grace of lute or clavicithern, ye shall say to confirm him who singeth —

We bring John now to be burned alive.

In the midst is a goodly gallows built;

'Twixt fork and fork, a stake is stuck;

But first they set divers tumbrils a-tilt,

Make a trench all round with the city muck;

Inside they pile log upon log, good store;

Fagots not few, blocks great and small,

Reach a man's mid-thigh, no less, no more, —

For they mean he should roast in the sight of
all.

CHO. — We mean he should roast in the sight
of all.

Good sappy bavins that kindle forthwith;

Billets that blaze substantial and slow;

Pine-stump split deftly, dry as pith;

Larch-heart that chars to a chalk-white glow:

Then up they hoist me John in a chafe,

Sling him fast like a hog to scorch,
Spit in his face, then leap back safe,
Sing "Laudes" and bid clap-to the torch.
CHO. — Laus Deo — who bids clap-to the torch.

John of the Temple, whose fame so bragged,
Is burning alive in Paris square!
How can he curse, if his mouth is gagged?
Or wriggle his neck, with a collar there?
Or heave his chest, which a band goes round?
Or threat with his fist, since his arms are spliced?
Or kick with his feet, now his legs are bound?
— Thinks John, I will call upon Jesus Christ.
[Here one crosseth himself.]

Jesus Christ — John had bought and sold,
Jesus Christ — John had eaten and drunk;
To him, the Flesh meant silver and gold.
(Salva reverentia.)
Now it was, "Saviour, bountiful lamb,
I have roasted thee Turks, though men roast
me!
See thy servant, the plight wherein I am!
Art thou a saviour? Save thou me!"
CHO. — 'Tis John the mocker cries, "Save thou
me!"

Who maketh God's menace an idle word?
— Saith, it no more means what it proclaims,
Than a damsel's threat to her wanton bird? —
For she too prattles of ugly names.
— Saith, he knoweth but one thing, — what he
knows?
That God is good and the rest is breath;
Why else is the same styled Sharon's rose?
Once a rose, ever a rose, he saith.
CHO. — Oh, John shall yet find a rose, he saith!

Alack, there be roses and roses, John!
Some, honeyed of taste like your leman's
tongue:
Some, bitter; for why? (roast gayly on!)
Their tree struck root in devil's dung.
When Paul once reasoned of righteousness
And of temperance and of judgment to come,
Good Felix trembled, he could no less:
John, snickering, crook'd his wicked thumb.
CHO. — What cometh to John of the wicked
thumb?

Ha ha, John plucketh now at his rose
To rid himself of a sorrow at heart!
Lo, — petal on petal, fierce rays unclose;
Anther on anther, sharp spikes outstart;
And with blood for dew, the bosom boils;
And a gust of sulphur is all its smell;
And lo, he is horribly in the toils
Of a coal-black giant flower of hell!
CHO. — What maketh heaven, That maketh hell.

So, as John called now, through the fire amain,
On the Name, he had cursed with, all his
life —
To the Person, he bought and sold again —
For the Face, with his daily buffets rife —
Feature by feature It took its place:
And his voice, like a mad dog's choking bark,

At the steady whole of the Judge's face —
Died. Forth John's soul flared into the dark.

HOLY-CROSS DAY

ON WHICH THE JEWS WERE FORCED TO ATTEND
AN ANNUAL CHRISTIAN SERMON IN ROME

The passage from a mock-historic Diary which follows is by Browning himself.

"Now was come about Holy-Cross Day, and now must my lord preach his first sermon to the Jews: as it was of old cared for in the merciful bowels of the Church, that, so to speak, a crumb at least from her conspicuous table here in Rome should be, though but once yearly, cast to the famishing dogs, under-trampled and bespitten-upon beneath the feet of the guests.
And a moving sight in truth, this, of so many of the besotted blind restif and ready-to-perish Hebrews! now maternally brought — nay, (for He saith, 'Compel them to come in') haled, as it were, by the head and hair, and against their obstinate hearts, to partake of the heavenly grace. What awakening, what striving with tears, what working of a yeasty conscience!
Nor was my lord wanting to himself on so apt
an occasion; witness the abundance of conversions which did incontinently reward him:
though not to my lord be altogether the glory."
— Diary by the Bishop's Secretary, 1600.

What the Jews really said, on thus being driven to church, was rather to this effect: —

FEE, faw, fum! bubble and squeak!
Blessedest Thursday's the fat of the week.
Rumble and tumble, sleek and rough,
Stinking and savory, smug and gruff,
Take the church-road, for the bell's due chime
Gives us the summons — 't is sermon-time!

Boh, here's Barnabas! Job, that's you?
Up stumps Solomon — bustling too?
Shame, man! greedy beyond your years
To handse the bishop's shaving-shears?
Fair play's a jewel! Leave friends in the lurch?

Stand on a line ere you start for the church!

Higgledy piggledy, packed we lie,
Rats in a hamper, swine in a sty,
Wasps in a bottle, frogs in a sieve,
Worms in a carcass, fleas in a sleeve.
Hist! square shoulders, settle your thumbs
And buzz for the bishop — here he comes.

Bow, wow, wow — a bone for the dog!
I liken his Grace to an acorned hog.

What, a boy at his side, with the bloom of a lass,
To help and handle my lord's hour-glass !
Didst ever behold so lithe a chine ?
His cheek hath laps like a fresh-singed swine.

Aaron's asleep — shove hip to haunch,
Or somebody deal him a dig in the paunch !
Look at the purse with the tassel and knob,
And the gown with the angel and thingumbob !

What's he at, quotha ? reading his text !
Now you've his curtsey — and what comes
next ?

See to our converts — you doomed black dozen —
No stealing away — nor cog nor cozen !
You five, that were thieves, deserve it fairly ;
You seven, that were beggars, will live less sparely ;
You took your turn and dipped in the hat,
Got fortune — and fortune gets you ; mind that !

Give your first groan — compunction's at work ;
And soft ! from a Jew you mount to a Turk.
Lo, Micah, — the selfsame beard on chin
He was four times already converted in !
Here's a knife, clip quick — it's a sign of
grace —
Or he ruins us all with his hanging-face.

Whom now is the bishop a-leering at ?
I know a point where his text falls pat.
I'll tell him to-morrow, a word just now
Went to my heart and made me vow
I meddle no more with the worst of trades —
Let somebody else pay his serenades.

Groan all together now, whee — hee — hee !
It's a-work, it's a-work, ah, woe is me !
It began, when a herd of us, picked and placed,
Were spurred through the Corso, stripped to the waist ;
Jew brutes, with sweat and blood well spent
To usher in worthily Christian Lent.

It grew, when the hangman entered our bounds,
Yelled, pricked us out to his church like hounds :
It got to a pitch, when the hand indeed
Which gutted my purse would throttle my creed :
And it overflows, when, to even the odd,
Men I helped to their sins help me to their God.

But now, while the scapegoats leave our flock,
And the rest sit silent and count the clock,
Since forced to muse the appointed time
On these precious facts and truths sublime, —
Let us fitly employ it, under our breath,
In saying Ben Ezra's Song of Death.

For Rabbi Ben Ezra, the night he died,
Called sons and sons' sons to his side,
And spoke, " This world has been harsh and
strange ;
Something is wrong : there needeth a change.

But what, or where ? at the last or first ?
In one point only we sinned, at worst.

" The Lord will have mercy on Jacob yet.
And again in his border see Israel set.
When Judah beholds Jerusalem,
The stranger-seed shall be joined to them :
To Jacob's House shall the Gentiles cleave.
So the Prophet saith and his sons believe.

" Ay, the children of the chosen race
Shall carry and bring them to their place :
In the land of the Lord shall lead the same,
Bondsmen and handmaids. Who shall blame,
When the slaves enslave, the oppressed ones o'er
The oppressor triumph forevermore ?

" God spoke, and gave us the word to keep :
Bade never fold the hands nor sleep
'Mid a faithless world, — at watch and ward,
Till Christ at the end relieve our guard.
By his servant Moses the watch was set :
Though near upon cock-crow, we keep it yet.

" Thou ! if thou wast he, who at mid-watch
came,
By the starlight, naming a dubious name !
And if, too heavy with sleep — too rash
With fear — O thou, if that martyr gash
Fell on thee coming to take thine own,
And we gave the Cross, when we owed the Throne —

" Thou art the Judge. We are bruised thus.
But, the Judgment over, join sides with us !
Thine too is the cause ! and not more thine
Thar ours, is the work of these dogs and swine, Whose life laughs through and spits at their
creed,
Who maintain thee in word, and defy thee in deed !

" We withstood Christ then ? Be mindful how
At least we withstand Barabbas now !
Was our outrage sore ? But the worst we spared,
To have called these — Christians, had we dared !
Let defiance to them pay mistrust of thee,
And Rome make amends for Calvary !

" By the torture, prolonged from age to age,
By the infamy, Israel's heritage,
By the Ghetto's plague, by the garb's disgrace,
By the badge of shame, by the felon's place,
By the branding-tool, the bloody whip,
And the summons to Christian fellowship, —

" We boast our proof that at least the Jew
Would wrest Christ's name from the Devil's crew.
Thy face took never so deep a shade
But we fought them in it, God our aid !
A trophy to bear, as we march, thy band,
South, East, and on to the Pleasant Land ! " 1

1 Pope Gregory XVI. abolished this bad business of the Sermon. — R. B.

PROTUS

AMONG these latter busts we count by scores,
Half-emperors and quarter-emperors.
Each with his bay-leaf fillet, loose-thonged
vest,

Loric and low-browed Gorgon on the breast, —
One loves a baby face, with violets there,
Violets instead of laurel in the hair,
As those were all the little locks could bear.

Now read here. "Protus ends a period
Of empery beginning with a god;
Born in the porphyry chamber at Byzant,
Queens by his cradle, proud and ministrant:
And if he quickened breath there, 't would like fire

Pantingly through the dim vast realm transpire.
A fame that he was missing spread afar:
The world, from its four corners, rose in war,
Till he was borne out on a balcony
To pacify the world when it should see.
The captains ranged before him, one, his hand
Made baby points at, gained the chief command.
And day by day more beautiful he grew
In shape, all said, in feature and in hue, While young Greek sculptors, gazing on the
child,

Became with old Greek sculpture reconciled.
Already sages labored to condense
In easy tomes a life's experience:
And artists took grave counsel to impart
In one breath and one hand-sweep, all their art —

To make his graces prompt as blossoming
Of plentifully-watered palms in spring:
Since well befits it, whoso mounts the throne,
For beauty, knowledge, strength, should stand alone.
And mortals love the letters of his name."

— Stop! Have you turned two pages? Still
the same
New reign, same date. The scribe goes on to
say

How that same year, on such a month and day,
"John the Pannonian, groundedly believed
A blacksmith's bastard, whose hard hand reprieved

The Empire from its fate the year before, —
Came, had a mind to take the crown, and wore
The same for six years (during which the Huns Kept off their fingers from us), till his sons
Put something in his liquor" — and so forth.
Then a new reign. Stay — "Take at its just worth"

(Subjoins an annotator) "what I give
As hearsay. Some think, John let Protus live
And slip away. 'T is said, he reached man's age
At some blind northern court; made, first a page,

Then tutor to the children; last, of use
About the hunting-stables. I deduce
He wrote the little tract 'On worming dogs,'
Whereof the name in sundry catalogues
Is extant yet. A Protus of the race
Is rumored to have died a monk in Thrace, —

And if the same, he reached senility."
Here's John the Smith's rough-hammered head. Great eye,
Gross jaw and gripped lips do what granite can
To give you the crown-grasper. What a man!

THE STATUE AND THE BUST

This poem was published first in 1855 as an independent issue. A correspondent of an American paper once asked the following questions respecting this poem: —

"1. When, how, and where did it happen? Browning's divine vagueness lets one gather only that the lady's husband was a Riccardi. 2. Who was the lady? who the duke? 3. The magnificent house wherein Florence lodges her préfet is known to all Florentine ball-goers as the Palazzo Riccardi. It was bought by the Riccardi from the Medici in 1659. From none of its windows did the lady gaze at her more than royal lover. From what window, then, if from any? Are the statue and the bust still in their original positions?"

The letter fell into the hands of Mr. Thomas J. Wise, who sent it to Mr. Browning, and received the following answer.

Jan. 8, 1887.

"DEAR MR. WISE, — I have seldom met with such a strange inability to understand what seems the plainest matter possible: 'ball-goers' are probably not history-readers, but any guide-book would confirm what is sufficiently stated in the poem. I will append a note or two, however. 1. 'This story the townsmen tell;' 'when, how, and where,' constitutes the subject of the poem. 2. The lady was the wife of Riccardi; and the duke, Ferdinand, just as the poem says. 3. As it was built by, and inhabited by, the Medici till sold, long after, to the Riccardi, it was not from the duke's palace, but a window in that of the Riccardi, that the lady gazed at her lover riding by. The statue is still in its place, looking at the window under which 'now is the empty shrine.' Can anything be clearer? My 'vagueness' leaves what to be 'gathered' when all these things are put down in black and white? Oh, 'ball-goers'!"

THERE's a palace in Florence, the world knows
well,
And a statue watches it from the square,
And this story of both do our townsmen tell.

Agès ago, a lady there,
At the farthest window facing the East
Asked, "Who rides by with the royal air?"

The bridesmaids' prattle around her ceased ;
She leaned forth, one on either hand ;
They saw how the blush of the bride increased —

They felt by its beats her heart expand —
As one at each ear and both in a breath
Whispered, "The Great-Duke Ferdinand."

That selfsame instant, underneath,
The Duke rode past in his idle way,
Empty and fine like a swordless sheath.

Gay he rode, with a friend as gay,
Till he threw his head back — "Who is she ?"
— "A bride the Riccardi brings home to-day."

Hair in heaps lay heavily
Over a pale brow spirit-pure —
Carved like the heart of the coal-black tree,

Crisped like a war-steed's encolure —
And vainly sought to dissemble her eyes
Of the blackest black our eyes endure,

And lo, a blade for a knight's emprise
Filled the fine empty sheath of a man, —
The Duke grew straightway brave and wise.

He looked at her, as a lover can ;
She looked at him, as one who awakes :
The past was a sleep, and her life began.

Now, love so ordered for both their sakes,
A feast was held that selfsame night
In the pile which the mighty shadow makes.

(For Via Larga is three-parts light,
But the palace overshadows one,
Because of a crime, which may God requite !

To Florence and God the wrong was done,
Through the first republic's murder there
By Cosimo and his cursed son.)

The Duke (with the statue's face in the square)
Turned in the midst of his multitude
At the bright approach of the bridal pair.

Face to face the lovers stood
A single minute and no more,
While the bridegroom bent as a man subdued —

Bowed till his bonnet brushed the floor —
For the Duke on the lady a kiss conferred,
As the courtly custom was of yore.

In a minute can lovers exchange a word ?
In a word did pass, which I do not think,
Only one out of a thousand heard.

That was the bridegroom. At day's brink
He and his bride were alone at last
In a bed chamber by a taper's blink.

Calmly he said that her lot was cast,
That the door she had passed was shut on
her
Till the final catafalk repassed.

The world meanwhile, its noise and stir,
Through a certain window facing the East
She could watch like a convent's chronicler.

Since passing the door might lead to a feast,
And a feast might lead to so much beside,
He, of many evils, chose the least.

"Freely I choose too," said the bride —
"Your window and its world suffice,"
Replied the tongue, while the heart replied —

"If I spend the night with that devil twice,
May his window serve as my loop of hell
Whence a damned soul looks on paradise !

"I fly to the Duke who loves me well,
Sit by his side and laugh at sorrow
Ere I count another ave-bell.

"'T is only the coat of a page to borrow,
And tie my hair in a horse-boy's trim.
And I save my soul — but not to-morrow" —

(She checked herself and her eye grew dim)
"My father tarries to bless my state :
I must keep it one day more for him.

"Is one day more so long to wait ?
Moreover the Duke rides past, I know ;
We shall see each other, sure as fate."

She turned on her side and slept. Just so !
So we resolve on a thing and sleep :
So did the lady, ages ago.

That night the Duke said, "Dear or cheap
As the cost of this cup of bliss may prove
To body or soul, I will drain it deep."

And on the morrow, bold with love,
He beckoned the bridegroom (close on call,
As his duty bade, by the Duke's alcove)

And smiled "'T was a very funeral,
Your lady will think, this feast of ours, —
A shame to efface, whate'er befall !

"What if we break from the Arno bowers,
And try if Petraja, cool and green,
Cure last night's fault with this morning's flowers ?"

The bridegroom, not a thought to be seen
On his steady brow and quiet mouth,
Said, "Too much favor for me so mean !

"But, alas ! my lady leaves the South ;
Each wind that comes from the Apennine
Is a menace to her tender youth :

"Nor a way exists, the wise opine,
If she quits her palace twice this year,
To avert the flower of life's decline."

Quoth the Duke, "A sage and a kindly fear.
Moreover Petraja is cold this spring ;
Be our feast to-night as usual here !"

And then to himself — "Which night shall bring Thy bride to her lover's embraces, fool —
Or I am the fool, and thou art the king !

"Yet my passion must wait a night, nor cool —
For to-night the Envoy arrives from France
Whose heart I unlook with thyself, my tool.

"I need thee still and might miss perchance.
To-day is not wholly lost, beside,
With its hope of my lady's countenance :

"For I ride — what should I do but ride ?
And passing her palace, if I list,
May glance at its window — well betide ! "

So said, so done : nor the lady missed
One ray that broke from the ardent brow,
Nor a curl of the lips where the spirit kissed.

Be sure that each renewed the vow,
No morrow's sun should arise and set
And leave them then as it left them now.

But next day passed, and next day yet,
With still fresh cause to wait one day more
Ere each leaped over the parapet.

And still, as love's brief morning wore,
With a gentle start, half smile, half sigh,
They found love not as it seemed before.

They thought it would work infallibly,
But nay in despite of heaven and earth :
The rose would blow when the storm passed
by.

Meantime they could profit in winter's dearth
Nor ray of fruits that supplant the rose :
The world and its ways have a certain worth :

And to press a point while these oppose
Were simple policy ; better wait :
We lose no friends and we gain no foes.

Meantime, worse fates than a lover's fate,
Who daily may ride and pass and look
Where his lady watches behind the grate !

And she — she watched the square like a book
Holding one picture and only one,
Which daily to find she undertook :

When the picture was reached the book was
done,
And she turned from the picture at night to scheme
Of tearing it out for herself next sun.

So weeks grew months, years ; gleam by gleam
The glory dropped from their youth and love,
And both perceived they had dreamed a dream ;

Which hovered as dreams do, still above :
But who can take a dream for a truth ?
Oh, hide our eyes from the next remove !

One day as the lady saw her youth
Depart, and the silver thread that streaked
Her hair, and, worn by the serpent's tooth,

The brow so puckered, the chin so peaked, —
And wondered who the woman was,
Hollow-eyed and haggard-cheeked,

Fronting her silent in the glass —
"Summon here," she suddenly said,
"Before the rest of my old self pass,

"Him, the Carver, a hand to aid,
Who fashions the clay no love will change,
And fixes a beauty never to fade.

"Let Robbia's craft so apt and strange
Arrest the remains of young and fair,
And rivet them while the seasons range.

"Make me a face on the window there,
Waiting as ever, mute the while,
My love to pass below in the square !

"And let me think that it may beguile
Dreary days which the dead must spend
Down in their darkness under the aisle,

"To say, 'What matters it at the end ?
I did no more while my heart was warm
Than does that image, my pale-faced friend.'

"Where is the use of the lip's red charm,
The heaven of hair, the pride of the brow,
And the blood that blues the inside arm —

"Unless we turn, as the soul knows how,
The earthly gift to an end divine ?
A lady of clay is as good, I trow."

But long ere Robbia's cornice, fine,
With flowers and fruits which leaves enlase,
Was set where now is the empty shrine —

(And, leaning out of a bright blue space,
As a ghost might lean from a chink of sky,
The passionate pale lady's face —

Eying ever, with earnest eye
And quick-turned neck at its breathless stretch,
Some one who ever is passing by —)

The Duke had sighed like the simplest wretch
In Florence, "Youth — my dream escapes !
Will its record stay ?" And he bade them fetch

Some subtle moulder of brazen shapes —
"Can the soul, the will, die out of a man
Ere his body find the grave that gapes ?

"John of Douay shall effect my plan,
Set me on horseback here aloft,
Alive, as the crafty sculptor can,

"In the very square I have crossed so oft :
That men may admire, when future suns
Shall touch the eyes to a purpose soft,

"While the mouth and the brow stay brave in bronze —
Admire and say, 'When he was alive
How he would take his pleasure once !'

"And it shall go hard but I contrive
To listen the while, and laugh in my tomb
At idleness which aspires to strive."

So! While these wait the trump of doom,
How do their spirits pass, I wonder,
Nights and days in the narrow row?

Still, I suppose, they sit and ponder
What a gift life was, ages ago,
Six steps out of the chapel yonder.

Only they see not God, I know,
Nor all that chivalry of his,
The soldier-saints who, row on row,

Burn upward each to his point of bliss —
Since, the end of life being manifest,
He had burned his way through the world to
this.

I hear you reproach, "But delay was best,
For their end was a crime." — Oh, a crime will
do
As well, I reply, to serve for a test,

As a virtue golden through and through,
Sufficient to vindicate itself
And prove its worth at a moment's view!

Must a game be played for the sake of pelf?
Where a button goes, 't were an epigram
To offer the stamp of the very Guelph.

The true has no value beyond the sham:
As well the counter as coin, I submit,
When your table's a hat, and your prize, a dram.

Stake your counter as boldly every whit,
Venture as warily, use the same skill,
Do your best, whether winning or losing it,

If you choose to play! — is my principle.
Let a man contend to the uttermost
For his life's set prize, be it what it will!

The counter our lovers staked was lost
As surely as if it were lawful coin:
And the sin I impute to each frustrate ghost

Is — the unlit lamp and the ungirt loin,
Though the end in sight was a vice, I say.
You of the virtue (we issue join)
How strive you? De te, fabula!

PORPHYRIA'S LOVER

First printed in Mr. Fox's Monthly Repository in 1836, under the signature Z. When issued in

Bells and Pomegranates it was grouped with Johannes Agricola in Meditation as No. II. of Madhouse Cells. The poem has an interest as the earliest, apparently, of Browning's monologues.

THE rain set early in to-night,
The sullen wind was soon awake,
It tore the elm-tops down for spite,
And did its worst to vex the lake:
I listened with heart fit to break.
When glided in Porphyria; straight
She shut the cold out and the storm,
And kneeled and made the cheerless grate
Blaze up, and all the cottage warm;
Which done, she rose, and from her form
Withdrew the dripping cloak and shawl,
And laid her soiled gloves by, untied
Her hat and let the damp hair fall,
And, last, she sat down by my side
And called me. When no voice replied,
She put my arm about her waist,
And made her smooth white shoulder bare
And all her yellow hair displaced,
And, stooping, made my cheek lie there,
And spread, o'er all, her yellow hair,
Murmuring how she loved me — she
Too weak, for all her heart's endeavor,
To set its struggling passion free
From pride, and vainer ties dis sever,
And give herself to me forever.
But passion sometimes would prevail,
Nor could to-night's gay feast restrain
A sudden thought of one so pale
For love of her, and all in vain:
So, she was come through wind and rain.
Be sure I looked up at her eyes
Happy and proud; at last I knew
Porphyria worshipped me; surprise
Made my heart swell, and still it grew
While I debated what to do.
That moment she was mine, mine, fair,
Perfectly pure and good: I found
A thing to do, and all her hair
In one long yellow string I wound
Three times her little throat around,
And strangled her. No pain felt she;
I am quite sure she felt no pain.
As a shut bud that holds a bee,
I warily oped her lids: again
Laughed the blue eyes without a stain.
And I untightened next the tress
About her neck; her cheek once more
Blushed bright beneath my burning kiss:
I propped her head up as before,
Only, this time my shoulder bore
Her head, which droops upon it still:
The smiling rosy little head,
So glad it has its utmost will,
That all it scorned at once is fled,
And I, its love, am gained instead!
Porphyria's love: she guessed not how
Her darling one wish would be heard.
And thus we sit together now,
And all night long we have not stirred,
And yet God has not said a word!

"CHILDE ROLAND TO THE DARK TOWER CAME"

See Edgar's song in Lear.

My first thought was, he lied in every word,
That hoary cripple, with malicious eye
Askance to watch the working of his lie
On mine, and mouth scarce able to afford
Suppression of the glee, that pursed and scored
Its edge, at one more victim gained thereby.

What else should he be set for, with his staff?
What, save to waylay with his lies, ensnare
All travellers who might find him posted
there,
And ask the road? I guessed what skull-like
laugh
Would break, what crutch 'gin write my epitaph
For pastime in the dusty thoroughfare,

If at his counsel I should turn aside
Into that ominous tract which, all agree,
Hides the Dark Tower. Yet acquiescingly
I did turn as he pointed: neither pride
Nor hope rekindling at the end deserved,
So much as gladness that some end might be.

For, what with my whole world-wide wander-
ing,
What with my search drawn out through years, my hope
Dwindled into a ghost not fit to cope
With that obstreperous joy success would bring, —
I hardly tried now to rebuke the spring
My heart made, finding failure in its scope.

As when a sick man very near to death
Seems dead indeed, and feels begin and end
The tears, and takes the farewell of each
friend,
And hears one bid the other go, draw breath
Freelier outside, ("since all is o'er," he saith,
"And the blow fallen no grieving can amend;")

While some discuss if near the other graves
Be room enough for this, and when a day
Suits best for carrying the corpse away,
With care about the banners, scarves and staves:
And still the man hears all, and only craves
He may not shame such tender love and stay.

Thus, I had so long suffered in this quest,
Heard failure prophesied so oft, been writ
So many times among "The Band" — to wit,
The knights who to the Dark Tower's search addressed

Their steps — that just to fail as they, seemed
best,

And all the doubt was now — should I be fit?

So, quiet as despair, I turned from him,
That hateful cripple, out of his highway
Into the path he pointed. All the day

Had been a dreary one at best, and dim
Was settling to its close, yet shot one grim
Red leer to see the plain catch its estray.

For mark! no sooner was I fairly found
Pledged to the plain, after a pace or two,
Than, pausing to throw backward a last view
O'er the safe road, 't was gone; gray plain all
round:

Nothing but plain to the horizon's bound.
I might go on; naught else remained to do.

So, on I went. I think I never saw
Such starved ignoble nature; nothing throve:
For flowers — as well expect a cedar grove!
But cockle, spurge, according to their law
Might propagate their kind, with none to awe,
You'd think: a burr had been a treasure trove.

No! penury, inertness and grimace,
In some strange sort, were the land's portion.
"See
Or shut your eyes," said Nature peevishly,
"It nothing skills: I cannot help my case:
'T is the Last Judgment's fire must cure this
place,
Calcine its clods and set my prisoners free."

If there pushed any ragged thistle-stalk
Above its mates, the head was chopped; the bents
Were jealous else. What made those holes and rents
In the dock's harsh swarth leaves, bruised as to balk
All hope of greenness? 't is a brute must walk
Pashing their life out, with a brute's intents.

As for the grass, it grew as scant as hair
In leprosy; thin dry blades pricked the mud
Which underneath looked kneaded up with
blood.
One stiff blind horse, his every bone a-stare,
Stood stupefied, however he came there:
Thrust out past service from the devil's stud!

Alive? he might be dead for aught I know,
With that red gaunt and colloped neck
a-strain,
And shut eyes underneath the rusty mane;
Seldom went such grotesqueness with such woe;
I never saw a brute I hated so;
He must be wicked to deserve such pain.

I shut my eyes and turned them on my heart.
As a man calls for wine before he fights,
I asked one draught of earlier, happier sights,
Ere fitly I could hope to play my part.
Think first, fight afterwards — the soldier's art:
One taste of the old time sets all to rights.

Not it! I fancied Cuthbert's reddening face
Beneath its garniture of curly gold,
Dear fellow, till I almost felt him fold
An arm in mine to fix me to the place,
That way he used. Alas, one night's disgrace!
Out went my heart's new fire and left it cold.

Giles then, the soul of honor — there he stands
 Frank as ten years ago when knighted first.
 What honest man should dare (he said) he
 durst.

Good — but the scene shifts — faugh! what hanging hands

Pin to his breast a parchment? His own bands
 Read it. Poor traitor, spit upon and curst!

Better this present than a past like that;
 Back therefore to my darkening path again!
 No sound, no sight as far as eye could strain.
 Will the night send a howlet or a bat?
 I asked: when something on the dismal flat Came to arrest my thoughts and change their train.

A sudden little river crossed my path
 As unexpected as a serpent comes.
 No sluggish tide congenial to the glooms;
 This, as it frothed by, might have been a bath
 For the fiend's glowing hoof — to see the wrath
 Of its black eddy bespate with flakes and spumes.

So petty yet so spiteful! All along,
 Low scrubby alders kneeled down over it;
 Drenched willows flung them headlong in a fit

Of mute despair, a suicidal throng:
 The river which had done them all the wrong,
 Whate'er that was, rolled by, deterred no whit.

Which, while I forded, — good saints, how I feared
 To set my foot upon a dead man's cheek,
 Each step, or feel the spear I thrust to seek
 For hollows, tangled in his hair or beard!
 — It may have been a water-rat I speared,
 But, ugh! it sounded like a baby's shriek.

Glad was I when I reached the other bank.
 Now for a better country. Vain presage!
 Who were the strugglers, what war did they wage,

Whose savage trample thus could pad the dank
 Soil to a plash? Toads in a poisoned tank,
 Or wild cats in a red-hot iron cage —

The fight must so have seemed in that fell cirque.
 What penned them there, with all the plain to choose?

No footprint leading to that horrid mews,
 None out of it. Mad brewage set to work
 Their brains, no doubt, like galley-slaves the Turk

Pits for his pastime, Christians against Jews.

And more than that — a furlong on — why,
 there!

What had use was that engine for, that wheel,
 Or brake, not wheel — that harrow fit to reel
 Men's bodies out like silk? with all the air
 Of Tophet's tool, on earth left unaware,
 Or brought to sharpen its rusty teeth of steel.

Then came a bit of stubbed ground, once a wood,

Next a marsh, it would seem, and now mere
 earth

Desperate and done with: (so a fool finds mirth,

Makes a thing and then mars it, till his mood
 Changes and off he goes!) within a rood —

Bog, clay and rubble, sand and stark black dearth.

Now blotches rankling, colored gay and grim,
 Now patches where some leanness of the soil's

Broke into moss or substances like boils;
 Then came some palsied oak, a cleft in him
 Like a distorted mouth that splits its rim
 Gaping at death, and dies while it recoils.

And just as far as ever from the end!
 Naught in the distance but the evening,
 naught

To point my footstep further! At the
 thought,

A great black bird, Apollyon's bosom-friend,
 Sailed past, nor beat his wide wing dragon-penned

That brushed my cap — perchance the guide
 I sought.

For, looking up, aware I somehow grew,
 'Spite of the dusk, the plain had given place
 All round to mountains — with such name to
 grace

Mere ugly heights and heaps now stolen in view.

How thus they had surprised me, — solve it,
 you!

How to get from them was no clearer case.

Yet half I seemed to recognize some trick
 Of mischief happened to me, God knows
 when —

In a bad dream perhaps. Here ended, then,
 Progress this way. When, in the very nick
 Of giving up, one time more, came a click
 As when a trap shuts — you're inside the den!

Burningly it came on me all at once.

This was the place! those two hills on the
 right,

Crouched like two bulls locked horn in horn
 in fight;

While to the left, a tall scalped mountain . . .
 Dunce,

Dotard, a-doing at the very nonce,
 After a life spent training for the sight!

What in the midst lay but the Tower itself?
 The round squat turret, blind as the fool's
 heart,

Built of brown stone, without a counterpart
 In the whole world. The tempest's mocking elf

Points to the shipman thus the unseen shelf
 He strikes on, only when the timbers start.

Not see? because of night perhaps? — why, day
 Came back again for that! before it left,
 The dying sunset kindled through a cleft:
 The hills, like giants at a hunting, lay,
 Chin upon hand, to see the game at bay, —
 "Now stab and end the creature—to the heft!"

Not hear? when noise was everywhere! it tolled
 Increasing like a bell. Names in my ears,
 Of all the lost adventurers my peers, —
 How such a one was strong, and such was bold,

And such was fortunate, yet each of old Lost, lost! one moment knelled the woe of
 years.

There they stood, ranged along the hillsides,
 met

To view the last of me, a living frame
 For one more picture! in a sheet of flame
 I saw them and I knew them all. And yet
 Dauntless the slug-horn to my lips I set,
 And blew. "Childe Roland to the Dark Tower came."

A SOUL'S TRAGEDY

ACT FIRST, BEING WHAT WAS CALLED THE POETRY OF CHIAPPINO'S LIFE; AND ACT SECOND, ITS PROSE

THIS drama was first printed with Luria as the concluding number of Bells and Pomegranates in April, 1846.

PERSONS

LUITOLFO and EULALIA, betrothed lovers.
 CHIAPPINO, their friend.
 OGNIEN, the Pope's Legate.
 Citizens of Faenza.

TIME, 15—. PLACE, FAENZA.

ACT I

Inside LUITOLFO'S house. CHIAPPINO, EULALIA.

Eulalia. What is it keeps Luitolfo? Night's fast falling.

And 't was scarce sunset . . . had the ave-bell
 Sounded before he sought the Provost's house?
 I think not: all he had to say would take
 Few minutes, such a very few, to say!
 How do you think, Chiappino? If our lord
 The Provost were less friendly to your friend
 Than everybody here professes him,
 I should begin to tremble — should not you?
 Why are you silent when so many times
 I turn and speak to you?

Chiappino. That's good!

Eu. You laugh!

Ch. Yes, I had fancied nothing that bears
 price

In the whole world was left to call my own;
 And, maybe, felt a little pride thereat.
 Up to a single man's or woman's love,
 Down to the right in my own flesh and blood.
 There's nothing mine, I fancied, — till you
 spoke:

— Counting, you see, as "nothing" the permission

To study this peculiar lot of mine
 In silence: well, go silence with the rest Of the world's good! What can I say, shall serve?

Eu. This, — lest you, even more than needs, embitter

Our clouting: say your wrongs have cast, for
 once,

A cloud across your spirit!

Ch.

How a cloud?

Eu. No man nor woman loves you, did you
 say?

Ch. My God, were 't not for thee!

Eu.

Ay, God remains,

Even did men forsake you.

Ch.

Oh, not so!

Were 't not for God, I mean, what hope of
 truth —

Speaking truth, hearing truth, would stay with
 man?

I, now — the homeless friendless penniless
 Proscribed and exiled wretch who speak to

you, —

Ought to speak truth, yet could not, for my
 death,

(The thing that tempts me most) help speaking lies

About your friendship and Luitolfo's courage
 And all our townsfolk's equanimity —

Through sheer incompetence to rid myself

Of the old miserable lying trick

Caught from the liars I have lived with, — God,

Did I not turn to thee! It is thy prompting

I dare to be ashamed of, and thy counsel

Would die along my coward lip, I know.

But I do turn to thee. This craven tongue,

These features which refuse the soul its way,

Reclaim thou! Give me truth — truth, power to speak

— And after be sole present to approve

The spoken truth! Or, stay, that spoken truth,
 Who knows but you, too, may approve?

Eu.

Ah, well —

Keep silence then, Chiappino!

Ch.

You would hear, —

You shall now, — why the thing we please to style

My gratitude to you and all your friends

For service done me, is just gratitude
 So much as yours was service : no whit more.
 I was born here, so was Luitolfo ; both
 At one time, much with the same circumstance
 Of rank and wealth ; and both, up to this night
 Of parting company, have side by side
 Still fared, he in the sunshine — I, the shadow.
 " Why ? " asks the world. " Because," replies
 the world

To its complacent self. " these playfellows,
 Who took at church the holy-water drop
 Each from the other's finger, and so forth, —
 Were of two moods : Luitolfo was the proper
 Friend-making, everywhere friend-finding soul,
 Fit for the sunshine, so, it followed him.
 A happy-tempered bringer of the best
 Out of the worst ; who bears with what 's past
 cure,

And puts so good a face on 't — wisely passive
 Where action 's fruitless, while he remedies
 In silence what the foolish rail against ;
 A man to smooth such natures as parade
 Of opposition must exasperate ;
 No general gauntlet-gatherer for the weak
 Against the strong, yet over-scrupulous
 At lucky junctures ; one who won't forego
 The after-battle work of binding wounds,
 Because, forsooth he 'd have to bring himself
 To side with wound-inflictors for their leave ! "
 — Why do you gaze, nor help me to repeat
 What comes so glibly from the common mouth,
 About Luitolfo and his so-styled friend ?

Eu. Because, that friend's sense is obscured . . .

Ch. I thought
 You would be readier with the other half
 Of the world's story, my half ! Yet, 't is true.
 For all the world does say it. Say your worst !
 True, I thank God, I ever said " you sin,"
 When a man did sin : if I could not say it,
 I glared it at him ; if I could not glare it,
 I prayed against him ; then my part seemed over.
 God's may begin yet : so it will, I trust.

Eu. If the world outraged you, did we ?

Ch. What 's " me " ?
 That you use well or ill ? It 's man, in me,
 All your successes are an outrage to,
 You all, whom sunshine follows, as you say !
 Here 's our Faenza birthplace ; they send here
 A provost from Ravenna : how he rules,
 You can at times be eloquent about.
 " Then, end his rule ! " — " Ah yes, one stroke does that !

But patience under wrong works slow and sure.
 Must violence still bring peace forth ? He,
 beside,

Returns so blandly one's obeisance ! ah —
 Some latent virtue may be lingering yet,
 Some human sympathy which, once excite,
 And all the lump were leavened quietly :
 So, no more talk of striking, for this time ! "
 But I, as one of those he rules, won't bear
 These pretty takings-up and layings-down
 Our cause, just as you think occasion suits.
 Enough of earnest, is there ? You 'll play, will
 you ?

Diversify your tactics, give submission,
 Obsequiousness and flattery a turn,

While we die in our misery patient deaths ?
 We all are outraged then, and I the first :
 I, for mankind, resent each shrug and smirk,
 Each beck and bend, each . . . all you do and
 are,

I hate !

Eu. We share a common censure, then.

'T is well you have not poor Luitolfo's part
 Nor mine to point out in the wide offence.

Ch. Oh, shall I let you so escape me, lady ?
 Come, on your own ground, lady, — from your-
 self,

(Leaving the people's wrong, which most is
 mine)

What have I got to be so grateful for ?

These three last fines, no doubt, one on the other

Paid by Luitolfo ?

Eu. Shame, Chiappino !

Ch. Shame

Fall presently on who deserves it most !

— Which is to see. He paid my fines — my
 friend,

Your prosperous smooth lover presently,
 Then, scarce your wooer, — soon, your husband : well —

I loved you.

Eu. Hold !

Ch. You knew it, years ago.

When my voice faltered and my eye grew dim
 Because you gave me your silk mask to hold —
 My voice that greatens when there's need to curse

The people's Provost to their heart's content,
 — My eye, the Provost, who bears all men's
 eyes,

Banishes now because he cannot bear, —

You knew . . . but you do your parts — my
 part, I :

So be it ! You flourish, I decay : all 's well.

Eu. I hear this for the first time.

Ch. The fault 's there ?
 Then my days spoke not, and my nights of fire
 Were voiceless ? Then the very heart may burst.

Yet all prove naught, because no mincing
 speech

Tells leisurely that thus it is and thus ?

Eulalia, truce with toying for this once !

A banished fool, who troubles you to-night

For the last time — why, what 's to fear from
 me ?

You knew I loved you !

Eu. Not so, on my faith !

You were my now-affianced lover's friend —

Came in, went out with him, could speak as he.

All praise your ready parts and pregnant wit ;

See how your words come from you in a crowd !

Luitolfo's first to place you o'er himself

In all that challenges respect and love :

Yet you were silent then, who blame me now

I say all this by fascination, sure :

I, all but wed to one I love, yet listen !

It must be, you are wronged, and that the wrongs

Luitolfo pities . . .

Ch. — You too pity ? Do !

But hear first what my wrongs are ; so began

This talk and so shall end this talk. I say,
Was 't not enough that I must strive (I saw)
To grow so far familiar with your charms
As next contrive some way to win them — which
To do, an age seemed far too brief — for, see!
We all aspire to heaven; and there lies heaven
Above us: go there! Dare we go? no, surely!
How dare we go without a reverent pause,
A growing less unfit for heaven? Just so,
I dared not speak: the greater fool, it seems!
Was 't not enough to struggle with such folly,
But I must have, beside, the very man
Whose slight free loose and incapacious soul
Gave his tongue scope to say whate'er he would — Must have him load me with his benefits
— For fortune's fiercest stroke?

Eu. Justice to him
That's now entreating, at his risk perhaps,
Justice for you! Did he once call those acts
Of simple friendship — bounties, benefits?

Ch. No: the straight course had been to call them thus.

Then, I had flung them back, and kept myself
Unhindered, free as he to win the prize
We both sought. But "the gold was dross," he said:

"He loved me, and I loved him not: why
spurn

A trifle out of superfluity?
He had forgotten he had done as much."
So had not I! Henceforth, try as I could
To take him at his word, there stood by you
My benefactor; who might speak and laugh
And urge his nothings, even banter me Before you — but my tongue was tied. A dream!

Let's wake: your husband . . . how you shake at that!

Good — my revenge!

Eu. Why should I shake? What forced
Or forces me to be Luitolfo's bride?

Ch. There's my revenge, that nothing forces you.

No gratitude, no liking of the eye
Nor longing of the heart, but the poor bond
Of habit — here so many times he came,
So much he spoke, — all these compose the tie
That pulls you from me. Well, he paid my fines,

Nor missed a cloak from wardrobe, dish from table;

He spoke a good word to the Provost here,
Held me up when my fortunes fell away,
— It had not looked so well to let me drop, —
Men take pains to preserve a tree-stump, even,
Whose boughs they played beneath — much more a friend.

But one grows tired of seeing, after the first,
Pains spent upon impracticable stuff Like me. I could not change: you know the
rest:

I've spoke my mind too fully out, by chance,
This morning to our Provost; so, ere night
I leave the city on pain of death. And now
On my account there's gallant intercession
Goes forward — that's so graceful! — and anon
He'll noisily come back; "the intercession
Was made and fails; all's over for us both;

"Tis vain contending; I would better go."
And I do go — and straight to you he turns
Light of a load; and ease of that permits
His visage to repair the natural bland
Economy, sore broken late to suit
My discontent. Thus, all are pleased — you,
with him,

He with himself, and all of you with me
— "Who," say the citizens, "had done far better

In letting people sleep upon their woes,
If not possessed with talent to relieve them
When once awake; — but then I had," they'll
say,

"Doubtless some unknown compensating pride
In what I did; and as I seem content
With ruining myself, why, so should they be."
And so they are, and so be with his prize
The devil, when he gets them speedily!

Why does not your Luitolfo come? I long
To don this cloak and take the Lugo path.
It seems you never loved me, then?

Eu.

Chiappino!

Ch. Never?

Eu. Never.

Ch. That's sad. Say what I might,
There was no help from being sure this while You loved me. Love like mine must have return,

I thought: no river starts but to some sea.
And had you loved me, I could soon devise
Some specious reason why you stifled love,
Some fancied self-denial on your part,
Which made you choose Luitolfo; so, except-
ing

From the wide condemnation of all here,
One woman. Well, the other dream may break!

If I knew any heart, as mine loved you,
Loved me, though in the vilest breast 't were lodged.

I should, I think, be forced to love again:

Else there's no right nor reason in the world.

Eu. "If you knew," say you, — but I did not know.

That's where you're blind, Chiappino! — a disease

Which if I may remove, I'll not repent
The listening to. You cannot, will not, see How, place you but in every circumstance
Of us, you are just now indignant at,
You'd be as we.

Ch. I should be? . . . that; again!
I, to my friend, my country and my love,
Be as Luitolfo and these Faentines?

Eu. As we.

Ch. Now, I'll say something to remember.
I trust in nature for the stable laws
Of beauty and utility. — Spring shall plant,
And Autumn garner to the end of time:
I trust in God — the right shall be the right
And other than the wrong, while he endures:
I trust in my own soul, that can perceive
The outward and the inward, nature's good
And God's: so, seeing these men and myself,
Having a right to speak, thus do I speak.
I'll not curse — God bears with them, well may I —

But I — protest against their claiming me.
I simply say, if that's allowable,
I would not (broadly) do as they have done.
— God curse this townful of born slaves, bred slaves,
Branded into the blood and bone, slaves!
Curse

Whoever loves, above his liberty,
House, land or life! and . . .

[A knocking without.
— bless my hero-friend,

Luitolfo!

Eu. How he knocks!

Ch. The peril, lady!
"Chiappino, I have run a risk — a risk!
For when I prayed the Provost (he's my friend)
To grant you a week's respite of the sentence
That confiscates your goods, exiles yourself,
He shrugged his shoulder — I say, shrugged it!

Yes,
And fright of that drove all else from my head.
Here's a good purse of scudi: off with you,
Lest of that shrug come what God only knows!
The scudi — friend, they're trash — no thanks,
I beg!

Take the north gate, — for San Vitale's suburb,
Whose double taxes you appealed against,
In discomposure at your ill-success
Is apt to stone you: there, there — only go!
Beside, Eulalia here looks sleepily.
Shake . . . oh, you hurt me, so you squeeze
my wrist!"

— Is it not thus you'll speak, adventurous
friend?

[As he opens the door, LUITOLFO rushes in, his garments disordered.

Eu. Luitolfo! Blood?

Luitolfo. There's more — and more of it!
Eulalia — take the garment! No — you, friend!
You take it and the blood from me — you dare!

Eu. Oh, who has hurt you? where's the wound?

Ch. "Who," say you?
The man with many a touch of virtue yet!
The Provost's friend has proved too frank of
speech,

And this comes of it. Miserable hound!
This comes of temporizing, as I said!
Here's fruit of your smooth speeches and soft looks!

Now see my way! As God lives, I go straight
To the palace and do justice, once for all!

Luit. What says he?

Ch. I'll do justice on him,

Luit. Him?

Ch. The Provost.

Luit. I've just killed him.

Eu. Oh, my God!

Luit. My friend, they're on my trace;
they'll have me — now!

They're round him, busy with him: soon they'll find

He's past their help, and then they'll be on
me!

Chiappino, save Eulalia! I forget . . .

Were you not bound for . . .

Ch.

Luit.

Lugo?

Ah — yes — yes!

That was the point I prayed of him to change.
Well, go — be happy! Is Eulalia safe?
They're on me!

Ch. 'T is through me they reach you, then!
Friend, seem the man you are! Lock arms — that's right!

Now tell me what you've done; explain how
you,

That still professed forbearance, still preached
peace,

Could bring yourself . . .
Luit. What was peace for, Chiappino?

I tried peace: did that promise, when peace failed,

Strife should not follow? All my peaceful days

Were just the prelude to a day like this.

I cried "You call me 'friend': save my true
friend!

Save him, or lose me!"

Ch. But you never said
You meant to tell the Provost thus and thus.

Luit. Why should I say it? What else did
I mean?

Ch. Well? He persisted?

Luit. — "Would so order it
You should not trouble him too soon again."

I saw a meaning in his eye and lip;
I poured my heart's store of indignant words
Out on him: then — I know not! He retorted,
And I . . . some staff lay there to hand — I

think
He bade his servants thrust me out — I

struck . . .

Ah, they come! Fly you, save yourselves, you two!

The dead back-weight of the beheading axe!
The glowing trip-hook, thumbscrews and the gadge!

Eu. They do come! Torches in the Place!
Farewell,

Chiappino! You can work no good to us —
Much to yourself; believe not, all the world
Must needs be cursed henceforth!

Ch. And you?

Eu. I stay.

Ch. Ha, ha! Now, listen! I am master
here!

This was my coarse disguise; this paper shows
My path of flight and place of refuge — see —

Lugo, Argenta, past San Nicolo,
Ferrara, then to Venice and all's safe!

Put on the cloak! His people have to fetch
A compass round about. There's time enough
Ere they can reach us, so you straightway make For Lugo . . . nay, he hears not! On with
it —

The cloak, Luitolfo, do you hear me? See —
He obeys he knows not how. Then, if I must — Answer me! Do you know the Lugo gate?

Eu. The northwest gate, over the bridge?

Luit. I know.

Ch. Well, there — you are not frightened?
all my route

Is traced in that: at Venice you escape
Their power. Eulalia, I am master here!

[Shouts from without. He pushes out LUITOLFO, who complies mechanically.

In time! Nay, help me with him—so! He's gone.

Eu. What have you done? On you, perchance, all know

The Provost's hater, will men's vengeance fall As our accomplice.

Ch. Mere accomplice? See!
[Putting on LUITOLFO'S vest.]

Now, lady, am I true to my profession,

Or one of these?

Eu. You take Luitolfo's place?

Ch. Die for him.

Eu. Well done!

[Shouts increase.]

Ch. How the people tarry!

I can't be silent; I must speak: or sing—

How natural to sing now!

Eu. Hush and pray!

We are to die; but even I perceive

'T is not a very hard thing so to die.

My cousin of the pale-blue tearful eyes,

Poor Cesca, suffers more from one day's life

With the stern husband; Tisbe's heart goes forth

Each evening after that wild son of hers,
To track his thoughtless footstep through the streets:

How easy for them both to die like this!

I am not sure that I could live as they.

Ch. Here they come, crowds! they pass the gate? Yes!—No!—

One torch is in the courtyard. Here flock all.

Eu. At least Luitolfo has escaped. What cries!

Ch. If they would drag one to the market-place,

One might speak there!

Eu. List, list!

Ch. They mount the steps.

[Enter the Populace.]

Ch. I killed the Provost!

The Populace. [Speaking together.] 'T was Chiappino, friends!

Our savior! The best man at last as first!

He who first made us feel what chains we wore,

He also strikes the blow that shatters them,

He at last saves us—our best citizen!

—Oh, have you only courage to speak now?

My eldest son was christened a year since

"Cino" to keep Chiappino's name in mind—

Cino, for shortness merely, you observe!

The city's in our hands. The guards are fled.

Do you, the cause of all, come down—come up—

Come out to counsel us, our chief, our king,

Whate'er rewards you! Choose your own reward!

The peril over, its reward begins!

Come and harangue us in the market-place!

Eu. Chiappino?

Ch. Yes—I understand your eyes!

You think I should have promptly disowned

This deed with its strange unforeseen success,

In favor of Luitolfo. But the peril,

So far from ended, hardly seems begun.

To-morrow, rather, when a calm succeeds,

We easily shall make him full amends:

And meantime—if we save them as they pray,

And justify the deed by its effects?

Eu. You would, for worlds, you had denied at once.

Ch. I know my own intention, be assured!

All's well. Precede us, fellow-citizens!

ACT II

The Market-place. LUITOLFO in disguise mingling with the Populace assembled opposite the Provost's Palace.

1st Bystander. [To LUIT.] You, a friend of Luitolfo's? Then, your friend is vanished,—in all probability killed on the night that his patron the tyrannical Provost was loyally suppressed here, exactly a month ago, by our illustrious fellow-citizen, thrice-noble savior, and new Provost that is like to be, this very morning,—Chiappino!

Luit. He the new Provost?

2d By. Up those steps will he go, and beneath yonder pillar stand, while Ogniben, the Pope's Legate from Ravenna, reads the new dignitary's title to the people, according to established custom: for which reason, there is the assemblage you inquire about.

Luit. Chiappino—the late Provost's successor? Impossible! But tell me of that presently. What I would know first of all is, wherefore Luitolfo must so necessarily have been killed on that memorable night?

3d By. You were Luitolfo's friend? So was I. Never, if you will credit me, did there exist so poor-spirited a milk-sop. He, with all the opportunities in the world, furnished by daily converse with our oppressor, would not stir a finger to help us: and, when Chiappino rose in solitary majesty and . . . how does one go on saying? . . . dealt the godlike blow,—this Luitolfo, not unreasonably fearing the indignation of an aroused and liberated people, fled precipitately. He may have got trodden to death in the press at the southeast gate, when the Provost's guards fled through it to Ravenna, with their wounded master,—if he did not rather hang himself under some hedge.

Luit. Or why not simply have lain perdue in some quiet corner,—such as San Cassiano, where his estate was,—receiving daily intelligence from some sure friend, meanwhile, as to the turn matters were taking here—how, for instance, the Provost was not dead, after all, only wounded—or, as to-day's news would seem to prove, how Chiappino was not Brutus the Elder, after all, only the new Provost—and thus Luitolfo be enabled to watch a favorable opportunity for returning? Might it not have been so?

3d By. Why, he may have taken that care of himself, certainly, for he came of a cautious stock. I'll tell you how his uncle, just such another gingerly treader on tiptoes with finger on lip,—how he met his death in the great plague-year: dico vobis! Hearing that the seventeenth house in a certain street was infected, he calculates to pass it in safety by taking plentiful breath, say, when he shall arrive at the eleventh house; then scouring by, holding that breath, till he be got so far on the other side as number twenty-three, and thus elude the danger. — And so did he begin; but, as he arrived at thirteen, we will say, — thinking to improve on his precaution by putting up a little prayer to Saint Nepomucene of Prague, this exhausted so much of his lungs' reserve, that at sixteen it was clean spent, — consequently at the fatal seventeen he inhaled with a vigor and persistence enough to suck you any latent venom out of the heart of a stone — Ha, ha!

Luit. [Aside.] (If I had not lent that man the money he wanted last spring, I should fear this bitterness was attributable to me.) Luitolfo is dead then, one may conclude?

3d By. Why, he had a house here, and a woman to whom he was affianced; and as they both pass naturally to the new Provost, his friend and heir . . .

Luit. Ah, I suspected you of imposing on me with your pleasantry! I know Chiappino better.

1st By. (Our friend has the bile! After all, I do not dislike finding somebody vary a little this general gape of admiration at Chiappino's glorious qualities.) Pray, how much may you know of what has taken place in Faenza since that memorable night?

Luit. It is most to the purpose, that I know Chiappino to have been by profession a hater of that very office of Provost, you now charge him with proposing to accept.

1st By. Sir, I'll tell you. That night was indeed memorable. Up we rose, a mass of us, men, women, children; out fled the guards with the body of the tyrant; we were to defy the world: but, next gray morning, "What will Rome say?" began everybody. You know we are governed by Ravenna, which is governed by Rome. And quietly into the town, by the Ravenna road, comes on muleback a portly personage, Ogniben by name, with the quality of Pontifical Legate; trots briskly through the streets humming a "Cur fremuere gentes," and makes directly for the Provost's Palace — there it faces you. "One Messer Chiappino is your leader? I have known three-and-twenty leaders of revolts!" (laughing gently to himself) — "Give me the help of your arm from my mule to yonder steps under the pillar — So! And now, my revolvers and good friends, what do you want? The guards burst into Ravenna last night bearing your wounded Provost; and, having had a little talk with him, I take on myself to come and try appease the disorderliness, before Rome, hearing of it, resort to another method: 't is I come, and not another, from a certain love I confess to, of composing differences. So, do you understand, you are about to experience this unheard-of tyranny from me, that there shall be no heading nor hanging, nor confiscation nor exile: I insist on your simply pleasing yourselves. And now, pray, what does please you? To live without any government at all? Or having decided for one, to see its minister murdered by the first of your body that chooses to find himself wronged, or disposed for reverting to first principles and a justice anterior to all institutions, — and so will you carry matters, that the rest of the world must at length unite and put down such a den of wild beasts? As for vengeance on what has just taken place, — once for all, the wounded man assures me he cannot conjecture who struck him; and this so earnestly, that one may be sure he knows perfectly well what intimate acquaintance could find admission to speak with him late last evening. I come not for vengeance therefore, but from pure curiosity to hear what you will do next." And thus he ran on, on, easily and volubly, till he seemed to arrive quite naturally at the praise of law, order, and paternal government by somebody from rather a distance. All our citizens were in the snare, and about to be friends with so congenial an adviser; but that Chiappino suddenly stood forth, spoke out indignantly, and set things right again.

Luit. Do you see? I recognize him there!

3d By. Ay, but, mark you, at the end of Chiappino's longest period in praise of a pure republic, — "And by whom do I desire such a government should be administered, perhaps, but by one like yourself?" returns the Legate: thereupon speaking for a quarter of an hour together, on the natural and only legitimate government by the best and wisest. And it should seem there was soon discovered to be no such vast discrepancy at bottom between this and Chiappino's theory, place but each in its proper light. "Oh, are you there?" quoth Chiappino: "Ay, in that, I agree," returns Chiappino: and so on.

Luit. But did Chiappino cede at once to this?

1st By. Why, not altogether at once. For instance, he said that the difference between him and all his fellows was, that they seemed all wishing to be kings in one or another way, — "whereas what right," asked he, "has any man to wish to be superior to another?" — whereat, "Ah, sir," answers the Legate, "this is the death of me, so often as I expect something is really going to be revealed to us by you clearer-seers, deeper-thinkers — this — that your right-hand (to speak by a figure) should be found taking up the weapon it displayed so ostentatiously, not to destroy any dragon in our path, as was prophesied, but simply to cut off its own fellow left-hand: yourself set about attacking yourself. For see now! Here are you who, I make sure, glory exceedingly in knowing the noble nature of the soul, its divine impulses, and so forth; and with such a knowledge you stand, as it were, armed to encounter the natural doubts and fears as to that same inherent nobility, which are apt to waylay us, the weaker ones, in the road of life. And when we look eagerly to see them fall before you, lo, round you wheel, only the left-hand gets the blow; one proof of the soul's nobility destroys simply another proof, quite as good, of the same, for you are found delivering an opinion like this! Why, what is this perpetual yearning to exceed, to subdue, to be better than, and a king over, one's fellows, — all that you so disclaim, — but the very tendency yourself are most proud of, and under another form, would oppose to it, — only in a lower stage of manifestation? You don't want to be vulgarly superior to your fellows after their poor fashion — to have me hold solemnly up your gown's tail, or hand you an express of the last importance from the Pope, with all these bystanders noticing how unconcerned you look the while; but neither does our gaping friend, the burgher yonder, want the other kind of kingship, that consists in understanding better than his fellows this and similar points of human nature, nor to roll under his tongue this sweeter morsel still, — the feeling that, through immense philosophy, he does not feel, he rather thinks, above you and me!" And so chatting, they glided off arm-in-arm.

Luit. And the result is . . .

1st By. Why that, a month having gone by, the indomitable Chiappino, marrying as he will Luitolfo's love — at all events succeeding to Luitolfo's wealth — becomes the first inhabitant of Faenza, and a proper aspirant to the Provostship; which we assemble here to see conferred on him this morning. The Legate's Guard to clear the way! He will follow presently.

Luit. [Withdrawing a little.] I understand the drift of Eulalia's communications less than ever. Yet she surely said, in so many words, that Chiappino was in urgent danger: wherefore, disregarding her injunction to continue in my retreat and await the result of — what she called, some experiment yet in process — I hastened here without her leave or knowledge: how could I else? But if this they say be true — if it were for such a purpose, she and Chiappino kept me away . . . Oh, no, no! I must confront him and her before I believe this of them. And at the word, see!

(Enter CHIAPPINO and EULALIA.)

Eu. We part here, then? The change in your principles would seem to be complete.

Ch. Now, why refuse to see that in my present course I change no principles, only re-adapt them and more adroitly? I had despaired of what you may call the material instrumentality of life; of ever being able to rightly operate on mankind through such a deranged machinery as the existing modes of government: but now, if I suddenly discover how to inform these perverted institutions with fresh purpose, bring the functionary limbs once more into immediate communication with, and subjection to, the soul I am about to bestow on them — do you see? Why should one desire to invent, as long as it remains possible to renew and transform? When all further hope of the old organization shall be extinct, then, I grant you, it may be time to try and create another.

Eu. And there being discoverable some hope yet in the hitherto much-abused old system of absolute government by a Provost here, you mean to take your time about endeavoring to realize those visions of a perfect State we once heard of?

Ch. Say, I would fain realize my conception of a palace, for instance, and that there is, abstractedly, but a single way of erecting one perfectly. Here, in the market-place is my allotted building-ground; here I stand without a stone to lay, or a laborer to help me, — stand, too, during a short day of life, close on which the night comes. On the other hand, circumstances suddenly offer me (turn and see it!) the old Provost's house to experiment upon — ruinous, if you please, wrongly constructed at the beginning, and ready to tumble now. But materials abound, a crowd of workmen offer their services; here exists yet a Hall of Audience of originally noble proportions, there a Guest-chamber of symmetrical design enough: and I may restore, enlarge, abolish or unite these to heart's content. Ought I not make the best of such an opportunity, rather than continue to gaze disconsolately with folded arms on the flat pavement here, while the sun goes slowly down, never to rise again? Since you cannot understand this nor me, it is better we should part as you desire.

Eu. So, the love breaks away too!

Ch. No, rather my soul's capacity for love widens — needs more than one object to content it, — and, being better instructed, will not persist in seeing all the component parts of love in what is only a single part, — nor in finding that so many and so various loves are all united in the love of a woman, — manifold uses in one instrument, as the savage has his sword, staff, sceptre and idol, all in one club-stick. Love is a very compound thing. The intellectual part of my love I shall give to men, the mighty dead or the illustrious living; and determine to call a mere sensual instinct by as few fine names as possible. What do I lose?

Eu. Nay, I only think, what do I lose? and, one more word — which shall complete my instruction — does friendship go too? What of Luitolfo, the author of your present prosperity?

Ch. How the author?

Eu. That blow now called yours . . .

Ch. Struck without principle or purpose, as by a blind natural operation: yet to which all my thought and life directly and advisedly tended. I would have struck it, and could not: he would have done his utmost to avoid striking it, yet did so. I dispute his right to that deed of mine — a final action with him, from the first effect of which he fled away, — a mere first step with me, on which I base a whole mighty superstructure of good to follow. Could he get good from it?

Eu. So we profess, so we perform!

(Enter OGNIEN. EULALIA stands apart.)

Ogniben. I have seen three-and-twenty leaders of revolts. By your leave, sir! Perform? What does the lady say of performing?

Ch. Only the trite saying, that we must not trust profession, only performance.

Ogni. She'll not say that, sir, when she knows you longer; you'll instruct her better. Ever judge of men by their professions! For though the bright moment of promising is but a moment and cannot be prolonged, yet, if sincere in its moment's extravagant goodness, why, trust it and know the man by it, I say — not by his performance; which is half the world's work, interfere as the world needs must, with its accidents and circumstances: the profession was purely the man's own. I judge people by what they might be, — not are, nor will be.

Ch. But have there not been found, too, performing natures, not merely promising?

Ogni. Plenty. Little Bindo of our town, for instance, promised his friend, great ugly Masaccio, once, "I will repay you!" — for a favor done him. So, when his father came to die, and Bindo succeeded to the inheritance, he sends straightway for Masaccio and shares all with him — gives him half the land, half the money, half the kegs of wine in the cellar. "Good," say you: and it is good. But had little Bindo found himself possessor of all this wealth some five years before — on the happy night when Masaccio procured him that interview in the garden with his pretty cousin Lisa — instead of being the beggar he then was, — I am bound to believe that in the warm moment of promise he would have given away all the wine-kegs and all the money and all the land, and only reserved to himself some hut on a hill-top hard by, whence he might spend his life in looking and seeing his friend enjoy himself: he meant fully that much, but the world interfered. — To our business! Did I understand you just now within-doors? You are not going to marry your old friend's love, after all?

Ch. I must have a woman that can sympathize with, and appreciate me, I told you.

Ogni. Oh, I remember! You, the greater nature, needs must have a lesser one (— avowedly lesser — contest with you on that score would never do) — such a nature must comprehend you, as the phrase is, accompany and testify of your greatness from point to point onward. Why, that were being not merely as great as yourself, but greater considerably! Meantime, might not the more bounded nature as reasonably count on your appreciation of it, rather? — on your keeping close by it, so far as you both go together, and then going on by yourself as far as you please? Thus God serves us.

Ch. And yet a woman that could understand the whole of me, to whom I could reveal alike the strength and the weakness —

Ogni. Ah, my friend, wish for nothing so foolish! Worship your love, give her the best of you to see; be to her like the western lands (they bring us such strange news of) to the Spanish Court; send her only your lumps of gold, fans of feathers, your spirit-like birds, and fruits and gems! So shall you, what is unseen of you, be supposed altogether a paradise by her, — as these western lands by Spain: though I warrant there is filth, red baboons, ugly reptiles and squalor enough, which they bring Spain as few samples of as possible. Do you want your mistress to respect your body generally? Offer her your mouth to kiss: don't strip off your boot and put your foot to her lips! You understand my humor by this time? I help men to carry out their own principles: if they please to say two and two make five, I assent, so they will but go on and say, four and four make ten.

Ch. But these are my private affairs; what I desire you to occupy yourself about, is my public appearance presently: for when the people hear that I am appointed Provost, though you and I may thoroughly discern — and easily, too — the right principle at bottom of such a movement, and how my republicanism remains thoroughly unaltered, only takes a form of expression hitherto commonly judged (and heretofore by myself) incompatible with its existence, — when thus I reconcile myself to an old form of government instead of proposing a new one —

Ogni. Why, you must deal with people broadly. Begin at a distance from this matter and say, — New truths, old truths! sirs, there is nothing new possible to be revealed to us in the moral world; we know all we shall ever know: and it is for simply reminding us, by their various respective expedients, how we do know this and the other matter, that men get called prophets, poets and the like. A philosopher's life is spent in discovering that, of the half-dozen truths he knew when a child, such an one is a lie, as the world states it in set terms; and then, after a weary lapse of years, and plenty of hard thinking, it becomes a truth again after all, as he happens to newly consider it and view it in a different relation with the others: and so he re-states it, to the confusion of somebody else in good time. As for adding to the original stock of truths, — impossible! Thus, you see the expression of them is the grand business: — you have got a truth in your head about the right way of governing people, and you took a mode of expressing it which now you confess to be imperfect. But what then? There is truth in falsehood, falsehood in truth. No man ever told one great truth, that I know, without the help of a good dozen of lies at least, generally unconscious ones. And as when a child comes in breathlessly and relates a strange story, you try to conjecture from the very falsities in it what the reality was, — do not conclude that he saw nothing in the sky, because he assuredly did not see a flying horse there as he says, — so, through the contradictory expression, do you see, men should look painfully for, and trust to arrive eventually at, what you call the true principle at bottom. Ah, what an answer is there! to what will it not prove applicable? — "Contradictions? Of course there were," say you!

Ch. Still, the world at large may call it inconsistency, and what shall I urge in reply?

Ogni. Why, look you, when they tax you with tergiversation or duplicity, you may answer — you begin to perceive that, when all's done and said, both great parties in the State, the advocates of change in the present system of things, and the opponents of it, patriot and anti-patriot, are found working together for the common good; and that in the midst of their efforts for and against its progress, the world somehow or other still advances: to which result they contribute in equal proportions.

those who spend their life in pushing it onward, as those who give theirs to the business of pulling it back. Now, if you found the world stand still between the opposite forces, and were glad, I should conceive you: but it steadily advances, you rejoice to see! By the side of such a rejoicer, the man who only winks as he keeps cunning and quiet, and says, "Let yonder hot-headed fellow fight out my battle! I, for one, shall win in the end by the blows he gives, and which I ought to be giving," — even he seems graceful in his avowal, when one considers that he might say, "I shall win quite as much by the blows our antagonist gives him, blows from which he saves me — I thank the antagonist equally!" Moreover, you may enlarge on the loss of the edge of party-animosity with age and experience . . .

Ch. And naturally time must wear off such asperities: the bitterest adversaries get to discover certain points of similarity between each other, common sympathies — do they not?

Ogni. Ay, had the young David but sat first to dine on his cheeses with the Philistine, he had soon discovered an abundance of such common sympathies. He of Gath, it is recorded, was born of a father and mother, had brothers and sisters like another man, — they, no more than the sons of Jesse, were used to eat each other. But, for the sake of one broad antipathy that had existed from the beginning, David slung the stone, cut off the giant's head, made a spoil of it, and after ate his cheeses alone, with the better appetite, for all I can learn. My friend, as you, with a quickened eyesight, go on discovering much good on the worse side, remember that the same process should proportionably magnify and demonstrate to you the much more good on the better side! And when I profess no sympathy for the Goliaths of our time, and you object that a large nature should sympathize with every form of intelligence, and see the good in it, however limited, — I answer, "So I do; but preserve the proportions of my sympathy, however finelier or wider I may extend its action." I desire to be able, with a quickened eyesight, to descry beauty in corruption where others see foulness only; but I hope I shall also continue to see a redoubled beauty in the higher forms of matter, where already everybody sees no foulness at all. I must retain, too, my old power of selection, and choice of appropriation, to apply to such new gifts; else they only dazzle instead of enlightening me. God has his archangels and consorts with them: though he made too, and intimately sees what is good in, the worm. Observe, I speak only as you profess to think and so ought to speak: I do justice to your own principles, that is all.

Ch. But you very well know that the two parties do, on occasion, assume each other's characteristics. What more disgusting, for instance, than to see how promptly the newly emancipated slave will adopt, in his own favor, the very measures of precaution, which pressed soreliest on himself as institutions of the tyranny he has just escaped from? Do the classes, hitherto without opinion, get leave to express it? there follows a confederacy immediately, from which — exercise your individual right and dissent, and woe be to you!

Ogni. And a journey over the sea to you! That is the generous way. Cry — "Emancipated slaves, the first excess, and off I go!" The first time a poor devil, who has been hasted steadily his whole life long, finds himself let alone and able to legislate, so, begins pettishly, while he rubs his soles, "Woe be to whoever brings anything in the shape of a stick this way!" — you, rather than give up the very innocent pleasure of carrying one to switch flies with, — you go away, to everybody's sorrow. Yet you were quite reconciled to staying at home while the governors used to pass, every now and then, some such edict as, "Let no man indulge in owning a stick which is not thick enough to chastise our slaves, if need require!" Well, there are pre-ordained hierarchies among us, and a profane vulgar subjected to a different law altogether; yet I am rather sorry you should see it so clearly: for, do you know what is to — all but save you at the Day of Judgment, all you men of genius? It is this: that, while you generally began by pulling down God, and went on to the end of your life in one effort at setting up your own genius in his place, — still, the last, bitterest concession wrung with the utmost unwillingness from the experience of the very loftiest of you, was invariably — would one think it? — that the rest of mankind, down to the lowest of the mass, stood not, nor ever could stand, just on a level and equality with yourselves. That will be a point in the favor of all such, I hope and believe.

Ch. Why, men of genius are usually charged, I think, with doing just the reverse; and at once acknowledging the natural inequality of mankind, by themselves participating in the universal craving after, and deference to, the civil distinctions which represent it. You wonder they pay such undue respect to titles and badges of superior rank.

Ogni. Not I (always on your own ground and showing, be it noted!) Who doubts that, with a weapon to brandish, a man is the more formidable? Titles and badges are exercised as such a weapon, to which you and I look up wistfully. We could pin lions with it moreover, while in its present owner's hands it hardly prods rats. Nay, better than a mere weapon of easy mastery and obvious use, it is a mysterious divining-rod that may serve us in undreamed-of ways. Beauty, strength, intellect — men often have none of these, and yet conceive pretty accurately what kind of advantages they would bestow on the possessor. We know at least what it is we make up our mind to forego, and so can apply the fittest substitute in our power. Wanting beauty, we cultivate good-humor; missing wit, we get riches: but the mystic unimaginable operation of that gold collar and string of Latin names which suddenly turned poor stupid little peevish Cecco of our town into natural lord of the best of us — a Duke, he is now — there indeed is a virtue to be revered!

Ch. Ay, by the vulgar: not by Messere Stiatto the poet, who pays more assiduous court to him than anybody.

Ogni. What else should Stiatto pay court to? He has talent, not honor and riches: men naturally covet what they have not.

Ch. No; or Cecco would covet talent, which he has not, whereas he covets more riches, of which he has plenty, already.

Ogni. Because a purse added to a purse makes the holder twice as rich: but just such another talent as Stiatto's, added to what he now possesses, what would that profit him? Give the talent a purse indeed, to do something with! But lo, how we keep the good people waiting! I only desired to do justice to the noble sentiments which animate you, and which you are too modest to duly enforce. Come, to our main business: shall we ascend the steps? I am going to propose you for Provost to the people; they know your antecedents, and will accept you with a joyful unanimity: whereon I confirm their choice. Rouse up! Are you nerving yourself to an effort? Beware the disaster of Messere Stiatto we were talking of! who, determining to keep an equal mind and constant face on whatever might be the fortune of his last new poem with our townsmen, heard too plainly "hiss, hiss, hiss," increase every moment. Till at last the man fell senseless: not perceiving that the portentous sounds had all the while been issuing from between his own nobly clenched teeth, and nostrils narrowed by resolve.

Ch. Do you begin to throw off the mask? — to jest with me, having got me effectually into your trap?

Ogni. Where is the trap, my friend? You hear what I engage to do, for my part: you, for yours, have only to fulfil your promise made just now within doors, of professing unlimited obedience to Rome's authority in my person. And I shall authorize no more than the simple re-establishment of the Provostship and the conferment of its privileges upon yourself: the only novel stipulation being a birth of the peculiar circumstances of the time.

Ch. And that stipulation?

Ogni. Just the obvious one — that in the event of the discovery of the actual assailant of the late Provost . . .

Ch. Ha!

Ogni. Why, he shall suffer the proper penalty, of course; what did you expect?

Ch. Who heard of this?

Ogni. Rather, who needed to hear of this?

Ch. Can it be, the popular rumor never reached you . . .

Ogni. Many more such rumors reach me, friend, than I choose to receive: those which wait longest have best chance. Has the present one sufficiently waited? Now is its time for entry with effect. See the good people crowding about yonder palace-steps — which we may not have to ascend, after all! My good friends! (nay, two or three of you will answer every purpose) — who was it fell upon and proved nearly the death of your late Provost? His successor desires to hear, that his day of inauguration may be graced by the act of prompt, bare justice we all anticipate. Who dealt the blow that night, does anybody know?

Luit. [Coming forward]. I!

All. Luitolfo!

Luit. I avow the deed, justify and approve it, and stand forth now, to relieve my friend of an unearned responsibility. Having taken thought, I am grown stronger: I shall shrink from nothing that awaits me. Nay, Chiappino — we are friends still: I dare say there is some proof of your superior nature in this starting aside, strange as it seemed at first. So, they tell me, my horse is of the right stock, because a shadow in the path frightens him into a frenzy, makes him dash my brains out. I understand only the dull mule's way of standing stockishly, plodding soberly, suffering on occasion a blow or two with due patience.

Eu. I was determined to justify my choice, Chiappino; to let Luitolfo's nature vindicate itself. Henceforth we are undivided, whatever be our fortune.

Ogni. Now, in these last ten minutes of silence, what have I been doing, deem you? Putting the finishing stroke to a homily of mine, I have long taken thought to perfect, on the text, "Let whoso thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall." To your house, Luitolfo! Still silent, my patriotic friend? Well, that is a good sign however. And you will go aside for a time? That is better still. I understand: it would be easy for you to die of remorse here on the spot and shock us all, but you mean to live and grow worthy of coming back to us one day. There, I will tell everybody; and you only do right to believe you must get better as you get older. All men do so: they are worst in childhood, improve in manhood, and get ready in old age for another world. Youth, with its beauty and grace, would seem bestowed on us for some such reason as to make us partly endurable till we have time for really becoming so of ourselves, without their aid; when they leave us. The sweetest child we all smile on for his pleasant want of the whole world to break up, or suck in his mouth, seeing no other good in it — would be rudely handled by that world's inhabitants, if he retained those angelic infantine desires when he had grown six feet high, black and bearded. But, little by little, he sees fit to forego claim after claim on the world, puts up with a less and less share of its good as his proper portion; and when the octogenarian asks barely a sup of gruel and a fire of dry sticks, and thanks you as for his full allowance and right in the common good of life, — hoping nobody may murder him, — he who began by asking and expecting the whole of us to bow down in worship to him, — why, I say he is advanced, far onward, very far, nearly out of sight like our friend Chiappino yonder. And now — (ay, good-by to you!) He turns round the northwest gate: going to Lugo again? Good-by!) — And now give thanks to God, the keys of the Provost's palace to me, and yourselves to profitable meditation at home! I have known Four-and-twenty leaders of revolts.

LURIA

A TRAGEDY

I DEDICATE THIS LAST ATTEMPT FOR THE PRESENT AT DRAMATIC POETRY TO A GREAT DRAMATIC POET;

"WISHING WHAT I WRITE MAY BE READ BY HIS LIGHT:"

IF A PHRASE ORIGINALLY ADDRESSED, BY NOT THE LEAST WORTHY OF HIS CONTEMPORARIES, TO SHAKESPEARE,

MAY BE APPLIED HERE, BY ONE WHOSE SOLE PRIVILEGE IS IN A GRATEFUL ADMIRATION, TO WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR

LONDON, 1846.

PERSONS

LURIA, a Moor, Commander of the Florentine Forces.
HUSAIN, a Moor, his friend.
PUCCIO, the old Florentine Commander, now LURIA'S
Chief Officer.
BRACCIO, Commissary of the Republic of Florence.
JACOPO (LAPO), his Secretary.
TIBURZIO, Commander of the Pisans.
DOMIZIA, a noble Florentine Lady.

TIME, 14—.

SCENE. LURIA'S Camp between Florence and Pisa.

ACT I

MORNING

BRACCIO, as dictating to his Secretary; PUCCIO standing
by.

Braccio. [To PUCCIO.] Then, you join battle in an hour?

Puccio. Not I;

Luria, the captain.

Brac. [To the Sec.] "In an hour, the battle."

[To PUC.] Sir, let your eye run o'er this loose digest,

And see if very much of your report
Have slipped away through my civilian phrase.
Does this instruct the Signory aright
How army stands with army?

Puc. [Taking the paper.] All seems here:

— That Luria, seizing with our city's force
The several points of vantage, hill and plain,
Shuts Pisa safe from help on every side,
And, baffling the Lucchese arrived too late,
Must, in the battle he delivers now,
Beat her best troops and first of chiefs.

Brac. So sure?

Tiburzio's a consummate captain too!

Puc. Luria holds Pisa's fortune in his hand.

Brac. [To the Sec.] "The Signory hold Pisa
in their hand."

Your own proved soldiiership's our warrant, sir:
So, while my secretary ends his task,
Have out two horsemen, by the open roads,
To post with it to Florence!

Puc. [Returning the paper.] All seems here;

Unless . . . Ser Braccio, 't is my last report!
Since Pisa's outbreak, and my overthrow,
And Luria's hastening at the city's call

To save her, as he only could, no doubt;
Till now that she is saved or sure to be, —
Whatever you tell Florence, I tell you:
Each day's note you, her Commissary, make
Of Luria's movements, I myself supply.
No youngster am I longer, to my cost;
Therefore while Florence gloried in her choice
And vaunted Luria, whom but Luria, still,
As if zeal, courage, prudence, conduct, faith,
Had never met in any man before,
I saw no pressing need to swell the cry.
But now, this last report and I have done:
So, ere to-night comes with its roar of praise,
'T were not amiss if some one old i' the trade Subscribed with, "True, for once rash counsel's best.

This Moor of the bad faith and doubtful race,
This boy to whose untried sagacity,
Raw valor, Florence trusts without reserve
The charge to save her, — justifies her choice;
In no point has this stranger failed his friends.
Now praise!" I say this, and it is not here.

Brac. [To the Sec.] Write, "Puccio, superseded in the charge,

By Luria, bears full witness to his worth,
And no reward our Signory can give
Their champion but he'll back it cheerfully."
Aught more? Five minutes hence, both messengers! [Puccio goes.]

Brac. [After a pause, and while he slowly tears
the paper into shreds.] I think . . . (pray
God, I hold in fit contempt

This warfare's noble art and ordering,
And, — once the brace of prizes fairly matched, Poleaxe with poleaxe, knife with knife as
good, —

Spit properly at what men term their skill! —)
Yet here I think our fighter has the odds.

With Pisa's strength diminished thus and thus,
Such points of vantage in our hands and such,
Luca still off the stage, too, — all's assured:
Luria must win this battle. Write the Court,
That Luria's trial end and sentence pass!

Secretary. Patron, —

Brac. Ay, Lapo?

Sec. If you trip, I fall;

'T is in self-interest I speak —

Brac. Nay, nay,
You overshoot the mark, my Lapo! Nay!
When did I say pure love's impossible?

I make you daily write those red cheeks thin,
Load your young brow with what concerns it
least,

And, when we visit Florence, let you pace
The Piazza by my side as if we talked,
Where all your old acquaintances may see :
You 'd die for me, I should not be surprised.
Now then !

Sec. Sir, look about and love yourself !
Step after step, the Signory and you
Tread gay till this tremendous point 's to pass ;
Which pass not, pass not, ere you ask your-
self, —

Bears the brain steadily such draughts of fire,
Or too delicious may not prove the pride
Of this long secret trial you dared plan,
Dare execute, you solitary here,
With the gray-headed toothless fools at home,
Who think themselves your lords, such slaves are they ?

If they pronounce this sentence as you bid,
Declare the treason, claim its penalty, —
And sudden out of all the blaze of life,
On the best minute of his brightest day,
From that adoring army at his back,
Through Florence' joyous crowds before his
face,

Into the dark you beckon Luria . . .

Brac. Then —
Why, Lapo, when the fighting-people vaunt,
We of the other craft and mystery,
May we not smile demure, the danger past ?

Sec. Sir, no, no, no, — the danger, and your spirit
At watch and ward ? Where 's danger on your part,

With that thin flitting instantaneous steel
'Gainst the blind bull-front of a brute-force
world ?

If Luria, that 's to perish sure as fate,
Should have been really guiltless after all ?

Brac. Ah, you have thought that ?

Sec. Here I sit, your scribe,
And in and out goes Luria, days and nights ;
This Puccio comes ; the Moor his other friend,
Husain ; they talk — that 's all feigned easily ;
He speaks (I would not listen if I could),
Reads, orders, counsels : — but he rests sometimes, —

I see him stand and eat, sleep stretched an
hour

On the lynx-skins yonder ; hold his bared black
arms

Into the sun from the tent-opening ; laugh
When his horse drops the forage from his teeth
And neighs to hear him hum his Moorish songs.
That man believes in Florence, as the saint
Tied to the wheel believes in God.

Brac. How strange !
You too have thought that !

Sec. Do but you think too,
And all is saved ! I only have to write,
"The man seemed false awhile, proves true at
last ;

Bury it" — so I write the Signory —

"Bury this trial in your breast forever,
Blot it from things or done or dreamed about !
So Luria shall receive his meed to-day

With no suspicion what reverse was near, —
As if no meteoric finger hushed
The doom-word just on the destroyer's lip,
Motioned him off, and let life's sunfall straight."'
Brac. [Looks to the wall of the tent.] Did he draw that ?

Sec. With charcoal, when the watch
Made the report at midnight ; Lady Domizia
Spoke of the unfinished Duomo, you remember ;
That is his fancy how a Moorish front Might join to, and complete, the body, — a sketch, —

And again where the cloak hangs, yonder in the shadow

Brac. He loves that woman.

Sec. She is sent the spy
Of Florence, — spies on you as you on him :
Florence, if only for Domizia's sake,
Is surely safe. What shall I write ?

Brac. I see —
A Moorish front, nor of such ill design !
Lapo, there 's one thing plain and positive ;
Man seeks his own good at the whole world's cost.

What ? If to lead our troops, stand forth our chiefs,

And hold our fate, and see us at their beck,
Yet render up the charge when peace return,
Have ever proved too much for Florentines,
Even for the best and bravest of ourselves —
If in the struggle when the soldier's sword
Should sink its point before the statish pen,
And the calm head replace the violent hand,
Virtue on virtue still have fallen away
Before ambition with unvarying fate,
Till Florence' self at last in bitterness
Be forced to own such falls the natural end,
And, sparing further to expose her sons
To a vain strife and profitless disgrace,
Declare, "The foreigner, one not my child,
Shall henceforth lead my troops, reach heigh-
by height

The glory, then descend into the shame ;
So shall rebellion be less guilt in him,
And punishment the easier task for me :"
— If on the best of us such brand she set,
Can I suppose an utter alien here,
This Luria, our inevitable foe,
Confessed a mercenary and a Moor,
Born free from many ties that bind the rest
Of common faith in Heaven or hope on earth,
No past with us, no future, — such a spirit
Shall hold the path from which our stanchest broke,

Stand firm where every famed precursor fell ?
My Lapo, I will frankly say, these proofs
So duly noted of the man's intent,
Are for the doting fools at home, not me.
The charges here, they may be true or false :
— What is set down ? Errors and oversights,
A dallying interchange of courtesies
With Pisa's General, — all that, hour by hour,
Puccio's pale discontent has furnished us,
Of petulant speeches, inconsiderate acts,
Now overhazard, overcaution now ;
Even that he loves this lady who believes
She outwits Florence, and whom Florence posted

By my procurement here, to spy on me,
Lest I one minute lose her from my sight —
She who remembering her whole House's fall,
That nest of traitors strangled in the birth,
Now labors to make Luria (poor device
As plain) the instrument of her revenge!
— That she is ever at his ear to prompt
Inordinate conceptions of his worth,
Exorbitant belief in worth's reward,
And after, when sure disappointment follows,
Proportionable rage at such a wrong —
Why, all these reasons, while I urge them
most,

Weigh with me less than least; as nothing weigh.

Upon that broad man's-heart of his, I go:
On what I know must be, yet while I live
Shall never be, because I live and know.
Brute-force shall not rule Florence! Intellect
May rule her, bad or good as chance supplies:
But intellect it shall be, pure if bad,
And intellect's tradition so kept up!
Till the good come — 't was intellect that ruled,
Not brute-force bringing from the battlefield
The attributes of wisdom, foresight's graces
We lent it there to lure its grossness on;
All which it took for earnest and kept safe
To show against us in our market-place,
Just as the plumes and tags and swordsman'sgear

(Fetched from the camp where, at their foolish
best,

When all was done they frightened nobody)
Perk in our faces in the street, forsooth,
With our own warrant and allowance. No!
The whole procedure's overcharged, — its end
In too strict keeping with the bad first step.
To conquer Pisa was sheer inspiration?

Well then, to perish for a single fault,
Let that be simple justice! There, my Lapo!
A Moorish front ill suits our Duomo's body:
Blot it out — and bid Luria's sentence come!

(LURIA, who, with DOMIZIA, has entered unobserved at the close of the last phrase, now advances.)

Luria. And Luria, Luria, what of Luria
now?

Brac. Ah, you so close, sir? Lady Domizia
too?

I said it needs must be a busy moment
For one like you; that you were now i' the thick

Of your duties, doubtless, while we idlers sat . . .

Lur. No — in that paper, — it was in that paper

What you were saying!

Brac. Oh — my day's despatch!
I censure you to Florence: will you see?

Lur. See your despatch, your last, for the first time?

Well, if I should, now? For in truth, Domizia,
He would be forced to set about another,
In his sly cool way, the true Florentine,
To mention that important circumstance.
So, while he wrote I should gain time, such
time!

Do not send this!

Brac. And wherefore?

Lur. These Lucchese

Are not arrived — they never will arrive!
And I must fight to-day, arrived or not,
And I shall beat Tiburzio, that is sure:
And then will be arriving his Lucchese,
But slowly, oh so slowly, just in time
To look upon my battle from the hills,
Like a late moon, of use to nobody!
And I must break my battle up, send forth,
Surround on this side, hold in check on that.
Then comes to-morrow, we negotiate,
You make me send for fresh instructions home,
— Incompleteness, incompleteness!

Brac. Ah, we scribes!

Why, I had registered that very point,
The non-appearance of our foes' ally,
As a most happy fortune; both at once
Were formidable: singly faced, each falls.

Lur. So, no great battle for my Florentines!
No crowning deed, decisive and complete,
For all of them, the simple as the wise,
Old, young, alike, that do not understand
Our wearisome pedantic art of war,
By which we prove retreat may be success,
Delay — best speed, — half loss, at times, —
whole gain:

They want results: as if it were their fault!
And you, with warmest wish to be my friend,
Will not be able now to simply say
"Your servant has performed his task —
enough!"

You ordered, he has executed: good!
Now walk the streets in holiday attire,
Congratulate your friends, till noon strikes fierce,

Then form bright groups beneath the Duomo's
shade!"

No, you will have to argue and explain,
Persuade them, all is not so ill in the end,
Tease, tire them out! Arrive, arrive, Lucchese!

Domizia. Well, you will triumph for the past
enough,

Whatever be the present chance; no service
Falls to the ground with Florence: she awaits
Her savior, will receive him fittingly.

Lur. Ah, Braccio, you know Florence! Will she, think you,

Receive one . . . what means "fittingly receive"?

— Receive compatriots, doubtless — I am none:
And yet Domizia promises so much!

Brac. Kind women still give men a woman's prize.

I know not o'er which gate most boughs will arch,

Nor if the Square will wave red flags or blue.
I should have judged, the fullest of rewards
Our state gave Luria, when she made him chief
Of her whole force, in her best captain's place.

Lur. That, my reward? Florence on my account

Relieved Ser Puccio? — mark you, my reward!
And Puccio's having all the fight's true joy —
Goes here and there, gets close, may fight, him-
self,

While I must order, stand aloof, o'ersee.
That was my calling, there was my true place!
I should have felt, in some one over me,
Florence impersonate, my visible head,

As I am over Puccio, — taking life
Directly from her eye! They give me you:
But do you cross me, set me half to work?
I enjoy nothing — though I will, for once!
Decide, shall we join battle? may I wait?

Brac. Let us compound the matter; wait till noon:

Then, no arrival, —
Lur. Ah, noon comes too fast!

I wonder, do you guess why I delay
Involuntarily the final blow

As long as possible? Peace follows it!

Florence at peace, and the calm studious heads

Come out again, the penetrating eyes;

As if a spell broke, all's resumed, each art

You boast, more vivid that it slept awhile.

'Gainst the glad heaven, o'er the white palace-
front

The interrupted scaffold climbs anew;

The walls are peopled by the painter's brush;

The statue to its niche ascends to dwell.

The present noise and trouble have retired

And left the eternal past to rule once more;

You speak its speech and read its records plain,

Greece lives with you, each Roman breathes
your friend:

But Luria — where will then be Luria's place?

Dom. Highest in honor, for that past's own
sake,

Of which his actions, sealing up the sum

By saving all that went before from wreck,

Will range as part, with which be worshipped too.

Lur. Then I may walk and watch you in your streets,

Lead the smooth life my rough life helps no
more,

So different, so new, so beautiful —

Nor fear that you will tire to see parade

The club that slew the lion, now that crooks

And shepherd-pipes come into use again?

For very lone and silent seems my East

In its drear vastness: still it spreads, and still

No Braccios, no Domizias anywhere —

Not ever more! Well, well, to-day is ours!

Dom. [To Brac.] Should he not have been one of us?

Lur. Oh, no!

Not one of you, and so escape the thrill

Of coming into you, of changing thus, —

Feeling a soul grow on me that restricts

The boundless unrest of the savage heart!

The sea heaves up, hangs loaded o'er the land,

Breaks there and buries its tumultuous
strength;

Horror, and silence, and a pause awhile:

Lo, inland glides the gulf-stream, miles away,

In rapture of assent, subdued and still,

'Neath those strange banks, those unimagined skies.

Well, 't is not sure the quiet lasts forever!

Your placid heads still find rough hands new
work;

Some minute's chance — there comes the need of mine:

And, all resolved on, I too hear at last.

Oh, you must find some use for me, Ser Braccio!

You hold my strength; 't were best dispose of
it:

What you created, see that you find food for —
I shall be dangerous else!

Brac. How dangerous, sir?

Lur. There are so many ways, Domizia
warns me,

And one with half the power that I possess,
— Grows very formidable! Do you doubt?

Why, first, who holds the army . . .

Dom. While we talk,

Morn wears; we keep you from your proper
place,

The field.

Lur. Nay, to the field I move no more;

My part is done, and Puccio's may begin:

I cannot trench upon his province longer

With any face. — You think yourselves so safe?

Why, see — in concert with Tiburzio, now —
One could . . .

Dom. A trumpet!

Lur. My Lucchese at last!
Arrived, as sure as Florence stands! Your leave! [Springs out.]

Dom. How plainly is true greatness charac-
tered

By such unconscious sport as Luria's here,

Strength sharing least the secret of itself!

Be it with head that schemes or hand that acts,

Such save the world which none but they could
save,

Yet think whate'er they did, that world could
do.

Brac. Yes: and how worthy note, that these same great ones

In hand or head, with such unconsciousness

And all its due entailed humility,

Should never shrink, so far as I perceive,

From taking up whatever tool there be

Effects the whole world's safety or mishap,

Into their mild hands as a thing of course!

The statist finds it natural to lead

The mob who might as easily lead him —

The captain marshals troops born skilled in war —

Statist and captain verily believe!

While we poor scribes . . . you catch me thinking now,

That I shall in this very letter write

What none of you are able! To it, Lapo!

[DOMIZIA goes.]

This last worst all-affected childish fit

Of Luria's, this be-praised unconsciousness,

Convinces me; the past was no child's play:

It was a man beat Pisa, — not a child.

All's mere dissimulation — to remove

The fear, he best knows we should entertain.

The utmost danger was at hand. Is 't written?

Now make a duplicate, lest this should fail,

And speak your fullest on the other side.

Sec. I noticed he was busily repairing

My half-effacement of his Duomo sketch,

And, while he spoke of Florence, turned to it,

As the Mage Negro king to Christ the babe.

I judge his childishness the mere relapse

To boyhood of a man who has worked lately,

And presently will work, so, meantime, plays:

Whence, more than ever I believe in him.

Brac. [After a pause.] The sword! At best,
the soldier, as he says,

In Florence—the black face, the barbarous name,
For Italy to boast her show of the age,
Her man of men!—To Florence with each letter!

ACT II

NOON

Dom. Well, Florence, shall I reach thee, pierce thy heart
Through all its safeguards? Hate is said to help—

Quicken the eye, invigorate the arm;
And this my hate, made up of many hates,
Might stand in scorn of visible instrument,
And will thee dead: yet do I trust it not.
Nor man's devices nor Heaven's memory
Of wickedness forgot on earth so soon,
But thy own nature, —hell and thee I trust,
To keep thee constant in that wickedness,
Where my revenge may meet thee. Turn aside
A single step, for gratitude or shame, —
Grace but this Luria, — this wild mass of rage
I have prepared to launch against thee now, —
With other payment than thy noblest found, —
Give his desert for once its due reward, —
And past thee would my sure destruction roll.
But thou, who mad'st our House thy sacrifice,
Cannot be thou wilt except this Moor
From the accustomed fate of zeal and truth:
Thou wilt deny his looked-for recompense,
And then — I reach thee. Old and trained, my sire

Could bow down on his quiet broken heart,
Die awe-struck and submissive, when at last
The strange blow came for the expected wreath;
And Porzio passed in blind bewilderment
To exile, never to return, — they say,
Perplexed in his frank simple honest soul,
As if some natural law had changed, — how else

Could Florence, on plain fact pronouncing thus,
Judge Porzio's actions worthy such reward?
But Berto, with the ever-passionate pulse,
— Oh that long night, its dreadful hour on hour,
In which no way of getting his fair fame
From their inexplicable charges free,
Was found, save pouring forth the impatient blood

To show its color whether false or no!
My brothers never had a friend like me
Close in their need to watch the time, then speak,
— Burst with a wakening laughter on their dream,
Cry, "Florence was all falseness, so, false here!"

And show them what a simple task remained —
To leave dreams, rise, and punish in God's name
The city wedded to the wickedness.
None stood by them as I by Luria stand.
So, when the stranger cheated of his due
Turns on thee as his rapid nature bids,
Then, Florence, think, a hireling at thy throat
For the first outrage, think who bore thy last,
Yet mutely in forlorn obedience died!

He comes — his friend — black faces in the camp
Where moved those peerless brows and eyes of old.

(Enter LURIA and HUSAIN.)

Well, and the movement — is it as you hope?
'T is Luca?

Lur. Ah, the Pisan trumpet merely!
Tiburzio's envoy, I must needs receive.

Dom. Whom I withdraw before; though if I lingered

You could not wonder, for my time fleets fast.
The overtaking night brings such reward!
And where will then be room for me? Yet, praised,

Remember who was first to promise praise,
And envy those who also can perform! [Goes.]

Lur. This trumpet from the Pisans? —

Husain. In the camp;
A very noble presence — Braccio's visage
On Puccio's body — calm and fixed and good;
A man I seem as I had seen before:

Most like, it was some statue had the face.

Lur. Admit him! This will prove the last delay.

Hus. Ay, friend, go on, and die thou going on!

Thou heard'st what the grave woman said but now:

To-night rewards thee. That is well to hear;
But stop not therefore: hear it, and go on!

Lur. Oh, their reward and triumph and the rest

They round me in the ears with, all day long?
All that, I never take for earnest, friend!
Well would it suit us, — their triumphal arch
Or storied pillar, — thee and me, the Moors!
But gratitude in those Italian eyes —
That, we shall get?

Hus. It is too cold an air.
Our sun rose out of yonder mound of mist:
Where is he now? So, I trust none of them.

Lur. Truly?

Hus. I doubt and fear. There stands a wall
'Twixt our expansive and explosive race
And those absorbing, concentrating men.
They use thee.

Lur. And I feel it, Husain! yes,
And care not — yes, an alien force like mine
Is only called to play its part outside
Their different nature; where its sole use seems
To fight with and keep off an adverse force,
As alien, — which repelled, mine too withdraws:
Inside, they know not what to do with me.
Thus I have told them laughingly and oft,
But long since am prepared to learn the worst.

Hus. What is the worst?

Lur. I will forestall them, Husain.
Will speak the destiny they dare not speak —
Banish myself before they find the heart.
I will be first to say, "The work rewards!
I know, for all your praise, my use is over,
So may it prove! — meanwhile 't is best I go,
Go carry safe my memories of you all
To other scenes of action, newer lands," —
Thus leaving them confirmed in their belief
They would not easily have tired of me.
You think this hard to say?

Hus. Say or not say,
So thou but go, so they but let thee go!
This hating people, that hate each the other,
And in one blandness to us Moors unite —
Locked each to each like slippery snakes, I say,
Which still in all their tangles, hissing tongue
And threatening tail, ne'er do each other harm;
While any creature of a better blood,
They seem to fight for, while they circle safe
And never touch it, — pines without a wound,
Withers away beside their eyes and breath.
See thou, if Puccio come not safely out
Of Braccio's grasp, this Braccio sworn his foe,
As Braccio safely from Domizia's toils Who hates him most! But thou, the friend of
all,
... Come out of them!

Lur. The Pisan trumpet now!
Hus. Breathe free — it is an enemy, no friend! [Goes.]

Lur. He keeps his instincts, no new culture mars

Their perfect use in him; just so the brutes
Rest not, are anxious without visible cause,
When change is in the elements at work,
Which man's trained senses fail to apprehend.
But here, — he takes the distant chariot-wheel
For thunder, festal flame for lightning's flash,
The finer traits of cultivated life
For treachery and malevolence: I see!

(Enter TIBURZIO.)

Lur. Quick, sir, your message! I but wait your message
To sound the charge. You bring no overture
For truce? — I would not, for your General's
sake,

You spoke of truce: a time to fight is come,
And, whatso'er the fight's event, he keeps
His honest soldier's-name to beat me with,
Or leaves me all himself to beat, I trust!

Tiburzio. I am Tiburzio.

Lur. You? 'Tis — yes . . . Tiburzio!
You were the last to keep the ford i' the valley
From Puccio, when I threw in succors there!
Why, I was on the heights — through the defile
Ten minutes after, when the prey was lost!
You wore an open skull-cap with a twist
Of water-reeds — the plume being hewn away;
While I drove down my battle from the heights,
I saw with my own eyes!

Tib. And you are Luria
Who sent my cohort, that laid down its arms
In error of the battle-signal's sense,
Back safely to me at the critical time —
One of a hundred deeds. I know you! Therefore

To none but you could I . . .

Lur. No truce, Tiburzio!

Tib. Luria, you know the peril imminent
On Pisa, — that you have us in the toils,
Us her last safeguard, all that intercept
The rage of her implacablest of foes
From Pisa: if we fall to-day, she falls.
Though Lucea will arrive, yet, 't is too late.
You have so plainly here the best of it,
That you must feel, brave soldier as you are,
How dangerous we grow in this extreme,
How truly formidable by despair.

Still, probabilities should have their weight:
The extreme chance is ours, but, that chance failing,

You win this battle. Wherefore say I this?
To be well apprehended when I add,
This danger absolutely comes from you.
Were you, who threaten thus, a Florentine . . .

Lur. Sir, I am nearer Florence than her sons.
I can, and have perhaps obliged the State,
Nor paid a mere son's duty.

Tib. Even so.
Were you the son of Florence, yet endued
With all your present nobleness of soul,
No question, what I must communicate
Would not detach you from her.

Lur. Me, detach?

Tib. Time urges. You will ruin presently Pisa, you never knew, for Florence's sake
You think you know. I have from time to
time

Made prize of certain secret missives sent
From Braccio here, the Commissary, home:
And knowing Florence otherwise, I piece
The entire chain out, from these its scattered links.

Your trial occupies the Signory;
They sit in judgment on your conduct now.
When men at home inquire into the acts
Which in the field e'en foes appreciate . . .
Brief, they are Florentines! You, saving
them,

Seek but the sure destruction saviors find.

Lur. Tiburzio!

Tib. All the wonder is of course.

I am not here to teach you, nor direct,
Only to loyally apprise — scarce that.
This is the latest letter, sealed and safe,
As it left here an hour ago. One way
Of two thought free to Florence, I command.
The duplicate is on its road; but this, —
Read it, and then I shall have more to say.

Lur. Florence!

Tib. Now, were yourself a Florentine,
This letter, let it hold the worst it can,
Would be no reason you should fall away.
The mother city is the mother still,
And recognition of the children's service
Her own affair; reward — there's no reward!
But you are bound by quite another tie.
Nor nature shows, nor reason, why at first
A foreigner, born friend to all alike,
Should give himself to any special State
More than another, stand by Florence's side
Rather than Pisa; 't is as fair a city
You war against, as that you fight for — famed
As well as she in story, graced no less
With noble heads and patriotic hearts:
Nor to a stranger's eye would either cause,
Stripped of the cumulative loves and hates
Which take importance from familiar view,
Stand as the right and sole to be upheld.
Therefore, should the preponderating gift
Of love and trust, Florence was first to throw,
Which made you hers, not Pisa's, void the scale, —

Old ties dissolving, things resume their place.
And all begins again. Break seal and read!
At least let Pisa offer for you now!

And I, as a good Pisan, shall rejoice,
Though for myself I lose, in gaining you,
This last fight and its opportunity;
The chance it brings of saving Pisa yet,
Or in the turn of battle dying so
That shame should want its extreme bitterness.

Lur. Tiburzio, you that fight for Pisa now
As I for Florence . . . say my chance were
yours!

You read this letter, and you find . . . no, no!
Too mad!

Tib. I read the letter, find they purpose
When I have crushed their foe, to crush me:
well?

Lur. You, being their captain, what is it you
do?

Tib. Why, as it is, all cities are alike;
As Florence pays you, Pisa will pay me.
I shall be as belied, whate'er the event,
As you, or more: my weak head, they will say
Prompted this last expedient, my faint heart
Entailed on them indelible disgrace,
Both which defects ask proper punishment.
Another tenure of obedience, mine!

You are no son of Pisa's: break and read!

Lur. And act on what I read? What act were fit?

If the firm-fixed foundation of my faith
In Florence, who to me stands for mankind,
— If that break up and, disimprisoning
From the abyss . . . Ah friend, it cannot be!
You may be very sage, yet — all the world
Having to fail, or your sagacity,
You do not wish to find yourself alone!
What would the world be worth? Whose love be sure?

The world remains: you are deceived!

Tib. Your hand!
I lead the vanguard. — If you fall, beside,
The better: I am left to speak! For me,
This was my duty, nor would I rejoice
If I could help, it misses its effect;
And after all you will look gallantly
Found dead here with that letter in your breast.

Lur. Tiburzio — I would see these people
once

And test them ere I answer finally!
At your arrival let the trumpet sound:
If mine return not then the wonted cry
It means that I believe — am Pisa's!

Tib. Well!
[Goes.]
Lur. My hand will have it he speaks true!
My blood

Beats close to this Tiburzio as a friend.
If he had steeped into my watch-tent, night
And the wild desert full of foes around,
I should have broke the bread and given the salt

Secure, and, when my hour of watch was done,
Taken my turn to sleep between his knees
Safe in the untroubled brow and honest cheek.
Oh world, where all things pass and naught
abides,

Oh life, the long mutation — is it so?

Is it with life as with the body's change?

— Where, e'en though better follow, good must pass,

Nor manhood's strength can mate with boy-
hood's grace,

Nor age's wisdom, in its turn, find strength,
But silently the first gift dies away,
And though the new stays, never both at once.
Life's time of savage instinct o'er with me,
It fades and dies away, past trusting more,
As if to punish the ingratitude

With which I turned to grow in these new lights,

And learned to look with European eyes.

Yet it is better, this cold certain way,
Where Braccio's brow tells nothing, Puccio's
mouth,

Domizia's eyes reject the searcher: yes!

For on their calm sagacity I lean,

Their sense of right, deliberate choice of good,
Sure, as they know my deeds, they deal with
me.

Yes, that is better — that is best of all!

Such faith stays when mere wild belief would
go.

Yes — when the desert creature's heart, at fault
Amid the scattering tempest's pillared sands,
Betrays its step into the pathless drift —
The calm instructed eye of man holds fast
By the sole bearing of the visible star,
Sure that when slow the whirling wreck subside,
The boundaries, lost now, shall be found
again, —

The palm-trees and the pyramid over all.

Yes: I trust Florence: Pisa is deceived.

(Enter BRACCIO, PUCCIO, and DOMIZIA.)

Brac. Noon's at an end: no Lucca? You must fight.

Lur. Do you remember ever, gentle friends,
I am no Florentine?

Dom. It is yourself

Who still are forcing us, importunately,

To bear in mind what else we should forget.

Lur. For loss! — for what I lose in being
none!

No shrewd man, such as you yourselves respect,
But would remind you of the stranger's loss
In natural friends and advocates at home,
Hereditary loves, even rivalships

With precedent for honor and reward.

Still, there's a gain, too! If you take it so,

The stranger's lot has special gain as well.

Do you forget there was my own far East

I might have given away myself to, once,

As now to Florence, and for such a gift,

Stood there like a descended deity?

There, worship waits us: what is it waits here?

[Shows the letter.]

See! Chance has put into my hand the means
Of knowing what I earn, before I work.

Should I fight better, should I fight the worse,
With payment palpably before me? See!

Here lies my whole reward! Best learn it now
Or keep it for the end's entire delight?

Brac. If you serve Florence as the vulgar
serve,

For swordman's-pay alone, — break seal and read!

In that case, you will find your full desert.

Lur. Give me one last happy moment,
friends!

You need me now, and all the graciousness
This letter can contain will hardly balance
The after-feeling that you need no more.
This moment . . . oh, the East has use with
you!

Its sword still flashes — is not flung aside
With the past praise, in a dark corner yet!
How say you? 'T is not so with Florentines —
Captains of yours: for them, the ended war
Is but a first step to the peace begun:
He who did well in war, just earns the right
To begin doing well in peace, you know:
And certain my precursors, — would not such
Look to themselves in such a chance as mine,
Secure the ground they trod upon, perhaps?
For I have heard, by fits, or seemed to hear,
Of strange mishap, mistake, ingratitude,
Treachery even. Say that one of you
Surmised this letter carried what might turn
To harm hereafter, cause him prejudice:
What would he do?

Dom. [Hastily.] Thank God and take revenge!

Hurl her own force against the city straight!
And, even at the moment when the foe
Sounded defiance . . .

(TIBURZIO'S trumpet sounds in the distance.)

Lur. Ah, you Florentines!
So would you do? Wisely for you, no doubt!
My simple Moorish instinct bids me clench
The obligation you relieve me from,
Still deeper! [To Puc.] Sound our answer, I should say,
And thus: — [Tearing the paper.] — The battle!
That solves every doubt.

ACT III

AFTERNOON

Puccio, as making a report to JACOPO.

Puc. And here, your captain must report
the rest;

For, as I say, the main engagement over
And Luria's special part in it performed,
How could a subaltern like me expect
Leisure or leave to occupy the field
And glean what dropped from his wide harvesting?

I thought, when Lucca at the battle's end
Came up, just as the Pisan centre broke,
That Luria would detach me and prevent
The flying Pisans seeking what they found,
Friends in the rear, a point to rally by.
But no, more honorable proved my post!
I had the august captive to escort
Safe to our camp; some other could pursue,
Fight, and be famous; gentler chance was
mine —

Tiburzio's wounded spirit must be soothed!
He's in the tent there.

Jacopo. Is the substance down?
I write — "The vanguard beaten and both wings

In full retreat, Tiburzio prisoner" —

And now, — "That they fell back and formed
again

On Lucca's coming." Why then, after all,
'T is half a victory, no conclusive one?

Puc. Two operations where a sole had served.

Jac. And Luria's fault was —?

Puc. Oh, for fault — not much!
He led the attack, a thought impetuously,
— There's commonly more prudence; now, he seemed

To hurry measures, otherwise well judged.
By over-concentrating strength at first
Against the enemy's van both wings escaped:
That's repairable, yet it is a fault.

(Enter BRACCIO.)

Jac. As good as a full victory to Florence,
With the advantage of a fault beside —
What is it, Puccio? — that by pressing forward
With too impetuous . . .

Brac. The report anon!
Thanks, sir — you have elsewhere a charge. I know. [Puccio goes.]

There's nothing done but I would do again;
Yet, Lapo, it may be the past proves nothing,
And Luria has kept faithful to the close.

Jac. I was for waiting.

Brac. Yes: so was not I.
He could not choose but tear that letter — true!
Still, certain of his tones, I mind, and looks: —
You saw, too, with a fresher soul than I.
So, Porzio seemed an injured man, they say!
Well, I have gone upon the broad, sure ground.

(Enter LURIA, PUCCIO, and DOMIZIA.)

Lur. [To Puc.] Say, at his pleasure I will see Tiburzio!

All's at his pleasure.

Dom. [To Lur.] Were I not forewarned
You would reject, as you do constantly,
Praise, — I might tell you how you have deserved

Of Florence by this last and crowning feat:
But words offend.

Lur. Nay, you may praise me now.
I want instruction every hour, I find,
On points where once I saw least need of it;
And praise, I have been used to slight perhaps,

Seems scarce so easily dispensed with now.
After a battle, half one's strength is gone;
The glorious passion in us once appeased,
Our reason's calm cold dreadful voice begins.
All justice, power and beauty scarce appear
Monopolized by Florence, as of late,
To me, the stranger: you, no doubt, may
know

Why Pisa needs must bear her rival's yoke.

And peradventure I grow nearer you,
For I, too, want to know and be assured.

When a cause ceases to reward itself,
Its friend seeks fresh sustainments; praise is
one,

And here stand you — you, lady, praise me
well.

But yours — (your pardon) — is unlearned
praise.

To the motive, the endeavor, the heart's self,
Your quick sense looks: you crown and call aright

The soul o' the purpose, ere 't is shaped as act,

Takes flesh i' the world, and clothes itself a king.

But when the act comes, stands for what 't is worth.

— Here 's Puccio, the skilled soldier, he 's my judge!

Was all well, Puccio?

Puc. All was . . . must be well: If we beat Lucca presently, as doubtless . . .

— No, there 's no doubt, we must — all was well done.

Lur. In truth? Still you are of the trade, my Puccio!

You have the fellow-craftsman's sympathy.

There 's none cares, like a fellow of the craft,

For the all unestimated sum of pains:

That go to a success the world can see:

They praise then, but the best they never know

— While you know! So, if envy mix with it,

Hate even, still the bottom-praise of all,

Whatever be the dregs, that drop 's pure gold!

— For nothing 's like it; nothing else records

Those daily, nightly drippings in the dark

Of the heart's blood, the world lets drop away

Forever — so, pure gold that praise must be!

And I have yours, my soldier! yet the best

Is still to come. There 's one looks on apart

Whom all refers to, failure or success;

What's done might be our best, our utmost work,

And yet inadequate to serve his need.

Here 's Braccio now, for Florence — here 's our service —

Well done for us, seems it well done for him?

His chosen engine, tasked to its full strength

Answers the end? Should he have chosen higher?

Do we help Florence, now our best is wrought?

Brac. This battle, with the foregone services, saves Florence.

Lur. Why then, all is very well!

Here am I in the middle of my friends,

Who know me and who love me, one and all.

And yet . . . 't is like . . . this instant while I speak

Is like the turning-moment of a dream

When . . . Ah, you are not foreigners like me!

Well then, one always dreams of friends at home;

And always comes, I say, the turning-point

When something changes in the friendly eyes

That love and look on you . . . so slight, so slight . . .

And yet it tells you they are dead and gone,

Or changed and enemies, for all their words,

And all is mockery and a maddening show.

You now, so kind here, all you Florentines,

What is it in your eyes . . . those lips, those brows . . .

Nobody spoke it, yet I know it well!

Come now — this battle saves you, all 's at end,

Your use of me is o'er, for good, for ill, —

Come now, what's done against me, while I speak,

In Florence? Come! I feel it in my blood,

My eyes, my hair, a voice is in my ears

That spite of all this smiling and soft speech

You are betraying me! What is it you do?

Have it your way, and think my use is over — Think you are saved and may throw off the mask —

Have it my way, and think more work remains Which I could do, — so, show you fear me not!

Or prudent be, or daring, as you choose,

But tell me — tell what I refused to know

At noon, lest heart should fail me! Well?

That letter?

My fate is sealed at Florence! What is it?

Brac. Sir, I shall not deny what you divine.

It is no novelty for innocence

To be suspected, but a privilege:

The after certain compensation comes.

Charges, I say not whether false or true,

Have been preferred against you some time since,

Which Florence was bound, plainly, to receive,

And which are therefore undergoing now

The due investigation. That is all.

I doubt not but your innocence will prove

Apparent and illustrious, as to me,

To them this evening, when the trial ends.

Lur. My trial?

Dom. Florence, Florence to the end, My whole heart thanks thee!

Puc. [To BRAC.] What is "trial," sir?

It was not for a trial, — surely, no —

I furnished you those notes from time to time?

I held myself aggrieved — I am a man —

And I might speak, — ay, and speak mere truth, too,

And yet not mean at bottom of my heart

What should assist a — trial, do you say?

You should have told me!

Dom.

Nay, go on, go on! His sentence! Do they sentence him? What is it?

The block — wheel?

Brac. Sentence there is none as yet,

Nor shall I give my own opinion now

Of what it should be, or is like to be.

When it is passed, applaud or disapprove!

Up to that point, what is there to impugn?

Lur. They are right, then, to try me?

Brac. I assert,

Maintain and justify the absolute right

Of Florence to do all she can have done

In this procedure, — standing on her guard,

Receiving even services like yours

With utmost fit suspicious wariness.

In other matters, keep the mummy up!

Take all the experiences of all the world,

Each knowledge that broke through a heart to life,

Each reasoning which, to reach, burnt out a brain,

— In other cases, know these, warrant these,

And then dispense with these — 't is very well!

Let friend trust friend, and love demand love's like,

And gratitude be claimed for benefits, —

There's grace in that, — and when the fresh heart breaks,

The new brain proves a ruin, what of them?

Where is the matter of one moth the more

Singed in the candle, at a summer's end?

But Florence is no simple John or James
To have his toy, his fancy, his conceit
That he's the one excepted man by fate,
And, when fate shows him he's mistaken
there,
Die with all good men's praise, and yield his
place

To Paul and George intent to try their chance !
Florence exists because these pass away.
She's a contrivance to supply a type
Of man, which men's deficiencies refuse ;
She binds so many, that she grows out of
them —
Stands steady o'er their numbers, though they
change

And pass away — there's always what upholds,
Always enough to fashion the great show.
As see, you hanging city, in the sun,
Of shapely cloud substantially the same !
A thousand vapors rise and sink again,
Are interfused, and live their life and die, —
Yet ever hangs the steady show i' the air,
Under the sun's straight influence: that is
well,

That is worth heaven should hold, and God should bless !

And so is Florence, — the unseen sun above,
Which draws and holds suspended all of us,
Binds transient vapors into a single cloud
Differing from each and better than they all.
And shall she dare to stake this permanence
On any one man's faith? Man's heart is weak,
And its temptations many: let her prove
Each servant to the very uttermost
Before she grant him her reward, I say !

Dom. And as for hearts she chances to mistake,

Wronged hearts, not destined to receive reward,

Though they deserve it, did she only know,
— What should she do for these ?

Brac. What does she not ?
Say, that she gives them but herself to serve !
Here's Luria — what had profited his strength,
When half an hour of sober fancying
Had shown him step by step the uselessness
Of strength exerted for strength's proper sake ?
But the truth is, she did create that strength,
Draw to the end the corresponding means.
The world is wide — are we the only men ?
Oh, for the time, the social purpose' sake,
Use words agreed on, bandy epithets,
Call any man the sole great wise and good !
But shall we therefore, standing by ourselves,
Insult our souls and God with the same speech ?
There, swarm the ignoble thousands under
him :

What marks us from the hundreds and the tens ?

Florence took up, turned all one way the soul
Of Luria with its fires, and here he glows !
She takes me out of all the world as him,
Fixing my coldness till like ice it checks
The fire ! So, Braccio, Luria, which is best ?

Lur. Ah, brave me ? And is this indeed the
way

To gain your good word and sincere esteem ?
Am I the baited animal that must turn

And fight his baiters to deserve their praise ?
Obedience is mistake then ? Be it so !
Do you indeed remember I stand here
The captain of the conquering army, — mine —
With all your tokens, praise and promise, ready
To show for what their names meant when you
gave,

Not what you style them now you take away ?
If I call in my troops to arbitrate,
And dash the first enthusiastic thrill
Of victory with this you menace now —
Commend to the instinctive popular sense,
My story first, your comment afterward, —
Will they take, think you, part with you or me ?
If I say — I, the laborer they saw work,
Ending my work, ask pay, and find my lords
Have all this while provided silently
Against the day of pay and proving faith,
By what you call my sentence that's to come —
Will friends advise I wait complacently ?
If I meet Florence half-way at their head,
What will you do, my mild antagonist ?

Brac. I will rise up like fire, proud and triumphant

That Florence knew you thoroughly and by
me,

And so was saved. "See, Italy." I'll say,
"The crown of our precautions! Here's a
man

Was far advanced, just touched on the belief
Less subtle cities had accorded long ;
But we were wiser: at the end comes this !"
And from that minute, where is Luria ? Lost !
The very stones of Florence cry against
The all-exacting, naught-enduring fool,
Who thus resents her first probation, flouts
As if he, only, shone and cast no shade,
He, only, walked the earth with privilege
Against suspicion, free where angels fear :
He, for the first inquisitive mother's-word,
Must turn, and stand on his defence, forsooth !
Reward ? You will not be worth punishment !

Lur. And Florence knew me thus ! Thus I have lived, —

And thus you, with the clear fine intellect,
Braccio, the cold acute instructed mind,
Out of the stir, so calm and unconfused,
Reported me — how could you otherwise !
Ay ? — and what dropped from you, just now,
moreover ?

Your information, Puccio ? — Did your skill,
Your understanding sympathy approve
Such a report of me ? Was this the end ?
Or is even this the end ? Can I stop here ?
You, lady, with the woman's stand apart,
The heart to see with, past man's brain and
eyes,

. . . I cannot fathom why you should destroy
The unoffending one, you call your friend —
Still, lessoned by the good examples here
Of friendship, 't is but natural I ask —
Had you a further aim, in aught you urged,
Than your friend's profit — in all those instances

Of perfidy, all Florence wrought of wrong —
All I remember now for the first time ?

Dom. I am a daughter of the Traversari,
Sister of Porzio and of Berto both,

So, have foreseen all that has come to pass.
I knew the Florence that could doubt their
faith,
Must needs mistrust a stranger's — dealing
them

Punishment, would deny him his reward.
And I believed, the shame they bore and died,
He would not bear, but live and fight against —
Seeing he was of other stuff than they.

Lur. Hear them! All these against one foreigner!

And all this while, where is, in the whole world,
To his good faith a single witness?

Tib. [Who has entered unseen during the preceding dialogue.] Here!

Thus I bear witness, not in word but deed.

I live for Pisa; she's not lost to-day

By many chances — much prevents from that!

Her army has been beaten, I am here,

But Lucca comes at last, one happy chance!

I rather would see Pisa three times lost

Than saved by any traitor, even by you;

The example of a traitor's happy fortune

Would bring more evil in the end than good; —

Pisa rejects the traitor, craves yourself!

I, in her name, resign forthwith to you

My charge, — the highest office, sword and shield!

You shall not, by my counsel, turn on Florence

Your army, give her calumny that ground —

Nor bring one soldier: be you all we gain!

And all she'll lose, — a head to deck some bridge,

And save the cost o' the crown should deck the
head.

Leave her to perish in her perfidy,

Plague-stricken and stripped naked to all eyes,

A proverb and a by-word in all mouths!

Go you to Pisa! Florence is my place —

Leave me to tell her of the rectitude,

I, from the first, told Pisa, knowing it.

To Pisa!

Dom. Ah my Braccio, are you caught?

Brac. Puccio, good soldier and good citizen,

Whom I have ever kept beneath my eye,

Ready as fit, to serve in this event

Florence, who clear foretold it from the first —

Through me, she gives you the command and
charge

She takes, through me, from him who held it
late!

A painful trial, very sore, was yours:

All that could draw out, marshal in array

The selfish passions 'gainst the public good —

Slights, scorn, neglects, were heaped on you to bear:

And ever you did bear and bow the head!

It had been sorry trial, to precede

Your feet, hold up the promise of reward

For luring gleam; your footsteps kept the track

Through dark and doubt: take all the light at
once!

Trial is over, consummation shines;

Well have you served, as well henceforth command!

Puc. No, no . . . I dare not! I am grateful, glad;

But Luria — you shall understand he's
wronged:

And he's my captain — this is not the way

We soldiers climb to fortune: think again!

The sentence is not even passed, beside!

I dare not: where's the soldier could?

Lur. Now, Florence —

Is it to be? You will know all the strength

O' the savage — to your neck the proof must
go?

You will prove the brute nature? Ah, I see!

The savage plainly is impassable —

He keeps his calm way through insulting words,

Sarcastic looks, sharp gestures — one of which

Would stop you, fatal to your finer sense,

But if he stolidly advance, march mute

Without a mark upon his callous hide,

Through the mere brushwood you grow angry
with,

And leave the tatters of your flesh upon,

— You have to learn that when the true bar
comes,

The murk mid-forest, the grand obstacle,

Which when you reach, you give the labor up,

Nor dash on, but lie down composed before,

— He goes against it, like the brute he is:

It falls before him, or he dies in his course.

I kept my course through past ingratitude:

I saw — it does seem, now, as if I saw,

Could not but see, those insults as they fell,

— Ay, let them glance from off me, very like,

Laughing, perhaps, to think the quality

You grew so bold on, while you so despised

The Moor's dull mute inapprehensive mood,

Was saving you: I bore and kept my course.

Now real wrong fronts me: see if I succumb!

Florence withstands me? I will punish her.

At night my sentence will arrive, you say.

Till then I cannot, if I would, rebel — Unauthorized to lay my office down,

Retaining my full power to will and do:

After — it is to see, Tiburzio, thanks!

Go; you are free: join Lucca! I suspend

All further operations till to-night.

Thank you, and for the silence most of all!

[To Brac.] Let my complacent bland accuser
go

Carry his self-approving head and heart

Safe through the army which would trample
him

Dead in a moment at my word or sign!

Go, sir, to Florence; tell friends what I say —

That while I wait my sentence, theirs waits
them!

[To Dom.] You, lady, — you have black Italian eyes!

I would be generous if I might: oh, yes —

For I remember how so oft you seemed

Inclined at heart to break the barrier down

Which Florence finds God built between us
both.

Alas, for generosity! this hour

Asks retribution: bear it as you may,

I must — the Moor — the savage, — pardon you!

Puccio, my trusty soldier, see them forth!

ACT IV

EVENING

Enter PUCCIO and JACOPO.

Puc. What Luria will do? Ah, 't is yours, fair sir,
Your and your subtle-witted master's part,
To tell me that; I tell you what he can.

Jac. Friend, you mistake my station: I observe
The game, watch how my betters play, no more.

Puc. But mankind are not pieces — there's your fault!
You cannot push them, and, the first move made,

Lean back and study what the next shall be,
In confidence that, when 't is fixed upon,
You find just where you left them, blacks and whites:

Men go on moving when your hand's away.
You build, I notice, firm on Luria's faith
This whole time, — firmlier than I choose to build,

Who never doubted it — of old, that is —
With Luria in his ordinary mind.

But now, oppression makes the wise man mad:
How do I know he will not turn and stand
And hold his own against you, as he may?

Suppose he but withdraw to Pisa — well, —
Then, even if all happen to your wish,
Which is a chance . . .

Jac. Nay — 't was an oversight,
Not waiting till the proper warrant came:
You could not take what was not ours to give.
But when at night the sentence really comes,
Our city authorizes past dispute
Luria's removal and transfers the charge,
You will perceive your duty and accept?

Puc. Accept what? muster-rolls of soldiers' names?

An army upon paper? I want men,
The hearts as well as hands — and where's a heart

But beats with Luria, in the multitude
I come from walking through by Luria's side?
You gave them Luria, set him thus to grow,
Head-like, upon their trunk: one heart feeds both,

They feel him there, live twice, and well know why.

— For they do know, if you are ignorant,
Who kept his own place and respected theirs,
Managed their sweat, yet never spared his blood.
All was your act: another might have served —
There's peradventure no such dearth of heads —
But you chose Luria: so, they grew one flesh,
And now, for nothing they can understand,
Luria removed, off is to roll the head;
The body's mine — much I shall do with it!

Jac. That's at the worst.

Puc. No — at the best, it is!
Best, do you hear? I saw them by his side.
Only we two with Luria in the camp
Are left that keep the secret? You think that?
Hear what I know: from rear to van, no heart

But felt the quiet patient hero there
Was wronged, nor in the moveless ranks an eye
But glancing told its fellow the whole story
Of that convicted silent knot of spies
Who passed through them to Florence; they might pass —

No breast but gladder beat when free of such!
Our troops will catch up Luria, close him round,
Bear him to Florence as their natural lord,
Partake his fortune, live or die with him.

Jac. And by mistake catch up along with him

Puccio, no doubt, compelled in self despire
To still continue second in command!

Puc. No, sir, no second nor so fortunate!
Your tricks succeed with me too well for that!
I am as you have made me, live and die
To serve your end — a mere trained fighting-hack,

With words, you laugh at while they leave your mouth,

For my life's rule and ordinance of God!
I have to do my duty, keep my faith,
And earn my praise, and guard against my blame,

As I was trained. I shall accept your charge,
And fight against one better than myself.

Spite of my heart's conviction of his worth —
That, you may count on! — just as hitherto
I have gone on, persuaded I was wronged,
Slighted, insulted, terms we learn by rote, —

All because Luria superseded me —
Because the better nature, fresh-inspired,
Mounted above me to its proper place!

What mattered all the kindly graciousness,
The cordial brother's-bearing? This was clear —

I, once the captain, now was subaltern,
And so must keep complaining like a fool!
Go, take the curse of a lost soul, I say!

You neither play your puppets to the end,
Nor treat the real man, — for his realness' sake
Thrust rudely in their place, — with such regard

As might console them for their altered rank.
Me, the mere steady soldier, you depose
For Luria, and here's all your pet deserves!

Of what account, then, is your laughing-stock?
One word for all: whatever Luria does,

— If backed by his indignant troops he turn,
Revenge himself, and Florence go to ground, —
Or, for a signal everlasting shame,

He pardon you, simply seek better friends,
Side with the Pisans and Luchese for change

— And if I, pledged to ingrates past belief,
Dare fight against a man such fools call false,

Who, inasmuch as he was true, fights me, —
Whichever way he win, he wins for worth,

For every soldier, for all true and good!
Sir, chinceling the rest, omit not this!

(As they go, enter LURIA and HUSAIN.)

Hus. Saw'st thou? — For they are gone!
The world lies bare

Before thee, to be tasted, felt and seen
Like what it is, now Florence goes away!
Thou livest now, with men art man again!
Those Florentines were all to thee of old;
But Braccio, but Domizia, gone is each,

There lie beneath thee thine own multitudes !
Saw'st thou ?

Lur. I saw.

Hus. Then, hold thy course, my king !
The years return. Let thy heart have its way :
Ah, they would play with thee as with all else,
Turn thee to use, and fashion thee anew,
Find out God's fault in thee as in the rest ?
Oh watch, oh listen only to these fiends
Once at their occupation ! Ere we know,
The free great heaven is shut, their stifling pall
Drops till it frets the very tingling hair,
So weighs it on our head. — and, for the earth,
Our common earth is tethered up and down,
Over and across — “here shalt thou move,” they cry !

Lur. Ay, Husain ?

Hus. So have they spoiled all beside !
So stands a man girt round with Florentines, Priests, graybeards, Braccios, women, boys and spies,

All in one tale, all singing the same song,
How thou must house, and live at bed and board,

Take pledge and give it, go their every way,
Breathe to their measure, make thy blood beat
time

With theirs — or, all is nothing — thou art lost —

A savage, how shouldst thou perceive as they ?
Feel glad to stand 'neath God's close naked
hand !

Look up to it ! Why, down they pull thy neck,
Lest it crush thee, who feel'st it and wouldst
kiss,

Without their priests that needs must glove it
first,

Least peradventure flesh offend thy lip.

Love woman ! Why, a very beast thou art !

Thou must . . .

Lur. Peace, Husain !

Hus. Ay, but, spoiling all,
For all, else true things, substituting false,
That they should dare spoil, of all instincts,
thine !

Should dare to take thee with thine instincts up,
Thy battle-ardors, like a ball of fire,
And class them and allow them place and play
So far, no farther — unabashed the while !

Thou with the soul that never can take rest —
Thou born to do, undo, and do again,
And never to be still, — wouldst thou make war ?
Oh, that is commendable, just and right !

“Come over,” say they, “have the honor due
In living out thy nature ! Fight thy best :

It is to be for Florence, not thyself !

For thee, it were a horror and a plague ;

For us, when war is made for Florence, see,
How all is changed : the fire that fed on earth
Now towers to heaven !” —

Lur. And what sealed up so long
My Husain's mouth ?

Hus. Oh friend, oh lord — for me,
What am I ? — I was silent at thy side,
Who am a part of thee. It is thy hand,
Thy foot that glows when in the heart fresh
blood

Boils up, thou heart of me ! Now, live again,

Again love as thou likest, hate as free !

Turn to no Braccios nor Donizias now,

To ask, before thy very limbs dare move,

If Florence's welfare be concerned thereby !

Lur. So clear what Florence must expect of
me ?

Hus. Both armies against Florence ! Take revenge !

Wide, deep — to live upon, in feeling now, —

And, after live, in memory, year by year —

And, with the dear conviction, die at last !

She lies now at thy pleasure : pleasure have !

Their vaunted intellect that gilds our sense,

And blends with life, to show it better by,

— How think'st thou ? — I have turned that light on them !

They called our thirst of war a transient thing ;

“The battle-element must pass away

From life,” they said, “and leave a tranquil
world.”

— Master, I took their light and turned it full

On that dull turgid vein they said would burst

And pass away ; and as I looked on life,

Still everywhere I tracked this, though it hid

And shifted, lay so silent as it thought,

Changed shape and hue yet ever was the same.

Why, 't was all fighting, all their nobler life !

All work was fighting, every harm — defeat,

And every joy obtained — a victory !

Be not their dupe !

— Their dupe ? That hour is past !

Here stand'st thou in the glory and the calm :

All is determined. Silence for me now !

[HUSAIN goes.]

Lur. Have I heard all ?

Dom. [Advancing from the background.] No,
Luria, I remain !

Not from the motives these have urged on thee,

Ignoble, insufficient, incomplete,

And pregnant each with sure seeds of decay,

As failing of sustainment from thyself.

— Neither from low revenge, nor selfishness,

Nor savage lust of power, nor one, nor all,

Shalt thou abolish Florence ! I proclaim

The angel in thee, and reject the sprites

Which ineffectual crowd about his strength,

And mingle with his work and claim a share !

Inconsciously to the augustest end

Thou hast arisen : second not in rank

So much as time, to him who first ordained

That Florence, thou art to destroy, should be.

Yet him a star, too, guided, who broke first

The pride of lonely power, the life apart,

And made the eminences, each to each,

Lean o'er the level world and let it lie

Safe from the thunder henceforth 'neath their
tops ;

So the few famous men of old combined,

And let the multitude rise underneath,

And reach them and unite — so Florence grew :

Braccio speaks true, it was well worth the price.

But when the sheltered many grew in pride

And grudged the station of the elected ones.

Who, greater than their kind, are truly great

Only in voluntary servitude —

Time was for thee to rise, and thou art here.

Such plague possessed this Florence : who can tell

The mighty girth and greatness at the heart
 Of those so perfect pillars of the grove
 She pulled down in her envy? Who as I,
 The light weak parasite born but to twine
 Round each of them and, measuring them, live?
 My light love keeps the matchless circle safe,
 My slender life proves what has passed away.
 I lived when they departed; lived to cling
 To thee, the mighty stranger; thou wouldst rise
 And burst the thralldom, and avenge, I knew.
 I have done nothing; all was thy strong hold.
 But a bird's weight can break the infant tree
 Which after holds an aery in its arms,
 And 't was my care that naught should warp thy spire
 From rising to the height; the roof is reached O' the forest, break through, see extend the sky!

Go on to Florence, Luria! 'Tis man's cause!
 Fail thou, and thine own fall were least to dread:

Thou keepest Florence in her evil way,
 Encouragest her sin so much the more—
 And while the ignoble past is justified,
 Thou all the surelier warp'st the future growth,
 The chiefs to come, the Lurias yet unborn,
 That, greater than thyself, are reached o'er thee
 Who giv'st the vantage-ground their foes require,
 As o'er my prostrate House thyself wast
     reached!

Man calls thee, God requites thee! All is said,
 The mission of my House fulfilled at last:
 And the mere woman, speaking for herself,
 Reserves speech—it is now no woman's time.

[DOMIZIA goes.]

Lur. Thus at the last must figure Luria,
     then!

Doing the various work of all his friends,
 And answering every purpose save his own.
 No doubt, 't is well for them to wish; but him—
 After the exploit what were left? Perchance
 A little pride upon the swarthy brow,
 At having brought successfully to bear
 'Gainst Florence' self her own especial arms,—
 Her craftiness, impelled by fiercer strength
 From Moorish blood than feeds the northern wit.
 But after!—once the easy vengeance willed,
 Beautiful Florence at a word laid low
 —(Not in her domes and towers and palaces,
 Not even in a dream, that outrage!)—low,
 As shamed in her own eyes henceforth forever,
 Low, for the rival cities round to laugh,
 Conquered and pardoned by a hieling Moor!
 —For him, who did the irreparable wrong,
 What would be left, his life's illusion fled,—
 What hope or trust in the forlorn wide world?
 How strange that Florence should mistake me
     so!

Whence grew this? What withdrew her faith from me?

Some cause! These fretful-blooded children talk

Against their mother,—they are wronged, they
     say—

Notable wrongs her smile makes up again!
 So, taking fire at each supposed offence,
 They may speak rashly, suffer for their speech:

But what could it have been in word or deed
 Thus injured me? Some one word spoken
     more

Out of my heart, and all had changed perhaps.
 My fault, it must have been,—for, what gain they?

Why risk the danger? See, what I could do!
 And my fault, wherefore visit upon them,
 My Florentines? The notable revenge
 I meditated! To stay passively,
 Attend their summons, be as they dispose!
 Why, if my very soldiers keep the rank,
 And if my chieftains acquiesce, what then?
 I ruin Florence, teach her friends mistrust,
 Confirm her enemies in harsh belief,
 And when she finds one day, as find she must,
 The strange mistake, and how my heart was
     hers,

Shall it console me, that my Florentines
 Walk with a sadder step, in graver guise,
 Who took me with such frankness, praised me
     so,

At the glad outset? Had they loved me less,
 They had less feared what seemed a change in
     me.

And after all, who did the harm? Not they!
 How could they interpose with those old fools.
 I' the council? Suffer for those old fools'
     sake—

They, who made pictures of me, sang the songs
 About my battles? Ah, we Moors get blind
 Out of our proper world, where we can see!
 The sun that guides is closer to us! There—There, my own orb! He sinks from out the sky!

Why, there! a whole day has he blessed the
     land,

My land, our Florence all about the hills,
 The fields and gardens, vineyards, olive-grounds,

All have been blest—and yet we Florentines,
 With souls intent upon our battle here,
 Found that he rose too soon, or set too late,
 Gave us no vantage, or gave Pisa much—Therefore we wronged him! Does he turn in ire

To burn the earth that cannot understand?
 Or drop out quietly, and leave the sky,
 His task once ended? Night wipes blame
     away.

Another morning from my East shall spring
 And find all eyes at leisure, all disposed
 To watch and understand its work, no doubt.
 So, praise the new sun, the successor praise,
 Praise the new Luria and forget the old!

[Taking a phial from his breast.]

—Strange! This is all I brought from my own land

To help me: Europe would supply the rest,
 All needs beside, all other helps save one!
 I thought of adverse fortune, battle lost,
 The natural upbraiding of the loser,
 And then this quiet remedy to seek
 At end of the disastrous day. [He drinks.]

'T is sought!
 This was my happy triumph-morning: Florence
 Is saved: I drink this, and ere night,—die!
     Strange!

ACT V

NIGHT

LURIA and PUCCIO

Lur. I thought to do this, not to talk this:
well,

Such were my projects for the city's good,
To help her in attack or by defence.
Time, here as elsewhere, soon or late may take Our foresight by surprise through chance and
change;

But not a little we provide against
— If you see clear on every point.

Puc. Most clear.

Lur. Then all is said — not much, if you count words,

Yet to an understanding ear enough;
And all that my brief stay permits, beside.
Nor must you blame me, as I sought to teach
My elder in command, or threw a doubt
Upon the very skill, it comforts me
To know I leave, — your steady soldiiership
Which never failed me: yet, because it seemed
A stranger's eye might haply note defect
That skill, through use and custom, overlooks —

I have gone into the old cares once more,
As if I had to come and save again Florence — that May — that morning! 'T is night now.

Well — I broke off with? . . .

Puc. Of the past campaign
You spoke — of measures to be kept in mind
For future use.

Lur. True, so . . . but, time — no time!
As well end here: remember this, and me!
Farewell now!

Puc. Dare I speak?

Lur. South o' the river —
How is the second stream called . . . no, — the third?

Puc. Pesa.

Lur. And a stone's-cast from the fording-
place,

To the east, — the little mount's name?

Puc. Lupo.

Lur. Ay!

Ay — there the tower, and all that side is safe!
With San Romano, west of Evola,
San Miniato, Scala, Empoli,
Five towers in all, — forget not!

Puc. Fear not me!

Lur. — Nor to memorialize the Council now,
I the easy hour, on those battalions' claim,
Who forced a pass by Staggia on the hills,
And kept the Siense at check!

Puc. One word —

Sir, I must speak! That you submit yourself
To Florence' bidding, howsoe'er it prove,
And give up the command to me — is much,
Too much, perhaps: but what you tell me now,
Even will affect the other course you choose —
Poor as it may be, perils even that!

Refuge you seek at Pisa: yet these plans
All militate for Florence, all conclude
Your formidable work to make her queen

O' the country, — which her rivals rose against
When you began it, — which to interrupt,
Pisa would buy you off at any price!
You cannot mean to sue for Pisa's help,
With this made perfect and on record?

Lur.

I —

At Pisa, and for refuge, do you say?

Puc. Where are you going, then? You must decide

On leaving us, a silent fugitive,

Alone, at night — you, stealing through our lines,

Who were this morning's Luria, — you escape

To painfully begin the world once more,

With such a past, as it had never been!

Where are you going?

Lur.

Not so far, my Puccio,

But that I hope to hear, enjoy and praise

(If you mind praise from your old captain yet)

Each happy blow you strike for Florence!

Puc.

Ay,

But ere you gain your shelter, what may come?
For see — though nothing's surely known as
yet,

Still — truth must out — I apprehend the worst.

If mere suspicion stood for certainty

Before, there's nothing can arrest the step

Of Florence: toward your ruin, once on foot.

Forgive her fifty times, it matters not!

And having disbelieved your innocence,

How can she trust your magnanimity?

You may do harm to her — why then, you will!

And Florence is sagacious in pursuit.

Have you a friend to count on?

Lur.

One sure friend.

Puc. Potent?

Lur. All-potent.

Puc.

And he is apprised?

Lur. He waits me.

Puc.

So! — Then I, put in your place,

Making my profit of all done by you,

Calling your labors mine, reaping their fruit,

To this, the State's gift, now add yours be-
side —

That I may take as my peculiar store

These your instructions to work Florence good.

And if, by putting some few happily

In practice, I should both advantage her

And draw down honor on myself, — what then?

Lur. Do it, my Puccio! I shall know and praise!

Puc. Though so, men say, "mark what we gain by change

— A Puccio for a Luria!"

Lur.

Even so!

Puc. Then, not for fifty hundred Florences

Would I accept one office save my own,

Fill any other than my rightful post

Here at your feet, my captain and my lord!

That such a cloud should break, such trouble
be,

Ere a man settle, soul and body, down

Into his true place and take rest forever!

Here were my wise eyes fixed on your right
hand,

And so the bad thoughts came and the worse
words,

And all went wrong and painfully enough, —

No wonder, — till, the right spot stumbled on,
All the jar stops, and there is peace at once!
I am yours now, — a tool your right hand wields!

God's love, that I should live, the man I am,
On orders, warrants, patents and the like,
As if there were no glowing eye i' the world
To glance straight inspiration to my brain,
No glorious heart to give mine twice the beats!
For, see — my doubt, where is it? — fear? 't is flown!

And Florence and her anger are a tale
To scare a child! Why, half-a-dozen words
Will tell her, spoken as I now can speak,
Her error, my past folly — and all's right,
And you are Luria, our great chief again!
Or at the worst — which worst were best of
all —

To exile or to death I follow you!

Lur. Thanks, Puccio! Let me use the privilege

You grant me: if I still command you, — stay!
Remain here, my vicegerent, it shall be,
And not successor: let me, as of old,
Still serve the State, my spirit prompting
yours —

Still triumph, one for both. There! Leave me now!

You cannot disobey my first command?
Remember what I spoke of Jacopo,
And what you promised to concert with him!
Send him to speak with me — nay, no farewell!
You shall be by me when the sentence comes.

[PUCCIO goes.]

So, there's one Florentine returns again!
Out of the genial morning company.
One face is left to take into the night.

[Enter JACOPO.]

Jac. I wait for your command, sir.

Lur. What, so soon?

I thank your ready presence and fair word.
I used to notice you in early days
As of the other species, so to speak,
Those watchers of the lives of us who act —
That weigh our motives, scrutinize our thoughts.
So, I propound this to your faculty
As you would tell me, were a town to take
. . . That is, of old. I am departing hence
Under these imputations; that is naught —
I leave no friend on whom they may rebound,
Hardly a name behind me in the land,
Being a stranger: all the more behooves
That I regard how altered were the case
With natives of the country, Florentines
On whom the like mischance should fall: the roots

O' the tree survive the ruin of the trunk —
No root of mine will throb, you understand.
But I had predecessors, Florentines,
Accused as I am now, and punished so —
The Traversari: you know more than I
How stigmatized they are and lost in shame.
Now Puccio, who succeeds me in command,
Both served them and succeeded, in due time;
He knows the way, holds proper documents,
And has the power to lay the simple truth
Before an active spirit, as I count yours:
And also there's Tiburzio, my new friend,

Will, at a word, confirm such evidence,
He being the great chivalric soul we know.
I put it to your tact, sir — were 't not well,
— A grace, though but for contrast's sake, no
more, —

If you who witness, and have borne a share
Involuntarily in my mischance,
Should, of your proper motion, set your skill
To indicate — that is, investigate
The right or wrong of what mischance befell
Those famous citizens, your countrymen?
Nay, you shall promise nothing: but reflect,
And if your sense of justice prompt you —
good!

Jac. And if, the trial past, their fame stand clear

To all men's eyes, as yours, my lord, to mine —
Their ghosts may sleep in quiet satisfied!
For me, a straw thrown up into the air,
My testimony goes for a straw's worth.
I used to hold by the instructed brain,
And move with Braccio as my master-wind;
The heart leads surer: I must move with
you —

As greatest now, who ever were the best.
So, let the last and humblest of your servants
Accept your charge, as Braccio's heretofore,
And tender homage by obeying you!

[JACOPO goes.]

Lur. Another! — Luria goes not poorly forth.
If we could wait! The only fault's with time;
All men become good creatures: but so slow!

[Enter DOMIZIA.]

Lur. Ah, you once more?

Dom. Domizia, whom you knew.
Performed her task, and died with it. 'T is I,
Another woman, you have never known.
Let the past sleep now!

Lur. I have done with it.

Dom. How inexhaustibly the spirit grows!
One object, she seemed erewhile born to reach
With her whole energies and die content, —
So like a wall at the world's edge it stood,
With naught beyond to live for, — is that reached? —

Already are new undreamed energies
Outgrowing under, and extending farther
To a new object; there's another world.
See! I have told the purpose of my life;
'T is gained: you are decided, well or ill —
You march on Florence, or submit to her —
My work is done with you, your brow declares.
But — leave you? — More of you seems yet to
reach:

I stay for what I just begin to see.

Lur. So that you turn not to the past!

Dom. You trace
Nothing but ill in it — my selfish impulse,
Which sought its end and disregarded yours?

Lur. Speak not against your nature: best,
each keep

His own — you, yours — most, now that I keep
mine,

— At least, fall by it, having too weakly stood.
God's finger marks distinctions, all so fine,
We would confound: the lesser has its use.
Which, when it apes the greater, is foregone.
I, born a Moor, lived half a Florentine:

But, punished properly, can end, a Moor.
Beside, there's something makes me understand
Your nature : I have seen it.

Dom. Aught like mine ?

Lur. In my own East . . . if you would stoop and help

My barbarous illustration ! It sounds ill ;
Yet there's no wrong at bottom : rather, praise.

Dom. Well ?

Lur. We have creatures there, which if you saw

The first time, you would doubtless marvel at
For their surpassing beauty, craft and strength.
And though it were a lively moment's shock
When you first found the purpose of forked tongues

That seem innocuous in their lambent play,
Yet, once made know such grace requires such guard,

Your reason soon would acquiesce, I think,
In wisdom which made all things for the best —
So, take them, good with ill, contentedly,
The prominent beauty with the latent sting.
I am glad to have seen you wondrous Flor-entines :

Yet . . .

Dom. I am here to listen.

Lur. My own East !

How nearer God we were ! He glows above
With scarce an intervention, presses close
And palpatingly, his soul o'er ours :
We feel him, nor by painful reason know !
The everlasting minute of creation

Is felt there ; now it is, as it was then ;
All changes at his instantaneous will,
Not by the operation of a law
Whose maker is elsewhere at other work.
His hand is still engaged upon his world —

Man's praise can forward it, man's prayer
suspend,

For is not God all-mighty ? To recast
The world, erase old things and make them new,
What costs it Him ? So, man breathes nobly
there.

And inasmuch as feeling, the East's gift,
Is quick and transient — comes, and lo, is gone —

While Northern thought is slow and durable,
Surely a mission was reserved for me,
Who, born with a perception of the power
And use of the North's thought for us of the East,

Should have remained, turned knowledge to account,

Giving thought's character and permanence
To the too transitory feeling there —

Writing God's message plain in mortal words.
Instead of which, I leave my fated field

For this where such a task is needed least,
Where all are born consummate in the art
I just perceive a chance of making mine, —
And then, deserting thus my early post,

I wonder that the men I come among Mistake me ! There, how all had understood,
Still brought fresh stuff for me to stamp and
keep,

Fresh instinct to translate them into law !

Me, who . . .

Dom. Who here the greater task achieve,
More needful even : who have brought fresh
stuff

For us to mould, interpret and prove right, —
New feeling fresh from God, which, could we
know

O' the instant, where had been our need of it ?
— Whose life re-teaches us what life should
be,

What faith is, loyalty and simpleness,
All, once revealed but taught us so long since
That, having mere tradition of the fact, —
Truth copied falteringly from copies faint,
The early traits all dropped away, — we said
On sight of faith like yours, "So looks not
faith

We understand, described and praised before."'
But still, the feat was dared ; and though at
first

It suffered from our haste, yet trace by trace
Old memories reappear, old truth returns,
Our slow thought does its work, and all's re-
known.

Oh noble Luria ! What you have decreed
I see not, but no animal revenge,
No brute-like punishment of bad by worse —
It cannot be, the gross and vulgar way
Traced for me by convention and mistake,
Has gained that calm approving eye and brow !
Spare Florence, after all ! Let Luria trust
To his own soul, he whom I trust with mine !

Lur. In time !

Dom. How, Luria ?

Lur. It is midnight now,
And they arrive from Florence with my fate.

Dom. I hear no step.

Lur. I feel one, as you say.

(Enter HUSAIN.)

Hus. The man returned from Florence !

Lur. As I knew.

Hus. He seeks thee.

Lur. And I only wait for him.

Aught else ?

Hus. A movement of the Lucchese troops Southward —

Lur. Toward Florence ? Have out instantly . . .

Ah, old use clings ! Puccio must care henceforth.

In — quick — 't is nearly midnight ! Bid him
come !

(Enter TIBURZIO, BRACCIO, and PUCCIO.)

Lur. Tiburzio ? — not at Pisa ?

Tib.

I return
From Florence : I serve Pisa, and must think
By such procedure I have served her best.
A people is but the attempt of many
To rise to the completer life of one ;
And those who live as models for the mass
Are singly of more value than they all.
Such man are you, and such a time is this,
That your sole fate concerns a nation more
Than much apparent welfare : that to prove
Your rectitude, and duly crown the same,
Imports us far beyond to-day's event.

A battle's loss or gain : man's mass remains, —

Keep but God's model safe, new men will rise

To take its mould, and other days to prove
 How great a good was Luria's glory. True —
 I might go try my fortune as you urged,
 And, joining Lucca, helped by your disgrace,
 Repair our harm — so were to-day's work done ;
 But where leave Luria for our sons to see ?
 No, I look farther. I have testified
 (Declaring my submission to your arms)
 Her full success to Florence, making clear
 Your probity, as none else could : I spoke,
 And out it shone !

Lur. Ah — until Braccio spoke !

Brac. Till Braccio told in just a word the whole —

His lapse to error, his return to knowledge :
 Which told . . . Nay, Luria, I should droop
 the head,
 I whom shame rests with ! Yet I dare look
 up,

Sure of your pardon now I sue for it,
 Knowing you wholly. Let the midnight end !
 'Tis morn approaches ! Still you answer
 not ?

Sunshine succeeds the shadow passed away ;
 Our faces, which phantasmal grew and false,
 Are all that felt it : they change round you
 turn

Truly themselves now in its vanishing.

Speak, Luria ! Here begins your true career :

Look up, advance ! All now is possible, Fact's grandeur, no false dreaming ! Dare and
 do !

And every prophecy shall be fulfilled

Save one — (nay, now your word must come at last)

— That you would punish Florence !

Hus. [Pointing to LURIA'S dead body.] That is done.

CHRISTMAS-EVE AND EASTER-DAY

FLORENCE, 1850

CHRISTMAS-EVE

I

OUT of the little chapel I burst
 Into the fresh night-air again.
 Five minutes full, I waited first
 In the doorway, to escape the rain
 That drove in gusts down the common's centre
 At the edge of which the chapel stands,
 Before I plucked up heart to enter.
 Heaven knows how many sorts of hands
 Reached past me, groping for the latch
 Of the inner door that hung on catch
 More obstinate the more they fumbled,
 Till, giving way at last with a scold
 Of the crazy hinge, in squeezed or tumbled
 One sheep more to the rest in fold,
 And left me irresolute, standing sentry
 In the sheepfold's lath-and-plaster entry,
 Six feet long by three feet wide,
 Partitioned off from the vast inside —
 I blocked up half of it at least.
 No remedy ; the rain kept driving.
 They eyed me much as some wild beast,
 That congregation, still arriving,
 Some of them by the main road, white
 A long way past me into the night,
 Skirting the common, then diverging ;
 Not a few suddenly emerging
 From the common's self through the palinggaps,
 — They house in the gravel-pits perhaps,
 Where the road stops short with its safeguard border
 Of lamps, as tired of such disorder ; —
 But the most turned in yet more abruptly
 From a certain squalid knot of alleys,
 Where the town's bad blood once slept cor-
 ruptly,

Which now the little chapel rallies
 And leads into day again, — its priestliness
 Lending itself to hide their beastliness
 So cleverly (thanks in part to the mason),
 And putting so cheery a whitewashed face on
 Those neophytes too much in lack of it,
 That, where you cross the common as I did,
 And meet the party thus presided,
 " Mount Zion " with Love-lane at the back of
 it,
 They front you as little disconcerted
 As, bound for the hills, her fate averted,
 And her wicked people made to mind him,
 Lot might have marched with Gomorrah behind
 him.

II

Well, from the road, the lanes or the common.
 In came the flock : the fat weary woman,
 Panting and bewildered, down-clapping
 Her umbrella with a mighty report,
 Grounded it by me, wry and flapping,
 A wreck of whalebones ; then, with a snort,
 Like a startled horse, at the interloper
 (Who humbly knew himself improper,
 But could not shrink up small enough)
 — Round to the door, and in, — the gruff
 Hinge's invariable scold
 Making my very blood run cold.
 Prompt in the wake of her, up-pattered
 On broken clogs, the many-tattered
 Little old-faced peaking sister-turned-mother
 Of the sickly babe she tried to smother
 Somehow up, with its spotted face,
 From the cold, on her breast, the one warm
 place ;
 She too must stop, wring the poor ends dry
 Of a draggled shawl, and add thereby
 Her tribute to the door-mat, sopping
 Already from my own clothes' dropping,

Which yet she seemed to grudge I should stand on:

Then, stooping down to take off her pattens,
She bore them defiantly, in each hand one,
Planted together before her breast
And its babe, as good as a lance in rest,
Close on her heels, the dingy satins
Of a female something past me flitted,
With lips as much too white, as a streak
Lay far too red on each hollow cheek;
And it seemed the very door-hinge pitied

All that was left of a woman once,
Holding at least its tongue for the nonce.
Then a tall yellow man, like the Penitent Thief,
With his jaw bound up in a handkerchief,
And eyelids screwed together tight,
Led himself in by some inner light.
And, except from him, from each that entered,
I got the same interrogation—

“What, you the alien, you have ventured
To take with us, the elect, your station?
A carer for none of it, a Gallio!”—
Thus, plain as print, I read the glance
At a common prey, in each countenance
As of huntsman giving his hounds the tallyho.
And, when the door’s cry drowned their wonder,

The draught, it always sent in shutting,
Made the flame of the single tallow candle
In the cracked square lantern I stood under,
Shoot its blue lip at me, rebutting
As it were, the luckless cause of scandal:

I verily fancied the zealous light
(In the chapel’s secret, too!) for spite
Would shudder itself clean off the wick,
With the airs of a Saint John’s Candlestick.
There was no standing it much longer.

“Good folks,” thought I, as resolve grew stronger,

“This way you perform the Grand-Inquisitor
When the weather sends you a chance visitor?
You are the men, and wisdom shall die with you,
And none of the old Seven Churches vie with you!

But still, despite the pretty perfection
To which you carry your trick of exclusiveness,
And, taking God’s word under wise protection,

Correct its tendency to diffusiveness,
And bid one reach it over hot ploughshares,—
Still, as I say, though you’ve found salvation,
If I should choose to cry, as now, ‘Shares!’—
See if the best of you bars me my ration!

I prefer, if you please, for my expounder
Of the laws of the feast, the feast’s own Founder;

Mine’s the same right with your poorest and sickliest,

Supposing I don the marriage vestiment:
So, shut your mouth and open your Testament,
And carve me my portion at your quickest!”
Accordingly, as a shoemaker’s lad
With wizened face in want of soap,
And wet apron wound round his waist like a rope,

(After stopping outside, for his cough was bad,

To get the fit over, poor gentle creature,
And so avoid disturbing the preacher)
—Passed in, I sent my elbow spikewise
At the shutting door, and entered likewise,
Received the hinge’s accustomed greeting,
And crossed the threshold’s magic pentacle,
And found myself in full conventicle,
—To wit, in Zion Chapel Meeting,
On the Christmas-Eve of ‘Forty-nine,
Which, calling its flock to their special clover,
Found all assembled and one sheep over,
Whose lot, as the weather pleased, was mine.

III

I very soon had enough of it.
The hot smell and the human noises,
And my neighbor’s coat, the greasy cuff of it,
Were a pebble-stone that a child’s hand poises,
Compared with the pig-of-lead-like pressure
Of the preaching man’s immense stupidity,
As he poured his doctrine forth, full measure,
To meet his audience’s avidity.
You needed not the wit of the Sibyl
To guess the cause of it all, in a twinkling:
No sooner our friend had got an inkling
Of treasure hid in the Holy Bible,
(Whene’er ’t was the thought first struck him,
How death, at unawares, might duck him
Deeper than the grave, and quench
The gin-shop’s light in hell’s grim drench)
Than he handled it so, in fine irreverence,
As to hug the book of books to pieces:
And, a patchwork of chapters and texts in severance,

Not improved by the private dog’s-ears and creases,
Having clothed his own soul with, he’d fain
see equipt yours,—

So tossed you again your Holy Scriptures,
And you picked them up, in a sense, no doubt:
Nay, had but a single face of my neighbors
Appeared to suspect that the preacher’s labors

Were help which the world could be saved without,

’T is odds but I might have borne in quiet
A qualm or two at my spiritual diet,
Or (who can tell?) perchance even mustered
Somewhat to urge in behalf of the sermon:
But the flock sat on, divinely flustered,
Sniffing, methought, its dew of Hermon
With such content in every snuffle,
As the devil inside us loves to ruffle.
My old fat woman purred with pleasure,
And thumb round thumb went twirling faster,
While she, to his periods keeping measure,
Maternally devoured the pastor.

The man with the handkerchief untied it.
Showed us a horrible wen inside it,
Gave his eyelids yet another screwing,
And rocked himself as the woman was doing.
The shoemaker’s lad, discreetly choking,
Kept down his cough. ’T was too provoking!
My gorge rose at the nonsense and stuff of it;
So, saying like Eve when she plucked the apple,
“I wanted a taste, and now there’s enough of it.”

I flung out of the little chapel.

IV

There was a lull in the rain, a lull
 In the wind too; the moon was risen,
 And would have shone out pure and full,
 But for the ramparted cloud-prison,
 Block on block built up in the West,
 For what purpose the wind knows best,
 Who changes his mind continually.
 And the empty other half of the sky
 Seemed in its silence as if it knew
 What, any moment, might look through
 A chance gap in that fortress massy: —
 Through its fissures you got hints
 Of the flying moon, by the shifting tints,
 Now, a dull lion-color, now, brassy
 Burning to yellow, and whitest yellow,
 Like furnace-smoke just ere flames bellow,
 All a-simmer with intense strain
 To let her through, — then blank again,
 At the hope of her appearance failing.
 Just by the chapel a break in the railing
 Shows a narrow path directly across;
 'T is ever dry walking there, on the moss —
 Besides, you go gently all the way up-hill.
 I stooped under and soon felt better;
 My head grew lighter, my limbs more supple,
 As I walked on, glad to have slipt the fetter.
 My mind was full of the scene I had left,
 That placid flock, that pastor vociferant,
 -- How this outside was pure and different!
 The sermon, now — what a mingled weft
 Of good and ill! Were either less,
 Its fellow had colored the whole distinctly;
 But alas for the excellent earnestness,
 And the truths, quite true if stated succinctly,
 But as surely false, in their quaint presentment,
 However to pastor and flock's contentment!
 Say rather, such truths looked false to your
 eyes,
 With his provings and parallels twisted and twined,
 Till how could you know them, grown double their size
 In the natural fog of the good man's mind,
 Like yonder spots of our roadside lamps,
 Haloed about with the common's damps?
 Truth remains true, the fault's in the prover;
 The zeal was good, and the aspiration;
 And yet, and yet, yet, fifty times over,
 Pharaoh received no demonstration,
 By his Baker's dream of Baskets Three,
 Of the doctrine of the Trinity, —
 Although, as our preacher thus embellished it,
 Apparently his hearers relished it
 With so unfeigned a gust — who knows if
 They did not prefer our friend to Joseph?
 But so it is everywhere, one way with all of
 them!
 These people have really felt, no doubt,
 A something, the motion they style the Call of
 them;
 And this is their method of bringing about,
 By a mechanism of words and tones,
 (So many texts in so many groans)
 A sort of reviving and reproducing,
 More or less perfectly, (who can tell?)
 The mood itself, which strengthens by using;

And how that happens, I understand well.
 A tune was born in my head last week,
 Out of the thump-thump and shriek-shriek
 Of the train, as I came by it, up from Manchester;
 And when, next week, I take it back again,
 My head will sing to the engine's clack again.
 While it only makes my neighbor's haunches
 stir,
 — Finding no dormant musical sprout
 In him, as in me, to be jolted out.
 'T is the taught already that profits by teaching;
 He gets no more from the railway's preaching
 Than, from this preacher who does the rail's office, I:
 Whom therefore the flock cast a jealous eye on,
 Still, why paint over their door "Mount Zion,"
 To which all flesh shall come, saith the prophecy?

V

But therefore be harsh on a single case?
 After how many modes, this Christmas-Eve,
 Does the self-same weary thing take place?
 The same endeavor to make you believe,
 And with much the same effect, no more:
 Each method abundantly convincing,
 As I say, to those convinced before,
 But scarce to be swallowed without wincing
 By the not-as-yet-convinced. For me,
 I have my own church equally:
 And in this church my faith sprang first!
 (I said, as I reached the rising ground,
 And the wind began again, with a burst
 Of rain in my face, and a glad rebound
 From the heart beneath, as if, God speeding me,
 I entered his church-door, nature leading me)
 — In youth I looked to these very skies,
 And probing their immensities,
 I found God there, his visible power;
 Yet felt in my heart, amid all its sense
 Of the power, an equal evidence
 That his love, there too, was the nobler dower.
 For the loving worm within its clod
 Were diviner than a loveless god
 Amid his worlds, I will dare to say.
 You know what I mean: God's all, man's
 naught:
 But also, God, whose pleasure brought
 Man into being, stands away
 As it were a handbreadth off, to give
 Room for the newly-made to live,
 And look at him from a place apart,
 And use his gifts of brain and heart,
 Given, indeed, but to keep forever.
 Who speaks of man, then, must not sever
 Man's very elements from man,
 Saying, "But all is God's" — whose plan
 Was to create man and then leave him
 Able, his own word saith, to grieve him,
 But able to glorify him too,
 As a mere machine could never do,
 That prayed or praised, all unaware
 Of its fitness for aught but praise and prayer.
 Made perfect as a thing of course.
 Man, therefore, stands on his own stock
 Of love and power as a pin-point rock:

And, looking to God who ordained divorce
 Of the rock from his boundless continent,
 Sees, in his power made evident,
 Only excess by a million-fold
 O'er the power God gave man in the mould.
 For, note: man's hand, first formed to carry
 A few pounds' weight, when taught to marry
 Its strength with an engine's, lifts a mountain,
 — Advancing in power by one degree;
 And why count steps through eternity?
 But love is the ever-springing fountain:
 Man may enlarge or narrow his bed
 For the water's play, but the water-head —
 How can he multiply or reduce it?
 As easy create it, as cause it to cease;
 He may profit by it, or abuse it,
 But 'tis not a thing to bear increase
 As power does: be love less or more
 In the heart of man, he keeps it shut
 Or opens it wide, as he pleases, but Love's sum remains what it was before.
 So, gazing up, in my youth, at love
 As seen through power, ever above
 All modes which make it manifest,
 My soul brought all to a single test —
 That he, the Eternal First and Last,
 Who, in his power, had so surpassed
 All man conceives of what is might, —
 Whose wisdom, too, showed infinite,
 — Would prove as infinitely good;
 Would never, (my soul understood,)
 With power to work all love desires,
 Bestow e'en less than man requires;
 That he who endlessly was teaching,
 Above my spirit's utmost reaching,
 What love can do in the leaf or stone,
 (So that to master this alone,
 This done in the stone or leaf for me,
 I must go on learning endlessly)
 Would never need that I, in turn,
 Should point him out defect unheeded,
 And show that God had yet to learn
 What the meanest human creature needed,
 — Not life, to wit, for a few short years,
 Tracking his way through doubts and fears,
 While the stupid earth on which I stay
 Suffers no change, but passive adds
 Its myriad years to myriads,
 Though I, he gave it to, decay,
 Seeing death come and choose about me,
 And my dearest ones depart without me.
 No: love which, on earth, amid all the shows
 of it,
 Has ever been seen the sole good of life in it,
 The love, ever growing there, spite of the strife
 in it,
 Shall arise, made perfect, from death's repose
 of it.
 And I shall behold thee, face to face,
 O God, and in thy light retrace
 How in all I loved here, still wast thou!
 Whom pressing to, then, as I fain would now,
 I shall find as able to satiate
 The love, thy gift, as my spirit's wonder
 Thou art able to quicken and sublimiate,
 With this sky of thine, that I now walk under
 And glory in thee for, as I gaze
 Thus, thus! Oh, let men keep their ways

Of seeking thee in a narrow shrine —
 Be this my way! And this is mine!

VI

For lo, what think you? suddenly
 The rain and the wind ceased, and the sky
 Received at once the full fruition
 Of the moon's consummate apparition.
 The black cloud-barricade was riven,
 Ruined beneath her feet, and driven
 Deep in the West; while, bare and breathless,
 North and South and East lay ready
 For a glorious thing that, dauntless, deathless,
 Sprang across them and stood steady.
 'T was a moon-rainbow, vast and perfect,
 From heaven to heaven extending, perfect
 As the mother-moon's self, full in face.
 It rose, distinctly at the base
 With its seven proper colors chorded,
 Which still, in the rising, were compressed.
 Until at last they coalesced,
 And supreme the spectral creature lorded
 In a triumph of whitest white, —
 Above which intervened the night.
 But above night too, like only the next,
 The second of a wondrous sequence,
 Reaching in rare and rarer frequency,
 Till the heaven of heavens were circumflexed,
 Another rainbow rose, a mightier,
 Fainter, flushier and flightier, —
 Rapture dying along its verge.
 Oh, whose foot shall I see emerge,
 Whose, from the straining topmost dark,
 On to the keystone of that arc?

VII

This sight was shown me, there and then, —
 Me, one out of a world of men,
 Singled forth, as the chance might hap
 To another if, in a thunderclap
 Where I heard noise and you saw flame,
 Some one man knew God called his name.
 For me, I think I said, "Appear!
 Good were it to be ever here.
 If thou wilt, let me build to thee
 Service-tabernacles three,
 Where, forever in thy presence,
 In ecstatic acquiescence,
 Far alike from thriftless learning
 And ignorance's undiscerning,
 I may worship and remain!"
 Thus at the show above me, gazing
 With upturned eyes, I felt my brain
 Glutted with the glory, blazing
 Throughout its whole mass, over and under,
 Until at length it burst asunder
 And out of it bodily there streamed,
 The too-much glory, as it seemed,
 Passing from out me to the ground,
 Then palely serpentine round
 Into the dark with mazy error.

VIII

All at once I looked up with terror.
 He was there.
 He himself with his human air,
 On the narrow pathway, just before.
 I saw the back of him, no more —

He had left the chapel, then, as I.
 I forgot all about the sky.
 No face : only the sight
 Of a sweepy garment, vast and white,
 With a hem that I could recognize.
 I felt terror, no surprise ;
 My mind filled with the cataract
 At one bound of the mighty fact.
 " I remember, he did say
 Doubtless that, to this world's end,
 Where two or three should meet and pray,
 He would be in the midst, their friend ;
 Certainly he was there with them ! "
 And my pulses leaped for joy
 Of the golden thought without alloy,
 That I saw his very vesture's hem.
 Then rushed the blood back, cold and clear,
 With a fresh enhancing shiver of fear ;
 And I hastened, cried out while I pressed
 To the salvation of the vest,
 " But not so, Lord ! It cannot be
 That thou, indeed, art leaving me —
 Me, that have despised thy friends !
 Did my heart make no amends ?
 Thou art the love of God — above
 His power, didst hear me place his love,
 And that was leaving the world for thee.
 Therefore thou must not turn from me
 As I had chosen the other part !
 Folly and pride o'ercame my heart.
 Our best is bad, nor bears thy test ;
 Still, it should be our very best.
 I thought it best that thou, the spirit,
 Be worshipped in spirit and in truth,
 And in beauty, as even we require it —
 Not in the forms burlesque, uncouth,
 I left but now, as scarcely fitted
 For thee : I knew not what I pitied.
 But, all I felt there, right or wrong,
 What is it to thee, who curest sinning ?
 Am I not weak as thou art strong ?
 I have looked to thee from the beginning,
 Straight up to thee through all the world
 Which, like an idle scroll, lay furled
 To nothingness on either side :
 And since the time thou wast descried,
 Spite of the weak heart, so have I
 Lived ever, and so fain would die,
 Living and dying, thee before !
 But if thou leavest me " —

IX

Less or more,

I suppose that I spoke thus.
 When, — have mercy, Lord, on us !
 The whole face turned upon me full.
 And I spread myself beneath it,
 As when the bleacher spreads, to seethe it
 In the cleansing sun, his wool, —
 Steeps in the flood of noontide whiteness
 Some defiled, discolored web —
 So lay I, saturate with brightness,
 And when the flood appeared to ebb,
 Lo, I was walking, light and swift,
 With my senses settling fast and steady,
 But my body caught up in the whirl and drift
 Of the vesture's amplitude, still eddying
 On, just before me, still to be followed,

As it carried me after with its motion :
 What shall I say ? — as a path were hollowed
 And a man went weltering through the ocean,
 Sucked along in the flying wake
 Of the luminous water-snake.
 Darkness and cold were cloven, as through
 I passed, upborne yet walking too.
 And I turned to myself at intervals, —
 " So he said, so it befalls.
 God who registers the cup
 Of mere cold water, for his sake
 To a disciple rendered up,
 Disdains not his own thirst to slake
 At the poorest love was ever offered :
 And because my heart I proffered,
 With true love trembling at the brim,
 He suffers me to follow him
 Forever, my own way, — dispensed
 From seeking to be influenced
 By all the less immediate ways
 That earth, in worships manifold,
 Adopts to reach, by prayer and praise,
 The garment's hem, which, lo, I hold ! "

X

And so we crossed the world and stopped.
 For where am I, in city or plain,
 Since I am 'ware of the world again ?
 And what is this that rises propped
 With pillars of prodigious girth ?
 Is it really on the earth,
 This miraculous Dome of God ?
 Has the angel's measuring-rod
 Which numbered cubits, gem from gem,
 'Twixt the gates of the New Jerusalem,
 Meted it out, — and what he meted,
 Have the sons of men completed ?
 — Binding, ever as he bade,
 Columns in the colonnade
 With arms wide open to embrace
 The entry of the human race
 To the breast of . . . what is it, yon building,
 Ablaze in front, all paint and gilding,
 With marble for brick, and stones of price
 For garniture of the edifice ?
 Now I see ; it is no dream ;
 It stands there and it does not seem :
 Forever, in pictures, thus it looks,
 And thus I have read of it in books
 Often in England, leagues away,
 And wondered how these fountains play,
 Growing up eternally
 Each to a musical water-tree,
 Whose blossoms drop, a glittering boon,
 Before my eyes, in the light of the moon,
 To the granite lavers underneath.
 Liar and dreamer in your teeth !
 I, the sinner that speak to you,
 Was in Rome this night, and stood, and knew
 Both this and more. For see, for see,
 The dark is rent, mine eye is free
 To pierce the crust of the outer wall,
 And I view inside, and all there, all,
 As the swarming hollow of a hive,
 The whole Basilica alive !
 Men in the chancel, body and nave,
 Men on the pillars' architrave,
 Men on the statues, men on the tombs

With popes and kings in their porphyry
wombs,

All famishing in expectation
Of the main altar's consummation.
For see, for see, the rapturous moment
Approaches, and earth's best endowment
Blends with heaven's; the taper-fires
Pant up, the winding brazen spires
Heave loftier yet the baldachin;
The incense-gasplings, long kept in,
Suspire in clouds; the organ blatant
Holds his breath and grovels latent,
As if God's hushing finger grazed him,
(Like Behemoth when he praised him)
At the silver bell's shrill tinkling,
Quick cold drops of terror sprinkling
On the sudden pavement strewed
With faces of the multitude.
Earth breaks up, time drops away,
In flows heaven, with its new day
Of endless life, when He who trod,
Very man and very God,
This earth in weakness, shame and pain,
Dying the death whose signs remain
Up yonder on the accursed tree, —
Shall come again, no more to be
Of captivity the thrall,
But the one God, All in all,
King of kings, Lord of lords,
As His servant John received the words,
"I died, and live forevermore!"

XI

Yet I was left outside the door.
"Why sit I here on the threshold-stone,
Left till He return, alone
Save for the garment's extreme fold
Abandoned still to bless my hold?"
My reason, to my doubt, replied,
As if a book were opened wide,
And at a certain page I traced
Every record undefaced,
Added by successive years, —
The harvestings of truth's stray ears
Singly gleaned, and in one sheaf
Bound together for belief.
Yes, I said — that he will go
And sit with these in turn, I know.
Their faith's heart beats, though her head swims
Too giddily to guide her limbs,
Disabled by their palsy-stroke
From propping mine. Though Rome's gross yoke
Drops off, no more to be endured,
Her teaching is not so obscured
By errors and perversities,
That no truth shines athwart the lies:
And he, whose eye detects a spark
Even where, to man's, the whole seems dark,
May well see flame where each beholder
Acknowledges the embers smoulder.
But I, a mere man, fear to quit
The clue God gave me as most fit
To guide my footsteps through life's maze,
Because himself discerns all ways
Open to reach him: I, a man
Able to mark where faith began

To swerve aside, till from its summit
Judgment drops her damning plummet,
Pronouncing such a fatal space
Departed from the founder's base:
He will not bid me enter too,
But rather sit, as now I do,
Awaiting his return outside.
— 'T was thus my reason straight replied
And joyously I turned, and pressed
The garment's skirt upon my breast,
Until, afresh its light suffusing me,
My heart cried — "What has been abusing
me

That I should wait here lonely and coldly,
Instead of rising, entering boldly,
Baring truth's face, and letting drift
Her veils of lies as they choose to shift?
Do these men praise him? I will raise
My voice up to their point of praise!
I see the error; but above
The scope of error, see the love. —
Oh, love of those first Christian days!
— Fanned so soon into a blaze,
From the spark preserved by the trampled sect,
That the antique sovereign Intellect
Which then sat ruling in the world,
Like a change in dreams, was hurled
From the throne he reigned upon:
You looked up and he was gone.
Gone, his glory of the pen!
— Love, with Greece and Rome in ken,
Bade her scribes abhor the trick
Of poetry and rhetoric,
And exult with hearts set free,
In blessed imbecility
Scrawled, perchance, on some torn sheet
Leaving Sallust incomplete.
Gone, his pride of sculptor, painter!
— Love, while able to acquaint her
While the thousand statues yet
Fresh from chisel, pictures wet
From brush, she saw on every side,
Chose rather with an infant's pride
To frame those portents which impart
Such unction to true Christian Art.
Gone, music too! The air was stirred
By happy wings: Terpander's bird
(That, when the cold came, fled away)
Would tarry not the wintry day, —
As more-enduring sculpture must,
Till filthy saints rebuked the gust
With which they chanced to get a sight
Of some dear naked Aphrodite
They glanced a thought above the toes of,
By breaking zealously her nose off.
Love, surely, from that music's lingering,
Might have filched her organ-fingering,
Nor chosen rather to set prayers
To hog-grunts, praises to horse-neighings.
Love was the startling thing, the new:
Love was the all-sufficient too;
And seeing that, you see the rest:
As a babe can find its mother's breast
As well in darkness as in light,
Love shut our eyes, and all seemed right.
True, the world's eyes are open now:
— Less need for me to disallow
Some few that keep Love's zone unbuckled,

Peevish as ever to be suckled,
 Lulled by the same old baby-prattle
 With intermixture of the rattle,
 When she would have them creep, stand steady
 Upon their feet, or walk already,
 Not to speak of trying to climb.
 I will be wise another time,
 And not desire a wall between us,
 When next I see a church-roof cover
 So many species of one genus,
 All with foreheads bearing lover
 Written above the earnest eyes of them ;
 All with breasts that beat for beauty,
 Whether sublimed, to the surprise of them,
 In noble daring, steadfast duty,
 The heroic in passion, or in action, —
 Or, lowered for sense's satisfaction,
 To the mere outside of human creatures,
 Mere perfect form and faultless features.
 What? with all Rome here, whence to levy
 Such contributions to their appetite,
 With women and men in a gorgeous bevy,
 They take, as it were, a padlock, clap it tight
 On their southern eyes, restrained from feeding
 On the glories of their ancient reading,
 On the beauties of their modern singing,
 On the wonders of the builder's bringing,
 On the majesties of Art around them, —
 And, all these loves, late struggling incessant,
 When faith has at last united and bound them,
 They offer up to God for a present?
 Why, I will, on the whole, be rather proud of
 it, —
 And, only taking the act in reference
 To the other recipients who might have allowed
 it,
 I will rejoice that God had the preference."

XII

So I summed up my new resolves:
 Too much love there can never be.
 And where the intellect devolves
 Its function on love exclusively,
 I, a man who possesses both,
 Will accept the provision, nothing loth,
 — Will feast my love, then depart elsewhere,
 That my intellect may find its share.
 And ponder, O soul, the while thou departest,
 And see thou applaud the great heart of the artist,
 Who, examining the capabilities
 Of the block of marble he has to fashion
 Into a type of thought or passion, —
 Not always, using obvious facilities,
 Shapes it, as any artist can,
 Into a perfect symmetrical man,
 Complete from head to foot of the life-size,
 Such as old Adam stood in his wife's eyes, —
 But, now and then, bravely aspires to consum-mate
 A Colossus by no means so easy to come at,
 And uses the whole of his block for the bust,
 Leaving the mind of the public to finish it,
 Since cut it ruefully short he must:
 On the face alone he expends his devotion,
 He rather would war than resolve to diminish
 it,

— Saying, "Applaud me for this grand notion
 Of what a face may be! As for completing it
 In breast and body and limbs, do that, you!"
 All hail! I fancy how, happily meeting it,
 A trunk and legs would perfect the statue,
 Could man carve so as to answer volition,
 And how much nobler than petty cavils,
 Were a hope to find, in my spirit-travels,
 Some artist of another ambition,
 Who having a block to carve, no bigger,
 Has spent his power on the opposite quest,
 And believed to begin at the feet was best —
 For so may I see, ere I die, the whole figure!

XIII

No sooner said than out in the night!
 My heart beat lighter and more light:
 And still, as before, I was walking swift,
 With my senses settling fast and steadying,
 But my body caught up in the whirl and drift
 Of the vesture's amplitude, still eddying
 On, just before me, still to be followed,
 As it carried me after with its motion:
 What shall I say? — as a path were hollowed,
 And a man went weltering through the ocean,
 Sucked along in the flying wake
 Of the luminous water-snake.

XIV

Alone! I am left alone once more —
 (Save for the garment's extreme fold
 Abandoned still to bless my hold)
 Alone, beside the entrance-door
 Of a sort of temple — perhaps a college,
 — Like nothing I ever saw before
 At home in England, to my knowledge.
 The tall old quaint irregular town!
 It may be . . . though which, I can't affirm
 . . . any

Of the famous middle-age towns of Germany;
 And this flight of stairs where I sit down,
 Is it Halle, Weimar, Cassel, Frankfurt,
 Or Göttingen, I have to thank for 't?
 It may be Göttingen, — most likely.
 Through the open door I catch obliquely
 Glimpses of a lecture-hall;
 And not a bad assembly neither.
 Ranged decent and symmetrical
 On benches, waiting what 's to see there;
 Which, holding still by the vesture's hem,
 I also resolve to see with them,
 Cautious this time how I suffer to slip
 The chance of joining in fellowship
 With any that call themselves his friends;
 As these folks do, I have a notion.
 But hush — a buzzing and emotion!
 All settle themselves, the while ascends
 By the creaking rail to the lecture-desk,
 Step by step, deliberate
 Because of his cranium's over-freight,
 Three parts sublime to one grotesque,
 If I have proved an accurate guesser,
 The hawk-nosed, high-cherkboned Professor.
 I felt at once as if there ran
 A shoot of love from my heart to the man —
 That sallow virgin-minded studious
 Martyr to mild enthusiasm,
 As he uttered a kind of cough-preludious

That woke my sympathetic spasm,
 (Beside some spitting that made me sorry)
 And stood, surveying his auditory
 With a wan pure look, wellnigh celestial, —
 Those blue eyes had survived so much !
 While, under the foot they could not smutch,
 Lay all the fleshly and the bestial.
 Over he bowed, and arranged his notes,
 Till the auditory's clearing of throats
 Was done with, died into a silence ;
 And, when each glance was upward sent,
 Each bearded mouth composed intent,
 And a pin might be heard drop half a mile
 hence. —

He pushed back higher his spectacles,
 Let the eyes stream out like lamps from cells,
 And giving his head of hair — a hake
 Of undressed tow, for color and quantity —
 One rapid and impatient shake,
 (As our own young England adjusts a jaunty tie
 When about to impart, on mature digestion,
 Some thrilling view of the surplice-question)
 — The Professor's grave voice, sweet though hoarse,
 Broke into his Christmas-Eve discourse.

XV

And he began it by observing
 How reason dictated that men
 Should rectify the natural swerving,
 By a reversion, now and then,
 To the well-heads of knowledge, few
 And far away, whence rolling grew
 The life-stream wide whereat we drink,
 Commingled, as we needs must think,
 With waters alien to the source ;
 To do which, aimed this eve's discourse ;
 Since, where could be a fitter time
 For tracing backward to its prime,
 This Christianity, this lake,
 This reservoir, whereat we slake,
 From one or other bank, our thirst ?
 So, he proposed inquiring first
 Into the various sources whence
 This Myth of Christ is derivable ;
 Demanding from the evidence,
 (Since plainly no such life was livable)
 How these phenomena should class ?
 Whether 't were best opine Christ was,
 Or never was at all, or whether
 He was and was not, both together —
 It matters little for the name,
 So the idea be left the same.
 Only, for practical purpose' sake,
 'T was obviously as well to take
 The popular story, — understanding
 How the ineptitude of the time,
 And the penman's prejudice, expanding
 Fact into fable fit for the clime,
 Had, by slow and sure degrees, translated it
 Into this myth, this Individuum, —
 Which when reason had strained and abated it
 Of foreign matter, left, for residuum,
 A Man ! — a right true man, however,
 Whose work was worthy a man's endeavor :
 Work, that gave warrant almost sufficient
 To his disciples, for rather believing
 He was just omnipotent and omniscient,

As it gives to us, for as frankly receiving
 His word, their tradition, — which, though it meant

Something entirely different
 From all that those who only heard it,
 In their simplicity thought and averred it,
 Had yet a meaning quite as respectable :
 For, among other doctrines delectable,
 Was he not surely the first to insist on
 The natural sovereignty of our race ? —
 Here the lecturer came to a pausing-place.
 And while his cough, like a droughty piston,
 Tried to dislodge the husk that grew to him,
 I seized the occasion of bidding adieu to him,
 The vesture still within my hand.

XVI

I could interpret its command.
 This time he would not bid me enter
 The exhausted air-bell of the Critic.
 Truth's atmosphere may grow mephitic
 When Papist struggles with Dissenter, Impregnating its pristine clarity,
 — One, by his daily fare's vulgarity,
 Its gust of broken meat and garlic ;
 — One, by his soul's too-much presuming
 To turn the frankincense's fuming
 And vapors of the candle starlike
 Into the cloud her wings she buoys on.
 Each, that thus sets the pure air seething,
 May poison it for healthy breathing —
 But the Critic leaves no air to poison ;
 Pumps out with ruthless ingenuity
 Atom by atom, and leaves you — vacuity.
 Thus much of Christ does he reject ?
 And what retain ? His intellect ?
 What is it I must reverence duly ?
 Poor intellect for worship, truly,
 Which tells me simply what was told
 (If mere morality, bereft
 Of the God in Christ, be all that's left)
 Elsewhere by voices manifold ;
 With this advantage, that the stater
 Made nowise the important stumble
 Of adding, he, the sage and humble,
 Was also one with the Creator.
 You urge Christ's followers' simplicity :
 But how does shifting blame evade it ?
 Have wisdom's words no more felicity ?
 The stumbling-block, his speech — who laid it ?
 How comes it that for one found able
 To sift the truth of it from fable,
 Millions believe it to the letter ?
 Christ's goodness, then — does that fare better ?
 Strange goodness, which upon the score
 Of being goodness, the mere due
 Of man to fellow-man, much more
 To God — should take another view
 Of its possessor's privilege.
 And bid him rule his race ! You pledge
 Your fealty to such rule ? What, all —
 From heavenly John and Attic Paul,
 And that brave weather-battered Peter,
 Whose stout faith only stood completer
 For buffets, sinning to be pardoned,
 As, more his hands hauled nets, they hardened, —
 All, down to you, the man of men,

Professing here at Göttingen,
 Compose Christ's flock ! They, you and I,
 Are sheep of a good man ! And why ?
 The goodness, — how did he acquire it ?
 Was it self-gained, did God inspire it ?
 Choose which ; then tell me, on what ground
 Should its possessor dare propound
 His claim to rise o'er us an inch ?
 Were goodness all some man's invention,
 Who arbitrarily made mention
 What we should follow, and whence flinch, —
 What qualities might take the style
 Of right and wrong, — and had such guessing
 Met with as general acquiescing
 As graced the alphabet erewhile,
 When A got leave an Ox to be,
 No Camel (quoth the Jews) like G, —
 For thus inventing thing and title
 Worship were that man's fit requital.
 But if the common conscience must
 Be ultimately judge, adjust
 Its apt name to each quality
 Already known, — I would decree
 Worship for such mere demonstration
 And simple work of nomenclature,
 Only the day I praised, not nature,
 But Harvey, for the circulation.
 I would praise such a Christ, with pride
 And joy, that he, as none beside,
 Had taught us how to keep the mind
 God gave him, as God gave his kind,
 Freer than they from fleshly taint :
 I would call such a Christ our Saint,
 As I declare our Poet, him
 Whose insight makes all others dim :
 A thousand poets pried at life,
 And only one amid the strife
 Rose to be Shakespeare : each shall take
 His crown, I'd say, for the world's sake —
 Though some objected — " Had we seen
 The heart and head of each, what screen
 Was broken there to give them light,
 While in ourselves it shuts the sight,
 We should no more admire, perchance,
 That these found truth out at a glance,
 Than marvel how the bat discerns
 Some pitch-dark cavern's fifty turns,
 Led by a finer tact, a gift
 He boasts, which other birds must shift
 Without, and grope as best they can." —
 No, freely I would praise the man, —
 Nor one whit more, if he contended
 That gift of his from God descended.
 Ah friend, what gift of man's does not ?
 No nearer something, by a jot,
 Rise an infinity of nothings
 Than one : take Euclid for your teacher :
 Distinguish kinds : do crownings, clothings,
 Make that creator which was creature ?
 Multiply gifts upon man's head,
 And what, when all's done, shall be said
 But — the more gifted he, I ween !
 That one's made Christ, this other, Pilate,
 And this might be all that has been, —
 So what is there to frown or smile at ?
 What is left for us, save, in growth
 Of soul, to rise up, far past both,
 From the gift looking to the giver,

And from the cistern to the river,
 And from the finite to infinity,
 And from man's dust to God's divinity ?

XVII

Take all in a word : the truth in God's breast
 Lies trace for trace upon ours impressed :
 Though he is so bright and we so dim,
 We are made in his image to witness him :
 And were no eye in us to tell,
 Instructed by no inner sense,
 The light of heaven from the dark of hell,
 That light would want its evidence, —
 Though justice, good and truth were still Divine, if, by some demon's will,
 Hatred and wrong had been proclaimed
 Law through the worlds, and right misnamed.
 No mere exposition of morality
 Made or in part or in totality,
 Should win you to give it worship, therefore :
 And, if no better proof you will care for,
 — Whom do you count the worst man upon
 earth ?
 Be sure, he knows, in his conscience, more
 Of what right is, than arrives at birth
 In the best man's acts that we bow before :
 This last knows better — true, but my fact is,
 'Tis one thing to know, and another to practice.
 And thence I conclude that the real God-function

Is to furnish a motive and injunction
 For practising what we know already.
 And such an injunction and such a motive
 As the God in Christ, do you waive, and

"heady,
 High-minded," hang your tablet-votive
 Outside the fane on a finger-post ?
 Morality to the uttermost,
 Supreme in Christ as we all confess,
 Why need we prove would avail no jot
 To make him God, if God he were not ?
 What is the point where himself lays stress ?
 Does the precept run " Believe in good,
 In justice, truth, now understood
 For the first time " ? — or, " Believe in me,
 Who lived and died, yet essentially Am Lord of Life " ? Whoever can take
 The same to his heart and for mere love's sake
 Conceive of the love, — that man obtains
 A new truth ; no conviction gains
 Of an old one only, made intense
 By a fresh appeal to his faded sense.

XVIII

Can it be that he stays inside ?
 Is the vesture left me to commune with ?
 Could my soul find aught to sing in tune with Even at this lecture, if she tried ?
 Oh, let me at lowest sympathize
 With the lurking drop of blood that lies
 In the desiccated brain's white roots
 Without throb for Christ's attributes,
 As the lecturer makes his special boast !
 If love's dead there, it has left a ghost.
 Admire we, how from heart to brain
 (Though to say so strike the doctors dumb)
 One instinct rises and falls again,
 Restoring the equilibrium.

And how when the Critic had done his best,
 And the pearl of price, at reason's test,
 Lay dust and ashes levigable
 On the Professor's lecture-table, —
 When we looked for the inference and monition
 That our faith, reduced to such condition,
 Be swept forthwith to its natural dust-hole, —
 He bids us, when we least expect it,
 Take back our faith, — if it be not just whole,
 Yet a pearl indeed, as his tests affect it,
 Which fact pays damage done rewardingly,
 So, prize we our dust and ashes accordingly !
 "Go home and venerate the myth
 I thus have experimented with —
 This man, continue to adore him
 Rather than all who went before him,
 And all who ever followed after !" —
 Surely for this I may praise you, my brother !
 Will you take the praise in tears or laughter ?
 That 's one point gained : can I compass another ?
 Unlearned love was safe from spurning —
 Can't we respect your loveless learning ?
 Let us at least give learning honor !
 What laurels had we showered upon her,
 Girding her loins up to perturb
 Our theory of the Middle Verb ;
 Or Turk-like brandishing a scimitar
 O'er anapaests in comic-trimeter ;
 Or curing the halt and maimed " Iketides,"
 While we lounged on at our indebted ease :
 Instead of which, a tricky demon
 Sets her at Titus or Philemon !
 When ignorance wags his ears of leather
 And hates God's word, 't is altogether ;
 Nor leaves he his congenial thistles
 To go and browse on Paul's Epistles.
 — And you, the audience, who might ravage
 The world wide, enviably savage,
 Nor heed the cry of the retriever,
 More than Herr Heine (before his fever), —
 I do not tell a lie so arrant
 As say my passion's wings are furled up,
 And, without plainest heavenly warrant,
 I were ready and glad to give the world up —
 But still, when you rub brow meticulous,
 And ponder the profit of turning holy
 If not for God's, for your own sake solely,
 — God forbid I should find you ridiculous !
 Deduce from this lecture all that eases you,
 Nay, call yourselves, if the calling pleases you,
 "Christians," — abhor the deist's pravity, —
 Go on, you shall no more move my gravity
 Than, when I see boys ride a-cockhorse,
 I find it in my heart to embarrass them
 By hinting that their stick 's a mock horse,
 And they really carry what they say carries
 them.

XIX

So sat I talking with my mind.
 I did not long to leave the door
 And find a new church, as before,
 But rather was quiet and inclined
 To prolong and enjoy the gentle resting
 From further tracking and trying and testing.
 "This tolerance is a genial mood !"
 (Said I, and a little pause ensued.)
 "One trims the bark 'twixt shoal and shelf,

And sees, each side, the good effects of it,
 A value for religion's self,
 A carelessness about the sects of it.
 Let me enjoy my own conviction,
 Not watch my neighbor's faith with fretfulness,
 Still spying there some dereliction
 Of truth, perversity, forgetfulness !
 Better a mild indifferentism,
 Teaching that both our faiths (though duller
 His shine through a dull spirit's prism)
 Originally had one color !
 Better pursue a pilgrimage
 Through ancient and through modern times
 To many peoples, various climes,
 Where I may see saint, savage, sage
 Fuse their respective creeds in one
 Before the general Father's throne !"

XX

— 'T was the horrible storm began afresh !
 The black night caught me in his mesh,
 Whirled me up, and flung me prone.
 I was left on the college-step alone.
 I looked, and far there, ever fleeting
 Far, far away, the receding gesture,
 And looming of the lessening vesture ! —
 Swept forward from my stupid hand,
 While I watched my foolish heart expand
 In the lazy glow of benevolence,
 O'er the various modes of man's belief.
 I sprang up with fear's vehemence.
 Needs must there be one way, our chief
 Best way of worship : let me strive
 To find it, and when found, contrive
 My fellows also take their share !
 This constitutes my earthly care :
 God's is above it and distinct,
 For I, a man, with men am linked
 And not a brute with brutes ; no gain
 That I experience, must remain
 Unshared : but should my best endeavor
 To share it, fail — subsisteth ever
 God's care above, and I exult
 That God, by God's own ways occult,
 May — doth, I will believe — bring back
 All wanderers to a single track.
 Meantime, I can but testify
 God's care for me — no more, can I —
 It is but for myself I know ;
 The world rolls witnessing around me
 Only to leave me as it found me ;
 Men cry there, but my ear is slow :
 Their races flourish or decay
 — What boots it ; while yon lucid way
 Loaded with stars divides the vault ?
 But soon my soul repairs its fault
 When, sharpening sense's hebetude,
 She turns on my own life ! So viewed,
 No mere mote's-breadth but teems immense
 With witnessings of providence :
 And woe to me if when I look
 Upon that record, the sole book
 Unsealed to me, I take no heed
 Of any warning that I read !
 Have I been sure, this Christmas-Eve,
 God's own hand did the rainbow weave,
 Whereby the truth from heaven slid
 Into my soul ? — I cannot bid

The world admit he stooped to heal
 My soul, as if in a thunder-peal
 Where one heard noise, and one saw flame,
 I only knew he named my name :
 But what is the world to me, for sorrow
 Or joy in its censure, when to-morrow
 It drops the remark, with just-turned head,
 Then, on again, "That man is dead" ?
 Yes, but for me — my name called, — drawn
 As a conscript's lot from the lap's black yawn,
 He has dipt into on a battle-dawn :
 Bid out of life by a nod, a glance, —
 Stumbling, mute-mazed, at nature's chance, —
 With a rapid finger circled round,
 Fixed to the first poor inch of ground
 To fight from, where his foot was found ;
 Whose ear but a minute since lay free
 To the wide camp's buzz and gossipry —
 Summoned, a solitary man,
 To end his life where his life began,
 From the safe glad rear, to the dreadful van !
 Soul of mine, hadst thou caught and held
 By the hem of the vesture ! —

XXI

And I caught
 At the flying robe, and unrepelled
 Was lapped again in its folds full-fraight
 With warmth and wonder and delight,
 God's mercy being infinite.
 For scarce had the words escaped my tongue,
 When, at a passionate bound, I sprung
 Out of the wondering world of rain,
 Into the little chapel again.

XXII

How else was I found there, bolt upright
 On my bench, as if I had never left it ?
 — Never flung out on the common at night,
 Nor met the storm and wedge-like cleft it,
 Seen the raree-show of Peter's successor,
 Or the laboratory of the Professor !
 For the Vision, that was true, I wist,
 True as that heaven and earth exist.
 There sat my friend, the yellow and tall,
 With his neck and its wen in the selfsame place ;
 Yet my nearest neighbor's cheek showed gall.
 She had slid away a contemptuous space :
 And the old fat woman, late so placable,
 Eyed me with symptoms, hardly mistakable,
 Of her milk of kindness turning rancid.
 In short, a spectator might have fancied
 That I had nodded, betrayed by slumber,
 Yet kept my seat, a warning ghastly,
 Through the heads of the sermon, nine in number,
 And woke up now at the tenth and lastly.
 But again, could such disgrace have happened ?
 Each friend at my elbow had surely nudged it ;
 And, as for the sermon, where did my nap end ?
 Unless I heard it, could I have judged it ?
 Could I report as I do at the close,
 First, the preacher speaks through his nose :
 Second, his gesture is too emphatic :
 Thirdly, to waive what 's pedagogic,
 The subject-matter itself lacks logic :
 Fourthly, the English is ungrammatic.
 Great news ! the preacher is found no Pascal,

Whom, if I pleased, I might to the task call
 Of making square to a finite eye
 The circle of infinity,
 And find so all-but-just-succeeding !
 Great news ! the sermon proves no reading
 Where bee-like in the flowers I bury me,
 Like Taylor's, the immortal Jeremy !
 And now that I know the very worst of him,
 What was it I thought to obtain at first of him ?
 Ha ! Is God mocked, as he asks ?
 Shall I take on me to change his tasks,
 And dare, dispatched to a river-head
 For a simple draught of the element,
 Neglect the thing for which he sent,
 And return with another thing instead ? —
 Saying, "Because the water found
 Welling up from underground,
 Is mingled with the taints of earth,
 While thou, I know, dost laugh at dearth,
 And couldst, at wink or word, convulse
 The world with the leap of a river-pulse, —
 Therefore I turned from the oozeings muddy,
 And bring thee a chalice I found, instead :
 See the brave veins in the breccia ruddy !
 One would suppose that the marble bled,
 What matters the water ? A hope I have nursed :

The waterless cup will quench my thirst."
 — Better have knelt at the poorest stream
 That trickles in pain from the straitest rift !
 For the less or the more is all God's gift,
 Who blocks up or breaks wide the granite-seam.
 And here, is there water or not, to drink ?
 I then, in ignorance and weakness,
 Taking God's help, have attained to think
 My heart does best to receive in meekness
 That mode of worship, as most to his mind,
 Where earthly aids being cast behind,
 His All in All appears serene
 With the thinnest human veil between,
 Letting the mystic lamps, the seven,
 The many motions of his spirit,
 Pass, as they list, to earth from heaven.
 For the preacher's merit or demerit,
 It were to be wished the flaws were fewer
 In the earthen vessel, holding treasure
 Which lies as safe in a golden ewer ;
 But the main thing is, does it hold good measure ?

Heaven soon sets right all other matters ! —
 Ask, else, these ruins of humanity,
 This flesh worn out to rags and tatters,
 This soul at struggle with insanity,
 Who thence take comfort — can I doubt ? —
 Which an empire gained, were a loss without.
 May it be mine ! And let us hope
 That no worse blessing befall the Pope,
 Turned sick at last of to-day's buffoonery,
 Of posturings and petticoatings,
 Beside his Bourbon bully's gloatings
 In the bloody orgies of drunk poltroonery !
 Nor may the Professor forego its peace
 At Göttingen presently, when, in the dusk
 Of his life, if his cough, as I fear, should increase,
 Prophesied of by that horrible husk —
 When thicker and thicker the darkness fills
 The world through his misty spectacles,

And he gropes for something more substantial
Than a fable, myth or personification, —
May Christ do for him what no mere man shall,
And stand confessed as the God of salvation!
Meantime, in the still recurring fear
Lest myself, at unawares, be found,
While attacking the choice of my neighbors
round,

With none of my own made — I choose here!
The giving out of the hymn reclaims me;
I have done: and if any blames me,
Thinking that merely to touch in brevity
The topics I dwell on, were unlawful, —
Or worse, that I trench, with undue levity,
On the bounds of the holy and the awful, —
I praise the heart, and pity the head of him,
And refer myself to THEE, instead of him,
Who head and heart alike discernest,
Looking below light speech we utter,
When frothy spume and frequent sputter
Prove that the soul's depths boil in earnest!
May truth shine out, stand ever before us!
I put up pencil and join chorus
To Hepzibah Tune, without further apology,
The last five verses of the third section
Of the seventeenth hymn of Whitefield's Col- lection,
To conclude with the doxology.

EASTER-DAY

I

How very hard it is to be
A Christian! Hard for you and me,
— Not the mere task of making real
That duty up to its ideal,
Effecting thus, complete and whole,
A purpose of the human soul —
For that is always hard to do;
But hard, I mean, for me and you
To realize it, more or less,
With even the moderate success
Which commonly repays our strife
To carry out the aims of life.
“This aim is greater,” you will say,
“And so more arduous every way.”
— But the importance of their fruits
Still proves to man, in all pursuits,
Proportional encouragement.
“Then, what if it be God's intent
That labor to this one result
Should seem unduly difficult?”
Ah, that's a question in the dark —
And the sole thing that I remark
Upon the difficulty, this:
We do not see it where it is,
At the beginning of the race:
As we proceed, it shifts its place,
And where we looked for crowns to fall,
We find the tug's to come, — that's all.

II

At first you say, “The whole, or chief
Of difficulties, is belief.
Could I believe once thoroughly,
The rest were simple. What? Am I
An idiot, do you think, — a beast?

Prove to me, only that the least
Command of God is God's indeed,
And what injunction shall I need
To pay obedience? Death so nigh,
When time must end, eternity
Begin, — and cannot I compute,
Weigh loss and gain together, suit
My actions to the balance drawn,
And give my body to be sawn
Asunder, hacked in pieces, tied
To horses, stoned, burned, crucified,
Like any martyr of the list?
How gladly! — if I make acquit,
Through the brief minute's fierce annoy,
Of God's eternity of joy.”

III

— And certainly you name the point
Whereon all turns: for could you joint
This flexile finite life once tight
Into the fixed and infinite,
You, safe inside, would spurn what's out,
With carelessness enough, no doubt —
Would spurn mere life: but when time brings
To their next stage your reasonings,
Your eyes, late wide, begin to wink
Nor see the path so well, I think.

IV

You say, “Faith may be, one agrees,
A touchstone for God's purposes,
Even as ourselves conceive of them.
Could he acquit us or condemn
For holding what no hand can loose,
Rejecting when we can't but choose?
As well award the victor's wreath
To whosoever should take breath
Duly each minute while he lived —
Grant heaven, because a man contrived
To see its sunlight every day.
He walked forth on the public way.
You must mix some uncertainty
With faith, if you would have faith be.
Why, what but faith, do we abhor
And idolize each other for —
Faith in our evil or our good,
Which is or is not understood
Aright by those we love or those
We hate, thence called our friends or foes?
Your mistress saw your spirit's grace,
When, turning from the ugly face,
I found belief in it too hard;
And she and I have our reward,
— Yet here a doubt peeps: well for us
Weak beings, to go using thus
A touchstone for our little ends,
Trying with faith the foes and friends;
— But God, bethink you! I would fain Conceive of the Creator's reign
As based upon exacter laws
Than creatures build by with applause.
In all God's acts — (as Plato cries
He doth) — he should geometrize.
Whence, I desiderate” . . .

V

I see!
You would grow as a natural tree,

Stand as a rock, soar up like fire.
 The world 's so perfect and entire,
 Quite above faith, so right and fit !
 Go there, walk up and down in it !
 No. The creation travails, groans —
 Contrive your music from its moans,
 Without or let or hindrance, friend !
 That 's an old story, and its end
 As old — you come back (be sincere)
 With every question you put here (Here where there once was, and is still,
 We think, a living oracle,
 Whose answers you stand carping at)
 This time flung back unanswered flat, —
 Beside, perhaps, as many more
 As those that drove you out before,
 Now added, where was little need.
 Questions impossible, indeed,
 To us who sat still, all and each
 Persuaded that our earth had speech,
 Of God's, writ down, no matter if
 In cursive type or hieroglyph, —
 Which one fact freed us from the yoke
 Of guessing why He never spoke.
 You come back in no better plight
 Than when you left us, — am I right ?

VI

So, the old process, I conclude,
 Goes on, the reasoning 's pursued
 Further. You own, " 'Tis well averred,
 A scientific faith 's absurd,
 — Frustrates the very end 't was meant
 To serve. So, I would rest content
 With a mere probability,
 But, probable ; the chance must lie
 Clear on one side, — lie all in rough,
 So long as there be just enough
 To pin my faith to, though it hap
 Only at points : from gap to gap
 One hangs up a huge curtain so,
 Grandly, nor seeks to have it go
 Foldless and flat along the wall.
 What care I if some interval
 Of life less plainly may depend
 On God ? I 'd hang there to the end ;
 And thus I should not find it hard
 To be a Christian and debarred
 From trailing on the earth, till furled
 Away by death. — Renounce the world !
 Were that a mighty hardship ? Plan
 A pleasant life, and straight some man
 Beside you, with, if he thought fit,
 Abundant means to compass it,
 Shall turn deliberate aside
 To try and live as, if you tried
 You clearly might, yet most despise.
 One friend of mine wears out his eyes,
 Slighting the stupid joys of sense,
 In patient hope that, ten years hence,
 ' Somewhat completer,' he may say,
 ' My list of coleoptera !'
 While just the other who most laughs
 At him, above all epitaphs
 Aspires to have his tomb describe
 Himself as sole among the tribe
 Of snuffbox-fanciers, who possessed
 A Grignon with the Regent's crest.

So that, subduing, as you want,
 Whatever stands predominant
 Among my earthly appetites
 For tastes and smells and sounds and sights,
 I shall be doing that alone.
 To gain a palm-branch and a throne,
 Which fifty people undertake
 To do, and gladly, for the sake
 Of giving a Semitic guess,
 Or playing pawns at blindfold chess."

VII

Good : and the next thing is, — look round
 For evidence enough ! 'Tis found,
 No doubt : as is your sort of mind,
 So is your sort of search : you 'll find
 What you desire, and that 's to be
 A Christian. What says history ?
 How comforting a point it were
 To find some mummy-scrap declare
 There lived a Moses ! Better still,
 Prove Jonah's whale translatable
 Into some quicksand of the seas,
 Isle, cavern, rock, or what you please,
 That faith might flap her wings and crow
 From such an eminence ! Or, no —
 The human heart 's best ; you prefer
 Making that prove the minister
 To truth ; you probe its wants and needs.
 And hopes and fears, then try what creeds
 Meet these most aptly, — resolute
 That faith plucks such substantial fruit
 Wherever these two correspond,
 She little needs to look beyond
 And puzzle out who Orpheus was,
 Or Dionysius Zagrias.
 You 'll find sufficient, as I say,
 To satisfy you either way ;
 You wanted to believe ; your pains
 Are crowned — you do : and what remains ?
 " Renounce the world ! " — Ah, were it done
 By merely cutting one by one
 Your limbs off, with your wise head last,
 How easy were it ! — how soon past,
 If once in the believing mood !
 " Such is man's usual gratitude,
 Such thanks to God do we return,
 For not exacting that we spurn
 A single gift of life, forego
 One real gain, — only taste them so
 With gravity and temperance,
 That those mild virtues may enhance
 Such pleasures, rather than abstract —
 Last spice of which, will be the fact
 Of love discerned in every gift ;
 While, when the scene of life shall shift,
 And the gay heart be taught to ache,
 As sorrows and privations take
 The place of joy, — the thing that seems
 Mere misery, under human schemes,
 Becomes, regarded by the light
 Of love, as very near or quite
 As good a gift as joy before.
 So plain is it that, all the more
 A dispensation 's merciful,
 More pettishly we try and eull
 Briers, thistles, from our private plot,
 To mar God's ground where thorns are not ! "

VIII

Do you say this, or I? — Oh, you!
 Then, what, my friend? — (thus I pursue
 Our parley) — you indeed opine
 That the Eternal and Divine
 Did, eighteen centuries ago,
 In very truth . . . Enough! you know
 The all-stupendous tale, — that Birth,
 That Life, that Death! And all, the earth
 Shuddered at, — all, the heavens grew black
 Rather than see; all, nature's rack
 And throe at dissolution's brink
 Attested, — all took place, you think,
 Only to give our joys a zest,
 And prove our sorrows for the best?
 We differ, then! Were I, still pale
 And heartstruck at the dreadful tale,
 Waiting to hear God's voice declare
 What horror followed for my share,
 As implicated in the deed,
 Apart from other sins, — concede
 That if He blacked out in a blot
 My brief life's pleasantness, 't were not
 So very disproportionate!
 Or there might be another fate —
 I certainly could understand
 (If fancies were the thing in hand)
 How God might save, at that day's price,
 The impure in their impurities,
 Give license formal and complete
 To choose the fair and pick the sweet.
 But there be certain words, broad, plain,
 Uttered again and yet again,
 Hard to mistake or overgloss —
 Announcing this world's gain for loss,
 And bidding us reject the same:
 The whole world lieth (they proclaim)
 In wickedness, — come out of it!
 Turn a deaf ear, if you think fit,
 But I who thrill through every nerve
 At thought of what deaf ears deserve —
 How do you counsel in the case?

IX

"I'd take, by all means, in your place,
 The safe side, since it so appears:
 Deny myself, a few brief years,
 The natural pleasure, leave the fruit
 Or cut the plant up by the root.
 Remember what a martyr said
 On the rude tablet overhead!
 'I was born sickly, poor and mean,
 A slave: no misery could screen
 The holders of the pearl of price
 From Caesar's envy; therefore twice
 I fought with beasts, and three times saw
 My children suffer by his law;
 At last my own release was earned:
 I was some time in being burned,
 But at the close a Hand came through
 The fire above my head, and drew
 My soul to Christ, whom now I see.
 Sergius, a brother, writes for me
 This testimony on the wall —
 For me, I have forgot it all.'
 You say right; this were not so hard!
 And since one nowise is debarred

From this, why not escape some sins
 By such a method?"

X

Then begins
 To the old point revulsion new —
 (For 't is just this I bring you to) —
 If after all we should mistake,
 And so renounce life for the sake
 Of death and nothing else? You hear
 Each friend we jeered at, send the jeer
 Back to ourselves with good effect —
 "There were my beetles to collect!
 My box — a trifle, I confess,
 But here I hold it, ne'ertheless!"
 Poor idiots, (let us pluck up heart
 And answer) we, the better part
 Have chosen, though 't were only hope, —
 Nor envy moles like you that grope
 Amid your veritable muck,
 More than the grasshoppers would truck,
 For yours, their passionate life away,
 That spends itself in leaps all day
 To reach the sun, you want the eyes
 To see, as they the wings to rise
 And match the noble hearts of them!
 Thus the contemner we contemn, —
 And, when doubt strikes us, thus we ward
 Its stroke off, caught upon our guard,
 — Not struck enough to overturn
 Our faith, but shake it — make us learn
 What I began with, and, I wis,
 End, having proved, — how hard it is
 To be a Christian!

XI

"Proved, or not,
 Howe'er you wis, small thanks, I wot,
 You get of mine, for taking pains
 To make it hard to me. Who gains
 By that, I wonder? Here I live
 In trusting ease; and here you drive
 At causing me to lose what most Yourself would mourn for had you lost!"

XII

But, do you see, my friend, that thus
 You leave Saint Paul for Æschylus?
 — Who made his Titan's arch-device
 The giving men blind hopes to spice
 The meal of life with, else devoured
 In bitter haste, while lo, death loured
 Before them at the platter's edge!
 If faith should be, as I allege,
 Quite other than a condiment
 To heighten flavors with, or meant
 (Like that brave curry of his Grace)
 To take at need the victuals' place?
 If, having dined, you would digest
 Besides, and turning to your rest
 Should find instead . . .

XIII

Now, you shall see
 And judge if a mere foppery
 Pricks on my speaking! I resolve
 To utter — yes, it shall devolve
 On you to hear as solemn, strange
 And dread a thing as in the range

Of facts, — or fancies, if God will — E'er happened to our kind ! I still Stand in the cloud and, while it wraps
 My face, ought not to speak perhaps ;
 Seeing that if I carry through
 My purpose, if my words in you
 Find a live actual listener,
 My story, reason must aver
 False after all — the happy chance !
 While, if each human countenance
 I meet in London day by day,
 Be what I fear, — my warnings fray
 No one, and no one they convert,
 And no one helps me to assert
 How hard it is to really be
 A Christian, and in vacancy
 I pour this story !

XIV

I commence

By trying to inform you, whence
 It comes that every Easter-night
 As now, I sit up, watch, till light,
 Upon those chimney-stacks and roofs,
 Give, through my window-pane, gray proofs
 That Easter-Day is breaking slow.
 On such a night, three years ago,
 It chanced that I had cause to cross
 The common, where the chapel was,
 Our friend spoke of, the other day —
 You've not forgotten, I dare say.
 I fell to musing of the time
 So close, the blessed matin-prime
 All hearts leap up at, in some guise —
 One could not well do otherwise.
 Insensibly my thoughts were bent
 Toward the main point ; I overwent
 Much the same ground of reasoning
 As you and I just now. One thing
 Remained, however — one that tasked
 My soul to answer ; and I asked,
 Fairly and frankly, what might be
 That History, that Faith, to me
 — Me there — not me in some domain
 Built up and peopled by my brain,
 Weighing its merits as one weighs Mere theories for blame or praise,
 — The kingcraft of the Lucumons,
 Or Fourier's scheme, its pros and cons, —
 But my faith there, or none at all.
 "How were my case, now, did I fall
 Dead here, this minute — should I lie Faithful or faithless ?" Note that I
 Inclined thus ever ! — little prone
 For instance, when I lay alone
 In childhood, to go calm to sleep
 And leave a closet where might keep
 His watch perdue some murderer
 Waiting till twelve o'clock to stir,
 As good authentic legends tell :
 "He might : but how improbable !
 How little likely to deserve
 The pains and trial to the nerve
 Of thrusting head into the dark !" —
 Urged my old nurse, and bade me mark
 Beside, that, should the dreadful scout
 Really lie hid there, and leap out
 At first turn of the rusty key,

Mine were small gain that she could see,
 Killed not in bed but on the floor,
 And losing one night's sleep the more.
 I tell you, I would always burst
 The door ope, know my fate at first.
 This time, indeed, the closet penned
 No such assassin : but a friend
 Rather, peeped out to guard me, fit
 For counsel, Common Sense, to wit,
 Who said a good deal that might pass, —
 Heartening, impartial too, it was,
 Judge else : "For, soberly now, — who Should be a Christian if not you ?"
 (Hear how he smoothed me down.) "One takes
 A whole life, sees what course it makes
 Mainly, and not by fits and starts —
 In spite of stoppage which imparts
 Fresh value to the general speed.
 A life, with none, would fly indeed :
 Your progressing is slower — right !
 We deal with progress and not flight.
 Through baffling senses passionate,
 Fancies as restless, — with a freight
 Of knowledge cumbersome enough
 To sink your ship when waves grow rough,
 Though meant for ballast in the hold, —
 I find, 'mid dangers manifold,
 The good bark answers to the helm
 Where faith sits, easier to o'erwhelm
 Than some stout peasant's heavenly guide,
 Whose hard head could not, if it tried,
 Conceive a doubt, nor understand
 How senses hornier than his hand
 Should 'tice the Christian off his guard.
 More happy ! But shall we award
 Less honor to the hull which, dogged
 By storms, a mere wreck, waterlogged,
 Masts by the board, her bulwarks gone
 And stanchions going, yet bears on, —
 Than to mere lifeboats, built to save,
 And triumph o'er the breaking wave ?
 Make perfect your good ship as these,
 And what were her performances !"
 I added — "Would the ship reach home !
 I wish indeed 'God's kingdom come' —
 The day when I shall see appear
 His bidding, as my duty, clear
 From doubt ! And it shall dawn, that day,
 Some future season ; Easter may Prove, not impossibly, the time —
 Yes, that were striking — fates would chime
 So aptly ! Easter-morn, to bring
 The Judgment ! — deeper in the spring
 Than now, however, when there's snow
 Capping the hills ; for earth must show
 All signs of meaning to pursue
 Her tasks as she was wont to do
 — The skylark, taken by surprise
 As we ourselves, shall recognize Sudden the end. For suddenly
 It comes ; the dreadfulness must be
 In that ; all warrants the belief —
 'At night it cometh like a thief.'
 I fancy why the trumpet blows ;
 — Plainly, to wake one. From repose
 We shall start up, at last awake
 From life, that insane dream we take
 For waking now, because it seems.

XVIII

I looked up; all seemed as before;
Of that cloud-Tophet overhead
No trace was left: I saw instead
The common round me, and the sky
Above, stretched drear and empty
Of life. 'T was the last watch of night,
Except what brings the morning quite;
When the armed angel, conscience-clear,
His task nigh done, leans o'er his spear
And gazes on the earth he guards,
Safe one night more through all its wards.

Till God relieve him at his post.
 "A dream — a waking dream at most!"
 (I spoke out quick, that I might shake
 The horrid nightmare off, and wake.)
 "The world gone, yet the world is here?"
 Are not all things as they appear?
 Is Judgment past for me alone?
 — And where had place the great white
   throne?
 The rising of the quick and dead?
 Where stood they, small and great? Who read
 The sentence from the opened book?"
 So, by degrees, the blood forsook
 My heart, and let it beat afresh;
 I knew I should break through the mesh
 Of horror, and breathe presently:
 When, lo, again, the voice by me!

XIX

I saw . . . O brother, 'mid far sands
 The palm-tree-cinctured city stands,
 Bright-white beneath, as heaven, bright-blue,
 Leans o'er it, while the years pursue
 Their course, unable to abate
 Its paradisaal laugh at fate!
 One morn, — the Arab staggers blind
 O'er a new tract of death, calcined
 To ashes, silence, nothingness, —
 And strives, with dizzy wits, to guess
 Whence fell the blow. What if, 'twixt skies
 And prostrate earth, he should surprise
 The imaged vapor, head to foot,
 Surveying, motionless and mute,
 Its work, ere, in a whirlwind rapt
 It vanish up again? — So hapt
 My chance. He stood there. Like the smoke
 Pillared o'er Sodom, when day broke, —
 I saw him. One magnific pall
 Mantled in massive fold and fall
 His head, and coiled in snaky swatches
 About his feet: night's black, that bathes
 All else, broke, grizzled with despair,
 Against the soul of blackness there.
 A gesture told the mood within —
 That wrapped right hand which bared the chin,
 That intense meditation fixed
 On his procedure, — pity mixed
 With the fulfilment of decree.
 Motionless, thus, he spoke to me,
 Who fell before his feet, a mass,
 No man now.

XX

"All is come to pass.
 Such shows are over for each soul
 They had respect to. In the roll
 Of Judgment which convinced mankind
 Of sin, stood many, bold and blind,
 Terror must burn the truth into:
 Their fate for them! — thou hadst to do
 With absolute omnipotence,
 Able its judgments to dispense
 To the whole race, as every one
 Were its sole object. Judgment done,
 God is, thou art, — the rest is hurled
 To nothingness for thee. This world,
 This finite life, thou hast preferred,
   1 disbelief of God's plain word,

To heaven and to infinity.
 Here the probation was for thee,
 To show thy soul the earthly mixed
 With heavenly, it must choose betwixt.
 The earthly joys lay palpable, —
 A taint, in each, distinct as well;
 The heavenly fitted, faint and rare,
 Above them, but as truly were
 Taintless, so, in their nature, best.
 Thy choice was earth: thou didst attest
 'T was fitter spirit should subserve
 The flesh, than flesh refine to nerve
 Beneath the spirit's play. Advance
 No claim to their inheritance
 Who chose the spirit's fugitive
 Brief gleams, and yearned, ' This were to live
 Indeed, if rays, completely pure
 From flesh that dulls them, could endure, —
 Not shoot in meteor-light athwart
 Our earth, to show how cold and swart
 It lies beneath their fire, but stand
 As stars do, destined to expand,
 Prove veritable worlds, our home!
 Thou saidst, — 'Let spirit star the dome
 Of sky, that flesh may miss no peak,
 No nook of earth, — I shall not seek
 Its service further!' Thou art shut
 Out of the heaven of spirit; glut
 Thy sense upon the world: 't is thine
 Forever — take it!"

XXI

"How? Is mine,
 The world?" (I cried, while my soul broke Out in a transport.) "Hast thou spoke Plainly in that? Earth's exquisite Treasures of wonder and delight
 For me?"

XXII

The austere voice returned, —
 "So soon made happy? Hadst thou learned
 What God accounteth happiness,
 Thou wouldst not find it hard to guess
 What hell may be his punishment
 For those who doubt if God invent
 Better than they. Let such men rest
 Content with what they judged the best.
 Let the unjust usurp at will:
 The filthy shall be filthy still:
 Miser, there waits the gold for thee!
 Hater, indulge thine enmity!
 And thou, whose heaven self-ordained
 Was, to enjoy earth unrestrained,
 Do it! Take all the ancient show!
 The woods shall wave, the rivers flow,
 And men apparently pursue
 Their works, as they were wont to do,
 While living in probation yet.
 I promise not thou shalt forget
 The past, now gone to its account;
 But leave thee with the old amount
 Of faculties, nor less nor more,
 Unvisited, as heretofore,
 By God's free spirit, that makes an end,
 So, once more, take thy world! Expend
 Eternity upon its shows
 Flung thee as freely as one rose
 Out of a summer's opulence,

Over the Eden-barrier whence Thou art excluded. Knock in vain!"

XXIII

I sat up. All was still again.
I breathed free; to my heart, back fled
The warmth. "But, all the world!" — I said.
I stooped and picked a leaf of fern,
And recollected I might learn
From books, how many myriad sorts
Of fern exist, to trust reports.
Each as distinct and beautiful
As this, the very first I cull.
Think, from the first leaf to the last!
Conceive, then, earth's resources! Vast Exhaustless beauty, endless change
Of wonder! And this foot shall range
Alps, Andes, — and this eye devour
The bee-bird and the aloe-flower?

XXIV

Then the voice: "Welcome so to rate
The arras-folds that variegated
The earth, God's antechamber, well!
The wise, who waited there, could tell
By these, what royalties in store
Lay one step past the entrance-door.
For whom, was reckoned, not too much,
This life's munificence? For such
As thou, — a race, whereof scarce one
Was able, in a million,
To feel that any marvel lay
In objects round his feet all day;
Scarce one, in many millions more,
Willing, if able, to explore
The secreter, minuter charm!
— Brave souls, a fern-leaf could disarm
Of power to cope with God's intent, —
Or scared if the south firmament
With north-fire did its wings ruffled!
All partial beauty was a pledge
Of beauty in its plenitude:
But since the pledge sufficed thy mood,
Retain it! plenitude be theirs
Who looked above!"

XXV

Though sharp despairs
Shot through me, I held up, bore on.
"What matter though my trust were gone
From natural things? Henceforth my part
Be less with nature than with art!
For art supplants, gives mainly worth
To nature; 'tis man stamps the earth —
And I will seek his impress, seek
The statuary of the Greek,
Italy's painting — there my choice
Shall fix!"

XXVI

"Obtain it!" said the voice,
"The one form with its single act,
Which sculptors labored to abstract,
The one face, painters tried to draw,
With its one look, from throngs they saw.
And that perfection in their soul,
These only hinted at? The whole,
They were but parts of? What each laid

His claim to glory on? — afraid
His fellow-men should give him rank
By mere tentatives which he shrank
Smitten at heart from, all the more,
That gazers pressed in to adore!
'Shall I be judged by only these?'
If such his soul's capacities,
Even while he trod the earth, — think, now,
What pomp in Buonarroti's brow,
With its new palace-brain where dwells
Superb the soul, unvexed by cells
That crumbled with the transient clay!
What visions will his right hand's sway
Still turn to forms, as still they burst
Upon him? How will he quench thirst,
Titanically infantine,
Laid at the breast of the Divine?
Does it confound thee, — this first page
Emblazoning man's heritage? —
Can this alone absorb thy sight,
As pages were not infinite, —
Like the omnipotence which tasks
Itself to furnish all that asks
The soul it means to satiate?
What was the world, the starry state
Of the broad skies, — what, all displays
Of power and beauty intermixed,
Which now thy soul is chained betwixt, —
What else than needful furniture
For life's first stage? God's work, be sure,
No more spreads wasted, than falls scant!
He filled, did not exceed, man's want
Of beauty in this life. But through Life pierce, — and what has earth to do,
Its utmost beauty's appanage,
With the requirement of next stage?
Did God pronounce earth 'very good'?
Needs must it be, while understood
For man's preparatory state;
Naught here to heighten nor abate;
Transfer the same completeness here,
To serve a new state's use, — and drear
Deficiency gapes every side!
The good, tried once, were bad, retried.
See the enwrapping rocky niche,
Sufficient for the sleep in which
The lizard breathes for ages safe:
Split the mould — and as light would chafe
The creature's new world-widened sense,
Dazzled to death at evidence
Of all the sounds and sights that broke
Innumerable at the chisel's stroke, —
So, in God's eye, the earth's first stuff
Was, neither more nor less, enough
To house man's soul, man's need fulfil.
Man reckoned it immeasurable?
So thinks the lizard of his vault!
Could God be taken in default,
Short of contrivances, by you, —
Or reached, ere ready to pursue
His progress through eternity?
That chambered rock, the lizard's world,
Your easy mallet's blow has hurled
To nothingness forever: so,
Has God abolished at a blow
This world, wherein his saints were pent, —
Who, though found grateful and content,
With the provision there, as thou,

Yet knew he would not disallow
 Their spirit's hunger, felt as well, —
 Unsated, — not unsatable,
 As paradise gives proof. Deride
 Their choice now, thou who sit'st outside ! ”

XXVII

I cried in anguish : “ Mind, the mind,
 So miserably cast behind,
 To gain what had been wisely lost !
 Oh, let me strive to make the most
 Of the poor stunted soul, I nipped
 Of budding wings, else now equipped
 For voyage from summer isle to isle !
 And though she needs must reconcile
 Ambition to the life on ground,
 Still, I can profit by late found
 But precious knowledge. Mind is best —
 I will seize mind, forego the rest,
 And try how far my tethered strength
 May crawl in this poor breadth and length.
 Let me, since I can fly no more,
 At least spin dervish-like about (Till giddy rapture almost doubt
 I fly) through circling sciences,
 Philosophies and histories !
 Should the whirl slacken there, then verse,
 Fining to music, shall asperse
 Fresh and fresh fire-dew, till I strain
 Intoxicate, half-break my chain !
 Not joyless, though more favored feet
 Stand calm, where I want wings to beat
 The floor. At least earth's bond is broke ! ”

XXVIII

Then (sickening even while I spoke) :
 “ Let me alone ! No answer, pray,
 To this ! I know what thou wilt say !
 All still is earth's, — to know, as much
 As feel its truths, which if we touch
 With sense, or apprehend in soul,
 What matter ? I have reached the goal —
 ‘ Where to does knowledge serve ! ’ will burn
 My eyes, too sure, at every turn !
 I cannot look back now, nor stake
 Bliss on the race, for running's sake.
 The goal's a ruin like the rest ! ”
 “ And so much worse thy latter quest, ”
 (Added the voice, ) “ that even on earth —
 Whenever, in man's soul, had birth
 Those intuitions, grasps of guess,
 Which pull the more into the less,
 Making the finite comprehend
 Infinity, — the bard would spend
 Such praise alone, upon his craft,
 As, when wind-lyres obey the waft,
 Goes to the craftsman who arranged
 The seven strings, changed them and re-
 changed —
 Knowing it was the South that harped.
 He felt his song, in singing, warped ;
 Distinguished his and God's part : whence
 A world of spirit as of sense
 Was plain to him, yet not too plain,
 Which he could traverse, not remain
 A guest in : — else were permanent
 Heaven on the earth its gleams were meant
 To sting with hunger for full light, —

Made visible in verse, despite
 The veiling weakness, — truth by means
 Of fable, showing while it screens, —
 Since highest truth, man e'er supplied,
 Was ever fable on outside.
 Such gleams made bright the earth an age ;
 Now the whole sun's his heritage !
 Take up thy world, it is allowed,
 Thou who hast entered in the cloud ! ”

XXIX

Then I — “ Behold, my spirit bleeds,
 Catches no more at broken reeds, —
 But lilies flower those reeds above :
 I let the world go, and take love !
 Love survives in me, albeit those
 I love be henceforth masks and shows,
 Not living men and women : still
 I mind how love repaired all ill,
 Cured wrong, soothed grief, made earth amend
 With parents, brothers, children, friends !
 Some semblance of a woman yet
 With eyes to help me to forget,
 Shall look on me ; and I will match
 Departed love with love, attach
 Old memories to new dreams, nor scorn
 The poorest of the grains of corn
 I save from shipwreck on this isle,
 Trusting its barrenness may smile
 With happy foodful green one day,
 More precious for the pains. I pray, —
 Leave to love, only ! ”

XXX

At the word,
 The form, I looked to have been stirred
 With pity and approval, rose
 O'er me, as when the headsman throws
 Axe over shoulder to make end —
 I fell prone, letting him expend
 His wrath, while thus the inflicting voice
 Smote me. “ Is this thy final choice ?
 Love is the best ? ’T is somewhat late !
 And all thou dost enumerate
 Of power and beauty in the world,
 The mightiness of love was curled
 Inextricably round about.
 Love lay within it and without,
 To clasp thee, — but in vain ! Thy soul
 Still shrunk from him who made the whole,
 Still set deliberate aside
 His love ! — Now take love ! Well betide Thy tardy conscience ! Haste to take
 The show of love for the name's sake,
 Remembering every moment who,
 Beside creating thee unto
 These ends, and these for thee, was said
 To undergo death in thy stead
 In flesh like thine : so ran the tale.
 What doubt in thee could countervail
 Belief in it ? Upon the ground
 ‘ That in the story had been found
 Too much love ! How could God love so ? ’
 He who in all his works below
 Adapted to the needs of man,
 Made love the basis of the plan, —
 Did love, as was demonstrated :
 While man, who was so fit instead

To hate, as every day gave proof, —
Man thought man, for his kind's behoof,
Both could and did invent that scheme
Of perfect love: 't would well beseem
Cain's nature thou wast wont to praise,
Not tally with God's usual ways!"

XXXI

And I cowered deprecatingly —
"Thou Love of God! Or let me die,
Or grant what shall seem heaven almost!
Let me not know that all is lost,
Though lost it be — leave me not tied
To this despair, this corpse-like bride!
Let that old life seem mine — no more —
With limitation as before,
With darkness, hunger, toil, distress:
Be all the earth a wilderness!
Only let me go on, go on,
Still hoping ever and anon
To reach one eve the Better Land!"

XXXII

Then did the form expand, expand —
I knew him through the dread disguise
As the whole God within his eyes
Embraced me.

XXXIII

When I lived again,
The day was breaking, — the gray plain
I rose from, silvered thick with dew,

Was this a vision? False or true?
Since then, three varied years are spent,
And commonly my mind is bent
To think it was a dream — be sure
A mere dream and distemperature —
The last day's watching: then the night, —
The shock of that strange Northern Light
Set my head swimming, bred in me
A dream. And so I live, you see,
Go through the world, try, prove, reject,
Prefer, still struggling to effect
My warfare; happy that I can
Be crossed and thwarted as a man,
Not left in God's contempt apart,
With ghastly smooth life, dead at heart,
Tame in earth's paddock as her prize,
Thank God, she still each method tries
To catch me, who may yet escape,
She knows, — the fiend in angel's shape!
Thank God, no paradise stands barred
To entry, and I find it hard
To be a Christian, as I said!
Still every now and then my head
Raised glad, sinks mournful — all grows drear
Spite of the sunshine, while I fear
And think, "How dreadful to be grudging
No ease henceforth, as one that's judged,
Condemned to earth forever, shut
From heaven!"
But Easter-Day breaks! But Christ rises! Mercy every way
Is infinite, — and who can say?

MEN AND WOMEN

LONDON AND FLORENCE, 184- 185-

IN making his final distribution of poems Browning gave the above title and dates to the thirteen poems which follow, but the title was originally given by him to two volumes published in 1855. The other poems are dispersed among the several groups already named, with the exception of In a Balcony, which appeared by itself.

"TRANSCENDENTALISM: A POEM IN TWELVE BOOKS"

STOP playing, poet! May a brother speak?
'Tis you speak, that's your error. Song's our art:
Whereas you please to speak these naked
thoughts
Instead of draping them in sights and sounds.
— True thoughts, good thoughts, thoughts fit to treasure up!
But why such long prolusion and display,
Such turning and adjustment of the harp,
And taking it upon your breast, at length,
Only to speak dry words across its strings?
Stark-naked thought is in request enough:
Speak prose and hollo it till Europe hears!

The six-foot Swiss tube, braced about with bark,
Which helps the hunter's voice from Alp to Alp —
Exchange our harp for that, — who hinders
you?

But here's your fault; grown men want thought, you think;
Thought's what they mean by verse, and seek
in verse:
Boys seek for images and melody,
Men must have reason — so, you aim at men.
Quite otherwise! Objects throng our youth,
't is true;
We see and hear and do not wonder much:
If you could tell us what they mean, indeed!

As German Boehme never cared for plants
Until it happened, a-walking in the fields,
He noticed all at once that plants could speak.
Nay, turned with loosened tongue to talk with
him.

That day the daisy had an eye indeed —
Colloquied with the crowslip on such themes !
We find them extant yet in Jacob's prose.
But by the time youth slips a stage or two While reading prose in that tough book he wrote

(Collating and emendating the same
And settling on the sense most to our mind),
We shut the clasps and find life's summer past.
Then, who helps more, pray, to repair our
loss —

Another Boehme with a tougher book
And subtler meanings of what roses say, —
Or some stout Mage like him of Halberstadt, John, who made things Boehme wrote thoughts
about ?

He with a "look you!" vents a brace of rhymes,

And in three breaks the sudden rose herself,
Over us, under, round us every side,
Nay, in and out the tables and the chairs
And musty volumes, Boehme's book and all, —
Buries us with a glory, young once more,
Pouring heaven into this shut house of life.

So come, the harp back to your heart again !
You are a poem, though your poem's naught.
The best of all you showed before, believe,
Was your own boy-face o'er the finer chords
Bent, following the cherub at the top
That points to God with his paired half-moon
wings.

HOW IT STRIKES A CONTEMPORARY

I ONLY knew one poet in my life :
And this, or something like it, was his way.

You saw go up and down Valladolid,
A man of mark, to know next time you saw.
His very serviceable suit of black
Was courtly once and conscientious still,
And many might have worn it, though none
did :

The cloak, that somewhat shone and showed the threads,

Had purpose, and the ruff, significance.
He walked and tapped the pavement with his cane,

Scenting the world, looking it full in face,
An old dog, bald and blindish, at his heels.
They turned up, now, the alley by the church,
That leads nowhere ; now, they breathed
themselves

On the main promenade just at the wrong time :
You 'd come upon his scrutinizing hat,
Making a peaked shade blacker than itself
Against the single window spared some house
Intact yet with its mouldered Moorish work, —
Or else surprise the ferrel of his stick
Trying the mortar's temper 'tween the chinks
Of some new shop a-building, French and fine.

He stood and watched the cobbler at his trade,
The man who slices lemons into drink,
The coffee-roaster's brazier, and the boys
That volunteer to help him turn its winch.
He glanced o'er books on stalls with half an
eye,

And fly-leaf ballads on the vender's string,
And broad-edge bold-print posters by the wall.
He took such cognizance of men and things,
If any beat a horse, you felt he saw ;
If any cursed a woman, he took note ;
Yet stared at nobody, — you stared at him,
And found, less to your pleasure than surprise,
He seemed to know you and expect as much.
So, next time that a neighbor's tongue was loosed,

It marked the shameful and notorious fact,
We had among us, not so much a spy,
As a recording chief-inquisitor,
The town's true master if the town but knew !
We merely kept a governor for form,
While this man walked about and took account
Of all thought, said and acted, then went home,
And wrote it fully to our Lord the King
Who has an itch to know things, he knows why,
And reads them in his bedroom of a night.
Oh, you might smile ! there wanted not a touch,
A tang of . . . well, it was not wholly ease
As back into your mind the man's look came.
Stricken in years a little, — such a brow
His eyes had to live under ! — clear as flint
On either side the formidable nose
Curved, cut and colored like an eagle's claw.
Had he to do with A's surprising fate ?
When altogether old B disappeared
And young C got his mistress, — was 't our
friend,

His letter to the King, that did it all ?
What paid the bloodless man for so much
pains ?

Our Lord the King has favorites manifold,
And shifts his ministry some once a month ;
Our city gets new governors at whiles, —
But never word or sign, that I could hear,
Notified to this man about the streets
The King's approval of those letters conned
The last thing duly at the dead of night.
Did the man love his office ? Frowned our Lord,
Exhorting when none heard — "Beseech me
not !

Too far above my people, — beneath me !
I set the watch, — how should the people know ?
Forget them, keep me all the more in mind !"
Was some such understanding 'twixt the two ?

I found no truth in one report at least —
That if you tracked him to his home, down lanes

Beyond the Jewry, and as clean to pace,
You found he ate his supper in a room
Blazing with lights, four Titians on the wall,
And twenty naked girls to change his plate !
Poor man, he lived another kind of life
In that new stuccoed third house by the bridge,
Fresh-painted, rather smart than otherwise !
The whole street might o'erlook him as he sat
Leg crossing leg, one foot on the dog's back,

Playing a decent cribbage with his maid (Jacynth, you're sure her name was) o'er the cheese
 And fruit, three red halves of starved winter-pears,
 Or treat of radishes in April. Nine,
 Ten, struck the church clock, straight to bed went he.

My father, like the man of sense he was,
 Would point him out to me a dozen times ;
 " 'St — 'St," he 'd whisper, " the Corregidor ! "
 I had been used to think that personage
 Was one with lacquered breeches, lustrous belt,
 And feathers like a forest in his hat,
 Who blew a trumpet and proclaimed the news,
 Announced the bull-fights, gave each church
 its turn,
 And memorized the miracle in vogue !
 He had a great observance from us boys ;
 We were in error ; that was not the man.

I 'd like now, yet had haply been afraid,
 To have just looked, when this man came to
 die,

And seen who lined the clean gay garret-sides
 And stood about the neat low truckle-bed,
 With the heavenly manner of relieving guard.
 Here had been, mark, the general-in-chief,
 Through a whole campaign of the world's life
 and death,

Doing the King's work all the dim day long,
 In his old coat and up to knees in mud,
 Smoked like a herring, dining on a crust, —
 And, now the day was won, relieved at once !
 No further show or need for that old coat,
 You are sure, for one thing ! Bless us, all the while

How sprucely we are dressed out, you and I !
 A second, and the angels alter that.

Well, I could never write a verse, — could you ?
 Let 's to the Prado and make the most of time.

ARTEMIS PROLOGIZES

Upon the first proof of this poem Browning wrote: " I had better say perhaps that the above is nearly all retained of a tragedy I composed much against my endeavor, while in bed with a fever two years ago — it went farther into the story of Hippolytus and Aricia ; but when I got well, putting only thus much down at once, I soon forgot the remainder." The notes contain an interesting defence by Browning of the form of his Greek names.

I AM a goddess of the ambrosial courts,
 And save by Here, Queen of Pride, surpassed
 By none whose temples whiten this the world.
 Through heaven I roll my lucid moon along ;
 I shied in hell o'er my pale people peace ;
 On earth I, caring for the creatures, guard
 Each pregnant yellow wolf and fox-bitch sleek,
 And every feathered mother's callow brood,
 And all that love green haunts and loneliness.

Of men, the chaste adore me, hanging crowns
 Of poppies red to blackness, bell and stem,
 Upon my image at Athenai here ;
 And this dead Youth, Aesclepios bends above,
 Was dearest to me. He, my buskined step
 To follow through the wild-wood leafy ways,
 And chase the panting stag, or swift with darts
 Stop the swift ounce, or lay the leopard low,
 Neglected homage to another god :
 Whence Aphrodite, by no midnight smoke
 Of tapers lulled, in jealousy dispatched
 A noisome lust that, as the gadbee stings,
 Possessed his stepdame Phaidra for himself
 The son of Theseus her great absent spouse.
 Hippolotos exclaiming in his rage
 Against the fury of the Queen, she judged
 Life insupportable ; and, pricked at heart
 An Amazonian stranger's race should dare
 To scorn her, perished by the murderous cord :
 Yet, ere she perished, blasted in a scroll
 The fame of him her swerving made not swerve.

And Theseus, read, returning, and believed,
 And exiled, in the blindness of his wrath,
 The man without a crime who, last as first,
 Loyal, divulged not to his sire the truth.
 Now Theseus from Poseidon had obtained
 That of his wishes should be granted three,
 And one he imprecated straight — " Alive
 May ne'er Hippolotos reach other lands ! "
 Poseidon heard, ai ai ! And scarce the prince
 Had stepped into the fixed boots of the car
 That gave the feet a stay against the strength
 Of the Henetian horses, and around
 His body flung the rein, and urged their speed
 Along the rocks and shingles of the shore,
 When from the gaping wave a monster flung
 His obscene body in the coursers' path.
 These, mad with terror, as the sea-bull sprawled
 Wallowing about their feet, lost care of him
 That reared them ; and the master-chariot-pole
 Snapping beneath their plunges like a reed,
 Hippolotos, whose feet were trammelled fast,
 Was yet dragged forward by the circling rein
 Which either hand directed ; nor they quenched
 The frenzy of their flight before each trace,
 Wheel-spoke and splinter of the woeful car,
 Each boulder-stone, sharp stub and spiny shell,
 Huge fish-bone wrecked and wreathed amid the sands

On that detested beach, was bright with blood
 And morsels of his flesh : then fell the steeds
 Head-foremost, crashing in their moonèd fronts,
 Shivering with sweat, each white eye horror-
 fixed.

His people, who had witnessed all afar,
 Bore back the ruins of Hippolotos.
 But when his sire, too swoln with pride, rejoiced
 (Indomitable as a man foredoomed)
 That vast Poseidon had fulfilled his prayer,
 I, in a flood of glory visible,
 Stood o'er my dying votary and, deed
 By deed, revealed, as all took place, the truth.
 Then Theseus lay the woefullest of men,
 And worthily ; but ere the death-veils hid
 His face, the murdered prince full pardon breathed

To his rash sire. Whereat Athenai wails.

So I, who ne'er forsake my votaries,
 Lest in the cross-way none the honey-cake
 Should tender, nor pour out the dog's hot life ;
 Lest at my fane the priests disconsolate
 Should dress my image with some faded poor
 Few crowns, made favors of, nor dare object
 Such slackness to my worshippers who turn
 Elsewhere the trusting heart and loaded hand,
 As they had climbed Olumpos to report
 Of Artemis and nowhere found her throne —
 I interposed : and, this eventful night, —
 (While round the funeral pyre the populace Stood with fierce light on their black robes which bound

Each sobbing head, while yet their hair they clipped

O'er the dead body of their withered prince,
 And, in his palace, Theseus prostrated
 On the cold hearth, his brow cold as the slab
 'Twas bruised on, groaned away the heavy grief —

As the pyre fell, and down the cross logs crashed
 Sending a crowd of sparkles through the night,
 And the gay fire, elate with mastery,
 Towered like a serpent o'er the clotted jars
 Of wine, dissolving oils and frankincense,
 And splendid gums like gold, — my potency
 Conveyed the perished man to my retreat
 In the thrice-venerable forest here.
 And this white-bearded sage who squeezes now
 The berried plant, is Phoibos' son of fame,
 Asclepius, whom my radiant brother taught
 The doctrine of each herb and flower and root,
 To know their secret : st virtue and express
 The saving soul of all : who so has soothed
 With lavers the torn brow and murdered cheeks,
 Composed the hair and brought its gloss again,
 And called the red bloom to the pale skin back,
 And laid the strips and jagged ends of flesh
 Even once more, and slacked the sinew's knot
 Of every tortured limb — that now he lies
 As if mere sleep possessed him underneath
 These interwoven oaks and pines. Oh cheer,
 Divine presenter of the healing rod,
 Thy snake, with ardent throat and lulling eye,
 Twines his lithe spires around ! I say, much cheer !

Proceed thou with thy wisest pharmacies !
 And ye, white crowd of woodland sister-nymphs,
 Ply, as the sage directs, these buds and leaves
 That strew the turf around the twain ! While I Await, in fitting silence, the event.

AN EPISTLE

CONTAINING THE STRANGE MEDICAL EXPERI-ENCE OF KARSHISH, THE ARAB PHYSICIAN

KARSHISH, the picker-up of learning's crumbs,
 The not-incurious in God's handiwork
 (This man's-flesh he hath admirably made,
 Blown like a bubble, kneaded like a paste,
 To coop up and keep down on earth a space
 That puff of vapor from his mouth, man's soul)
 — To Abib, all-sagacious in our art,
 Breeder in me of what poor skill I boast,
 Like me inquisitive how pricks and cracks

Befall the flesh through too much stress and strain,

Whereby the wily vapor fain would slip
 Back and rejoin its source before the term, —
 And aptest in contrivance (under God)
 To baffle it by deftly stopping such : —
 The vagrant Scholar to his Sage at home Sends greeting (health and knowledge, fame with peace)

Three samples of true snake-stone — rarer still,
 One of the other sort, the melon-shaped,
 (But fitter, pounded fine, for charms than drugs)
 And writeth now the twenty-second time.

My journeyings were brought to Jericho :
 Thus I resume. Who studious in our art
 Shall count a little labor unpaid ?
 I have shed sweat enough, left flesh and bone
 On many a flinty furlong of this land.
 Also, the country-side is all on fire
 With rumors of a marching hitherward :
 Some say Vespasian cometh, some, his son.
 A black lynx snarled and pricked a tufted ear ;
 Lust of my blood inflamed his yellow balls :
 I cried and threw my staff and he was gone.
 Twice have the robbers stripped and beaten me,
 And once a town declared me for a spy ;
 But at the end, I reach Jerusalem,
 Since this poor covert where I pass the night,
 This Bethany, lies scarce the distance thence
 A man with plague-sores at the third degree
 Runs till he drops down dead. Thou laughest
 here !

'Sooth, it elates me, thus reposed and safe,
 To void the stuffing of my travel-scrip
 And share with thee whatever Jewry yields.
 A viscid choler is observable
 In tertians, I was nearly bold to say ;
 And falling-sickness hath a happier cure
 Than our school wots of : there's a spider
 here

Weaves no web, watches on the ledge of tombs,
 Sprinkled with mottles on an ash-gray back ;
 Take five and drop them . . . but who knows
 his mind,

The Syrian runagate I trust this to ?
 His service payeth me a sublimate
 Blown up his nose to help the ailing eye.
 Best wait : I reach Jerusalem at morn,
 There set in order my experiences,
 Gather what most deserves, and give thee
 all —

Or I might add, Judæa's gum-tragacanth
 Scales off in purer flakes, shines clearer-grained,
 Cracks 'twixt the pestle and the porphyry,
 In fine exceeds our produce. Scalp-disease
 Confounds me, crossing so with leprosy —
 Thou hadst admired one sort I gained at Zoar —

But zeal outruns discretion. Here I end.

Yet stay : my Syrian blinketh gratefully,
 Protesteth his devotion is my price —
 Suppose I write what harms not, though he steal ?

I half resolve to tell thee, yet I blush,
 What set me off a-writing first of all.
 An itch I had, a sting to write, a tang !

For, be it this town's barrenness — or else
The Man had something in the look of him —
His case has struck me far more than 't is worth.

So, pardon if — (lest presently I lose
In the great press of novelty at hand
The care and pains this somehow stole from
me)

I bid thee take the thing while fresh in mind,
Almost in sight — for, wilt thou have the truth?
The very man is gone from me but now,
Whose ailment is the subject of discourse.
Thus then, and let thy better wit help all!

'T is but a case of mania — subinduced
By epilepsy, at the turning-point
Of trance prolonged unduly some three days:
When, by the exhibition of some drug
Or spell, exorcization, stroke of art Unknown to me and which 't were well to
know,

The evil thing out-breaking all at once
Left the man whole and sound of body indeed, —
But, flinging (so to speak) life's gates too wide,
Making a clear house of it too suddenly,
The first conceit that entered might inscribe
Whatever it was minded on the wall
So plainly at that vantage, as it were,
(First come, first served) that nothing subsequent

Attaineth to erase those fancy-scrawls
The just-returned and new-established soul
Hath gotten now so thoroughly by heart
That henceforth she will read or these or none.
And first — the man's own firm conviction rests
That he was dead (in fact they buried him)
— That he was dead and then restored to life
By a Nazarene physician of his tribe:
— 'Sayeth, the same bade "Rise," and he did
rise.

"Such cases are diurnal," thou wilt cry.
Not so this figment! — not, that such a fume,
Instead of giving way to time and health,
Should eat itself into the life of life,
As saffron tingeth flesh, blood, bones and all!
For see, how he takes up the after-life.

The man — it is one Lazarus a Jew,
Sanguine, proportioned, fifty years of age,
The body's habit wholly laudable,
As much, indeed, beyond the common health
As he were made and put aside to show.
Think, could we penetrate by any drug
And bathe the wearied soul and worried flesh,
And bring it clear and fair, by three days'
sleep!

Whence has the man the balm that brightens
all?

This grown man eyes the world now like a
child.

Some elders of his tribe, I should premise,
Led in their friend, obedient as a sheep,
To bear my inquisition. While they spoke,
Now sharply, now with sorrow, — told the case, —

He listened not except I spoke to him,
But folded his two hands and let them talk,
Watching the flies that buzzed: and yet no
fool.

And that 's a sample how his years must go.
Look, if a beggar, in fixed middle-life,
Should find a treasure, — can he use the same
With straitened habits and with tastes starved
small,

And take at once to his impoverished brain
The sudden element that changes things,
That sets the undreamed-of rapture at his hand
And puts the cheap old joy in the scorned dust?
Is he not such an one as moves to mirth —
Warily parsimonious, when no need,
Wasteful as drunkenness at undue times?
All prudent counsel as to what befits
The golden mean, is lost on such an one:
The man's fantastic will is the man's law.
So here — we call the treasure knowledge, say,
Increased beyond the fleshly faculty —
Heaven opened to a soul while yet on earth,
Earth forced on a soul's use while seeing heaven:

The man is witless of the size, the sum,
The value in proportion of all things,
Or whether it be little or be much.
Discourse to him of prodigious armaments
Assembled to besiege his city now,
And of the passing of a mule with gourds —
'T is one! Then take it on the other side,
Speak of some trifling fact, — he will gaze rapt
With stupor at its very littleness,
(Far as I see) as if in that indeed
He caught prodigious import, whole results;
And so will turn to us the bystanders
In ever the same stupor (note this point)
That we too see not with his opened eyes.
Wonder and doubt come wrongly into play,
Preposterously, at cross purposes.
Should his child sicken unto death, — why, look
For scarce abatement of his cheerfulness,
Or pretermission of the daily craft!
While a word, gesture, glance from that same
child

At play or in the school or laid asleep
Will startle him to an agony of fear,
Exasperation, just as like. Demand
The reason why — "'t is but a word," object —
"A gesture" — he regards thee as our lord
Who lived there in the pyramid alone,
Looked at us (dost thou mind?) when, being young,

We both would unadvisedly recite
Some charm's beginning, from that book of his,
Able to bid the sun throb wide and burst
All into stars, as suns grown old are wont.
Thou and the child have each a veil alike
Thrown o'er your heads, from under which ye
both

Stretch your blind hands and trifle with a match

Over a mine of Greek fire, did ye know!
He holds on firmly to some thread of life —
(It is the life to lead forcedly)
Which runs across some vast distracting orb
Of glory on either side that meagre thread,
Which, conscious of, he must not enter yet —
The spiritual life around the earthly life:
The law of that is known to him as this,
His heart and brain move there, his feet stay
here.

So is the man perplex with impulses
Sudden to start off crosswise, not straight on,
Proclaiming what is right and wrong across,
And not along, this black thread through the blaze —
"It should be" balked by "here it cannot
be."

And off the man's soul springs into his face
As if he saw again and heard again
His sage that bade him "Rise" and he did
rise.

Something, a word, a tick o' the blood within Admonishes: then back he sinks at once
To ashes, who was very fire before,
In sedulous recurrence to his trade
Whereby he earneth him the daily bread;
And studiously the humbler for that pride,
Professedly the faultier that he knows
God's secret, while he holds the thread of life.
Indeed the especial marking of the man
Is prone submission to the heavenly will — Seeing it, what it is, and why it is.

'Sayeth, he will wait patient to the last
For that same death which must restore his being

To equilibrium, body loosening soul
Divorced even now by premature full growth:
He will live, nay, it pleaseth him to live
So long as God please, and just how God please.
He even seeketh not to please God more
(Which meaneth, otherwise) than as God please.
Hence, I perceive not he affects to preach
The doctrine of his sect whate'er it be,
Make proselytes as madmen thirst to do:
How can he give his neighbor the real ground,
His own conviction? Ardent as he is —
Call his great truth a lie, why, still the old
"Be it as God please" reassureth him.
I probed the sore as thy disciple should:
"How, beast," said I, "this stolid carelessness
Sufficeth thee, when Rome is on her march
To stamp out like a little spark thy town,
Thy tribe, thy crazy tale and thee at once?"
He merely looked with his large eyes on me.
The man is apathetic, you deduce?
Contrariwise, he loves both old and young,
Able and weak, affects the very brutes
And birds — how say I? flowers of the field —
As a wise workman recognizes tools
In a master's workshop, loving what they make.

Thus is the man as harmless as a lamb:
Only impatient, let him do his best,
At ignorance and carelessness and sin —
And indignation which is promptly curbed:
As when in certain travel I have feigned
To be an ignoramus in our art
According to some preconceived design,
And happened to hear the land's practitioners,
Steeped in conceit sublimed by ignorance,
Prattle fantastically on disease,
Its cause and cure — and I must hold my peace!

Thou wilt object — Why have I not ere this Sought out the sage himself, the Nazarene
Who wrought this cure, inquiring at the source,
Conferring with the frankness that befits?

Alas! it grieveth me, the learned leech
Perished in a tumult many years ago,
Accused — our learning's fate — of wizardry,
Rebellion, to the setting up a rule
And creed prodigious as described to me.
His death, which happened when the earthquake fell

(Prefiguring, as soon appeared, the loss
To occult learning in our lord the sage
Who lived there in the pyramid alone)
Was wrought by the mad people — that's their wont!

On vain recourse, as I conjecture it,
To his tried virtue, for miraculous help —
How could he stop the earthquake? That's their way!

The other imputations must be lies:
But take one, though I loathe to give it thee,
In mere respect for any good man's fame.
(And after all, our patient Lazarus Is stark mad; should we count on what he says?)

Perhaps not: though in writing to a leech
'T is well to keep back nothing of a case.)
This man so cured regards the curer, then,
As — God forgive me! who but God himself,
Creator and sustainer of the world,
That came and dwelt in flesh on it awhile!
— 'Sayeth that such an one was born and lived,
Taught, healed the sick, broke bread at his own house,
Then died, with Lazarus by, for aught I know,
And yet was . . . what I said nor choose repeat,

And must have so avouched himself, in fact,
In hearing of this very Lazarus
Who saith — but why all this of what he saith?
Why write of trivial matters, things of price
Calling at every moment for remark?
I noticed on the margin of a pool
Blue-flowering borage, the Aleppo sort,
Aboundeth, very nitrous. It is strange!

Thy pardon for this long and tedious case,
Which, now that I review it, needs must seem
Unduly dwelt on, prolixly set forth!
Nor I myself discern in what is writ
Good cause for the peculiar interest
And awe indeed this man has touched me with.
Perhaps the journey's end, the weariness
Had wrought upon me first. I met him thus:
I crossed a ridge of short sharp broken hills
Like an old lion's cheek teeth. Out there came
A moon made like a face with certain spots
Multiform, manifold, and menacing:
Then a wind rose behind me. So we met
In this old sleepy town at unware,
The man and I. I send thee what is writ.
Regard it as a chance, a matter risked
To this ambiguous Syrian — he may lose,
Or steal, or give it thee with equal good.
Jerusalem's repose shall make amends
For time this letter wastes, thy time and mine;
Till when, once more thy pardon and fare-
well!

The very God! think, Abib; dost thou think?
So. the All-Great, were the All-Loving too —

So, through the thunder comes a human voice
 Saying, "O heart I made, a heart beats here!
 Face, my hands fashioned, see it in myself!
 Thou hast no power nor mayst conceive of
 mine,
 But love I gave thee, with myself to love,
 And thou must love me who have died for
 thee!"
 The madman saith He said so: it is strange.

JOHANNES AGRICOLA IN MEDITATION

First published with the signature Z in The Monthly Repository in 1836. A quotation from a Dictionary of all Religions followed the title on the first publication, but is here transferred to the notes.

THERE 's heaven above, and night by night
 I look right through its gorgeous roof;
 No suns and moons though e'er so bright
 Avail to stop me; splendour-proof
 I keep the broods of stars aloof:
 For I intend to get to God,
 For 't is to God I speed so fast,
 For in God's breast, my own abode,
 Those shoals of dazzling glory, passed,
 I lay my spirit down at last.
 I lie where I have always lain,
 God smiles as he has always smiled;
 Ere suns and moons could wax and wane,
 Ere stars were thundergirt, or piled
 The heavens, God thought on me his child;
 Ordained a life for me, arrayed
 Its circumstances every one
 To the minutest; ay, God said
 This head this hand should rest upon
 Thus, ere he fashioned star or sun.
 And having thus created me,
 Thus rooted me, he bade me grow,
 Guiltless forever, like a tree
 That buds and blooms, nor seeks to know
 The law by which it prospers so:
 But sure that thought and word and deed
 All go to swell his love for me,
 Me, made because that love had need
 Of something irreversibly
 Pledged solely its content to be.
 Yes, yes, a tree which must ascend,
 No poison-gourd foredoomed to stoop!
 I have God's warrant, could I blend
 All hideous sins, as in a cup,
 To drink the mingled venoms up;
 Secure my nature will convert
 The draught to blossoming gladness fast:
 While sweet dews turn to the gourd's hurt,
 And bloat, and while they bloat it, blast,
 As from the first its lot was cast.
 For as I lie, smiled on, full-fed
 By unexhausted power to bless,
 I gaze below on hell's fierce bed,
 And those its waves of flame oppress,
 Swarming in ghastly wretchedness;
 Whose life on earth aspired to be
 One altar-smoke, so pure! — to win
 If not love like God's love for me,

At least to keep his anger in;
 And all their striving turned to sin.
 Priest, doctor, hermit, monk grown white
 With prayer, the broken-hearted nun,
 The martyr, the wan acolyte,
 The incense-swinging child, — undone
 Before God fashioned star or sun!
 God, whom I praise; how could I praise,
 If such as I might understand,
 Make out and reckon on his ways,
 And bargain for his love, and stand,
 Paying a price, at his right hand?

PICTOR IGNOTUS

FLORENCE, 15—

I COULD have painted pictures like that youth's Ye praise so. How my soul springs up! No bar
 Stayed me — ah, thought which saddens while it soothes!
 — Never did fate forbid me, star by star,
 To outburst on your night with all my gift
 Of fires from God: nor would my flesh have shrunk
 From seconding my soul, with eyes uplift
 And wide to heaven, or, straight like thunder, sunk
 To the centre, of an instant; or around
 Turned calmly and inquisitive, to scan
 The license and the limit, space and bound,
 Allowed to truth made visible in man.
 And, like that youth ye praise so, all I saw,
 Over the canvas could my hand have flung,
 Each face obedient to its passion's law,
 Each passion clear proclaimed without a
 tongue;
 Whether Hope rose at once in all the blood,
 A-tiptoe for the blessing of embrace,
 Or Rapture drooped the eyes, as when her brood Pull down the nesting dove's heart to its
 place;
 Or Confidence lit swift the forehead up,
 And locked the mouth fast, like a castle braved, —
 O human faces, hath it spilt, my cup?
 What did ye give me that I have not saved?
 Nor will I say I have not dreamed (how well!)
 Of going — I, in each new picture, — forth,
 As, making new hearts beat and bosoms swell,
 To Pope or Kaiser, East, West, South, or
 North,
 Bound for the calmly satisfied great State,
 Or glad aspiring little burgh, it went,
 Flowers cast upon the car which bore the freight,
 Through old streets named afresh from the event,
 Till it reached home, where learned age should greet
 My face, and youth, the star not yet distinct
 Above his hair, lie learning at my feet! —
 Oh, thus to live, I and my picture, linked With love about, and praise, till life should
 end,
 And then not go to heaven, but linger here,

Here on my earth, earth's every man my friend, —

The thought grew frightful, 't was so wildly dear!

But a voice changed it. Glimpses of such sights

Have scared me, like the revels through a door

Of some strange house of idols at its rites!

This world seemed not the world it was before:

Mixed with my loving trusting ones, there trooped

. . . Who summoned those cold faces that begun

To press on me and judge me? Though I stooped

Shrinking, as from the soldiery a nun,

They drew me forth, and spite of me . . . enough!

These buy and sell our pictures, take and give,

Count them for garniture and household-stuff, And where they live needs must our pictures live

And see their faces, listen to their prate,

Partakers of their daily pettiness,

Discussed of, — "This I love, or this I hate, This likes me more, and this affects me less!"

Wherefore I chose my portion. If at whiles

My heart sinks, as monotonous I paint These endless cloisters and eternal aisles

With the same series, Virgin, Babe and Saint,

With the same cold calm beautiful regard, —

At least no merchant traffics in my heart;

The sanctuary's gloom at least shall ward Vain tongues from where my pictures stand apart:

Only prayer breaks the silence of the shrine

While, blackening in the daily candle-smoke,

They moulder on the damp wall's travertine, 'Mid echoes the light footstep never woke.

So, die my pictures! surely, gently die!

O youth, men praise so, — holds their praise its worth?

Blown harshly, keeps the trumpet's golden cry? Tastes sweet the water with such specks of earth?

FRA LIPPO LIPPI

I AM poor brother Lippo, by your leave!

You need not clap your torches to my face.

Zooks, what's to blame? you think you see a monk!

What, 't is past midnight, and you go the rounds,

And here you catch me at an alley's end

Where sportive ladies leave their doors ajar?

The Carmine's my cloister: hunt it up,

Do, — harry out, if you must show your zeal,

Whatever rat, there, haps on his wrong hole,

And nip each softling of a wee white mouse,

Weke, weke, that's crept to keep him company!

Aha, you know your betters! Then, you'll take

Your hand away that's fiddling on my throat, And please to know me likewise. Who am I?

Why, one, sir, who is lodging with a friend Three streets off — he's a certain . . . how d'ye call?

Master — a . . . Cosimo of the Medici, I' the house that caps the corner. Boh! you were best!

Remember and tell me, the day you're hanged, How you affected such a gullet's-gripe!

But you, sir, it concerns you that your knaves Pick up a manner nor discredit you:

Zooks, are we pilchards, that they sweep the streets

And count fair prize what comes into their net? He's Judas to a tittle, that man is!

Just such a face! Why, sir, you make amends. Lord, I'm not angry! Bid your handdogs go

Drink out this quarter-florin to the health Of the munificent House that harbors me

(And many more beside, lads! more beside!) And all's come square again. I'd like his face —

His, elbowing on his comrade in the door With the pike and lantern, — for the slave that holds

John Baptist's head a-dangle by the hair With one hand ("Look you, now," as who should say)

And his weapon in the other, yet unwiped! It's not your chance to have a bit of chalk,

A wood-coal or the like? or you should see! Yes, I'm the painter, since you style me so.

What, brother Lippo's doings, up and down, You know them and they take you? like enough!

I saw the proper twinkle in your eye — 'Tell you, I liked your looks at very first.

Let's sit and set things straight now, hip to haunch.

Here's spring come, and the nights one makes up bands

To roam the town and sing out carnival, And I've been three weeks shut within my mew,

A-painting for the great man, saints and saints And saints again. I could not paint all night —

Onf! I leaned out of window for fresh air. There came a hurry of feet and little feet,

A sweep of lute-strings, laughs, and whiffs of song, —

Flower o' the broom,

Take away love, and our earth is a tomb!

Flower o' the quince,

I let Lisa go, and what good in life since?

Flower o' the thyme — and so on. Round they went.

Scarce had they turned the corner when a titter Like the skipping of rabbits by moonlight, —

three slim shapes, And a face that looked up . . . zooks, sir, flesh and blood, That's all I'm made of! Into shreds it went,

Curtain and counterpane and coverlet, All the bed-furniture — a dozen knots,

There was a ladder! Down I let myself, Hands and feet, scrambling somehow, and so dropped,

And after them. I came up with the fun
Hard by Saint Laurence, hail fellow, well
met, —

Flower o' the rose,
If I've been merry, what matter who knows?
And so as I was stealing back again
To get to bed and have a bit of sleep
Ere I rise up to-morrow and go work
On Jerome knocking at his poor old breast
With his great round stone to subdue the flesh,
You snap me of the sudden. Ah, I see!
Though your eye twinkles still, you shake your
head —

Mine 's shaved — a monk, you say — the sting 's in that!

If Master Cosimo announced himself,
Mum 's the word naturally; but a monk!
Come, what am I a beast for? tell us, now!
I was a baby when my mother died
And father died and left me in the street.
I starved there, God knows how, a year or two
On fig-skins, melon-parings, rinds and shucks,
Refuse and rubbish. One fine frosty day,
My stomach being empty as your hat,
The wind doubled me up and down I went.
Old Aunt Lapaccia trussed me with one hand,
(Its fellow was a stinger as I knew)
And so along the wall, over the bridge,
By the straight cut to the convent. Six words
there,

While I stood munching my first bread that month:

"So, boy, you're minded," quoth the good fat
father,

Wiping his own mouth, 't was refection-time, —
'To quit this very miserable world?

Will you renounce? . . . "the mouthful of bread?" thought I;

By no means! Brief, they made a monk of
me;

I did renounce the world, its pride and greed,
Palace, farm, villa, shop, and banking-house,
Trash, such as these poor devils of Medici
Have given their hearts to — all at eight years
old.

Well, sir, I found in time, you may be sure,
'T was not for nothing — the good bellyful,
The warm serge and the rope that goes all
round,

And day-long blessed idleness beside!
"Let's see what the urchin's fit for" — that came next.

Not overmuch their way, I must confess.
Such a to-do! They tried me with their books;

Lord, they'd have taught me Latin in pure waste!

Flower o' the clove,
All the Latin I construe is "amo," I love!
But, mind you, when a boy starves in the streets
Eight years together, as my fortune was,
Watching folk's faces to know who will fling
The bit of half-stripped grape-bunch he desires,
And who will curse or kick him for his pains, —
Which gentleman processional and fine,
Holding a candle to the Sacrament,
Will wink and let him lift a plate and catch
The droppings of the wax to sell again,
Or holla for the Eight and have him whipped, —

How say I? — nay, which dog bites, which lets drop

His bone from the heap of offal in the street, —
Why, soul and sense of him grow sharp alike,
He learns the look of things, and none the less
For admonition from the hunger-pinch.

I had a store of such remarks, be sure,
Which, after I found leisure, turned to use.
I drew men's faces on my copy-books,
Scrawled them within the antiphony's marge,
Joined legs and arms to the long music-notes,
Found eyes and nose and chin for A's and B's,
And made a string of pictures of the world
Betwixt the ins and outs of verb and noun,
On the wall, the bench, the door. The monks looked black.

"Nay," quoth the Prior, "turn him out, d' ye
say?"

In no wise. Lose a crow and catch a lark.
What if at last we get our man of parts,
We Carmelites, like those Camaldolese
And Preaching Friars, to do our church up fine
And put the front on it that ought to be!
And hereupon he bade me daub away.
Thank you! my head being crammed, the walls
a blank,

Never was such prompt disembodying.
First, every sort of monk, the black and white,
I drew them, fat and lean; then, folk at church,
From good old gossips waiting to confess
Their cribs of barrel-droppings, candle-ends, —
To the breathless fellow at the altar-foot,
Fresh from his murder, safe and sitting there
With the little children round him in a row
Of admiration, half for his beard and half
For that white anger of his victim's son
Shaking a fist at him with one fierce arm,
Signing himself with the other because of Christ (Whose sad face on the cross sees only this After the passion of a thousand years)
Till some poor girl, her apron o'er her head,
(Which the intense eyes looked through) came at eve

On tiptoe, said a word, dropped in a loaf,
Her pair of earrings and a bunch of flowers
(The brute took growling), prayed, and so was gone.

I painted all, then cried "'T is ask and have;
Choose, for more's ready!" — laid the ladder
flat,

And showed my covered bit of cloister-wall.
The monks closed in a circle and praised loud
Till checked, taught what to see and not to see,
Being simple bodies, — "That's the very man!
Look at the boy who stoops to pat the dog!
That woman's like the Prior's niece who comes
To care about his asthma: it's the life!"
But there my triumph's straw-fire flared and funked;

Their betters took their turn to see and say:
The Prior and the learned pulled a face
And stopped all that in no time. "How?
what's here?"

Quite from the mark of painting, bless us all!
Faces, arms, legs, and bodies like the true
As much as pea and pea! it's devil's-game!
Your business is not to catch men with show,
With homage to the perishable clay,

But lift them over it, ignore it all,
Make them forget there's such a thing as flesh.
Your business is to paint the souls of men—
Man's soul, and it's a fire, smoke . . . no, it's
not . . .

It's vapor done up like a new-born babe—
(In that shape when you die it leaves your mouth)

It's . . . well, what matters talking, it's the
soul!

Give us no more of body than shows soul!
Here's Giotto, with his Saint a-praising God,
That sets us praising, — why not stop with him?
Why put all thoughts of praise out of our head
With wonder at lines, colors, and what not?
Paint the soul, never mind the legs and arms!
Rub all out, try at it a second time.
Oh, that white smallish female with the breasts.
She's just my niece . . . Herodias, I would
say, —

Who went and danced and got men's heads cut off!

Have it all out!" Now, is this sense, I ask?
A fine way to paint soul, by painting body
So ill, the eye can't stop there, must go further And can't fare worse! Thus, yellow does for white

When what you put for yellow's simply black,
And any sort of meaning looks intense
When all beside itself means and looks naught.
Why can't a painter lift each foot in turn,
Left foot and right foot, go a double step,
Make his flesh liker and his soul more like,
Both in their order? Take the prettiest face,
The Prior's niece . . . patron-saint—is it so pretty

You can't discover if it means hope, fear,
Sorrow or joy? won't beauty go with these?
Suppose I've made her eyes all right and blue,
Can't I take breath and try to add life's flash,
And then add soul and heighten them three-
fold?

Or say there's beauty with no soul at all—
(I never saw it—put the case the same—)
If you get simple beauty and naught else,
You get about the best thing God invents:
That's somewhat: and you'll find the soul you have missed,

Within yourself, when you return him thanks.
"Rub all out!" Well, well, there's my life,
in short,

And so the thing has gone on ever since.
I'm grown a man no doubt, I've broken
bounds:

You should not take a fellow eight years old
And make him swear to never kiss the girls.
I'm my own master, paint now as I please—
Having a friend, you see, in the Corner-house!
Lord, it's fast holding by the rings in front—
Those great rings serve more purposes than just
To plant a flag in, or tie up a horse!

And yet the old schooling sticks, the old grave
eyes

Are peeping o'er my shoulder as I work,
The heads shake still—"It's art's decline, my son!

You're not of the true painters, great and old;
Brother Angelico's the man, you'll find;

Brother Lorenzo stands his single peer:
Fag on at flesh, you'll never make the third!"
Flower o' the pine,
You keep your mistr . . . manners, and I'll stick to mine!

I'm not the third, then: bless us, they must
know!

Don't you think they're the likeliest to know,
They with their Latin? So, I swallow my
rage,

Clench my teeth, suck my lips in tight, and paint

To please them—sometimes do and sometimes don't;

For, doing most, there's pretty sure to come
A turn, some warm eve finds me at my saints—
A laugh, a cry, the business of the world—(Flower o' the peach,

Death for us all, and his own life for each!)
And my whole soul revolves, the cup runs over,
The world and life's too big to pass for a dream,
And I do these wild things in sheer despite,
And play the fooleries you catch me at,
In pure rage! The old mill-horse, out at grass
After hard years, throws up his stiff heels so,
Although the miller does not preach to him
The only good of grass is to make chaff.
What would men have? Do they like grass or
no—

May they or may n't they? all I want's the
thing

Settled forever one way. As it is,
You tell too many lies and hurt yourself:
You don't like what you only like too much,
You do like what, if given you at your word,
You find abundantly detestable.
For me, I think I speak as I was taught;
I always see the garden and God there
A-making man's wife: and, my lesson learned,
The value and significance of flesh,
I can't unlearn ten minutes afterwards.

You understand me: I'm a beast, I know.
But see, now—why, I see as certainly
As that the morning-star's about to shine,
What will hap some day. We've a youngster
here

Comes to our convent, studies what I do,
Slouches and stares and lets no atom drop:
His name is Guidi—he'll not mind the monks—

They call him Hulking Tom, he lets them
talk—

He picks my practice up—he'll paint apace,
I hope so—though I never live so long,
I know what's sure to follow. You be judge!
You speak no Latin more than I, belike;
However, you're my man, you've seen the
world

—The beauty and the wonder and the power,
The shapes of things, their colors, lights and shades,

Changes, surprises,—and God made it all!
—For what? Do you feel thankful, ay or
no,

For this fair town's face, yonder river's line,
The mountain round it and the sky above,
Much more the figures of man, woman, child,

These are the frame to? What's it all about?
To be passed over, despised? or dwelt upon,
Wondered at? oh, this last of course! — you
say.

But why not do as well as say, — paint these
Just as they are, careless what comes of it?
God's works — paint any one, and count it crime
To let a truth slip. Don't object, "His works
Are here already; nature is complete:
Suppose you reproduce her — (which you can't)
There's no advantage! you must beat her,
then."

For, don't you mark? we're made so that we
love

First when we see them painted, things we have passed

Perhaps a hundred times nor cared to see;
And so they are better, painted — better to us,
Which is the same thing. Art was given for
that;

God uses us to help each other so,
Lending our minds out. Have you noticed,
now,

Your cullion's hanging face? A bit of chalk,
And trust me but you should, though! How much more,

If I drew higher things with the same truth!
That were to take the Prior's pulpit-place,
Interpret God to all of you! Oh, oh,
It makes me mad to see what men shall do
And we in our graves! This world's no blot
for us,

Nor blank; it means intensely, and means
good:

To find its meaning is my meat and drink.
"Ay, but you don't so instigate to prayer!"
Strikes in the Prior: "when your meaning's
plain

It does not say to folk — remember matins,
Or, mind you fast next Friday!" Why, for
this

What need of art at all? A skull and bones,
Two bits of stick nailed crosswise, or, what's best,

A bell to chime the hour with, does as well.
I painted a Saint Laurence six months since
At Prato, splashed the fresco in fine style:
"How looks my painting, now the scaffold's
down?"

I ask a brother: "Hugely," he returns —
"Already not one phiz of your three slaves
Who turn the Deacon off his toasted side,
But 's scratched and prodded to our heart's content,

The pious people have so eased their own
With coming to say prayers there in a rage:
We get on fast to see the bricks beneath.
Expect another job this time next year,
For pity and religion grow i' the crowd —
Your painting serves its purpose!" Hang the fools!

— That is — you'll not mistake an idle word
Spoke in a huff by a poor monk, God wot,
Tasting the air this spicy night which turns
The unaccustomed head like Chianti wine!
Oh, the church knows! don't misreport me,
now!

It's natural a poor monk out of bounds
Should have his apt word to excuse himself:
And hearken how I plot to make amends.
I have bethought me: I shall paint a piece
... There's for you! Give me six months, then go, see

Something in Sant' Ambrogio's! Bless the nuns!

They want a cast o' my office. I shall paint
God in the midst, Madonna and her babe,
Ringed by a bowery, flowery angel-brood,
Lilies and vestments and white faces, sweet
As puff on puff of grated orris-root
When ladies crowd to Church at midsummer.
And then i' the front, of course a saint or
two —

Saint John, because he saves the Florentines, Saint Ambrose, who puts down in black and
white

The convent's friends and gives them a long
day,

And Job, I must have him there past mistake,

The man of Uz (and Us without the z, Painters who need his patience). Well, all these

Secured at their devotion, up shall come
Out of a corner when you least expect,
As one by a dark stair into a great light,
Music and talking, who but Lippo! I! — Mazed, motionless, and moonstruck — I'm the
man!

Back I shrink — what is this I see and hear?
I, caught up with my monk's-things by mistake,

My old serge gown and rope that goes all round,
I, in this presence, this pure company!
Where's a hole, where's a corner for escape?
Then steps a sweet angelic slip of a thing Forward, puts out a soft palm — "Not so fast!"

— Addresses the celestial presence, "nay —
He made you and devised you, after all,
Though he's none of you! Could Saint John there draw —

His camel-hair make up a painting-brush?
We come to brother Lippo for all that,
Iste perfecit opus!" So, all smile —

I shuffle sideways with my blushing face
Under the cover of a hundred wings
Thrown like a spread of kirtles when you're gay

And play hot cockles, all the doors being shut,
Till, wholly unexpected, in there pops

The hothead husband! Thus I scuttle off
To some safe bench behind, not letting go
The palm of her, the little lily thing

That spoke the good word for me in the nick,
Like the Prior's niece . . . Saint Lucy, I would
say.

And so all's saved for me, and for the church
A pretty picture gained. Go, six months hence!
Your hand, sir, and good-by: no lights, no
lights!

The street's hushed, and I know my own way
back,

Don't fear me! There's the gray beginning.
Zooks!

ANDREA DEL SARTO

CALLED "THE FAULTLESS PAINTER"

BUT do not let us quarrel any more,
No, my Lucrezia; bear with me for once:
Sit down and all shall happen as you wish.
You turn your face, but does it bring your
heart?

I'll work then for your friend's friend, never
fear,

Treat his own subject after his own way,
Fix his own time, accept too his own price,
And shut the money into this small hand
When next it takes mine. Will it? tenderly?
Oh, I'll content him, — but to-morrow, Love!
I often am much wearier than you think,
This evening more than usual, and it seems
As if — forgive now — should you let me sit
Here by the window with your hand in mine
And look a half-hour forth on Fiesole,
Both of one mind, as married people use,
Quietly, quietly the evening through,
I might get up to-morrow to my work
Cheerful and fresh as ever. Let us try.
To-morrow, how you shall be glad for this!
Your soft hand is a woman of itself,
And mine the man's bared breast she curls inside.

Don't count the time lost, neither; you must serve

For each of the five pictures we require:
It saves a model. So! keep looking so —
My serpentine beauty, rounds on rounds!
— How could you ever prick those perfect ears,
Even to put the pearl there! oh, so sweet —
My face, my moon, my everybody's moon,
Which everybody looks on and calls his,
And, I suppose, is looked on by in turn,
While she looks — no one's: very dear, no less.
You smile? why, there's my picture ready
made,

There's what we painters call our harmony!
A common grayness silvers everything, —
All in a twilight, you and I alike
— You, at the point of your first pride in me (That's gone you know), — but I, at every point;

My youth, my hope, my art, being all toned
down

To yonder sober pleasant Fiesole.
There's the bell clinking from the chapel-top;
That length of convent-wall across the way
Holds the trees safer, huddled more inside;
The last monk leaves the garden; days decrease,

And autumn grows, autumn in everything.
Eh? the whole seems to fall into a shape
As if I saw alike my work and self
And all that I was born to be and do,
A twilight-piece. Love, we are in God's hand.
How strange now looks the life he makes us
lead;

So free we seem, so fettered fast we are!
I feel he laid the fetter: let it lie!
This chamber for example — turn your head —
All that's behind us! You don't understand

Nor care to understand about my art,
But you can hear at least when people speak:
And that cartoon, the second from the door
— It is the thing, Love! so such thing should
be —

Behold Madonna! — I am bold to say.
I can do with my pencil what I know,
What I see, what at bottom of my heart
I wish for, if I ever wish so deep —
Do easily, too — when I say, perfectly,
I do not boast, perhaps: yourself are judge,
Who listened to the Legate's talk last week,
And just as much they used to say in France.
At any rate 't is easy, all of it!
No sketches first, no studies, that's long past:
I do what many dream of all their lives,
— Dream? strive to do, and agonize to do,
And fail in doing. I could count twenty such
On twice your fingers, and not leave this town,
Who strive — you don't know how the others strive

To paint a little thing like that you smeared
Carelessly passing with your robes afloat, —
Yet do much less, so much less, Someone says,
(I know his name, no matter) — so much less!
Well, less is more, Lucrezia: I am judged.
There burns a truer light of God in them,
In their vexed beating stuffed and stopped-up brain,

Heart, or whate'er else, than goes on to prompt
This low-pulsed forthright craftsman's hand of
mine.

Their works drop groundward, but themselves,
I know,

Reach many a time a heaven that's shut to me,
Enter and take their place there sure enough.
Though they come back and cannot tell the
world.

My works are nearer heaven, but I sit here.
The sudden blood of these men! at a word —
Praise them, it boils, or blame them, it boils
too.

I, painting from myself and to myself,
Know what I do, am unmoved by men's blame
Or their praise either. Somebody remarks
Morello's outline there is wrongly traced,
His hue mistaken; what of that? or else,
Rightly traced and well ordered; what of that?
Speak as they please, what does the mountain
care?

Ah, but a man's reach should exceed his grasp,
Or what's a heaven for? All is silver-gray
Placid and perfect with my art: the worse!
I know both what I want and what might gain,
And yet how profitless to know, to sigh
"Had I been two, another and myself,
Our head would have o'erlooked the world!"

No doubt.
Yonder's a work now, of that famous youth
The Urbinate who died five years ago.
(T is copied, George Vasari sent it.)
Well, I can fancy how he did it all,
Pouring his soul, with kings and popes to see,
Reaching, that heaven might so replenish him.
Above and through his art — for it gives way;
That arm is wrongly put — and there again —
A fault to pardon in the drawing's lines,
Its body, so to speak: its soul is right,

He means right — that, a child may understand.
Still, what an arm ! and I could alter it :
But all the play, the insight and the stretch —
Out of me, out of me ! And wherefore out ?
Had you enjoined them on me, given me soul,
We might have risen to Rafael, I and you !
Nay, Love, you did give all I asked, I think —
More than I merit, yes, by many times.
But had you — oh, with the same perfect brow,
And perfect eyes, and more than perfect mouth,
And the low voice my soul hears, as a bird
The fowler's pipe, and follows to the snare —
Had you, with these the same, but brought a mind !

Some women do so. Had the mouth there urged
" God and the glory ! never care for gain.
The present by the future, what is that ?
Live for fame, side by side with Agnolo !
Rafael is waiting : up to God, all three ! "
I might have done it for you. So it seems :
Perhaps not. All is as God overrules.
Beside, incentives come from the soul's self ;
The rest avail not. Why do I need you ?
What wife had Rafael, or has Agnolo ?
In this world, who can do a thing, will not ;
And who would do it, cannot, I perceive :
Yet the will 's somewhat — somewhat, too, the
power —

And thus we half-men struggle. At the end,
God, I conclude, compensates, punishes.
'T is safer for me, if the award be strict,
That I am something underrated here,
Poor this long while, despised, to speak the
truth.

I dared not, do you know, leave home all day,
For fear of chancing on the Paris lords.
The best is when they pass and look aside ;
But they speak sometimes ; I must bear it all.
Well may they speak ! That Francis, that first
time,

And that long festal year at Fontainebleau !
I surely then could sometimes leave the ground,
Put on the glory, Rafael's daily wear,
In that humane great monarch's golden look, —
One finger in his beard or twisted curl
Over his mouth's good mark that made the
smile,

One arm about my shoulder, round my neck,
The jingle of his gold chain in my ear,
I painting proudly with his breath on me,
All his court round him, seeing with his eyes,
Such frank French eyes, and such a fire of souls Profuse, my hand kept plying by those hearts, —

And, best of all, this, this, this face beyond,
This in the background, waiting on my work,
To crown the issue with a last reward !
A good time, was it not, my kingly days ?
And had you not grown restless . . . but I
know —

'T is done and past ; 't was right, my instinct
said ;

Too live the life grew, golden and not gray,
And I 'm the weak-eyed bat no sun should
tempt

Out of the grange whose four walls make his
world.

How could it end in any other way ?

You called me, and I came home to your heart.
The triumph was — to reach and stay there ;
since

I reached it ere the triumph, what is lost ?
Let my hands frame your face in your hair's
gold,

You beautiful Lucrezia that are mine !
" Rafael did this, Andrea painted that ;
The Roman's is the better when you pray.
But still the other's Virgin was his wife " —
Men will excuse me. I am glad to judge
Both pictures in your presence ; clearer grows
My better fortune, I resolve to think.
For, do you know, Lucrezia, as God lives,
Said one day Agnolo, his very self,
To Rafael . . . I have known it all these years . . .

(When the young man was flaming out his thoughts

Upon a palace-wall for Rome to see,
Too lifted up in heart because of it)
" Friend, there 's a certain sorry little scrub
Goes up and down our Florence, none cares how,
Who, were he set to plan and execute
As you are, pricked on by your popes and kings,
Would bring the sweat into that brow of yours ! "
To Rafael's ! — And indeed the arm is wrong.
I hardly dare . . . yet, only you to see,
Give the chalk here — quick, thus the line should go !

Ay, but the soul ! he 's Rafael ! rub it out !
Still, all I care for, if he spoke the truth,
(What he ? why, who but Michel Agnolo ?
Do you forget already words like those ? )
If really there was such a chance, so lost, —
Is, whether you 're — not grateful — but more pleased.

Well, let me think so. And you smile indeed !
This hour has been an hour ! Another smile ?
If you would sit thus by me every night
I should work better, do you comprehend ?
I mean that I should earn more, give you more.
See, it is settled dusk now ; there 's a star ;
Morello 's gone, the watch-lights show the wall,
The cue-owls speak the name we call them by.
Come from the window, love, — come in, at last,
Inside the melancholy little house
We built to be so gay with. God is just.

King Francis may forgive me : oft at nights
When I look up from painting, eyes tired out,
The walls become illumined, brick from brick
Distinct, instead of mortar, fierce bright gold,
That gold of his I did cement them with !
Let us but love each other. Must you go ?
That Cousin here again ? he waits outside ?
Must see you — you, and not with me ? Those loans ?

More gaming debts to pay ? you smiled for that ?
Well, let smiles buy me ! have you more to spend ?

While hand and eye and something of a heart
Are left me, work 's my ware, and what 's it
worth ?

I 'll pay my fancy. Only let me sit
The gray remainder of the evening out,
Idle, you call it, and muse perfectly
How I could paint, were I but back in France,
One picture, just one more — the Virgin's face,

Not yours this time ! I want you at my side
To hear them — that is, Michel Agnolo —
Judge all I do and tell you of its worth.
Will you ? To-morrow, satisfy your friend.
I take the subjects for his corridor,
Finish the portrait out of hand — there, there,
And throw him in another thing or two
If he demurs ; the whole should prove enough
To pay for this same Cousin's freak. Beside,
What's better and what's all I care about,
Get you the thirteen scudi for the ruff !
Love, does that please you ? Ah, but what does
he,

The Cousin ! what does he to please you more ?

I am grown peaceful as old age to-night.
I regret little, I would change still less.
Since there my past life lies, why alter it ?
The very wrong to Francis ! — it is true
I took his coin, was tempted and complied,
And built this house and sinned, and all is said.
My father and my mother died of want.
Well, had I riches of my own ? you see
How one gets rich ! Let each one bear his lot.
They were born poor, lived poor, and poor they died :

And I have labored somewhat in my time
And not been paid profusely. Some good son
Paint my two hundred pictures — let him try !
No doubt, there's something strikes a balance.

Yes,

You loved me quite enough, it seems to-night.
This must suffice me here. What would one
have ?

In heaven, perhaps, new chances, one more
chance —

Four great walls in the New Jerusalem,
Meted on each side by the angel's reed,
For Leonard, Rafael, Agnolo and me
To cover — the three first without a wife,
While I have mine ! So — still they overcome
Because there's still Lucrezia, — as I choose.

Again the Cousin's whistle ! Go, my Love.

THE BISHOP ORDERS HIS TOMB AT SAINT PRAXED'S CHURCH

ROME, 15—

This poem was first published in Hood's Magazine, March, 1845, with the title The Tomb at Saint Praxed's (Rome, 15—).

VANITY, saith the preacher, vanity !
Draw round my bed : is Anselm keeping back ?
Nephews — sons mine . . . ah God, I know not !

Well —

She, men would have to be your mother once,
Old Gandolf envied me, so fair she was !
What's done is done, and she is dead beside,
Dead long ago, and I am Bishop since,
And as she died so must we die ourselves,
And thence ye may perceive the world's a dream.
Life, how and what is it ? As here I lie
In this state-chamber, dying by degrees,

Hours and long hours in the dead night, I ask
" Do I live, am I dead ? " Peace, peace seems
all.

Saint Praxed's ever was the church for peace ;
And so, about this tomb of mine. I fought
With tooth and nail to save my niche, ye know :
— Old Gandolf cozened me, despite my care ;
Shrewd was that snatch from out the corner
South

He graced his carrion with, God curse the same !
Yet still my niche is not so cramped but thence
One sees the pulpit o' the epistle-side,
And somewhat of the choir, those silent seats,
And up into the airy dome where live
The angels, and a sunbeam's sure to lurk :
And I shall fill my slab of basalt there,
And 'neath my tabernacle take my rest,
With those nine columns round me, two and two,
The odd one at my feet where Anselm stands :
Peach-blossom marble all, the rare, the ripe
As fresh-poured red wine of a mighty pulse.
— Old Gandolf with his paltry onion-stone,
Put me where I may look at him ! True peach,
Rosy and flawless : how I earned the prize !
Draw close : that conflagration of my church
— What then ? So much was saved if aught were missed !

My sons, ye would not be my death ? Go dig
The white-grape vineyard where the oil-press
stood,

Drop water gently till the surface sink,
And if ye find . . . Ah God, I know not, I ! . . .
Bedded in store of rotten fig-leaves soft,
And corded up in a tight olive-frail,
Some lump, ah God, of lapis lazuli,
Big as a Jew's head cut off at the nape,
Blue as a vein o'er the Madonna's breast . . .
Sons, all have I bequeathed you, villas, all,
That brave Frascati villa with its bath,
So, let the blue lump poise between my knees,
Like God the Father's globe on both his hands
Ye worship in the Jesu Church so gay,
For Gandolf shall not choose but see and burst !
Swift as a weaver's shuttle fleet our years :
Man goeth to the grave, and where is he ?
Did I say basalt for my slab, sons ? Black —
'T was ever antique-black I meant ! How else
Shall ye contrast my frieze to come beneath ?
The bas-relief in bronze ye promised me,
Those Pans and Nymphs ye wot of, and per-
chance

Some tripod, thyrsus, with a vase or so,
The Saviour at his sermon on the mount,
Saint Praxed in a glory, and one Pan
Ready to twitch the Nymph's last garment off,
And Moses with the tables . . . but I know
Ye mark me not ! What do they whisper thee,
Child of my bowels, Anselm ? Ah, ye hope
To revel down my villas while I gasp
Bricked o'er with beggar's mouldy travertine
Which Gandolf from his tomb-top chuckles at !
Nay, boys, ye love me — all of jasper, then !
'T is jasper ye stand pledged to, lest I grieve
My bath must needs be left behind, alas !
One block, pure green as a pistachio-nut,
There's plenty jasper somewhere in the world —
And have I not Saint Praxed's ear to pray
Horses for ye, and brown Greek manuscripts,

And mistresses with great smooth marbly limbs ?
 — That's if ye carve my epitaph aright,
 Choice Latin, picked phrase, Tully's every word,
 No gaudy ware like Gandolf's second line —
 Tully, my masters ? Ulpian serves his need !
 And then how I shall lie through centuries,
 And hear the blessed mutter of the mass,
 And see God made and eaten all day long,
 And feel the steady candle-flame, and taste
 Good strong thick stupefying incense-smoke !
 For as I lie here, hours of the dead night,
 Dying in state and by such slow degrees,
 I fold my arms as if they clasped a crook,
 And stretch my feet forth straight as stone can
 point,

And let the bedclothes, for a morteloth, drop
 Into great laps and folds of sculptor's-work :
 And as yon tapers dwindle, and strange thoughts
 Grow, with a certain humming in my ears,
 About the life before I lived this life,
 And this life too, popes, cardinals and priests,
 Saint Praxed at his sermon on the mount,
 Your tall pale mother with her talking eyes,
 And new-found agate urns as fresh as day,
 And marble's language, Latin pure, discreet,
 — Aha, ELUCESCERAT quoth our friend ?
 No Tully, said I, Ulpian at the best !
 Evil and brief hath been my pilgrimage.
 All lapis, all, sons ! Else I give the Pope
 My villas ! Will ye ever eat my heart ?
 Ever your eyes were as a lizard's quick,
 They glitter like your mother's for my soul,
 Or ye would heighten my impoverished frieze,
 Piece out its starved design, and fill my vase
 With grapes, and add a visor and a Term,
 And to the tripod ye would tie a lynx
 That in his struggle throws the thyrsus down,
 To comfort me on my entablature
 Whereon I am to lie till I must ask
 "Do I live, am I dead ?" There, leave me,
 there !

For ye have stabbed me with ingratitude
 To death — ye wish it — God, ye wish it !
 Stone —

Gritstone, a-erumble ! Clammy squares which sweat
 As if the corpse they keep were oozing
 through —

And no more lapis to delight the world !
 Well, go ! I bless ye. Fewer tapers there,
 But in a row : and, going, turn your backs —
 — Ay, like departing altar-ministrants,
 And leave me in my church, the church for
 peace,

That I may watch at leisure if he leers —
 Old Gandolf — at me, from his onion-stone,
 As still he envied me, so fair she was !

BISHOP BLOUGRAM'S APOLOGY

No more wine ? then we'll push back chairs and talk.

A final glass for me, though : cool, i' faith !
 We ought to have our Abbey back, you see.
 It's different, preaching in basilicas,
 And doing duty in some masterpiece
 Like this of brother Pugin's, bless his heart !

I doubt if they're half baked, those chalk rosettes,
 Ciphers and stucco-twiddlings everywhere ;
 It's just like breathing in a lime-kiln : eh ?
 These hot long ceremonies of our church
 Cost us a little — oh, they pay the price,
 You take me — amply pay it ! Now, we'll talk.

So, you despise me, Mr. Gigadibs.
 No deprecation, — nay, I beg you, sir !
 Beside 't is our engagement : don't you know,
 I promised, if you'd watch a dinner out,
 We'd see truth dawn together ? — truth that peeps

Over the glasses' edge when dinner's done,
 And body gets its sop and holds its noise
 And leaves soul free a little. Now's the time :
 Truth's break of day ! You do despise me then.
 And if I say, "despise me," — never fear !
 I know you do not in a certain sense —
 Not in my arm-chair, for example : here,
 I well imagine you respect my place
 (Status, entourage, worldly circumstance)
 Quite to its value — very much indeed :
 — Are up to the protesting eyes of you
 In pride at being seated here for once —
 You'll turn it to such capital account !

When somebody, through years and years to
 come,
 Hints of the bishop, — names me — that's
 enough :

"Blougram ? I knew him" — (into it you slide)

"Dined with him once, a Corpus Christi Day,
 All alone, we two ; he's a clever man :
 And after dinner, — why, the wine you
 know, —

Oh, there was wine, and good ! — what with the wine . . .

'Faith, we began upon all sorts of talk !
 He's no bad fellow, Blougram ; he had seen
 Something of mine he relished, some review :
 He's quite above their humbug in his heart,
 Half-said as much, indeed — the thing's his trade.

I warrant, Blougram's skeptical at times :
 How otherwise ? I liked him, I confess !"

Che che, my dear sir, as we say at Rome, Don't you protest now ! It's fair give and take ;

You have had your turn and spoken your home-truths :

The hand's mine now, and here you follow suit.

Thus much conceded, still the first fact stays —

You do despise me ; your ideal of life
 Is not the bishop's ; you would not be I.
 You would like better to be Goethe, now,
 Or Buonaparte, or, bless me, lower still,
 Count D'Orsay, — so you did what you pre-
 ferred,

Spoke as you thought, and, as you cannot help,
 Believed or disbelieved, no matter what,
 So long as on that point, whate'er it was,
 You loosed your mind, were whole and sole
 yourself.

— That, my ideal never can include,

Upon that element of truth and worth
Never be based ! for say they make me Pope —
(They can't — suppose it for our argument !)
Why, there I'm at my tether's end, I've reached

My height, and not a height which pleases you :
An unbelieving Pope won't do, you say.
It's like those eerie stories nurses tell,
Of how some actor on a stage played Death,
With pasteboard crown, sham orb and tinselled
dart,

And called himself the monarch of the world ;
Then, going in the tire-room afterward,
Because the play was done, to shift himself,
Got touched upon the sleeve familiarly,
The moment he had shut the closet door,
By Death himself. Thus God might touch a
Pope

At unawares, ask what his baubles mean,
And whose part he presumed to play just now.
Best be yourself, imperial, plain and true !

So, drawing comfortable breath again,
You weigh and find, whatever more or less
I boast of my ideal realized
Is nothing in the balance when opposed
To your ideal, your grand simple life,
Of which you will not realize one jot.
I am much, you are nothing ; you would be all,
I would be merely much : you beat me there.

No, friend, you do not beat me : hearken why !
The common problem, yours, mine, every one's,
Is — not to fancy what were fair in life
Provided it could be, — but, finding first
What may be, then find how to make it fair
Up to our means : a very different thing !
No abstract intellectual plan of life
Quite irrespective of life's plainest laws,
But one, a man, who is man and nothing more,
May lead within a world which (by your leave)
Is Rome or London, not Fool's-paradise.
Embellish Rome, idealize away,
Make paradise of London if you can,
You're welcome, nay, you're wise.

A simile !

We mortals cross the ocean of this world
Each in his average cabin of a life ;
The best's not big, the worst yields elbow-
room.
Now for our six months' voyage — how prepare ?

You come on shipboard with a landsman's list
Of things he calls convenient : so they are !
An India screen is pretty furniture,
A piano-forte is a fine resource,
All Balzac's novels occupy one shelf,
The new edition fifty volumes long ;
And little Greek books, with the funny type
They get up well at Leipsic, fill the next :
Go on ! slabbed marble, what a bath it makes !
And Parma's pride, the Jerome, let us add !
'T were pleasant could Correggio's fleeting glow
Hang full in face of one where'er one roams,
Since he more than the others brings with him
Italy's self, — the marvellous Modenese ! —
Yet was not on your list before, perhaps.

— Alas, friend, here's the agent . . . is't the
name ?

The captain, or whoever's master here —

You see him screw his face up ; what's his cry

Ere you set foot on shipboard ? "Six feet square !"

If you won't understand what six feet mean,
Compute and purchase stores accordingly —
And if, in pique because he overhauls
Your Jerome, piano, bath, you come on board
Bare — why, you cut a figure at the first
While sympathetic landsmen see you off ;
Not afterward, when long ere half seas over,
You peep up from your utterly naked boards
Into some snug and well-appointed berth,
Like mine for instance (try the cooler jug —
Put back the other, but don't jog the ice !)
And mortified you mutter, "Well and good ;
He sits enjoying his sea-furniture ;
'T is stout and proper, and there's store of it :
Though I've the better notion, all agree,
Of fitting rooms up. Hang the carpenter,
Neat ship-shape fixings and contrivances —
I would have brought my Jerome, frame and
all !"

And meantime you bring nothing : never
mind —

You've proved your artist-nature : what you don't

You might bring, so despise me, as I say.

Now come, let's backward to the starting-
place.

See my way : we're two college friends, suppose.

Prepare together for our voyage, then ;
Each note and check the other in his work, —
Here's mine, a bishop's outfit ; criticise !
What's wrong ? why won't you be a bishop
too ?

Why first, you don't believe, you don't and
can't,

(Not stately, that is, and fixedly

And absolutely and exclusively)

In any revelation called divine.

No dogmas nail your faith ; and what remains

But say so, like the honest man you are ?

First, therefore, overhaul theology !

Nay, I too, not a fool, you please to think,

Must find believing every whit as hard :

And if I do not frankly say as much,

The ugly consequence is clear enough.

Now wait, my friend : well, I do not believe —

If you'll accept no faith that is not fixed,

Absolute and exclusive, as you say.

You're wrong — I mean to prove it in due
time.

Meanwhile, I know where difficulties lie

I could not, cannot solve, nor ever shall,

So give up hope accordingly to solve —

(To you, and over the wine). Our dogmas then

With both of us, though in unlike degree,

Missing full credence — overboard with them !

I mean to meet you on your own premise :

Good, there go mine in company with yours !

And now what are we? unbelievers both,
Calm and complete, determinately fixed
To-day, to-morrow, and forever, pray?
You 'll guarantee me that? Not so, I think!
In no wise! all we 've gained is, that belief,
As unbelief before, shakes us by fits.
Confounds us like its predecessor. Where 's
The gain? how can we guard our unbelief,
Make it bear fruit to us? — the problem here.
Just when we are safest, there 's a sunset-touch,
A fancy from a flower-bell, some one's death,
A chorus-ending from Euripides, —
And that 's enough for fifty hopes and fears
As old and new at once as nature's self,
To rap and knock and enter in our soul,
Take hands and dance there, a fantastic ring,
Round the ancient idol, on his base again, —
The grand Perhaps! We look on helplessly.
There the old misgivings, crooked questions
are —

This good God, — what he could do, if he would,
Would, if he could — then must have done long
since:

If so, when, where and how? some way must
be, —

Once feel about, and soon or late you hit
Some sense, in which it might be, after all.
Why not, "The Way, the Truth, the Life?"

— That way

Over the mountain, which who stands upon
Is apt to doubt if it be meant for a road;
While, if he views it from the waste itself,
Up goes the line there, plain from base to brow,
Not vague, mistakable! what 's a break or two
Seen from the unbroken desert either side?
And then (to bring in fresh philosophy)
What if the breaks themselves should prove at
last

The most consummate of contrivances
To train a man's eye, teach him what is faith?
And so we stumble at truth's very test!
All we have gained then by our unbelief
Is a life of doubt diversified by faith,
For one of faith diversified by doubt:
We called the chess-board white, — we call it black.

"Well," you rejoin, "the end 's no worse, at
least;

We 've reason for both colors on the board:
Why not confess then, where I drop the faith
And you the doubt, that I 'm as right as you?"

Because, friend, in the next place, this being
so,

And both things even, — faith and unbelief
Left to a man's choice, — we 'll proceed a step,
Returning to our image, which I like.

A man's choice, yes — but a cabin-passenger's —

The man made for the special life o' the
world —

Do you forget him? I remember though!
Consult our ship's conditions and you find
One and but one choice suitable to all;
The choice, that you unluckily prefer,

Turning things topsy-turvy — they or it
Going to the ground. Belief or unbelief
Bears upon life, determines its whole course,
Begins at its beginning. See the world
Such as it is, — you made it not, nor I;
I mean to take it as it is, — and you,
Not so you 'll take it, — though you get naught
else.

I know the special kind of life I like,
What suits the most my idiosyncrasy,
Brings out the best of me and bears me fruit
In power, peace, pleasantness and length of days.

I find that positive belief does this
For me, and unbelief, no whit of this.
— For you, it does, however? — that, we 'll try!
'Tis clear, I cannot lead my life, at least,
Induce the world to let me peaceably,
Without declaring at the outset, "Friends,
I absolutely and peremptorily
Believe!" — I say, faith is my waking life:
One sleeps, indeed, and dreams at intervals,
We know, but waking 's the main point with
us,

And my provision 's for life's waking part.
Accordingly, I use heart, head and hand
All day, I build, scheme, study, and make
friends;

And when night overtakes me, down I lie,
Sleep, dream a little, and get done with it,
The sooner the better, to begin afresh.
What 's midnight doubt before the day'spring's
faith?

You, the philosopher, that disbelieve,
That recognize the night, give dreams their weight —

To be consistent you should keep your bed,
Abstain from healthy acts that prove you man,
For fear you drowse perhaps at unawares!
And certainly at night you 'll sleep and dream,
Live through the day and bustle as you please.
And so you live to sleep as I to wake,
To unbelieve as I to still believe?
Well, and the common sense o' the world calls
you

Bed-ridden, — and its good things come to me.
Its estimation, which is half the fight,
That 's the first-cabin comfort I secure:
The next . . . but you perceive with half an
eye!

Come, come, it 's best believing, if we may;
You can't but own that!

Next, concede again,

If once we choose belief, on all accounts
We can't be too decisive in our faith,
Conclusive and exclusive in its terms,
To suit the world which gives us the good
things.

In every man's career are certain points
Whereon he dares not be indifferent;
The world detects him clearly, if he dare,
As baffled at the game, and losing life.
He may care little or he may care much
For riches, honor, pleasure, work, repose.
Since various theories of life and life's
Success are extant which might easily
Comport with either estimate of these;

And whoso chooses wealth or poverty,
 Labor or quiet, is not judged a fool
 Because his fellow would choose otherwise :
 We let him choose upon his own account
 So long as he 's consistent with his choice,
 But certain points, left wholly to himself,
 When once a man has arbitrated on,
 We say he must succeed there or go hang.
 Thus, he should wed the woman he loves most
 Or needs most, whatso'er the love or need —
 For he can't wed twice. Then, he must avouch,
 Or follow, at the least, sufficiently,
 The form of faith his conscience holds the best,
 Whate'er the process of conviction was :
 For nothing can compensate his mistake
 On such a point, the man himself being judge :
 He cannot wed twice, nor twice lose his soul.

Well now, there 's one great form of Christian
 faith

I happened to be born in — which to teach
 Was given me as I grew up, on all hands,
 As best and readiest means of living by ;
 The same on examination being proved
 The most pronounced moreover, fixed, precise
 And absolute form of faith in the whole world —
 Accordingly, most potent of all forms
 For working on the world. Observe, my
 friend !

Such as you know me, I am free to say,
 In these hard latter days which hamper one,
 Myself — by no immoderate exercise
 Of intellect and learning, but the tact
 To let external forces work for me, — Bid the street's stones be bread and they are
 bread ;

Bid Peter's creed, or rather, Hildebrand's,
 Exalt me o'er my fellows in the world
 And make my life an ease and joy and pride ;
 It does so, — which for me 's a great point
 gained,

Who have a soul and body that exact
 A comfortable care in many ways.
 There 's power in me and will to dominate
 Which I must exercise, they hurt me else :
 In many ways I need mankind's respect,
 Obedience, and the love that 's born of fear :
 While at the same time, there 's a taste I have,
 A toy of soul, a titillating thing,
 Refuses to digest these dainties crude.

The naked life is gross till clothed upon :
 I must take what men offer, with a grace
 As though I would not, could I help it, take !
 An uniform I wear though over-rich —
 Something imposed on me, no choice of mine ;
 No fancy-dress worn for pure fancy's sake
 And despicable therefore ! now folk kneel
 And kiss my hand — of course the Church's
 hand.

Thus I am made, thus life is best for me,
 And thus that it should be I have procured ;
 And thus it could not be another way,
 I venture to imagine.

You 'll reply,
 So far my choice, no doubt, is a success ;
 But were I made of better elements,
 With nobler instincts, purer tastes, like you,

I hardly would account the thing success
 Though it did all for me I say.

But, friend,
 We speak of what is ; not of what might be,
 And how 't were better if 't were otherwise.
 I am the man you see here plain enough :
 Grant I 'm a beast, why, beasts must lead beasts' lives !

Suppose I own at once to tail and claws ;
 The tailless man exceeds me : but being tailed
 I 'll lash out lion fashion, and leave apes
 To dock their stump and dress their haunches
 up.

My business is not to remake myself,
 But make the absolute best of what God made.
 Or — our first simile — though you prove me doomed

To a viler berth still, to the steerage-hole,
 The sheep-pen or the pig-sty, I should strive
 To make what use of each were possible ;
 And as this cabin gets upholstery,
 That hutch should rustle with sufficient straw.

But, friend, I don't acknowledge quite so fast
 I fail of all your manhood's lofty tastes
 Enumerated so complacently,
 On the mere ground that you forsooth can find
 In this particular life I choose to lead
 No fit provision for them. Can you not ?
 Say you, my fault is I address myself
 To grosser estimators than should judge ?
 And that 's no way of holding up the soul,
 Which, nobler, needs men's praise perhaps, yet
 knows

One wise man's verdict outweighs all the fools' —
 Would like the two, but, forced to choose,
 takes that.

I pine among my million imbeciles
 (You think) aware some dozen men of sense
 Eye me and know me, whether I believe
 In the last winking Virgin, as I vow,
 And am a fool, or disbelieve in her
 And am a knave, — approve in neither case,
 Withhold their voices though I look their way :
 Like Verdi when, at his worst opera's end
 (The thing they gave at Florence, — what 's its name ?)

While the mad houseful's plaudits near out-bang
 His orchestra of salt-box, tongs, and bones,
 He looks through all the roaring and the wreaths
 Where sits Rossini patient in his stall.

Nay, friend, I meet you with an answer
 here —

That even your prime men who appraise their kind

Are men still, catch a wheel within a wheel,
 See more in a truth than the truth's simple self,
 Confuse themselves. You see lads walk the street

Sixty the minute ; what 's to note in that ?
 You see one lad o'erstride a chimney-stack ;
 Him you must watch — he 's sure to fall, yet
 stands !

Our interest 's on the dangerous edge of things.
The honest thief, the tender murderer,
The superstitious atheist, demirep
That loves and saves her soul in new French
books —

We watch while these in equilibrium keep
The giddy line midway : one step aside, They're classed and done with. I, then, keep the line

Before your sages, — just the men to shrink
From the gross weights, coarse scales and labels broad

You offer their refinement. Fool or knave?
Why needs a bishop be a fool or knave
When there 's a thousand diamond weights between?

So, I enlist them. Your picked twelve, you 'll
find,

Profess themselves indignant, scandalized
At thus being held unable to explain
How a superior man who disbelieves
May not believe as well: that 's Schelling's
way!

It 's through my coming in the tail of time,
Nicking the minute with a happy tact.
Had I been born three hundred years ago They'd say, "What 's strange?" Blougram of course believes; "

And, seventy years since, "disbelieves of
course."

But now, "He may believe; and yet, and yet
How can he?" All eyes turn with interest.
Whereas, step off the line on either side —
You, for example, clever to a fault,
The rough and ready man who write apace,
Read somewhat seldomer, think perhaps even less —

You disbelieve! Who wonders and who cares?
Lord So-and-So — his coat bedropped with wax,

All Peter's chains about his waist, his back
Brave with the needlework of Noddledom —
Believes! Again, who wonders and who cares?
But I, the man of sense and learning too,
The able to think yet act, the this, the that,
I, to believe at this late time of day!
Enough; you see, I need not fear contempt.

— Except it 's yours! Admire me as these may,
You don't. But whom at least do you admire?
Present your own perfection, your ideal,
Your pattern man for a minute — oh, make
haste!

Is it Napoleon you would have us grow?
Concede the means; allow his head and hand,
(A large concession, clever as you are)
Good! In our common primal element
Of unbelief (we can't believe, you know —
We're still at that admission, recollect!)
Where do you find — apart from, towering o'er
The secondary temporary aims
Which satisfy the gross taste you despise —
Where do you find his star? — his crazy trust
God knows through what or in what? it 's alive
And shines and leads him, and that 's all we want.

Have we aught in our sober night shall point

Such ends as his were, and direct the means
Of working out our purpose straight as his,
Nor bring a moment's trouble on success
With after-care to justify the same?

— Be a Napoleon, and yet disbelieve —
Why, the man 's mad, friend, take his light
away!

What 's the vague good o' the world, for which you dare

With comfort to yourself blow millions up?
We neither of us see it! we do see
The blown-up millions — spatter of their brains
And writhing of their bowels and so forth,
In that bewildering entanglement
Of horrible eventualities

Past calculation to the end of time!
Can I mistake for some clear word of God
(Which were my ample warrant for it all)
His puff of hazy instinct, idle talk,
"The State, that 's I," quack-nonsense about
crowns,

And (when one beats the man to his last hold)
A vague idea of setting things to rights,
Policing people efficaciously,
More to their profit, most of all to his own;
The whole to end that dismallest of ends
By an Austrian marriage, cant to us the Church,
And resurrection of the old régime?

Would I, who hope to live a dozen years,
Fight Austerlitz for reasons such and such?
No: for, concede me but the merest chance
Doubt may be wrong — there 's judgment, life to come!

With just that chance, I dare not. Doubt proves right?

This present life is all? — you offer me
Its dozen noisy years, without a chance
That wedding an archduchess, wearing lace,
And getting called by divers new-coined names,
Will drive off ugly thoughts and let me dine,
Sleep, read and chat in quiet as I like!
Therefore I will not.

Take another case;

Fit up the cabin yet another way.
What say you to the poets? shall we write
Hamlet, Othello — make the world our own,
Without a risk to run of either sort?
I can't! — to put the strongest reason first.
"But try," you urge, "the trying shall suffice;
The aim, if reached or not, makes great the
life:
Try to be Shakespeare, leave the rest to fate!"
Spare my self-knowledge — there 's no fooling
me!

If I prefer remaining my poor self,
I say so not in self-dispraise but praise.
If I 'm a Shakespeare, let the well alone;
Why should I try to be what now I am?
If I 'm no Shakespeare, as too probable, —
His power and consciousness and self-delight
And all we want in common, shall I find —
Trying forever? while on points of taste
Wherewith, to speak it humbly, he and I
Are dowered alike — I 'll ask you, I or he,
Which in our two lives realizes most?
Much, he imagined — somewhat, I possess.
He had the imagination; stick to that!

Let him say, "In the face of my soul's works
Your world is worthless and I touch it not Lest I should wrong them" — I'll withdraw my plea.

But does he say so? look upon his life!
Himself, who only can, gives judgment there.
He leaves his towers and gorgeous palaces
To build the trimmest house in Stratford town; Saves money, spends it, owns the worth of
things,

Giulio Romano's pictures, Dowland's lute;
Enjoys a show, respects the puppets, too,
And none more, had he seen its entry once,
Than "Pandulph, of fair Milan cardinal."
Why then should I who play that personage,
The very Pandulph Shakespeare's fancy made,
Be told that had the poet chanced to start
From where I stand now (some degree like
mine

Being just the goal he ran his race to reach)
He would have run the whole race back, for-
sooth,

And left being Pandulph, to begin write plays?
Ah, the earth's best can be but the earth's best!
Did Shakespeare live, he could but sit at home
And get himself in dreams the Vatican,
Greek busts, Venetian paintings, Roman walls,
And English books, none equal to his own,
Which I read, bound in gold (he never did).
— Terni's fall, Naples' bay, and Gothard's top —

Eh, friend? I could not fancy one of these;
But, as I pour this claret, there they are:
I've gained them — crossed Saint Gothard last July

With ten mules to the carriage and a bed
Slung inside; is my hap the worse for that?
We want the same things, Shakespeare and my-
self,

And what I want, I have: he, gifted more,
Could fancy he too had them when he liked,
But not so thoroughly that, if fate allowed,
He would not have them also in my sense.
We play one game; I send the ball aloft
No less adroitly that of fifty strokes
Scarce five go o'er the wall so wide and high
Which sends them back to me: I wish and get.
He struck balls higher and with better skill,
But at a poor fence level with his head,
And hit — his Stratford house, a coat of arms,
Successful dealings in his grain and wool, —
While I receive heaven's incense in my nose
And style myself the cousin of Queen Bess.
Ask him, if this life's all, who wins the game?

Believe — and our whole argument breaks up.
Enthusiasm's the best thing, I repeat;
Only, we can't command it: fire and life
Are all, dead matter's nothing, we agree:
And be it a mad dream or God's very breath,
The fact's the same, — belief's fire, once in us,
Makes of all else mere stuff to show itself:
We penetrate our life with such a glow
As fire lends wood and iron — this turns steel,
That burns to ash — all's one, fire proves its power

For good or ill, since men call flare success.
But paint a fire, it will not therefore burn.

Light one in me, I'll find it food enough!
Why, to be Luther — that's a life to lead,
Incomparably better than my own.
He comes, reclaims God's earth for God, he
says,

Sets up God's rule again by simple means,
Reopens a shut book, and all is done.
He flared out in the flaring of mankind;
Such Luther's luck was: how shall such be
mine?

If he succeeded, nothing's left to do:
And if he did not altogether — well,
Strauss is the next advance. All Strauss should be

I might be also. But to what result?
He looks upon no future: Luther did.
What can I gain on the denying side?
Ice makes no conflagration. State the facts,
Read the text right, emancipate the world —
The emancipated world enjoys itself
With scarce a thank-you: Blougram told it first
It could not owe a farthing, — not to him
More than Saint Paul! 't would press its pay.
you think?

Then add there's still that plaguy hundredth
chance

Strauss may be wrong. And so a risk is run —
For what gain? not for Luther's, who secured
A real heaven in his heart throughout his life,
Supposing death a little altered things.

"Ay, but since really you lack faith," you
cry,

"You run the same risk really on all sides,
In cool indifference as bold unbelief.
As well be Strauss as swing 'twixt Paul and
him.

It's not worth having, such imperfect faith,
No more available to do faith's work Than unbelief like mine. Whole faith, or none!"

Softly, my friend! I must dispute that point.

Once own the use of faith, I'll find you faith.
We're back on Christian ground. You call for
faith:

I show you doubt, to prove that faith exists.
The more of doubt, the stronger faith, I say,
If faith o'ercomes doubt. How I know it does?
By life and man's free will, God gave for that!
To mould life as we choose it, shows our
choice:

That's our one act, the previous work's his
own.

You criticise the soul? It reared this tree —
This broad life and whatever fruit it bears!
What matter though I doubt at every pore,
Head-doubts, heart-doubts, doubts at my fingers' ends,

Doubts in the trivial work of every day,
Doubts at the very bases of my soul
In the grand moments when she probes her-
self —

If finally I have a life to show,
The thing I did, brought out in evidence
Against the thing done to me underground
By hell and all its brood, for aught I know?

I say, whence sprang this? shows it faith or doubt?

All 's doubt in me; where 's break of faith in this?

It is the idea, the feeling and the love, God means mankind should strive for and show forth

Whatever be the process to that end, — And not historic knowledge, logic sound, And metaphysical acumen, sure!

"What think ye of Christ," friend? when all 's done and said,

Like you this Christianity or not?

It may be false, but will you wish it true?

Has it your vote to be so if it can?

Trust you an instinct silenced long ago

That will break silence and enjoin you love

What mortified philosophy is hoarse,

And all in vain, with bidding you despise?

If you desire faith — then you 've faith enough:

What else seeks God — nay, what else seek ourselves?

You form a notion of me, we 'll suppose,

On hearsay; it 's a favorable one:

"But still," (you add), "there was no such good man,

Because of contradiction in the facts.

One proves, for instance, he was born in Rome, This Blougram; yet throughout the tales of him

I see he figures as an Englishman."

Well, the two things are reconcilable.

But would I rather you discovered that,

Subjoining — "Still, what matter though they be?

Blougram concerns me naught, born here or there."

Pure faith indeed — you know not what you ask!

Naked belief in God the Omnipotent,

Omniscient, Omnipresent, sears too much

The sense of conscious creatures to be borne.

It were the seeing him, no flesh shall dare.

Some think, Creation 's meant to show him forth:

I say it 's meant to hide him all it can,

And that 's what all the blessed evil 's for.

Its use in Time is to environ us,

Our breath, our drop of dew, with shield enough

Against that sight till we can bear its stress.

Under a vertical sun, the exposed brain

And lidless eye and disemprisoned heart

Less certainly would wither up at once

Than mind, confronted with the truth of him.

But time and earth case-harden us to live;

The feeblest sense is trusted most; the child

Feels God a moment, ichors o'er the place,

Plays on and grows to be a man like us.

With me, faith means perpetual unbelief

Kept quiet like the snake 'neath Michael's foot

Who stands calm just because he feels it writhe.

Or, if that 's too ambitious, — here 's my box — I need the excitation of a pinch

Threatening the torpor of the inside-nose

Nigh on the imminent sneeze that never comes.

'Leave it in peace,' advise the simple folk:

Make it aware of peace by itching-fits, Say I — let doubt occasion still more faith!

You 'll say, once all believed, man, woman, child,

In that dear middle-age these noodles praise.

How you 'd exult if I could put you back

Six hundred years, blot out cosmogony,

Geology, ethnology, what not,

(Greek endings, each the little passing-bell

That signifies some faith 's about to die),

And set you square with Genesis again, —

When such a traveller told you his last news,

He saw the ark a-top of Ararat

But did not climb there since 't was getting dusk

And robber-bands infest the mountain's foot!

How should you feel, I ask, in such an age,

How act? As other people felt and did;

With soul more blank than this decanter's knob,

Believe — and yet lie, kill, rob, fornicate,

Full in belief's face, like the beast you 'd be!

No, when the fight begins within himself,

A man 's worth something. God stoops o'er his head,

Satan looks up between his feet — both tug —

He 's left, himself, i' the middle: the soul wakes

And grows. Prolong that battle through his life!

Never leave growing till the life to come!

Here, we 've got callous to the Virgin's winks

That used to puzzle people wholesomely:

Men have outgrown the shame of being fools.

What are the laws of nature, not to bend

If the Church bid them? — brother Newman asks.

Up with the Immaculate Conception, then —

On to the rack with faith! — is my advice.

Will not that hurry us upon our knees,

Knocking our breasts, "It can't be — yet it shall!

Who am I, the worm, to argue with my Pope? Low things confound the high things!" and so forth.

That 's better than acquitting God with grace

As some folk do. He 's tried — no case is proved,

Philosophy is lenient — he may go!

You 'll say, the old system 's not so obsolete

But men believe still: ay, but who and where?

King Bomba's lazzaroni foster yet

The sacred flame, so Antonelli writes;

But even of these, what ragamuffin-saint

Believes God watches him continually,

As he believes in fire that it will burn,

Or rain that it will drench him? Break fire's law,

Sin against rain, although the penalty

Be just a singe or soaking? "No," he smiles;

"Those laws are laws that can enforce themselves."

The sum of all is — yes, my doubt is great, My faith 's still greater, then my faith 's enough.

I have read much, thought much, experienced much,

Yet would die rather than avow my fear
The Naples' liquefaction may be false,
When set to happen by the palace-clock
According to the clouds or dinner-time.
I hear you recommend, I might at least
Eliminate, declassify my faith
Since I adopt it; keeping what I must
And leaving what I can — such points as this.
I won't — that is, I can't throw one away.
Supposing there's no truth in what I hold
About the need of trial to man's faith,
Still, when you bid me purify the same,
To such a process I discern no end.
Clearing off one excrescence to see two,
There's ever a next in size, now grown as big,
That meets the knife: I cut and cut again!
First cut the Liquefaction, what comes last
But Fichte's clever cut at God himself?
Experimentalize on sacred things!
I trust nor hand nor eye nor heart nor brain
To stop betimes: they all get drunk alike.
The first step, I am master not to take.

You'd find the cutting-process to your taste
As much as leaving growths of lies unpruned,
Nor see more danger in it, — you retort.
Your taste's worth mine; but my taste proves more wise

When we consider that the steadfast hold
On the extreme end of the chain of faith
Gives all the advantage, makes the difference
With the rough purblind mass we seek to rule:
We are their lords, or they are free of us,
Just as we tighten or relax our hold.
So, other matters equal, we'll revert
To the first problem — which, if solved my way
And thrown into the balance, turns the scale —
How we may lead a comfortable life,
How suit our luggage to the cabin's size.

Of course you are remarking all this time
How narrowly and grossly I view life,
Respect the creature-comforts, care to rule
The masses, and regard complacently
"The cabin," in our old phrase. Well, I do.
I act for, talk for, live for this world now,
As this world prizes action, life and talk:
No prejudice to what next world may prove,
Whose new laws and requirements, my best pledge

To observe then, is that I observe these now,
Shall do hereafter what I do meanwhile.
Let us concede (gratuitously though)
Next life relieves the soul of body, yields
Pure spiritual enjoyment: well, my friend,
Why lose this life if the meantime, since its use
May be to make the next life more intense?

Do you know, I have often had a dream
(Work it up in your next month's article)
Of man's poor spirit in its progress, still Losing true life forever and a day
Through ever trying to be and ever being —
In the evolution of successive spheres —
Before its actual sphere and place of life,
Halfway into the next, which having reached,

It shoots with corresponding foolery
Halfway into the next still, on and off!
As when a traveller, bound from North to South,

Scouts fur in Russia: what's its use in France?
In France spurns flannel: where's its need in Spain?

In Spain drops cloth, too cumbrous for Algiers!
Linen goes next, and last the skin itself,
A superfluity at Timbuctoo.

When, through his journey, was the fool at ease?

I'm at ease now, friend; worldly in this world,
I take and like its way of life; I think
My brothers, who administer the means,
Live better for my comfort — that's good too;
And God, if he pronounce upon such life,
Approves my service, which is better still.
If he keep silence, — why, for you or me
Or that brute beast pulled-up in to-day's
"Times."

What odds is 't, save to ourselves, what life we lead?

You meet me at this issue: you declare, —
All special-pleading done with — truth is truth,
And justifies itself by undreamed ways.
You don't fear but it's better, if we doubt,
To say so, act up to our truth perceived
However feebly. Do then, — act away!
'T is there I'm on the watch for you. How one acts

Is, both of us agree, our chief concern:
And how you'll act is what I fain would see
If, like the candid person you appear,
You dare to make the most of your life's scheme

As I of mine, live up to its full law
Since there's no higher law that counterchecks.
Put natural religion to the test
You've just demolished the revealed with —
quick,

Down to the root of all that checks your will,
All prohibition to lie, kill and thieve,
Or even to be an atheistic priest!
Suppose a pricking to incontinence —
Philosophers deduce you chastity
Or shame, from just the fact that at the first Whoso embraced a woman in the field,
Threw club down and forewent his brains be-
side,

So, stood a ready victim in the reach
Of any brother savage, club in hand;
Hence saw the use of going out of sight
In wood or cave to prosecute his loves:
I read this in a French book t'other day.
Does law so analyzed coerce you much?
Oh, men spin clouds of fuzz where matters end,
But you who reach where the first thread begins,

You'll soon cut that! — which means you can,
but won't,

Through certain instincts, blind, unreasoned-
out,

You dare not set aside, you can't tell why,
But there they are, and so you let them rule.
Then, friend, you seem as much a slave as I,
A liar, conscious coward and hypocrite,

Without the good the slave expects to get,
 In case he has a master after all!
 You own your instincts? why, what else do I,
 Who want, am made for, and must have a God
 Ere I can be aught, do aught? — no mere name Want, but the true thing with what proves its
     truth,
 To wit, a relation from that thing to me,
 Touching from head to foot — which touch I feel,
 And with it take the rest, this life of ours!
 I live my life here; yours you dare not live.

— Not as I state it, who (you please subjoin)
 Disfigure such a life and call it names,
 While, to your mind, remains another way
 For simple men: knowledge and power have rights,
 But ignorance and weakness have rights too.
 There needs no crucial effort to find truth
 If here or there or anywhere about:
 We ought to turn each side, try hard and see,
 And if we can't, be glad we've earned at least
 The right, by one laborious proof the more,
 To graze in peace earth's pleasant pasturage.
 Men are not angels, neither are they brutes:
 Something we may see, all we cannot see.
 What need of lying? I say, I see all,
 And swear to each detail the most minute
 In what I think a Pan's face — you, mere cloud:
 I swear I hear him speak and see him wink,
 For fear, if once I drop the emphasis,
 Mankind may doubt there's any cloud at all.
 You take the simple life — ready to see,
 Willing to see (for no cloud's worth a face) —
 And leaving quiet what no strength can move,
 And which, who bids you move? who has the
     right?
 I bid you; but you are God's sheep, not mine:
 "Pastor est tui Dominus." You find
 In this the pleasant pasture of our life
 Much you may eat without the least offence,
 Much you don't eat because your maw objects,
 Much you would eat but that your fellow-flock
 Open great eyes at you and even butt,
 And thereupon you like your mates so well
 You cannot please yourself, offending them;
 Though when they seem exorbitantly sheep,
 You weigh your pleasure with their butts and bleats
 And strike the balance. Sometimes certain fears
 Restrain you, real checks since you find them
     so;
 Sometimes you please yourself and nothing
     checks:
 And thus you graze through life with not one
     lie,
 And like it best.

But do you, in truth's name?
 If so, you beat — which means you are not I —
 Who needs must make earth mine and feed my fill
 Not simply unbutted at, unbickered with,
 But motioned to the velvet of the sward
 By those obsequious wethers' very selves.
 Look at me, sir; my age is double yours:

At yours, I knew beforehand, so enjoyed,
 What now I should be — as, permit the word,
 I pretty well imagine your whole range
 And stretch of tether twenty years to come.
 We both have minds and bodies much alike:
 In truth's name, don't you want my bishoprie,
 My daily bread, my influence, and my state?
 You're young. I'm old; you must be old one
     day;
 Will you find then, as I do hour by hour,
 Women their lovers kneel to, who cut curls
 From your fat lap-dog's ear to grace a brooch —
 Dukes, who petition just to kiss your ring —
 With much beside you know or may conceive?
 Suppose we die to-night: well, here am I,
 Such were my gains, life bore this fruit to
     me,
 While writing all the same my articles
 On music, poetry, the fictile vase
 Found at Albano, chess, Anacreon's Greek.
 But you — the highest honor in your life,
 The thing you'll crown yourself with, all your
     days,
 Is — dining here and drinking this last glass
 I pour you out in sign of amity
 Before we part forever. Of your power
 And social influence, worldly worth in short,
 Judge what's my estimation by the fact,
 I do not condescend to enjoin, beseech,
 Hint secrecy on one of all these words!
 You're shrewd and know that should you publish one
 The world would brand the lie — my enemies
     first,
 Who'd sneer — "the bishop's an arch-hypocrite
 And knave perhaps, but not so frank a fool."
 Whereas I should not dare for both my ears
 Breathe one such syllable, smile one such smile,
 Before the chaplain who reflects myself —
 My shade's so much more potent than your flesh.
 What's your reward, self-abnegating friend?
 Stood you confessed of those exceptional
 And privileged great natures that dwarf mine —
 A zealot with a mad ideal in reach,
 A poet just about to print his ode,
 A statesman with a scheme to stop this war,
 An artist whose religion is his art —
 I should have nothing to object: such men
 Carry the fire, all things grow warm to them,
 Their druggot's worth my purple, they beat
     me,
 But you, — you're just as little those as I —
 You, Gigadibs, who, thirty years of age,
 Write stately for Blackwood's Magazine,
 Believe you see two points in Hamlet's soul
 Unseized by the Germans yet — which view you'll print —
 Meantime the best you have to show being still
 That lively lightsome article we took Almost for the true Dickens, — what's its
     name?
 "The Slum and Cellar, or Whitechapel life
 Limned after dark!" it made me laugh, I know,
 And pleased a month, and brought you in ten pounds.
 — Success I recognize and compliment,

And therefore give you, if you choose, three words

(The card and pencil-scratch is quite enough)
Which whether here, in Dublin or New York,
Will get you, prompt as at my eyebrow's wink,
Such terms as never you aspired to get
In all our own reviews and some not ours.
Go write your lively sketches! be the first
"Blougram, or The Eccentric Confidence" —
Or better simply say, "The Outward-bound."
Why, men as soon would throw it in my teeth
As copy and quote the infamy chalked broad
About me on the church-door opposite.
You will not wait for that experience though,
I fancy, howsoever you decide,
To discontinue — not detesting, not
Defaming, but at least — despising me!

Over his wine so smiled and talked his hour
Sylvester Blougram, styled in partibus
Episcopus, nec non — (the deuce knows what It's changed to by our novel hierarchy)
With Gigadibs the literary man,
Who played with spoons, explored his plate's
design,
And ranged the olive-stones about its edge,
While the great bishop rolled him out a mind
Long crumpled, till creased consciousness lay smooth.

For Blougram, he believed, say, half he spoke.
The other portion, as he shaped it thus
For argumentary purposes,
He felt his foe was foolish to dispute.
Some arbitrary accidental thoughts
That crossed his mind, amusing because new,
He chose to represent as fixtures there,
Invariable convictions (such they seemed
Beside his interlocutor's loose cards
Flung daily down, and not the same way twice),
While certain hell-deep instincts, man's weak
tongue

Is never bold to utter in their truth
Because styled hell-deep ('t is an old mistake
To place hell at the bottom of the earth),
He ignored these, — not having in readiness
Their nomenclature and philosophy:
He said true things, but called them by wrong
names.

"On the whole," he thought, "I justify myself
On every point where cavillers like this
Oppugn my life: he tries one kind of fence,
I close, he's worsted, that's enough for him.
He's on the ground: if ground should break
away

I take my stand on, there's a firmer yet
Beneath it, both of us may sink and reach.
His ground was over mine and broke the first:
So, let him sit with me this many a year!"

He did not sit five minutes. Just a week
Sufficed his sudden healthy vehemence.
Something had struck him in the "Outward-bound"

Another way than Blougram's purpose was:
And having bought, not cabin-furniture

But settler's-implements (enough for three)
And started for Australia — there, I hope,
By this time he has tested his first plough,
And studied his last chapter of Saint John.

CLEON

"As certain also of your own poets have said" —

CLEON the poet (from the sprinkled isles,
Lily on lily, that o'erlace the sea,
And laugh their pride when the light wave lisps
"Greece") —
To Protus in his Tyranny: much health!

They give thy letter to me, even now:
I read and seem as if I heard thee speak.
The master of thy galley still unlades
Gift after gift; they block my court at last
And pile themselves along its portico
Royal with sunset, like a thought of thee:
And one white she-slave from the group dispersed
Of black and white slaves (like the chequer-
work
Pavement, at once my nation's work and gift,
Now covered with this settle-down of doves),
One lyric woman, in her crocus vest
Woven of sea-wools, with her two white hands
Commends to me the strainer and the cup
Thy lip hath bettered ere it blesses mine.

Well-counselled, king, in thy munificence!
For so shall men remark, in such an act
Of love for him whose song gives life its joy,
Thy recognition of the use of life;
Nor call thy spirit barely adequate
To help on life in straight ways, broad enough
For vulgar souls, by ruling and the rest.
Thou, in the daily building of thy tower, —
Whether in fierce and sudden spasms of toil,
Or through dim lulls of unapparent growth,
Or when the general work 'mid good acclaim
Climbed with the eye to cheer the architect, —
Didst ne'er engage in work for mere work's
sake —

Hadst ever in thy heart the luring hope
Of some eventual rest a-top of it,
Whence, all the tumult of the building hushed,
Thou first of men mightst look out to the East:
The vulgar saw thy tower, thou sawest the
sun.

For this, I promise on thy festival
To pour libation, looking o'er the sea,
Making this slave narrate thy fortunes, speak
Thy great words, and describe thy royal face —
Wishing thee wholly where Zeus lives the most,
Within the eventual element of calm.

Thy letter's first requirement meets me here.
It is as thou hast heard: in one short life
I, Cleon, have effected all those things
Thou wonderingly dost enumerate.
That epics on thy hundred plates of gold
Is mine, — and also mine the little chant,
So sure to rise from every fishing-bark
When, lights at prow, the seamen haul their net

The image of the sun-god on the phare,
Men turn from the sun's self to see, is mine ;
The Pœcile, o'er-storied its whole length,
As thou didst hear, with painting, is mine too.
I know the true proportions of a man
And woman also, not observed before ;
And I have written three books on the soul,
Proving absurd all written hitherto,
And putting us to ignorance again.
For music, — why, I have combined the moods,
Inventing one. In brief, all arts are mine ;
Thus much the people know and recognize,
Throughout our seventeen islands. Marvel not.
We of these latter days, with greater mind
Than our forerunners, since more composite,
Look not so great, beside their simple way,
To a judge who only sees one way at once,
One mind-point and no other at a time, —
Compares the small part of a man of us
With some whole man of the heroic age,
Great in his way — not ours, nor meant for ours.
And ours is greater, had we skill to know :
For, what we call this life of men on earth,
This sequence of the soul's achievements here
Being, as I find much reason to conceive,
Intended to be viewed eventually
As a great whole, not analyzed to parts,
But each part having reference to all, —
How shall a certain part, pronounced complete,
Endure effacement by another part ?
Was the thing done ? — then, what's to do
again ?

See, in the chequered pavement opposite,
Suppose the artist made a perfect rhomb,
And next a lozenge, then a trapezoid —
He did not overlay them, superimpose
The new upon the old and blot it out,
But laid them on a level in his work,
Making at last a picture ; there it lies.
So, first the perfect separate forms were made,
The portions of mankind ; and after, so,
Occurred the combination of the same.
For where had been a progress, otherwise ?
Mankind, made up of all the single men, —
In such a synthesis the labor ends.
Now mark me ! those divine men of old time
Have reached, thou sayest well, each at one point

The outside verge that rounds our faculty ;
And where they reached, who can do more than
reach ?

It takes but little water just to touch
At some one point the inside of a sphere,
And, as we turn the sphere, touch all the rest
In due succession : but the finer air
Which not so palpably nor obviously,
Though no less universally, can touch
The whole circumference of that emptied sphere,
Fills it more fully than the water did ;
Holds thrice the weight of water in itself
Resolved into a subtler element.
And yet the vulgar call the sphere first full
Up to the visible height — and after, void ;
Not knowing air's more hidden properties.
And thus our soul, misknown, cries out to Zeus
To vindicate his purpose in our life :
Why stay we on the earth unless to grow ?
Long since, I imagined, wrote the fiction out,

That he or other god descended here
And, once for all, showed simultaneously
What, in its nature, never can be shown,
Piecemeal or in succession ; — showed, I say,
The worth both absolute and relative
Of all his children from the birth of time,
His instruments for all appointed work.
I now go on to image, — might we hear
The judgment which should give the due to each,

Show where the labor lay and where the ease,
And prove Zeus' self, the latent everywhere !
This is a dream ; — but no dream, let us hope,
That years and days, the summers and the springs,

Follow each other with unwaning powers.
The grapes which dye thy wine are richer far,
Through culture, than the wild wealth of the
rock ;

The suave plum than the savage-tasted drupe ;
The pastured honey-bee drops choicer sweet ;
The flowers turn double, and the leaves turn
flowers ;

That young and tender crescent-moon, thy slave,

Sleeping above her robe as buoyed by clouds,
Refines upon the women of my youth.

What, and the soul alone deteriorates ?

I have not chanted verse like Homer, no —
Nor swept string like Terpander, no — nor carved

And painted men like Phidias and his friend :

I am not great as they are, point by point.

But I have entered into sympathy

With these four, running these into one soul,

Who, separate, ignored each other's art.

Say, is it nothing that I know them all ?

The wild flower was the larger ; I have dashed

Rose-blood upon its petals, pricked its cup's

Honey with wine, and driven its seed to fruit,

And show a better flower if not so large :

I stand myself. Refer this to the gods

Whose gift alone it is ! which, shall I dare

(All pride apart) upon the absurd pretext

That such a gift by chance lay in my hand,

Discourse of lightly or depreciate ?

It might have fallen to another's hand : what
then ?

I pass too surely : let at least truth stay !

And next, of what thou followest on to ask.

This being with me as I declare, O king,

My works, in all these varicolored kinds,

So done by me, accepted so by men —

Thou askest, if (my soul thus in men's hearts)

I must not be accounted to attain

The very crown and proper end of life ?

Inquiring thence how, now life closeth up,

I face death with success in my right hand :

Whether I fear death less than dost thyself

The fortunate of men ? "For" (writest thou)

"Thou leavest much behind, while I leave
naught.

Thy life stays in the poems men shall sing,

The pictures men shall study ; while my life,

Complete and whole now in its power and joy,

Dies altogether with my brain and arm,

Is lost indeed ; since, what survives myself ?

The brazen statue to o'erlook my grave,
Set on the promontory which I named.
And that — some supple courtier of my heir
Shall use its robed and sceptred arm, perhaps,
To fix the rope to, which best drags it down.
I go then: triumph thou, who dost not go!"

Nay, thou art worthy of hearing my whole mind.

Is this apparent, when thou turn'st to muse
Upon the scheme of earth and man in chief,
That admiration grows as knowledge grows?
That imperfection means perfection hid,
Reserved in part, to grace the after-time?
If, in the morning of philosophy,
Ere aught had been recorded, nay perceived,
Thou, with the light now in thee, couldst have looked

On all earth's tenantry, from worm to bird,
Ere man, her last, appeared upon the stage —
Thou wouldst have seen them perfect, and deduced

The perfectness of others yet unseen.
Conceding which, — had Zeus then questioned thee,

"Shall I go on a step, improve on this,
Do more for visible creatures than is done?"
Thou wouldst have answered, "Ay, by making each

Grow conscious in himself — by that alone.
All's perfect else: the shell sucks fast the rock,
The fish strikes through the sea, the snake both swims

And slides, forth range the beasts, the birds take flight,

Till life's mechanics can no further go —

And all this joy in natural life is put

Like fire from off thy finger into each,

So exquisitely perfect is the same.

But 't is pure fire, and they mere matter are;

It has them, not they it: and so I choose

For man, thy last premeditated work

(If I might add a glory to the scheme),

That a third thing should stand apart from both,

A quality arise within his soul,

Which, intro-active, made to supervise

And feel the force it has, may view itself,

And so be happy." Man might live at first

The animal life: but is there nothing more?

In due time, let him critically learn

How he lives; and, the more he gets to know

Of his own life's adaptabilities,

The more joy-giving will his life become.

Thus man, who hath this quality, is best.

But thou, king, hadst more reasonably said:

"Let progress end at once, — man make no step

Beyond the natural man, the better beast,

Using his senses, not the sense of sense."

In man there's failure, only since he left

The lower and unconscious forms of life.

We called it an advance, the rendering plain

Man's spirit might grow conscious of man's life,

And, by new lore so added to the old,

Take each step higher over the brute's head.

This grew the only life, the pleasure-house,

Watch-tower and treasure-fortress of the soul,

Which whole surrounding flats of natural life
Seemed only fit to yield subsistence to;

A tower that crowns a country. But alas,

The soul now climbs it just to perish there!

For thence we have discovered ('t is no dream —

We know this, which we had not else perceived)

That there's a world of capability

For joy, spread round about us, meant for us,

Inviting us; and still the soul craves all,

And still the flesh replies, "Take no jot more

Than ere thou clombst the tower to look abroad!

Nay, so much less as that fatigue has brought Deduction to it." We struggle, fain to enlarge

Our bounded physical recipiency,

Increase our power, supply fresh oil to life,

Repair the waste of age and sickness: no,

It skills not! life's inadequate to joy.

As the soul sees joy, tempting life to take.

They praise a fountain in my garden here

Wherein a Naiad sends the water-bow

Thin from her tube; she smiles to see it rise.

What if I told her, it is just a thread

From that great river which the hills shut up,

And mock her with my leave to take the same?

The artificer has given her one small tube

Past power to widen or exchange — what boots

To know she might spout oceans if she could?

She cannot lift beyond her first thin thread:

And so a man can use but a man's joy

While he sees God's. Is it for Zeus to boast,

"See, man, how happy I live, and despair —

That I may be still happier — for thy use!"

If this were so, we could not thank our lord,

As hearts beat on to doing; 't is not so —

Malice it is not. Is it carelessness?

Still, no. If care — where is the sign? I ask,

And get no answer, and agree in sum,

O king, with thy profound discouragement,

Who seest the wider but to sigh the more.

Most progress is most failure: thou sayest well.

The last point now: — thou dost except a case —

Holding joy not impossible to one

With artist-gifts — to such a man as I

Who leave behind me living works indeed;

For, such a poem, such a painting lives.

What? dost thou verily trip upon a word,

Confound the accurate view of what joy is (Caught somewhat clearer by my eyes than thine)

With feeling joy? confound the knowing how

And showing how to live (my faculty)

With actually living? — Otherwise

Where is the artist's vantage o'er the king?

Because in my great epos I display

How divers men young, strong, fair, wise, can act —

Is this as though I acted? if I paint,

Carve the young Phæbus, am I therefore young?

Methinks I'm older than I bowed myself

The many years of pain that taught me art!

Indeed, to know is something, and to prove

How all this beauty might be enjoyed, is more:

But, knowing naught, to enjoy is something
too.

Yon rower, with the moulded muscles there,

Lowering the sail, is nearer it than I.

I can write love-odes: thy fair slave 's an ode.
I get to sing of love, when grown too gray
For being beloved: she turns to that young
man,

The muscles all a-ripple on his back.
I know the joy of kingship: well, thou art king!

"But," sayest thou — (and I marvel, I repeat,
To find thee trip on such a mere word) "what Thou writest, paintest, stays; that does not
die:

Sappho survives, because we sing her songs,
And Æschylus, because we read his plays!"
Why, if they live still, let them come and take Thy slave in my despite, drink from thy cup, Speak in my place. Thou diest while I survive?

Say rather that my fate is deadlier still,
In this, that every day my sense of joy
Grows more acute, my soul (intensified
By power and insight) more enlarged, more keen;

While every day my hairs fall more and more,
My hand shakes, and the heavy years increase —
The horror quickening still from year to year,
The consummation coming past escape,
When I shall know most, and yet least enjoy —

When all my works wherein I prove my worth,
Being present still to mock me in men's mouths,
Alive still, in the praise of such as thou,
I, I the feeling, thinking, acting man,
The man who loved his life so over-much,
Sleep in my urn. It is so horrible,
I dare at times imagine to my need
Some future state revealed to us by Zeus,
Unlimited in capability

For joy, as this is in desire for joy,
— To seek which, the joy-hunger forces us:
That, stung by straitness of our life, made strait
On purpose to make prized the life at large —
Freed by the throbbing impulse we call death,
We burst there as the worm into the fly,
Who, while a worm still, wants his wings. But
no!

Zeus has not yet revealed it; and alas,
He must have done so, were it possible!

Live long and happy, and in that thought
die:

Glad for what was! Farewell. And for the
rest,

I cannot tell thy messenger aright
Where to deliver what he bears of thine
To one called Paulus; we have heard his fame
Indeed, if Christ be not one with him —
I know not, nor am troubled much to know.
Thou canst not think a mere barbarian Jew,
As Paulus proves to be, one circumcised,
Hath access to a secret shut from us?
Thou wrongest our philosophy, O king,
In stooping to inquire of such an one,
As if his answer could impose at all!

He writeth, doth he? well, and he may write.
Oh, the Jew findeth scholars! certain slaves
Who touched on this same isle, preached him
and Christ;

And (as I gathered from a bystander)
Their doctrine could be held by no sane man.

RUDEL TO THE LADY OF TRIPOLI

Originally published in Bells and Pomegranates as the first of two poems, Cristina being the other, under the title Queen Worship.

I

I KNOW a Mount, the gracious Sun perceives
First, when he visits, last, too, when he leaves
The world; and, vainly favored, it repays
The day-long glory of his steadfast gaze
By no change of its large calm front of snow.
And underneath the Mount, a Flower I know,
He cannot have perceived, that changes ever
At his approach; and, in the lost endeavor
To live his life, has parted, one by one,
With all a flower's true graces, for the grace
Of being but a foolish mimic sun,
With ray-like florets round a disk-like face.
Men nobly call by many a name the Mount
As over many a land of theirs its large
Calm front of snow like a triumphal target
Is reared, and still with old names, fresh names vie,

Each to its proper praise and own account:
Men call the Flower the Sunflower, sportively.

II

Oh, Angel of the East, one, one gold look Across the waters to this twilight nook,
— The far sad waters, Angel, to this nook!

III

Dear Pilgrim, art thou for the East indeed?
Go! — saying ever as thou dost proceed,
That I, French Rudel, choose for my device
A sunflower outspread like a sacrifice
Before its idol. See! These inexpert
And hurried fingers could not fail to hurt
The woven picture; 't is a woman's skill
Indeed; but nothing baffled me, so, ill
Or well, the work is finished. Say, men feed
On songs I sing, and therefore bask the bees
On my flower's breast as on a platform broad:
But, as the flower's concern is not for these
But solely for the sun, so men applaud
In vain this Rudel, he not looking here
But to the East — the East! Go, say this,
Pilgrim dear!

ONE WORD MORE

TO E. B. B.

London, September, 1855

Originally appended to the collection of Poems called Men and Women, the greater portion of which has now been, more correctly, distributed under the other titles of this edition. R. B.

I

THERE they are, my fifty men and women
Naming me the fifty poems finished!
Take them, Love, the book and me together:
Where the heart lies, let the brain lie also.

II

Rafael made a century of sonnets,
Made and wrote them in a certain volume
Hinted with the silver-pointed pencil
Else he only used to draw Madonnas :
These, the world might view—but one, the volume.
Who that one, you ask ? Your heart instructs
you.

Did she live and love it all her lifetime ?
Did she drop, his lady of the sonnets,
Die, and let it drop beside her pillow
Where it lay in place of Rafael's glory,
Rafael's cheek so duteous and so loving —
Cheek, the world was wont to hail a painter's,
Rafael's cheek, her love had turned a poet's ?

III

You and I would rather read that volume,
(Taken to his beating bosom by it)
Lean and list the bosom-beats of Rafael,
Would we not ? than wonder at Madonnas —
Her, San Sisto names, and Her, Foligno,
Her, that visits Florence in a vision,
Her, that's left with lilies in the Louvre —
Seen by us and all the world in circle.

IV

You and I will never read that volume.
Guido Reni, like his own eye's apple
Guarded long the treasure-book and loved it.
Guido Reni dying, all Bologna Cried, and the world cried too, " Ours, the treasure !"
Suddenly, as rare things will, it vanished.

V

Dante once prepared to paint an angel :
Whom to please ? You whisper " Beatrice."
While he mused and traced it and retraced it, (Peradventure with a pen corroded Still by drops of that hot ink he dipped for,
When, his left-hand i' the hair o' the wicked,
Back he held the brow and pricked its stigma,
Bit into the live man's flesh for parchment,
Loosed him, laughed to see the writing rankle,
Let the wretch go festering through Florence) —
Dante, who loved well because he hated,
Hated wickedness that hinders loving,
Dante standing, studying his angel, —
In there broke the folk of his Inferno.
Says he — " Certain people of importance"
(Such he gave his daily dreadful line to)
" Entered and would seize, forsooth, the poet."
Says the poet — " Then I stopped my painting."

VI

You and I would rather see that angel,
Painted by the tenderness of Dante,
Would we not ? — than read a fresh Inferno.

VII

You and I will never see that picture.
While he mused on love and Beatrice,
While he softened o'er his outlined angel,
In they broke, those " people of importance ;"
We and Bice bear the loss forever.

VIII

What of Rafael's sonnets, Dante's picture ?
This : no artist lives and loves, that longs not
Once, and only once, and for one only,
(Ah, the prize !) to find his love a language
Fit and fair and simple and sufficient —
Using nature that's an art to others,
Not, this one time, art that's turned his nature.

Ay, of all the artists living, loving,
None but would forego his proper dowry, —
Does he paint ? he fain would write a poem, —
Does he write ? he fain would paint a picture,
Put to proof art alien to the artist's,
Once, and only once, and for one only,
So to be the man and leave the artist,
Gain the man's joy, miss the artist's sorrow.

IX

Wherefore ? Heaven's gift takes earth's abatement !

He who smites the rock and spreads the water,
Bidding drink and live a crowd beneath him,
Even he, the minute makes immortal,
Proves, perchance, but mortal in the minute,
Desecrates, belike, the deed in doing.
While he smites, how can he but remember,
So he smote before, in such a peril,
When they stood and mocked — " Shall smiting help us ?"

When they drank and sneered — " A stroke is easy !"

When they wiped their mouths and went their journey,

Throwing him for thanks — " But drought was pleasant."

Thus old memories mar the actual triumph ;
Thus the doing savors of disrelish ;
Thus achievement lacks a gracious somewhat ;
O'er-importuned brows becloud the mandate,
Carelessness or consciousness — the gesture.
For he bears an ancient wrong about him,
Sees and knows again those phalanxed faces,
Hears, yet one time more, the 'customed prelude —

" How shouldst thou, of all men, smite, and save us ?"

Guesses what is like to prove the sequel —
" Egypt's flesh-pots — nay, the drought was better."

X

Oh, the crowd must have emphatic warrant !
Theirs, the Sinai-forehead's cloven brilliance,
Right-arm's rod-sweep, tongue's imperial fiat.
Never dares the man put off the prophet.

XI

Did he love one face from out the thousands,
(Were she Jethro's daughter, white and wifely,
Were she but the Æthiopian bondslave.)
He would envy you dumb patient camel,
Keeping a reserve of scanty water
Meant to save his own life in the desert ;
Ready in the desert to deliver
(Kneeling down to let his breast be opened)
Hoard and life together for his mistress.

XII

I shall never, in the years remaining,
Paint you pictures, no, nor carve you statues,
Make you music that should all-express me;
So it seems: I stand on my attainment.
This of verse alone, one life allows me;
Verse and nothing else have I to give you.
Other heights in other lives, God willing:
All the gifts from all the heights, your own,
Love!

XIII

Yet a semblance of resource avails us —
Shade so finely touched, love's sense must seize
it.
Take these lines, look lovingly and nearly,
Lines I write the first time and the last time.
He who works in fresco, steals a hair-brush,
Curbs the liberal hand, subservient proudly,
Cranps his spirit, crowds its all in little,
Makes a strange art of an art familiar,
Fills his lady's missal-marge with flowerets.
He who blows through bronze, may breathe
through silver,
Fitly serenade a slumbrous princess.
He who writes, may write for once as I do.

XIV

Love, you saw me gather men and women,
Live or dead or fashioned by my fancy,
Enter each and all, and use their service,
Speak from every mouth, — the speech, a poem.
Hardly shall I tell my joys and sorrows,
Hopes and fears, belief and disbelieving:
I am mine and yours — the rest be all men's,
Karshish, Cleon, Norbert, and the fifty.
Let me speak this once in my true person,
Not as Lippo, Roland, or Andrea,
Though the fruit of speech be just this sentence:
Pray you, look on these my men and women,
Take and keep my fifty poems finished;
Where my heart lies, let my brain lie also!
Poor the speech; be how I speak, for all things.

XV

Not but that you know me! Lo, the moon's
self!
Here in London, yonder late in Florence,
Still we find her face, the thrice-transfigured.
Curving on a sky imbrued with color,
Drifted over Fiesole by twilight,
Came she, our new crescent of a hair's-breadth.
Full she flared it, lamping Samminiato,
Rounder 'twixt the cypresses and rounder,
Perfect till the nightingales applauded.
Now, a piece of her old self, impoverished,
Hard to greet, she traverses the house-roofs,
Hurries with unhandsome thrift of silver,
Goes dispiritedly, glad to finish.

XVI

What, there's nothing in the moon noteworthy?
Nay: for if that moon could love a mortal,

Use, to charm him (so to fit a fancy),
All her magic ('t is the old sweet mythos),
She would turn a new side to her mortal,
Side unseen of herdsman, huntsman, steers-
man —

Blank to Zoroaster on his terrace,
Blind to Galileo on his turret,
Dumb to Homer, dumb to Keats — him, even!
Think, the wonder of the moonstruck mortal —

When she turns round, comes again in heaven,
Opens out anew for worse or better!
Proves she like some portent of an iceberg
Swimming full upon the ship it founders,
Hungry with huge teeth of splintered crystals?

Proves she as the paved work of a sapphire
Seen by Moses when he climbed the mountain?

Moses, Aaron, Nadab and Abihu
Climbed and saw the very God, the Highest,
Stand upon the paved work of a sapphire.
Like the bodied heaven in his clearness
Shone the stone, the sapphire of that paved
work,

When they ate and drank and saw God also!

XVII

What were seen? None knows, none ever shall
know.

Only this is sure — the sight were other,
Not the moon's same side, born late in Florence,

Dying now impoverished here in London.
God be thanked, the meanest of his creatures
Boasts two soul-sides, one to face the world
with,

One to show a woman when he loves her!

XVIII

This I say of me, but think of you, Love!
This to you — yourself my moon of poets!
Ah, but that's the world's side, there's the wonder,

Thus they see you, praise you, think they know
you!

There, in turn I stand with them and praise
you —

Out of my own self, I dare to phrase it.
But the best is when I glide from out them,
Cross a step or two of dubious twilight,
Come out on the other side, the novel
Silent silver lights and darks undreamed of,
Where I hush and bless myself with silence.

XIX

Oh, their Rafael of the dear Madonnas,
Oh, their Dante of the dread Inferno,
Wrote one song — and in my brain I sing it,
Drew one angel — borne, see, on my bosom!

IN A BALCONY

WRITTEN in 1853, partly at Bagni di Lucca, partly at Rome. It was included in the original series of Men and Women and there divided into three parts.

PERSONS

NORBERT.

CONSTANCE.

THE QUEEN.

CONSTANCE and NORBERT.

Norbert. Now!

Constance. Not now!

Nor. Give me them again, those hands: Put them upon my forehead, how it throbs! Press them before my eyes, the fire comes through!

You cruellest, you dearest in the world, Let me! The Queen must grant whate'er I ask—

How can I gain you and not ask the Queen? There she stays waiting for me, here stand you; Some time or other this was to be asked; Now is the one time—what I ask, I gain: Let me ask now, Love!

Con. Do, and ruin us!

Nor. Let it be now, Love! All my soul breaks forth.

How I do love you! Give my love its way! A man can have but one life and one death, One heaven, one hell. Let me fulfil my fate—Grant me my heaven now! Let me know you mine,

Prove you mine, write my name upon your brow,

Hold you and have you, and then die away, If God please, with completion in my soul!

Con. I am not yours then? How content this man!

I am not his— who change into himself, Have passed into his heart and beat its beats, Who give my hands to him, my eyes, my hair, Give all that was of me away to him— So well, that now, my spirit turned his own, Takes part with him against the woman here, Bids him not stumble at so mere a straw As caring that the world be cognizant How he loves her and how she worships him. You have this woman, not as yet that world. Go on, I bid, nor stop to care for me By saving what I cease to care about, The courtly name and pride of circumstance— The name you'll pick up and be cumbered with Just for the poor parade's sake, nothing more; Just that the world may slip from under you— Just that the world may cry, "So much for him—

The man predestined to the heap of crowns:

There goes his chance of winning one, at least!"

Nor. The world!

Con. You love it! Love me quite as well, And see if I shall pray for this in vain!

Why must you ponder what it knows or thinks?

Nor. You pray for— what, in vain?

Con. Oh my heart's heart,

How I do love you, Norbert! That is right: But listen, or I take my hands away! You say, "let it be now:" you would go now And tell the Queen, perhaps six steps from us, You love me—so you do, thank God!

Nor. Thank God!

Con. Yes, Norbert,— but you fain would tell your love,

And, what succeeds the telling, ask of her My hand. Now take this rose and look at it, Listening to me. You are the minister, The Queen's first favorite, nor without a cause. To-night completes your wonderful year's-work (This palace-feast is held to celebrate) Made memorable by her life's success, The junction of two crowns, on her sole head, Her house had only dreamed of anciently: That this mere dream is grown a stable truth, To-night's feast makes authentic. Whose the praise?

Whose genius, patience, energy, achieved What turned the many heads and broke the hearts?

You are the fate, your minute's in the heaven. Next comes the Queen's turn. "Name your own reward!"

With leave to clench the past, chain the to-come,

Put out an arm and touch and take the sun And fix it ever full-faced on your earth, Possess yourself supremely of her life,— You choose the single thing she will not grant; Nay, very declaration of which choice Will turn the scale and neutralize your work: At best she will forgive you, if she can. You think I'll let you choose— her cousin's hand?

Nor. Wait. First, do you retain your old belief

The Queen is generous,— nay, is just?

Con. There, there!

So men make women love them, while they know

No more of women's hearts than . . . look you here,

You that are just and generous beside. Make it your own case! For example now, I'll say—I let you kiss me, hold my hands— Why? do you know why? I'll instruct you, then—

The kiss, because you have a name at court; This hand and this, that you may shut in each A jewel, if you please to pick up such.

That's horrible? Apply it to the Queen— Suppose I am the Queen to whom you speak.

"I was a nameless man; you needed me: Why did I proffer you my aid? there stood A certain pretty cousin at your side.

Why did I make such common cause with you? Access to her had not been easy else.

You give my labor here abundant praise ?
 'Faith, labor, which she overlooked, grew
 play.

How shall your gratitude discharge itself ?
 Give me her hand ! "

Nor. And still I urge the same.
 Is the Queen just ? just — generous or no !

Con. Yes, just. You love a rose : no harm
 in that :

But was it for the rose's sake or mine
 You put it in your bosom ? mine, you said —
 Then, mine you still must say or else be false.
 You told the Queen you served her for herself ;
 If so, to serve her was to serve yourself,
 She thinks, for all your unbelieving face !
 I know her. In the hall, six steps from us,
 One sees the twenty pictures : there 's a life
 Better than life, and yet no life at all.
 Conceive her born in such a magic dome,
 Pictures all round her ! why, she sees the world,
 Can recognize its given things and facts,
 The fight of giants or the feast of gods,
 Sages in senate, beauties at the bath.
 Chases and battles, the whole earth's display, Landscape and sea-piece, down to flowers and
 fruit —

And who shall question that she knows them all,
 In better semblance than the things outside ?
 Yet bring into the silent gallery
 Some live thing to contrast in breath and blood,
 Some lion, with the painted lion there —
 You think she 'll understand composedly ?
 — Say, " that 's his fellow in the hunting-piece Yonder, I 've turned to praise a hundred
 times ? "

Not so. Her knowledge of our actual earth,
 Its hopes and fears, concerns and sympathies,
 Must be too far, too mediate, too unreal.
 The real exists for us outside, not her :
 How should it, with that life in these four walls,

That father and that mother, first to last
 No father and no mother — friends, a heap,
 Lovers, no lack — a husband in due time,
 And every one of them alike a lie !
 Things painted by a Rubens out of naught
 Into what kindness, friendship, love should be ;
 All better, all more grandiose than the life,
 Only no life ; mere cloth and surface-paint,
 You feel, while you admire. How should she feel ?

Yet now that she has stood thus fifty years
 The sole spectator in that gallery,
 You think to bring this warm real struggling
 love

In to her of a sudden, and suppose
 She 'll keep her state untroubled ? Here 's the
 truth —

She 'll apprehend truth's value at a glance,
 Prefer it to the pictured loyalty ?
 You only have to say, " So men are made,
 For this they act ; the thing has many names,
 But this the right one : and now, Queen, be just ! "

Your life slips back ; you lose her at the word :
 You do not even for amends gain me.
 He will not understand ! oh, Norbert, Norbert,
 Do you not understand ?

Nor. The Queen 's the Queen,

I am myself — no picture, but alive
 In every nerve and every muscle, here
 At the palace-window o'er the people's street,
 As she in the gallery where the pictures glow :
 The good of life is precious to us both.
 She cannot love ; what do I want with rule ?
 When first I saw your face a year ago
 I knew my life's good, my soul heard one
 voice —

" The woman yonder, there 's no use of life
 But just to obtain her ! heap earth's woes in one
 And bear them — make a pile of all earth's joys

And spurn them, as they help or help not this ;
 Only, obtain her ! " How was it to be ?
 I found you were the cousin of the Queen ;
 I must then serve the Queen to get to you.
 No other way. Suppose there had been one,
 And I, by saying prayers to some white star
 With promise of my body and my soul,
 Might gain you, — should I pray the star or no ?
 Instead, there was the Queen to serve ! I
 served,

Helped, did what other servants failed to do.
 Neither she sought nor I declared my end.
 Her good is hers, my recompense be mine, —
 I therefore name you as that recompense.
 She dreamed that such a thing could never be ?
 Let her wake now. She thinks there was more cause

In love of power, high fame, pure loyalty ?
 Perhaps she fancies men wear out their lives
 Chasing such shades. Then, I 've a fancy too ;
 I worked because I want you with my soul :
 I therefore ask your hand. Let it be now !

Con. Had I not loved you from the very
 first,

Were I not yours, could we not steal out thus
 So wickedly, so wildly, and so well,
 You might become impatient. What's conceived

Of us without here, by the folk within ?
 Where are you now ? immersed in cares of state —

Where am I now ? intent on festal robes —
 We two, embracing under death's spread hand !
 What was this thought for, what that scruple of yours

Which broke the council up ? — to bring about
 One minute's meeting in the corridor !
 And then the sudden sleights, strange seeceries,
 Complots inscrutable, deep telegraphs,
 Long-planned chance-meetings, hazards of a
 look,

" Does she know ? does she not know ? saved
 or lost ? "

A year of this compression's ecstasy
 All goes for nothing ! you would give this up
 For the old way, the open way, the world's,
 His way who beats, and his who sells his wife !
 What tempts you ? — their notorious happiness
 Makes you ashamed of ours ? The best you 'll
 gain

Will be — the Queen grants all that you require,
 Concedes the cousin, rids herself of you
 And me at once, and gives us ample leave
 To live like our five hundred happy friends.

The world will show us with officious hand
Our chamber-entry, and stand sentinel
Where we so oft have stolen across its traps !
Get the world's warrant, ring the falcons' feet,
And make it duty to be bold and swift,
Which long ago was nature. Have it so !
We never hawked by rights till flung from fist ?

Oh, the man's thought ! no woman's such a
fool.

Nor. Yes, the man's thought and my thought, which is more —
One made to love you, let the world take note !
Have I done worthy work ? be love's the
praise,

Though hampered by restrictions, barred against

By set forms, blinded by forced secrecies !
Set free my love, and see what love can do
Shown in my life — what work will spring from that !

The world is used to have its business done
On other grounds, find great effects produced
For power's sake, fame's sake, motives in men's mouth.

So, good : but let my low ground shame their
high !

Truth is the strong thing. Let man's life be
true !

And love's the truth of mine. Time prove the
rest !

I choose to wear you stamped all over me,
Your name upon my forehead and my breast,
You, from the sword's blade to the ribbon's edge,
That men may see, all over, you in me —
That pale loves may die out of their pretence
In face of mine, shames thrown on love fall
off.

Permit this, Constance ! Love has been so
long

Subdued in me, eating me through and through,
That now 't is all of me and must have way.
Think of my work, that chaos of intrigues,
Those hopes and fears, surprises and delays,
That long endeavor, earnest, patient, slow,
Trembling at last to its assured result :
Then think of this revulsion ! I resume
Life after death, (it is no less than life,
After such long unlovely laboring days.)

And liberate to beauty life's great need
O' the beautiful, which, while it prompted work, Suppressed itself erewhile. This eve's the
time,

This eve intense with yon first trembling star
We seem to pant and reach ; scarce aught between

The earth that rises and the heaven that bends ;
All nature self-abandoned, every tree
Flung as it will, pursuing its own thoughts
And fixed so, every flower and every weed,
No pride, no shame, no victory, no defeat ;
All under God, each measured by itself.
These statues round us stand abrupt, distinct,
The strong in strength, the weak in weakness
fixed,

The Muse forever wedded to her lyre,
Nymph to her fawn, and Silence to her rose :
See God's approval on his universe !

Let us do so — aspire to live as these
In harmony with truth, ourselves being true !
Take the first way, and let the second come !
My first is to possess myself of you ;
The music sets the march-step — forward, then !
And there's the Queen, I go to claim you of,
The world to witness, wonder and applaud.
Our flower of life breaks open. No delay !

Con. And so shall we be ruined, both of us.
Norbert, I know her to the skin and bone :
You do not know her, were not born to it,
To feel what she can see or cannot see.
Love, she is generous, — ay, despite your
smile,

Generous as you are : for, in that thin frame
Pain-twisted, punctured through and through with cares,

There lived a lavish soul until it starved,
Debarred of healthy food. Look to the soul —
Pity that, stoop to that, ere you begin (The true man's - way) on justice and your rights,

Exactions and acquittance of the past !
Begin so — see what justice she will deal !
We women hate a debt as men a gift.
Suppose her some poor keeper of a school
Whose business is to sit through summer
months

And dote out children leave to go and play,
Herself superior to such lightness — she
In the arm-chair's state and pædagogic pomp —
To the life, the laughter, sun and youth out-
side :

We wonder such a face looks black on us ?
I do not bid you wake her tenderness,
(That were vain truly — none is left to wake,)
But, let her think her justice is engaged
To take the shape of tenderness, and mark
If she 'll not coldly pay its warmest debt !
Does she love me, I ask you ? not a whit :
Yet, thinking that her justice was engaged
To help a kinswoman, she took me up —
Did more on that bare ground than other loves
Would do on greater argument. For me,
I have no equivalent of such cold kind
To pay her with, but love alone to give
If I give anything. I give her love :
I feel I ought to help her, and I will.

So, for her sake, as yours, I tell you twice
That women hate a debt as men a gift.
If I were you, I could obtain this grace —
Could lay the whole I did to love's account,
Nor yet be very false as courtiers go —
Declaring my success was recompense ;
It would be so, in fact : what were it else ?

And then, once loose her generosity, —
Oh, how I see it ! then, were I but you
To turn it, let it seem to move itself,
And make it offer what I really take,
Accepting just, in the poor cousin's hand,
Her value as the next thing to the Queen's —
Since none love Queens directly, none dare that,
And a thing's shadow or a name's mere echo
Suffices those who miss the name and thing !

You pick up just a ribbon she has worn,
To keep in proof how near her breath you
came.

Say, I'm so near I seem a piece of her —

Ask for me that way — (oh, you understand,) You'd find the same gift yielded with a grace, Which, if you make the least show to extort . . .

— You'll see! and when you have ruined both of us,

Dissertate on the Queen's ingratitude!

Nor. Then, if I turn it that way, you consent?

'T is not my way; I have more hope in truth: Still, if you won't have truth — why, this indeed,

Were scarcely false, as I'd express the sense. Will you remain here?

Con. O best heart of mine, How I have loved you! then, you take my way? Are mine as you have been her minister, Work out my thought, give it effect for me, Paint plain my poor conceit and make it serve? I owe that withered woman everything — Life, fortune, you, remember! Take my part —

Help me to pay her! Stand upon your rights? You, with my rose, my hands, my heart on you?

Your rights are mine — you have no rights but mine.

Nor. Remain here. How you know me!

Con. Ah, but still —
[He breaks from her; she remains. Dance-music from within.]

(Enter the QUEEN.)

Queen. Constance? She is here as he said. Speak quick!

Is it so? Is it true or false? One word!

Con. True.

Queen. Mercifullest Mother, thanks to thee!

Con. Madam?

Queen. I love you, Constance, from my soul.

Now say once more, with any words you will,

'T is true, all true, as true as that I speak.

Con. Why should you doubt it?

Queen. Ah, why doubt? why doubt?

Dear, make me see it! Do you see it so?

None see themselves; another sees them best.

You say "why doubt it?" — you see him and me.

It is because the Mother has such grace That if we had but faith — wherein we fail — Whate'er we yearn for would be granted us; Yet still we let our whims prescribe despair, Our fancies thwart and cramp our will and power,

And while accepting life, abjure its use.

Constance, I had abjured the hope of love

And being loved, as truly as you palm

The hope of seeing Egypt from that plot.

Con. Heaven!

Queen. But it was so, Constance, it was so!

Men say — or do men say it? fancies say —

"Stop here, your life is set, you are grown old.

Too late — no love for you, too late for love — Leave love to girls. Be queen: let Constance love!"

One takes the hint — half meets it like a child, Ashamed at any feelings that oppose.

"Oh love, true, never think of love again!

I am a queen: I rule, not love, forsooth."

So it goes on; so a face grows like this, Hair like this hair, poor arms as lean as these, Till, — nay, it does not end so, I thank God!

Con. I cannot understand —

Queen. The happier you!

Constance, I know not how it is with men:

For women (I am a woman now like you)

There is no good of life but love — but love!

What else looks good, is some shade flung from love;

Love gilds it, gives it worth. Be warned by me,

Never you cheat yourself one instant! Love,

Give love, ask only love, and leave the rest!

O Constance, how I love you!

Con.

I love you.

Queen. I do believe that all is come through you.

I took you to my heart to keep it warm

When the last chance of love seemed dead in me;

I thought your fresh youth warmed my withered heart.

Oh, I am very old now, am I not?

Not so! it is true and it shall be true!

Con. Tell it me: let me judge if true or false.

Queen. Ah, but I fear you! you will look at me

And say, "she's old, she's grown unlovely quite

Who ne'er wasauteous: men want beauty still."

Well, so I feared — the curse! so I felt sure!

Con. Be calm. And now you feel not sure, you say?

Queen. Constance, he came, — the coming was not strange —

Do not I stand and see men come and go?

I turned a half-look from my pedestal

Where I grow marble — "one young man the more!

He will love some one; that is naught to me;

What would he with my marble stateliness?"

Yet this seemed somewhat worse than heretofore;

The man more gracious, youthful, like a god,

And I still older, with less flesh to change —

We two those dear extremes that long to touch.

It seemed still harder when he first began

To labor at those state-affairs, absorbed

The old way for the old end — interest.

Oh, to live with a thousand beating hearts

Around you, swift eyes, serviceable hands.

Professing they've no care but for your cause,

Thought but to help you, love but for yourself, —

And you the marble statue all the time

They praise and point at as preferred to life,

Yet leave for the first breathing woman's smile,

First dancer's, gypsy's, or street baladine's!

Why, how I have ground my teeth to hear men's speech

Stified for fear it should alarm my ear,

Their gait subdued lest step should startle me,

Their eyes declined, such quondam to respect,

Their hands alert, such treasure to preserve,

While not a man of them broke rank and spoke,
Wrote me a vulgar letter all of love,
Or caught my hand and pressed it like a hand !
There have been moments, if the sentinel
Lowering his halbert to salute the queen,
Had flung it brutally and elapsed my knees,
I would have stooped and kissed him with my
soul.

Con. Who could have comprehended ?

Queen. Ay, who — who ?
Why, no one, Constance, but this one who did.
Not they, not you, not I. Even now perhaps
It comes too late — would you but tell the truth.

Con. I wait to tell it.

Queen. Well, you see, he came,
Outfaced the others, did a work this year
Exceeds in value all was ever done,
You know — it is not I who say it — all
Say it. And so (a second pang and worse)
I grew aware not only of what he did,
But why so wondrously. Oh, never work
Like his was done for work's ignoble sake —
Souls need a finer aim to light and lure !
I felt, I saw, he loved — loved somebody.
And Constance, my dear Constance, do you
know,

I did believe this while 't was you he loved.

Con. Me, madam ?

Queen. It did seem to me, your face Met him where'er he looked : and whom but
you

Was such a man to love ? It seemed to me,
You saw he loved you, and approved his love,
And both of you were in intelligence.
You could not loiter in that garden, step
Into this balcony, but I straight was stung
And forced to understand. It seemed so true,
So right, so beautiful, so like you both,
That all this work should have been done by
him

Not for the vulgar hope of recompense,
But that at last — suppose, some night like
this —

Borne on to claim his due reward of me,
He might say, "Give her hand and pay me
so."

And I (O Constance, you shall love me now !)

I thought, surmounting all the bitterness,

—"And he shall have it. I will make her blest,

My flower of youth, my woman's self that was,
My happiest woman's self that might have been!
These two shall have their joy and leave me
here."

Yes — yes !

Con. Thanks !

Queen. And the word was on my lips
When he burst in upon me. I looked to hear
A mere calm statement of his just desire
For payment of his labor. When — O heaven,
How can I tell you ? lightning on my eyes
And thunder in my ears proved that first word
Which told 't was love of me, of me, did all —
He loved me — from the first step to the last,
Loved me !

Con. You hardly saw, scarce heard him
speak
Of love : what if you should mistake ?

Queen.

No, no —

No mistake ! Ha, there shall be no mistake !
He had not dared to hint the love he felt —
You were my reflex — (how I understood !)
He said you were the ribbon I had worn,
He kissed my hand, he looked into my eyes,
And love, love came at end of every phrase.
Love is begun ; this much is come to pass :
The rest is easy. Constance, I am yours !
I will learn, I will place my life on you,
Teach me but how to keep what I have won !
Am I so old ? This hair was early gray ;
But joy ere now has brought hair brown again,
And joy will bring the cheek's red back, I feel.
I could sing once too ; that was in my youth.
Still, when men paint me, they declare me . . .

yes,

Beautiful — for the last French painter did !
I know they flatter somewhat ; you are frank —
I trust you. How I loved you from the first !

Some queens would hardly seek a cousin out
And set her by their side to take the eye :
I must have felt that good would come from
you.

I am not generous — like him — like you !

But he is not your lover after all :

It was not you he looked at. Saw you him ?
You have not been mistaking words or looks ?
He said you were the reflex of myself.
And yet he is not such a paragon

To you, to younger women who may choose Among a thousand Norberts. Speak the
truth !

You know you never named his name to me :

You know, I cannot give him up — ah God,

Not up now, even to you !

Con.

Then calm yourself.

Queen. See, I am old — look here, you happy
girl !

I will not play the fool, deceive — ah, whom ?
'T is all gone : put your cheek beside my cheek
And what a contrast does the moon behold !
But then I set my life upon one chance,
The last chance and the best — am I not left,
My soul, myself ? All women love great men
If young or old ; it is in all the tales :
Young beauties love old poets who can love —
Why should not he, the poems in my soul,
The passionate faith, the pride of sacrifice,
Life-long, death-long ? I throw them at his feet.

Who cares to see the fountain's very shape,
Whether it be a Triton's or a Nymph's
That pours the foam, makes rainbows all around ?

You could not praise indeed the empty conch ;
But I'll pour floods of love and hide myself.
How I will love him ! Cannot men love love ?
Who was a queen and loved a poet once
Humpbacked, a dwarf ? ah, women can do
that !

Well, but men too ; at least, they tell you so.
They love so many women in their youth,
And even in age they all love whom they please ;
And yet the best of them confide to friends
That 't is not beauty makes the lasting love —
They spend a day with such and tire the next :

They like soul,— well then, they like phantasy,
Novelty even. Let us confess the truth,
Horrible though it be, that prejudice,
Prescription . . . curses! they will love a queen.
They will, they do: and will not, does not — he?

Con. How can he? You are wedded: 'tis a name

We know, but still a bond. Your rank remains,
His rank remains. How can he, nobly souled
As you believe and I incline to think,
Aspire to be your favorite, shame and all?

Queen. Hear her! There, there now — could she love like me?

What did I say of smooth-cheeked youth and
grace?

See all it does or could do! so youth loves!

Oh, tell him, Constance, you could never do

What I will — you, it was not born in! I

Will drive these difficulties far and fast

As yonder mists curdling before the moon.

I'll use my light too, gloriously retrieve

My youth from its enforced calamity,

Dissolve that hateful marriage, and be his,

His own in the eyes alike of God and man.

Con. You will do — dare do . . . pause on what you say!

Queen. Hear her! I thank you, sweet, for that surprise.

You have the fair face: for the soul, see mine!

I have the strong soul: let me teach you, here.

I think I have borne enough and long enough,

And patiently enough, the world remarks,

To have my own way now, unblamed by all.

It does so happen (I rejoice for it)

This most unhopèd-for issue cuts the knot.

There's not a better way of settling claims

Than this; God sends the accident express:

And were it for my subjects' good, no more,

'T were best thus ordered. I am thankful now,

Mute, passive, acquiescent. I receive,

And bless God simply, or should almost fear

To walk so smoothly to my ends at last.

Why, how I baffle obstacles, spurn fate!

How strong I am! Could Norbert see me now!

Con. Let me consider. It is all too strange.

Queen. You, Constance, learn of me; do you,
like me!

You are young, beautiful: my own, best girl,

You will have many lovers, and love one —

Light hair, not hair like Norbert's, to suit
yours,

Taller than he is, since yourself are tall.

Love him, like me! Give all away to him;

Think never of yourself; throw by your pride,

Hope, fear, — your own good as you saw it once,

And love him simply for his very self.

Remember, I (and what am I to you?)

Would give up all for one, leave throne, lose life,

Do all but just unlove him! He loves me.

Con. He shall.

Queen. You, step inside my inmost heart!

Give me your own heart: let us have one heart!

I'll come to you for counsel; "this he says,

This he does; what should this amount to,
pray?

Beseech you, change it into current coin!

Is that worth kisses? Shall I please him
there?"

And then we'll speak in turn of you — what else?

Your love, according to your beauty's worth,

For you shall have some noble love, all gold:

Whom choose you? we will get him at your choice.

— Constance, I leave you. Just a minute since,
I felt as I must die or be alone

Breathing my soul into an ear like yours:

Now, I would face the world with my new life,

Wear my new crown. I'll walk around the rooms,

And then come back and tell you how it feels.

How soon a smile of God can change the world!

How we are made for happiness — how work

Grows play, adversity a winning fight!

True, I have lost so many years: what then?

Many remain: God has been very good.

You, stay here! 'T is as different from dreams,

From the mind's cold calm estimate of bliss,

As these stone statues from the flesh and
blood.

The comfort thou hast caused mankind, God's moon!

[She goes out, leaving CONSTANCE. Dance-music from within.]

(NORBERT enters.)

Nor. Well? we have but one minute and one
word!

Con. I am yours, Norbert!

Nor. Yes, mine.

Con. Not till now!

You were mine. Now I give myself to you.

Nor. Constance?

Con. Your own! I know the thriftier way
Of giving — haply, 't is the wiser way.

Meaning to give a treasure, I might dole

Coin after coin out (each, as that were all,

With a new largess still at each despair)

And force you keep in sight the deed, preserve

Exhaustless till the end my part and yours,

My giving and your taking; both our joys

Dying together. Is it the wiser way?

I choose the simpler; I give all at once.

Know what you have to trust to, trade upon!

Use it, abuse it, — anything but think

Hereafter, "Had I known she loved me so,

And what my means, I might have thriven with
it."

This is your means. I give you all myself.

Nor. I take you and thank God.

Con. Look on through years! We cannot kiss, a second day like this;

Else were this earth no earth.

Nor. With this day's heat

We shall go on through years of cold.

Con. So, best!

— I try to see those years — I think I see.

You walk quick and new warmth comes; you look back

And lay all to the first glow — not sit down

Forever brooding on a day like this

While seeing embers whiten and love die.

Yes, love lives best in its effect; and mine,

Full in its own life, yearns to live in yours.

Nor. Just so. I take and know you all at
once.

Your soul is disengaged so easily,

Your face is there, I know you ; give me time,
Let me be proud and think you shall know me.
My soul is slower : in a life I roll

The minute out whereto you condense yours —
The whole slow circle round you I must move,
To be just you. I look to a long life
To decompose this minute, prove its worth.

'T is the sparks' long succession one by one Shall show you, in the end, what fire was crammed

In that mere stone you struck : how could you
know,

If it lay ever unproved in your sight,
As now my heart lies ? your own warmth would hide

Its coldness, were it cold.

Con. But how prove, how ?

Nor. Prove in my life, you ask ?

Con. Quick, Norbert — how ?

Nor. That's easy told. I count life just a stuff

To try the soul's strength on, educe the man.
Who keeps one end in view makes all things
serve

As with the body — he who hurls a lance
Or heaps up stone on stone, shows strength alike :

So must I seize and task all means to prove
And show this soul of mine, you crown as yours,
And justify us both.

Con. Could you write books,

Paint pictures ! One sits down in poverty
And writes or paints, with pity for the rich.

Nor. And loves one's painting and one's writing, then.

And not one's mistress ! All is best, believe,
And we best as no other than we are.
We live, and they experiment on life —
Those poets, painters, all who stand aloof
To overlook the farther. Let us be The thing they look at ! I might take your
face

And write of it and paint it — to what end ?
For whom ? what pale dictatress in the air
Feeds, smiling sadly, her fine ghost-like form
With earth's real blood and breath, the beauteous life

She makes despised forever ? You are mine,
Made for me, not for others in the world,
Nor yet for that which I should call my art.
The cold calm power to see how fair you look.
I come to you ; I leave you not, to write
Or paint. You are, I am : let Rubens there Paint us !

Con. So, best !

Nor. I understand your soul,
You live, and rightly sympathize with life,
With action, power, success. This way is straight ;

And time were short beside, to let me change
The craft my childhood learnt : my craft shall serve.

Men set me here to subjugate, enclose,
Manure their barren lives, and force thence
fruit

First for themselves, and afterward for me
In the due tithe ; the task of some one soul,
Through ways of work appointed by the world.

I am not bid create — men see no star
Transfiguring my brow to warrant that —
But find and bind and bring to bear their wills.
So I began : to-night sees how I end.

What if it see, too, power's first outbreak here
Amid the warmth, surprise and sympathy,
And instincts of the heart that teach the head ?
What if the people have discerned at length
The dawn of the next nature, novel brain
Whose will they venture in the place of theirs, Whose work, they trust, shall find them as novel ways

To untried heights which yet he only sees ?
I felt it when you kissed me. See this Queen,
This people — in our phrase this mass of
men —

See how the mass lies passive to my hand
Now that my hand is plastic, with you by
To make the muscles iron ! Oh, an end
Shall crown this issue as this crowns the first !
My will be on the people ! then, the strain,
The grappling of the potter with his clay,
The long uncertain struggle, — the success
And consummation of the spirit-work,
Some vase shape to the curl of the god's lip,
While rounded fair for human sense to see
The Graces in a dance men recognize
With turbulent applause and laughs of heart !
So triumph ever shall renew itself ;
Ever shall end in efforts higher yet,
Ever begin . . .

Con. I ever helping ?

Nor. Thus !

(As he embraces her, the QUEEN enters.)

Con. Hist, madam ! So have I performed my part.

You see your gratitude's true decency,
Norbert ? A little slow in seeing it !
Begin, to end the sooner ! What's a kiss ?

Nor. Constance ?

Con. Why, must I teach it you again ?
You want a witness to your dullness, sir ?
What was I saying these ten minutes long ?
Then I repeat — when some young handsome
man

Like you has acted out a part like yours,
Is pleased to fall in love with one beyond,
So very far beyond him, as he says —
So hopelessly in love that but to speak
Would prove him mad, — he thinks judiciously,
And makes some insignificant good soul,
Like me, his friend, adviser, confidant,
And very stalking-horse to cover him
In following after what he dares not face —
When his end's gained — (sir, do you understand ?)

When she, he dares not face, has loved him
first.

— May I not say so, madam ? — tops his hope,
And overpasses so his wildest dream,
With glad consent of all, and most of her
The confidant who brought the same about —
Why, in the moment when such joy explodes,
I do hold that the merest gentleman
Will not start rudely from the stalking-horse,
Dismiss it with a " There, enough of you !"
Forget it, show his back unmanly ;
But like a liberal heart will rather turn

And say, "A tingling time of hope was ours;
Betwixt the fears and falterings, we two lived
A chanceful time in waiting for the prize:
The confidant, the Constance, served not ill.
And though I shall forget her in good time,
Her use being answered now, as reason bids,
Nay as herself bids from her heart of hearts,—
Still, she has rights, the first thanks go to her,
The first good praise goes to the prosperous tool.

And the first — which is the last — rewarding
kiss."

Nor. Constance, it is a dream — ah, see,
you smile!

Con. So, now his part being properly performed,

Madam, I turn to you and finish mine

As duly; I do justice in my turn.

Yes, madam, he has loved you — long and
well;

He could not hope to tell you so — 't was I
Who served to prove your soul accessible,
I led his thoughts on, drew them to their place
When they had wandered else into despair,
And kept love constant toward its natural aim.
Enough, my part is played; you stoop half-way
And meet us royally and spare our fears:
'T is like yourself. He thanks you, so do I.
Take him — with my full heart! my work is praised

By what comes of it. Be you happy, both!
Yourself — the only one on earth who can —
Do all for him, much more than a mere heart
Which though warm is not useful in its warmth
As the silk vesture of a queen! fold that Around him gently, tenderly. For him —
For him, — he knows his own part!

Nor. Have you done?
I take the jest at last. Should I speak now?
Was yours the wager, Constance, foolish child,
Or did you but accept it? Well — at least
You lose by it.

Con. Nay, madam, 't is your turn!
Restrain him still from speech a little more,
And make him happier as more confident!
Pity him, madam, he is timid yet!
Mark, Norbert! Do not shrink now! Here I yield

My whole right in you to the Queen, observe!
With her go put in practice the great schemes
You teem with, follow the career else closed —
Be all you cannot be except by her!
Behold her! — Madam, say for pity's sake
Anything — frankly say you love him! Else
He'll not believe it: there's more earnest in
His fear than you conceive: I know the man!

Nor. I know the woman somewhat, and confess

I thought she had jested better: she begins
To overcharge her part. I gravely wait
Your pleasure, madam: where is my reward?

Queen. Norbert, this wild girl (whom I recognize

Scarcely more than you do, in her fancy-fit,
Eccentric speech and variable mirth.
Not very wise perhaps and somewhat bold.
Yet suitable, the whole night's work being strange)

— May still be right: I may do well to speak
And make authentic what appears a dream
To even myself. For, what she says is true:
Yes, Norbert — what you spoke just now of love,
Devotion, stirred no novel sense in me,
But justified a warmth felt long before.
Yes, from the first — I loved you, I shall say:
Strange! but I do grow stronger, now 't is said.
Your courage helps mine: you did well to speak
To-night, the night that crowns your twelve-months' toil:

But still I had not waited to discern
Your heart so long, believe me! From the first
The source of so much zeal was almost plain,
In absence even of your own words just now
Which hazarded the truth. 'T is very strange,
But takes a happy ending — in your love
Which mine meets: be it so! as you choose me,
So I choose you.

Nor. And worthily you choose.
I will not be unworthy your esteem,
No, madam. I do love you; I will meet
Your nature, now I know it. This was well.
I see, — you dare and you are justified:
But none had ventured such experiment,
Less versed than you in nobleness of heart,
Less confident of finding such in me.
I joy that thus you test me ere you grant
The dearest, richest, beauteouset and best
Of women to my arms: 't is like yourself.
So — back again into my part's set words —
Devotion to the uttermost is yours,
But no, you cannot, madam, even you,
Create in me the love our Constance does.
Or — something truer to the tragic phrase —
Not yon magnolia-bell superb with scent
Invites a certain insect — that 's myself —
But the small eye-flower nearer to the ground.
I take this lady.

Con. Stay — not hers, the trap —
Stay, Norbert — that mistake were worst of all!
He is too cunning, madam! It was I,
I, Norbert, who . . .

Nor. You, was it, Constance? Then,
But for the grace of this divinest hour
Which gives me you, I might not pardon here!
I am the Queen's; she only knows my brain:
She may experiment upon my heart
And I instruct her too by the result.
But you, Sweet, you who know me, who so long
Have told my heartbeats over, held my life
In those white hands of yours, — it is not well!

Con. Tush! I have said it, did I not say it
all?

The life, for her — the heartbeats, for her sake!
Nor. Enough! my cheek grows red, I think.
Your test?

There's not the meanest woman in the world,
Not she I least could love in all the world,
Whom, did she love me, had love proved itself,
I dare insult as you insult me now.
Constance, I could say, if it must be said,
"Take back the soul you offer, I keep mine!"
But — "Take the soul still quivering on your
hand,

The soul so offered, which I cannot use,
And, please you, give it to some playful friend,
For — what 's the trifle he requites me with?"

I tempt a woman, to amuse a man,
That two may mock her heart if it succumb ?
No : fearing God and standing 'neath his
heaven,

I would not dare insult a woman so,
Were she the meanest woman in the world,
And he, I feared to please, ten emperors !

Con. Norbert !

Nor. I love once as I live but once.
What case is this to think or talk about ?
I love you. Would it mend the case at all
If such a step as this killed love in me ?
Your part were done : account to God for it !
But mine — could murdered love get up again,
And kneel to whom you please to designate,
And make you mirth ? It is too horrible.

You did not know this, Constance ? now you
know
That body and soul have each one life, but
one ;

And here's my love, here, living, at your feet.

Con. See the Queen ! Norbert — this one more last word —

If thus you have taken jest for earnest — thus Loved me in earnest . . .

Nor. Ah, no jest holds here !
Where is the laughter in which jests break up,
And what this horror that grows palpable ?
Madam — why grasp you thus the balcony ?
Have I done ill ? Have I not spoken truth ?
How could I other ? Was it not your test,
To try me, what my love for Constance meant ?
Madam, your royal soul itself approves,
The first, that I should choose thus ! so one takes A beggar, — asks him, what would buy his
child ?

And then approves the expected laugh of scorn
Returned as something noble from the rags.
Speak, Constance, I'm the beggar ! Ha, what 's this ?

You two glare each at each like panthers now.
Constance, the world fades ; only you stand
there !

You did not, in to-night's wild whirl of things,
Sell me — your soul of souls, for any price ?
No — no — 't is easy to believe in you !
Was it your love's mad trial to o'ertop
Mine by this vain self-sacrifice ? well, still —
Though I might curse, I love you. I am love
And cannot change : love's self is at your feet !

[The Queen goes out.]

Con. Feel my heart ; let it die against your
own !

Nor. Against my own. Explain not ; let this
be !

This is life's height.

Con. Yours, yours, yours !

Nor. You and I —

Why care by what meanders we are here
I' the centre of the labyrinth ? Men have died
Trying to find this place, which we have found.

Con. Found, found !

Nor. Sweet, never fear what she can do !
We are past harm now.

Con.

I thought of men — as if you were a man.
Tempting him with a crown !

Nor.

This must end here :

It is too perfect.

Con.

There 's the music stopped.
What measured heavy tread ? It is one blaze
About me and within me.

Nor.

Oh, some death
Will run its sudden finger round this spark
And sever us from the rest !

Con.

And so do well.

Now the doors open,

Nor.

'T is the guard comes.

Con.

Kiss !

BEN KARSHOOK'S WISDOM

The eighth line of the fourteenth section of
One Word More reads,

"Karshish, Cleon, Norbert and the fifty."

Originally it read,

"Karshook, Cleon, Norbert and the fifty."

The reference apparently was to the poem written in April, 1854, and printed in The Keepsake, an annual edited by Miss Power, a niece of Lady Blessington, in whom Dickens also took an interest. It may have been Browning's intention to include this poem in Men and Women, but he never did place it there, and finally dropped Karshook and substituted Karshish, who narrates his medical experience.

I

"WOULD a man 'scape the rod ?"

Rabbi Ben Karshook saith,

"See that he turn to God

The day before his death."

"Ay, could a man inquire

When it shall come !" I say.

The Rabbi's eye shoots fire —

"Then let him turn to-day !"

II

Quoth a young Sadducee :

"Reader of many rolls,

Is it so certain we

Have, as they tell us, souls ?"

"Son, there is no reply !"

The Rabbi bit his beard :

"Certain, a soul have I —

We may have none," he sneered.

Thus Karshook, the Hiram's-Hammer,
The Right-hand Temple-column,
Taught babes in grace their grammar,
And struck the simple, solemn.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ

THE volume bearing the title Dramatis Personæ was published in 1864 and the contents remained unchanged in subsequent editions except that two short poems were added in the edition of 1868. The first poem was however originally entitled James Lee. The first six stanzas of the sixth section of the poem were first printed in 1836 in Mr. Fox's The Monthly Repository, and bore the title merely Lines, with the signature Z.

JAMES LEE'S WIFE SPEAKS AT THE WINDOW

AH, Love, but a day
And the world has changed!
The sun's away,
And the bird estranged;
The wind has dropped,
And the sky's deranged:
Summer has stopped.

Look in my eyes!
Wilt thou change too?
Should I fear surprise?
Shall I find aught new
In the old and dear,
In the good and true,
With the changing year?

Thou art a man,
But I am thy love.
For the lake, its swan;
For the dell its dove;
And for thee — (oh, haste!)
Me, to bend above,
Me, to hold embraced.

II

BY THE FIRESIDE

Is all our fire of shipwreck wood,
Oak and pine?
Oh, for the ills half-understood,
The dim dead woe
Long ago
Befallen this bitter coast of France!
Well, poor sailors took their chance;
I take mine.

A ruddy shaft our fire must shoot
O'er the sea:
Do sailors eye the casement — mute
Drenched and stark,
From their bark —
And envy, gnash their teeth for hate
O' the warm safe house and happy freight — Thee and me?

God help you, sailors, at your need!
Spare the curse!
For some ships, safe in port indeed,

Rot and rust,
Run to dust,
All through worms i' the wood, which crept,
Gnawed our hearts out while we slept:
That is worse.

Who lived here before us two?
Old-world pairs.
Did a woman ever — would I knew! —
Watch the man
With whom began
Love's voyage full-sail, — (now gnash your teeth!)
When planks start, open hell beneath Unawares?

III

IN THE DOORWAY

The swallow has set her six young on the rail,
And looks seaward:
The water's in stripes like a snake, olive-pale
To the leeward, —
On the weather-side, black, spotted white with
the wind.
"Good fortune departs, and disaster's behind," —
Hark, the wind with its wants and its infinite wail!

Our fig-tree, that leaned for the saltness, has furled
Her five fingers,
Each leaf like a hand opened wide to the world
Where there lingers
No glint of the gold, Summer sent for her sake:
How the vines writhe in rows, each impaled on its stake!
My heart shrivels up and my spirit shrinks curled.

Yet here are we two; we have love, house
enough,
With the field there,
This house of four rooms, that field red and rough,
Though it yield there,
For the rabbit that robs, scarce a blade or a
bent;
If a magpie alight now, it seems an event;
And they both will be gone at November's rebuff.

But why must cold spread? but wherefore bring change
To the spirit,

God meant should mate his with an infinite range,
And inherit
His power to put life in the darkness and cold ?
Oh, live and love worthily, bear and be bold !
Whom Summer made friends of, let Winter estrangle !

IV

ALONG THE BEACH

I will be quiet and talk with you,
And reason why you are wrong.
You wanted my love — is that much true ?
And so I did love, so I do :
What has come of it all along ?

I took you — how could I otherwise ?
For a world to me, and more ;
For all, love greatens and glorifies
Till God 's aglow, to the loving eyes,
In what was mere earth before.

Yes, earth — yes, mere ignoble earth !
Now do I mis-state, mistake ?
Do I wrong your weakness and call it worth ?
Expect all harvest, dread no dearth,
Seal my sense up for your sake ?

Oh, Love, Love, no, Love ! not so, indeed !
You were just weak earth, I knew :
With much in you waste, with many a weed,
And plenty of passions run to seed,
But a little good grain too.

And such as you were, I took you for mine :
Did not you find me yours,
To watch the olive and wait the vine,
And wonder when rivers of oil and wine
Would flow, as the Book assures ?

Well, and if none of these good things came,
What did the failure prove ?
The man was my whole world, all the same,
With his flowers to praise or his weeds to blame,
And, either or both, to love.

Yet this turns now to a fault — there ! there !
That I do love, watch too long,
And wait too well, and weary and wear ;
And 'tis all an old story, and my despair
Fit subject for some new song :

"How the light, light love, he has wings to fly
At suspicion of a bond :
My wisdom has bidden your pleasure good-by,
Which will turn up next in a laughing eye,
And why should you look beyond ?"

ON THE CLIFF

I leaned on the turf,
I looked at a rock
Left dry by the surf :

For the turf, to call it grass were to mock :
Dead to the roots, so deep was done
The work of the summer sun.

And the rock lay flat
As an anvil's face ;
No iron like that !
Baked dry ; of a weed, of a shell, no trace :
Sunshine outside, but ice at the core,
Death's altar by the lone shore.

On the turf, sprang gay
With his films of blue,
No cricket, I'll say,
But a warhorse, barded and chanfroned too,
The gift of a quixote-mage to his knight,
Real fairy, with wings all right.

On the rock, they scorch
Like a drop of fire
From a brandished torch,
Fall two red fans of a butterfly :
No turf, no rock : in their ugly stead,
See, wonderful blue and red !

Is it not so
With the minds of men ?
The level and low,
The burnt and bare, in themselves ; but then
With such a blue and red grace, not theirs, —
Love settling unawares !

READING A BOOK, UNDER THE CLIFF

"Still ailing, Wind ? Wilt be appeased or
no ?

Which needs the other's office, thou or I ?
Dost want to be disburdened of a woe,
And can, in truth, my voice untie
Its links, and let it go ?

"Art thou a dumb, wronged thing that would be righted,

Entrusting thus thy cause to me ? Forbear !
No tongue can mend such pleadings ; faith, requited

With falsehood, — love, at last aware
Of scorn, — hopes, early blighted, —

"We have them ; but I know not any tone
So fit as thine to falter forth a sorrow :
Dost think men would go mad without a moan,
If they knew any way to borrow
A pathos like thy own ?

"Which sigh wouldst mock, of all the sighs ?
The one

So long escaping from lips starved and blue,
That lasts while on her pallet-bed the nun
Stretches her length ; her foot comes through
The straw she shivers on ;

"You had not thought she was so tall : and spent,
Her shrunk lids open, her lean fingers shut

Close, close, their sharp and livid nails indent
The clammy palm; then all is mute:
That way, the spirit went.

"Or wouldst thou rather that I understand
Thy will to help me? — like the dog I found
Once, pacing sad this solitary strand,
Who would not take my food, poor hound,
But whined and licked my hand."

All this, and more, comes from some young man's pride

Of power to see, — in failure and mistake,
Relinquishment, disgrace, on every side, —
Merely examples for his sake,
Helps to his path untried:

Instances he must — simply recognize?

Oh, more than so! — must, with a learner's zeal,

Make doubly prominent, twice emphasize,
By added touches that reveal
The god in babe's disguise.

Oh, he knows what defeat means, and the
rest!

Himself the undefeated that shall be:
Failure, disgrace, he flings them you to test, —
His triumph, in eternity
Too plainly manifest!

Whence, judge if he learn forthwith what the wind

Means in its moaning — by the happy prompt
Instinctive way of youth, I mean; for kind
Calm years, exacting their account
Of pain, mature the mind:

And some midsummer morning, at the lull

Just about daybreak, as he looks across
A sparkling foreign country, wonderful
To the sea's edge for gloom and gloss,
Next minute must annul, —

Then, when the wind begins among the vines,
So low, so low, what shall it say but this?
"Here is the change beginning, here the lines
Circumscribe beauty, set to bliss
The limit time assigns."

Nothing can be as it has been before;

Better, so call it, only not the same.
To draw one beauty into our hearts' core,
And keep it changeless! such our claim;
So answered, — Nevermore!

Simple? Why this is the old woe o' the world;
Tune, to whose rise and fall we live and
die.

Rise with it, then! Rejoice that man is hurled
From change to change unceasingly,
His soul's wings never furled!

That's a new question; still replies the fact,
Nothing endures: the wind moans, saying
so;

We moan in acquiescence: there's life's pact.
Perhaps probation — do I know?
God does: endure his act!

Only, for man, how bitter not to grave
On his soul's hands' palms one fair good wise
thing

Just as he grasped it! For himself, death's wave;

While time first washes — ah, the sting! —
O'er all he'd sink to save.

VII

AMONG THE ROCKS

Oh, good gigantic smile o' the brown old earth,
This autumn morning! How he sets his bones

To bask i' the sun, and thrusts out knees and
feet

For the ripple to run over in its mirth;

Listening the while, where on the heap of stones

The white breast of the sea-lark twitters sweet.

That is the doctrine, simple, ancient, true;

Such is life's trial, as old earth smiles and
knows.

If you loved only what were worth your love,
Love were clear gain, and wholly well for
you:

Make the low nature better by your throes!
Give earth yourself, go up for gain above!

BESIDE THE DRAWING-BOARD

I

"As like as a Hand to another Hand!"

Whoever said that foolish thing,
Could not have studied to understand

The councils of God in fashioning,
Out of the infinite love of his heart,
This Hand, whose beauty I praise, apart
From the world of wonder left to praise,
If I tried to learn the other ways

Of love in its skill, or love in its power.

"As like as a Hand to another Hand:"

Who said that, never took his stand,

Found and followed, like me, an hour,
The beauty in this, — how free, how fine
To fear, almost, — of the limit-line!

As I looked at this, and learned and drew,
Drew and learned, and looked again,

While fast the happy minutes flew,
Its beauty mounted into my brain.

And a fancy seized me; I was fain

To efface my work, begin anew,

Kiss what before I only drew;

Ay, laying the red chalk 'twixt my lips,

With soul to help if the mere lips failed.

I kissed all right where the drawing ailed,

Kissed fast the grace that somehow slips

Still from one's soulless finger-tips.

II

'Tis a clay cast, the perfect thing.

From Hand live once, dead long ago :

Princess-like it wears the ring

To fancy's eye, by which we know

That here at length a master found

His match, a proud lone soul its mate,

As soaring genius sank to ground,

And pencil could not emulate

The beauty in this, — how free, how fine

To fear almost ! — of the limit-line.

Long ago the god, like me

The worm, learned, each in our degree :

Looked and loved, learned and drew,

Drew and learned and loved again,

While fast the happy minutes flew,

Till beauty mounted into his brain

And on the finger which outvied

His art he placed the ring that's there,

Still by fancy's eye desiered,

In token of a marriage rare :

For him on earth, his art's despair,

For him in heaven, his soul's fit bride.

III

Little girl with the poor coarse hand

I turned from to a cold clay cast —

I have my lesson, understand

The worth of flesh and blood at last !

Nothing but beauty in a Hand ?

Because he could not change the hue,

Mend the lines and make them true

To this which met his soul's demand, —

Would Da Vinci turn from you ?

I hear him laugh my woes to scorn —

"The fool forsooth is all forlorn

Because the beauty, she thinks best,

Lived long ago or was never born, —

Because no beauty bears the test

In this rough peasant Hand ! Confessed

'Art is null and study void !'

So sayest thou ? So said not I,

Who threw the faulty pencil by,

And years instead of hours employed,

Learning the veritable use

Of flesh and bone and nerve beneath

Lines and hue of the outer sheath,

If haply I might reproduce

One motive of the powers profuse,

Flesh and bone and nerve that make

The poorest coarsest human hand

An object worthy to be scanned

A whole life long for their sole sake.

Shall earth and the cramped moment-space

Yield the heavenly crowning grace ?

Now the parts and then the whole !

Who art thou, with stinted soul

And stunted body, thus to cry,

'I love, — shall that be life's strait dole ?

I must live beloved or die !'

This peasant hand that spins the wool

And bakes the bread, why lives it on,

Poor and coarse with beauty gone, —

What use survives the beauty ? " Fool !

Go, little girl with the poor coarse hand !

I have my lesson, shall understand.

IX

ON DECK

There is nothing to remember in me,

Nothing I ever said with a grace,

Nothing I did that you care to see,

Nothing I was that deserves a place

In your mind, now I leave you, set you free.

Conceded ! In turn, concede to me,

Such things have been as a mutual flame.

Your soul's locked fast ; but, love for a key,

You might let it loose, till I grew the same

In your eyes, as in mine you stand : strange plea !

For then, then, what would it matter to me

That I was the harsh, ill-favored one ?

We both should be like as pea and pea ;

It was ever so since the world begun :

So, let me proceed with my reverie.

How strange it were if you had all me,

As I have all you in my heart and brain,

You, whose least word brought gloom or glee,

Who never lifted the hand in vain —

Will hold mine yet, from over the sea !

Strange, if a face, when you thought of me,

Rose like your own face present now,

With eyes as dear in their due degree,

Much such a mouth, and as bright a brow,

Till you saw yourself, while you cried "T is

She !"

Well, you may, you must, set down to me

Love that was life, life that was love ;

A tenure of breath at your lips' decree,

A passion to stand as your thoughts approve,

A rapture to fall where your foot might be.

But did one touch of such love for me

Come in a word or a look of yours,

Whose words and looks will, circling, flee

Round me and round while life endures, —

Could I fancy "As I feel, thus feels He ;"

Why, fade you might to a thing like me,

And your hair grow these coarse hanks of

hair,

Your skin, this bark of a gnarled tree, —

You might turn myself ! — should I know or

care,

When I should be dead of joy, James Lee ?

GOLD HAIR

A STORY OF PORNIC

This poem was issued by itself as well as included later in Dramatis Personæ, and simultaneously with its appearance in England it was printed in The Atlantic Monthly. It was written in Normandy, and in a letter printed in

Mrs. Orr's Life, II. 395, there is an account of the destruction of the church referred to in the poem.

Oh, the beautiful girl, too white,
Who lived at Pornic, down by the sea,
Just where the sea and the Loire unite!
And a boasted name in Brittany
She bore, which I will not write.

Too white, for the flower of life is red:
Her flesh was the soft seraphic screen
Of a soul that is meant (her parents said)
To just see earth, and hardly be seen,
And blossom in heaven instead.

Yet earth saw one thing, one how fair!
One grace that grew to its full on earth:
Smiles might be sparse on her cheek so spare,
And her waist want half a girdle's girth,
But she had her great gold hair.

Hair, such a wonder of flix and floss,
Freshness and fragrance — floods of it, too!
Gold, did I say? Nay, gold's mere dress:
Here, Life smiled, "Think what I meant to
do!"
And Love sighed, "Fancy my loss!"

So, when she died, it was scarce more strange
Than that, when delicate evening dies,
And you follow its spent sun's pallid range,
There's a shoot of color startles the skies
With sudden, violent change, —

That, while the breath was nearly to seek,
As they put the little cross to her lips,
She changed; a spot came out on her cheek,
A spark from her eye in mid-eclipse,
And she broke forth, "I must speak!"

"Not my hair!" made the girl her moan —
"All the rest is gone or to go;
But the last, last grace, my all, my own,
Let it stay in the grave, that the ghosts may
know!
Leave my poor gold hair alone!"

The passion thus vented, dead lay she;
Her parents sobbed their worst on that;
All friends joined in, nor observed degree:
For indeed the hair was to wonder at,
As it spread — not flowing free,

But curled around her brow, like a crown,
And coiled beside her cheeks, like a cap,
And calmed about her neck — ay, down
To her breast, pressed flat, without a gap
I' the gold, it reached her gown.

All kissed that face, like a silver wedge
Mid the yellow wealth, nor disturbed its hair:
E'en the priest allowed death's privilege,
As he planted the crucifix with care
On her breast, 'twixt edge and edge.

And thus was she buried, inviolate
Of body and soul, in the very space

By the altar; keeping saintly state
In Pornic church, for her pride of race,
Pure life and piteous fate.

And in after-time would your fresh tear fall,
Though your mouth might twitch with a dubious smile,
As they told you of gold, both robe and pall,
How she prayed them leave it alone awhile,
So it never was touched at all.

Years flew; this legend grew at last
The life of the lady; all she had done,
All been, in the memories fading fast
Of lover and friend, was summed in one
Sentence survivors passed:

To wit, she was meant for heaven, not earth;
Had turned an angel before the time:
Yet, since she was mortal, in such dearth
Of frailty, all you could count a crime
Was — she knew her gold hair's worth.

At little pleasant Pornic church,
It chanced, the pavement wanted repair,
Was taken to pieces: left in the lurch,
A certain sacred space lay bare,
And the boys began research.

'T was the space where our sires would lay a saint,
A benefactor, — a bishop, suppose,
A baron with armor-adornments quaint,
Dame with chased ring and jewelled rose,
Things sanctity saves from taint;

So we come to find them in after-days
When the corpse is presumed to have done with gauds
Of use to the living, in many ways:
For the boys get pelf, and the town applauds,
And the church deserves the praise.

They grubbed with a will: and at length — O
cor
Humanum, pectora cæca, and the rest! —
They found — no gaud they were prying for,
No ring, no rose, but — who would have guessed? —
A double Louis-d'or!

Here was a case for the priest: he heard,
Marked, inwardly digested, laid
Finger on nose, smiled, "There's a bird
Chirps in my ear:" then, "Bring a spade,
Dig deeper!" — he gave the word.

And lo, when they came to the coffin-lid,
Or rotten planks which composed it once,
Why, there lay the girl's skull wedged amid
A mint of money, it served for the nonce
To hold in its hair-heaps hid!

Hid there? Why? Could the girl be wont
(She the stainless soul) to treasure up

Money, earth's trash and heaven's affront?
Had a spider found out the communion-cup,
Was a toad in the christening-font?

Truth is truth: too true it was.
Gold! She hoarded and hugged it first,
Longed for it, leaned o'er it, loved it — alas —
Till the humor grew to a head and burst,
And she cried, at the final pass, —

“Talk not of God, my heart is stone!
Nor lover nor friend — be gold for both!
Gold I lack; and, my all, my own,
It shall hide in my hair. I scarce die loth
If they let my hair alone!”

Louis-d'or, some six times five,
And duly double, every piece.
Now, do you see? With the priest to thrive,
With parents preventing her soul's release
By kisses that kept alive, —

With heaven's gold gates about to ope,
With friends' praise, gold-like, lingering still,
An instinct had bidden the girl's hand grope
For gold, the true sort — “Gold in heaven, if you will;
But I keep earth's too, I hope.”

Enough! The priest took the grave's grim
yield:

The parents, they eyed that price of sin
As if thirty pieces lay revealed
On the place to bury strangers in,
The hideous Potter's Field.

But the priest bethought him: “‘Milk that's spilt’
— You know the adage! Watch and pray!
Saints tumble to earth with so slight a tilt!
It would build a new altar; that, we may!”
And the altar therewith was built.

Why I deliver this horrible verse?
As the text of a sermon, which now I preach:
Evil or good may be better or worse
In the human heart, but the mixture of each
Is a marvel and a curse.

The candid incline to surmise of late
That the Christian faith proves false, I find;
For our Essays-and-Reviews' debate
Begins to tell on the public mind,
And Colenso's words have weight:

I still, to suppose it true, for my part,
See reasons and reasons; this, to begin:
‘Tis the faith that launched point-blank her dart
At the head of a lie — taught Original Sin,
The Corruption of Man's Heart.

THE WORST OF IT

WOULD it were I had been false, not you!
I that am nothing, not you that are all:
I, never the worse for a touch or two
On my speckled hide; not you, the pride

Of the day, my swan, that a first flock's fall
On her wonder of white must unswan, undo!

I had dipped in life's struggle and, out again,
Bore specks of it here, there, easy to see,
When I found my swan and the cure was plain;
The dull turned bright as I caught your white
On my bosom: you saved me — saved in vain
If you ruined yourself, and all through me!

Yes, all through the speckled beast that I am,
Who taught you to stoop; you gave me your-
self,
And bound your soul by the vows that damn:
Since on better thought you break, as you ought,
Vows — words, no angel set down, some elf
Mistook, — for an oath, an epigram!

Yes, might I judge you, here were my heart,
And a hundred its like, to treat as you
pleased!
I choose to be yours, for my proper part,
Yours, leave or take, or mar me or make;
If I acquiesce, why should you be teased
With the conscience-prick and the memory-smart?

But what will God say? Oh, my sweet,
Think, and be sorry you did this thing!
Though earth were unworthy to feel your feet,
There's a heaven above may deserve your
love:
Should you forfeit heaven for a snapt gold ring
And a promise broke, were it just or meet?

And I to have tempted you! I, who tried
Your soul, no doubt, till it sank! Unwise,
I loved, and was lowly, loved and aspired,
Loved, grieving or glad, till I made you mad,
And you meant to have hated and despised —
Whereas, you deceived me nor inquired!

She, ruined? How? No heaven for her?
Crowns to give, and none for the brow
That looked like marble and smelt like myrrh?
Shall the robe be worn, and the palm-branch borne,
And she go graceless, she graced now
Beyond all saints, as themselves aver?

Hardly! That must be understood!
The earth is your place of penance, then;
And what will it prove? I desire your good.
But, plot as I may, I can find no way
How a blow should fall, such as falls on men.
Nor prove too much for your womanhood.

It will come, I suspect, at the end of life,
When you walk alone, and review the past;
And I, who so long shall have done with strife,
And journeyed my stage and earned my wage
And retired as was right, — I am called at
last

When the devil stabs you, to lend the knife.

He stabs for the minute of trivial wrong,
Nor the other hours are able to save,

The happy, that lasted my whole life long :
 For a promise broke, not for first words spoke,
 The true, the only, that turn my grave
 To a blaze of joy and a crash of song.

Witness beforehand ! Off I trip
 On a safe path gay through the flowers you flung :
 My very name made great by your lip,
 And my heart aglow with the good I know
 Of a perfect year when we both were young,
 And I tasted the angels' fellowship.

And witness, moreover . . . Ah, but wait !
 I spy the loop whence an arrow shoots !
 It may be for yourself, when you meditate,
 That you grieve — for slain ruth, murdered
 truth :
 " Though falsehood escape in the end, what boots ?
 How truth would have triumphed ! " — you sigh too late.

Ay, who would have triumphed like you, I
 say !
 Well, it is lost now ; well, you must bear,
 Abide and grow fit for a better day :
 You should hardly grudge, could I be your judge !
 But hush ! For you, can be no despair :
 There 's amends : 't is a secret : hope and pray !

For I was true at least — oh, true enough !
 And, Dear, truth is not as good as it seems !
 Commend me to conscience ! Idle stuff !
 Much help is in mine, as I mope and pine,
 And skulk through day, and scowl in my dreams
 At my swan's obtaining the crow's rebuff.

Men tell me of truth now — " False ! " I cry :
 Of beauty — " A mask, friend ! Look beneath ! "
 We take our own method, the devil and I,
 With pleasant and fair and wise and rare :
 And the best we wish to what lives, is — death ;
 Which even in wishing, perhaps we lie !

Far better commit a fault and have done —
 As you, Dear ! — forever ; and choose the
 pure,
 And look where the healing waters run,
 And strive and strain to be good again,
 And a place in the other world ensure,
 All glass and gold, with God for its sun.

Misery ! What shall I say or do ?
 I cannot advise, or, at least, persuade :
 Most like, you are glad you deceived me — rue
 No whit of the wrong : you endured too long,
 Have done no evil and want no aid,
 Will live the old life out and chance the
 new.

And your sentence is written all the same,
 And I can do nothing, — pray, perhaps :
 But somehow the world pursues its game, —
 If I pray, if I curse, — for better or worse :

And my faith is torn to a thousand seraps,
 And my heart feels ice while my words
 breathe flame.

Dear, I look from my hiding-place.
 Are you still so fair ? Have you still the eyes ?
 Be happy ! Add but the other grace,
 Begood ! Why want what the angels vaunt ?
 I knew you once : but in Paradise,
 If we meet, I will pass nor turn my face.

DÏS ALITER VISUM ;

OR, LE BYRON DE NOS JOURS

STOP, let me have the truth of that !
 Is that all true ? I say, the day
 Ten years ago when both of us
 Met on a morning, friends — as thus
 We meet this evening, friends or what ? —

Did you — because I took your arm
 And sillily smiled, " A mass of brass
 That sea looks, blazing underneath ! "
 While up the cliff-road edged with heath,
 We took the turns nor came to harm —

Did you consider, " Now makes twice
 That I have seen her, walked and talked
 With this poor pretty thoughtful thing,
 Whose worth I weigh : she tries to sing ;
 Draws, hopes in time the eye grows nice ;

" Reads verse and thinks she understands ;
 Loves all, at any rate, that 's great,
 Good, beautiful ; but much as we
 Down at the bath-house love the sea,
 Who breathe its salt and bruise its sands :

" While . . . do but follow the fishing-gull
 That flaps and floats from wave to cave !
 There 's the sea-lover, fair my friend !
 What then ? Be patient, mark and mend !
 Had you the making of your skull ? "

And did you, when we faced the church
 With spire and sad slate roof, aloof
 From human fellowship so far,
 Where a few graveyard crosses are,
 And garlands for the swallows' perch, —

Did you determine, as we stepped O'er the lone stone fence, " Let me get
 Her for myself, and what 's the earth
 With all its art, verse, music, worth —
 Compared with love, found, gained, and kept ?

" Schumann 's our music-maker now ;
 Has his march-movement youth and mouth ?
 Ingres 's the modern man that paints ;
 Which will lean on me, of his saints ?
 Heine for songs ; for kisses, how ? "

And did you, when we entered, reached
 The votive frigate, soft aloft
 Riding on air this hundred years,
 Safe-smiling at old hopes and fears, —
 Did you draw profit while she preached ?

Resolving, "Fools we wise men grow !

Yes, I could easily blurt out curt
Some question that might find reply
As prompt in her stopped lips, dropped eye,
And rush of red to cheek and brow :

"Thus were a match made, sure and fast,
'Mid the blue weed-flowers round the mound
Where, issuing, we shall stand and stay
For one more look at baths and bay,
Sands, sea-gulls, and the old church last —

"A match 'twixt me, bent, wigged and lamed,
Famous, however, for verse and worse,
Sure of the Fortieth spare Arm-chair
When gout and glory seat me there,
So, one whose love-freaks pass unblamed, —

"And this young beauty, round and sound
As a mountain-apple, youth and truth
With loves and doves, at all events
With money in the Three per Cents ;
Whose choice of me would seem profound : —

"She might take me as I take her.
Perfect the hour would pass, alas !
Climb high, love high, what matter ? Still,
Feet, feelings, must descend the hill :
An hour's perfection can't recur.

"Then follows Paris and full time
For both to reason : 'Thus with us !'
She 'll sigh, 'Thus girls give body and soul
At first word, think they gain the goal,
When 't is the starting-place they climb !

"My friend makes verse and gets renown ;
Have they all fifty years, his peers ?
He knows the world, firm, quiet and gay ;
Boys will become as much one day :
They're fools ; he cheats, with beard less brown.

"For boys say, Love me or I die !
He did not say, The truth is, youth
I want, who am old and know too much ;
I'd catch youth : lend me sight and touch !
Drop heart's blood where life's wheels grate dry !

"While I should make rejoinder" — (then
It was no doubt, you ceased that least Light pressure of my arm in yours) —
"I can conceive of cheaper cures
For a yawning-fit o'er books and men.

"What ? All I am, was, and might be,
All, books taught, art brought, life's whole
strife,
Painful results since precious, just
Were fitly exchanged, in wise disgust,
For two cheeks freshened by youth and sea ?

"All for a nosegay ! — what came first ;
With fields on flower, untried each side ;
I rally, need my books and men,
And find a nosegay : ' drop it, then,
No match yet made for best or worst !"

That ended me. You judged the porch
We left by, Norman ; took our look
At sea and sky ; wondered so few
Find out the place for air and view ;
Remarked the sun began to scorch ;

Descended, soon regained the baths,
And then, good-by ! Years ten since then :
Ten years ! We meet : you tell me, now,
By a window-seat for that cliff-brow,
On carpet-stripes for those sand-paths.

Now I may speak : you fool, for all
Your lore ! WHO made things plain in vain ?
What was the sea for ? What, the gray
Sad church, that solitary day,
Crosses and graves and swallows' call ?

Was there naught better than to enjoy ?
No feat which, done, would make time break,
And let us pent-up creatures through
Into eternity, our due ?
No forcing earth teach heaven's employ ?

No wise beginning, here and now,
What cannot grow complete (earth's feat)
And heaven must finish, there and then ?
No tasting earth's true food for men,
Its sweet in sad, its sad in sweet ?

No grasping at love, gaining a share
O' the sole spark from God's life at strife
With death, so, sure of range above
The limits here ? For us and love,
Failure ; but, when God fails, despair.

This you call wisdom ? Thus you add
Good unto good again, in vain ?
You loved, with body worn and weak ;
I loved, with faculties to seek :
Were both loves worthless since ill-clad ?

Let the mere star-fish in his vault
Crawl in a wash of weed, indeed,
Rose-jacynth to the finger-tips :
He, whole in body and soul, outstrips
Man, found with either in default.

But what's whole can increase no more,
Is dwarfed and dies, since here's its sphere.
The devil laughed at you in his sleeve !
You know not ? That I well believe ;
Or you had saved two souls : nay, four.

For Stephanie sprained last night her wrist,
Ankle or something. "Pooh," cry you ?
At any rate she danced, all say,
Vilely ; her vogue has had its day.
Here comes my husband from his whist.

TOO LATE

HERE was I with my arm and heart
And brain, all yours for a word, a want
Put into a look — just a look, your part, —
While mine, to repay it . . . vainest vaunt,

Were the woman, that's dead, alive to hear,
Had her lover, that's lost, love's proof to show!

But I cannot show it; you cannot speak
From the churchyard neither, miles removed,
Though I feel by a pulse within my cheek,
Which stabs and stops, that the woman I loved
Needs help in her grave and finds none near,
Wants warmth from the heart which sends it
— so!

Did I speak once angrily, all the drear days
You lived, you woman I loved so well,
Who married the other? Blame or praise,
Where was the use then? Time would tell,
And the end declare what man for you,
What woman for me, was the choice of God.
But, Edith dead! no doubting more!
I used to sit and look at my life
As it rippled and ran till, right before,
A great stone stopped it: oh, the strife
Of waves at the stone some devil threw
In my life's midcurrent, thwarting God!

But either I thought, "They may churn and
chide

Awhile, my waves which came for their joy
And found this horrible stone full-tide:
Yet I see just a thread escape, deploy
Through the evening-country, silent and safe,
And it suffers no more till it finds the sea."
Or else I would think, "Perhaps some night
When new things happen, a meteor-ball
May slip through the sky in a line of light,
And earth breathe hard, and landmarks fall,
And my waves no longer champ nor chafe,
Since a stone will have rolled from its place:
let be!"

But, dead! All's done with: wait who may,
Watch and wear and wonder who will.
Oh, my whole life that ends to-day!
Oh, my soul's sentence, sounding still,
"The woman is dead that was none of his;
And the man that was none of hers may go!"
There's only the past left: worry that!
Wreak, like a bull, on the empty coat,
Rage, its late wearer is laughing at!
Tear the collar to rags, having missed his throat;
Strike stupidly on — "This, this and this,
Where I would that a bosom received the blow!"

I ought to have done more: once my speech,
And once your answer, and there, the end,
And Edith was henceforth out of reach!
Why, men do more to deserve a friend,
Be rid of a foe, get rich, grow wise,
Nor, folding their arms, stare fate in the face.
Why, better even have burst like a thief
And borne you away to a rock for us two,
In a moment's horror, bright, bloody and brief,
Then changed to myself again — "I slew
Myself in that moment; a ruffian lies Somewhere: your slave, see, born in his
place!"

What did the other do? You be judge!
Look at us, Edith! Here are we both!
Give him his six whole years: I grudge
None of the life with you, nay, loathe
Myself that I grudged his start in advance
Of me who could overtake and pass.
But, as if he loved you! No, not he,
Nor any one else in the world, 't is plain:
Who ever heard that another, free
As I, young, prosperous, sound and sane,
Poured life out, proffered it — "Half a glance
Of those eyes of yours and I drop the glass!"

Handsome, were you? 'T is more than they held,

More than they said; I was 'ware and
watched:

I was the scapegrace, this rat belled
The cat, this fool got his whiskers scratched:
The others? No head that was turned, no heart
Broken, my lady, assure yourself!
Each soon made his mind up; so and so
Married a dancer, such and such
Stole his friend's wife, stagnated slow,
Or maundered, unable to do as much,
And muttered of peace where he had no part:
While, hid in the closet, laid on the shelf, —

On the whole, you were let alone, I think!
So, you looked to the other, who acquiesced;
My rival, the proud man, — prize your pink
Of poets! A poet he was! I've guessed:
He rhymed you his rubbish nobody read,
Loved you and doted you — did not I laugh!
There was a prize! But we both were tried.
Oh, heart of mine, marked broad with her
mark,
Tekel, found wanting, set aside,
Scorned! See, I bleed these tears in the dark
Till comfort come and the last be bled:
He? He is tagging your epitaph.

If it would only come over again!
— Time to be patient with me, and probe
This heart till you punctured the proper vein,
Just to learn what blood is: twitch the robe
From that blank lay-figure your fancy draped, Prick the leathern heart till the — verses spirt!

And late it was easy; late, you walked
Where a friend might meet you; Edith's
name
Arose to one's lip if one laughed or talked;
If I heard good news, you heard the same;
When I woke, I knew that your breath escaped;
I could bide my time, keep alive, alert.

And alive I shall keep and long, you will see!
I knew a man, was kicked like a dog
From gutter to cesspool; what cared he
So long as he picked from the filth his prog?
He saw youth, beauty and genius die,
And jollily lived to his hundredth year.
But I will live otherwise: none of such life!
At once I begin as I mean to end.
Go on with the world, get gold in its strife,
Give your spouse the slip and betray your
friend!

There are two who decline, a woman and I,
And enjoy our death in the darkness here.

I liked that way you had with your curls
Wound to a ball in a net behind :
Your cheek was chaste as a Quaker-girl's,
And your mouth — there was never, to my
mind,
Such a funny mouth, for it would not shut ;
And the dented chin too — what a chin !
There were certain ways when you spoke, some
words

That you know you never could pronounce :
You were thin, however ; like a bird's
Your hand seemed — some would say, the
pounce

Of a scaly-footed hawk — all but !
The world was right when it called you thin.

But I turn my back on the world : I take
Your hand, and kneel, and lay to my lips.
Bid me live, Edith ! Let me slake
Thirst at your presence ! Fear no slips :
'Tis your slave shall pay, while his soul endures,

Full due, love's whole debt, summum jus.
My queen shall have high observance, planned
Courtship made perfect, no least line
Crossed without warrant. There you stand,
Warm too, and white too : would this wine
Had washed all over that body of yours.
Ere I drank it, and you down with it, thus !

ABT VOGLER

(AFTER HE HAS BEEN EXTEMPORIZING UPON THE MUSICAL INSTRUMENT OF HIS INVENTION)

Would that the structure brave, the manifold music I build,

Bidding my organ obey, calling its keys to their work,

Claiming each slave of the sound, at a touch, as when Solomon willed

Armies of angels that soar, legions of demons
that lurk,

Man, brute, reptile, fly, — alien of end and of
aim,

Adverse, each from the other heaven-high,
hell-deep removed, —

Should rush into sight at once as he named the ineffable Name,

And pile him a palace straight, to pleasure
the princess he loved !

Would it might tarry like his, the beautiful building of mine,

This which my keys in a crowd pressed and importuned to raise !

Ah, one and all, how they helped, would dispart
now and now combine,

Zealous to hasten the work, heighten their master his praise !

And one would bury his brow with a blind
plunge down to hell,

Burrow awhile and build, broad on the roots
of things,

Then up again swim into sight, having based me my palace well,
Founded it, fearless of flame, flat on the nether springs.

And another would mount and march, like the excellent minion he was,

Ay, another and yet another, one crowd but with many a crest,

Raising my rampired walls of gold as transparent as glass,

Eager to do and die, yield each his place to
the rest :

For higher still and higher (as a runner tips
with fire,

When a great illumination surprises a festal
night —

Outlined round and round Rome's dome from space to spire)

Up, the pinnaced glory reached, and the pride of my soul was in sight.

In sight ? Not half ! for it seemed, it was certain, to match man's birth,

Nature in turn conceived, obeying an impulse
as I ;

And the emulous heaven yearned down, made effort to reach the earth,

As the earth had done her best, in my passion,
to scale the sky :

Novel splendors burst forth, grew familiar and dwelt with mine,

Not a point nor peak but found and fixed its wandering star ;

Meteor-moons, balls of blaze : and they did not pale nor pine,

For earth had attained to heaven, there was no more near nor far.

Nay more ; for there wanted not who walked in the glare and glow,

Presences plain in the place ; or, fresh from the Protoplast,

Furnished for ages to come, when a kindlier
wind should blow,

Lured now to begin and live, in a house to their liking at last ;

Or else the wonderful Dead who have passed through the body and gone,

But were back once more to breathe in an old world worth their new :

What never had been, was now ; what was, as it shall be anon ;

And what is, — shall I say, matched both ? for
I was made perfect too.

All through my keys that gave their sounds to a wish of my soul,

All through my soul that praised as its wish flowed visibly forth,

All through music and me ! For think, had I painted the whole,

Why, there it had stood, to see, nor the process so wonder-worth :

Had I written the same, made verse — still,
effect proceeds from cause,

Ye know why the forms are fair, ye hear how the tale is told ;

It is all triumphant art, but art in obedience to laws,

Painter and poet are proud in the artist-list enrolled:—

But here is the finger of God, a flash of the will that can,

Exister behind all laws, that made them and, lo, they are!

And I know not if, save in this, such gift be allowed to man,

That out of three sounds he frame, not a fourth sound, but a star.

Consider it well: each tone of our scale in itself is naught:

It is everywhere in the world—loud, soft, and all is said:

Give it to me to use! I mix it with two in my thought:

And there! Ye have heard and seen: consider and bow the head!

Well, it is gone at last, the palace of music I reared;

Gone! and the good tears start, the praises that come too slow;

For one is assured at first, one scarce can say that he feared,

That he even gave it a thought, the gone thing was to go.

Never to be again! But many more of the kind

As good, nay, better perchance: is this your comfort to me?

To me, who must be saved because I cling with my mind

To the same, same self, same love, same God: ay, what was, shall be.

Therefore to whom turn I but to thee, the ineffable Name?

Builder and maker, thou, of houses not made with hands!

What, have fear of change from thee who art ever the same?

Doubt that thy power can fill the heart that thy power expands?

There shall never be one lost good! What was, shall live as before;

The evil is null, is naught, is silence implying sound;

What was good shall be good, with, for evil, so much good more;

On the earth the broken arcs; in the heaven a perfect round.

All we have willed or hoped or dreamed of good shall exist;

Not its semblance, but itself; no beauty, nor good, nor power

Whose voice has gone forth, but each survives for the melodist

When eternity affirms the conception of an hour.

The high that proved too high, the heroic for earth too hard,

The passion that left the ground to lose itself in the sky,

Are music sent up to God by the lover and the bard;

Enough that he heard it once: we shall hear it by and by.

And what is our failure here but a triumph's evidence

For the fulness of the days? Have we withered or agonized?

Why else was the pause prolonged but that singing might issue thence?

Why rushed the discords in, but that harmony should be prized?

Sorrow is hard to bear, and doubt is slow to clear,

Each sufferer says his say, his scheme of the weal and woe:

But God has a few of us whom he whispers in the ear;

The rest may reason and welcome: 't is we musicians know.

Well, it is earth with me; silence resumes her reign:

I will be patient and proud, and soberly acquiesce.

Give me the keys. I feel for the common chord again,

Sliding by semitones till I sink to the minor, —yes,

And I blunt it into a ninth, and I stand on alien ground,

Surveying awhile the heights I rolled from into the deep;

Which, hark, I have dared and done, for my resting-place is found,

The C Major of this life: so, now I will try to sleep.

RABBI BEN EZRA

Grow old along with me!

The best is yet to be,

The last of life, for which the first was made:

Our times are in his hand

Who saith, "A whole I planned,

Youth shows but half; trust God: see all, nor be afraid!"

Not that, amassing flowers,

Youth sighed, "Which rose make ours,

Which lily leave and then as best recall?"

Not that, admiring stars,

It yearned, "Nor Jove, nor Mars;

Mine be some figured flame which blends, transcends them all!"

Not for such hopes and fears

Annulling youth's brief years,

Do I remonstrate: folly wide the mark!

Rather I prize the doubt

Low kinds exist without,

Finished and finite clods, untroubled by a spark.

Poor vaunt of life indeed,

Were man but formed to feed

On joy, to solely seek and find and feast;

Such feasting ended, then
As sure an end to men ;
Irks care the crop full bird ? Frets doubt the maw-crammed beast ?

Rejoice we are allied
To that which doth provide
And not partake, effect and not receive !
A spark disturbs our clod ;
Nearer we hold of God
Who gives, than of his tribes that take, I must believe.

Then, welcome each rebuff
That turns earth's smoothness rough,
Each sting that bids nor sit nor stand but go !
Be our joys three-parts pain !
Strive, and hold cheap the strain ;
Learn, nor account the pang ; dare, never grudge the throe !

For thence, — a paradox
Which comforts while it mocks, —
Shall life succeed in that it seems to fail :
What I aspired to be,
And was not, comforts me :
A brute I might have been, but would not sink
i' the scale.

What is he but a brute
Whose flesh has soul to suit,
Whose spirit works lest arms and legs want
play ?
To man, propose this test —
Thy body at its best,
How far can that project thy soul on its lone
way ?

Yet gifts should prove their use :
I own the Past profuse
Of power each side, perfection every turn :
Eyes, ears took in their dole,
Brain treasured up the whole ;
Should not the heart beat once " How good to live and learn " ?

Not once beat " Praise be thine !
I see the whole design,
I, who saw power, see now Love perfect
too :

Perfect I call thy plan :
Thanks that I was a man !
Maker, remake, complete, — I trust what thou shalt do ! "

For pleasant is this flesh ;
Our soul, in its rose-mesh
Pulled ever to the earth, still yearns for rest :
Would we some prize might hold
To match those manifold Possessions of the brute, — gain most, as we did best !

Let us not always say,
" Spite of this flesh to-day
I strove, made head, gained ground upon the
whole ! "
As the bird wings and sings,

Let us cry, " All good things
Are ours, nor soul helps flesh more, now, than flesh helps soul ! "

Therefore I summon age
To grant youth's heritage,
Life's struggle having so far reached its term :
Thence shall I pass, approved
A man, for aye removed
From the developed brute ; a God though in the germ.

And I shall thereupon
Take rest, ere I be gone
Once more on my adventure brave and new :
Fearless and unperplexed,
When I wage battle next,
What weapons to select, what armor to indue.

Youth ended, I shall try
My gain or loss thereby ;
Leave the fire ashes, what survives is gold :
And I shall weigh the same,
Give life its praise or blame :
Young, all lay in dispute ; I shall know, being
old.

For note, when evening shuts,
A certain moment cuts
The deed off, calls the glory from the gray :
A whisper from the west
Shoots — " Add this to the rest,
Take it and try its worth : here dies another
day. "

So, still within this life,
Though lifted o'er its strife,
Let me discern, compare, pronounce at last,
" This rage was right i' the main,
That acquiescence vain :
The Future I may face now I have proved the Past. "

For more is not reserved
To man, with soul just nerved
To act to-morrow what he learns to-day :
Here, work enough to watch
The Master work, and catch
Hints of the proper craft, tricks of the tool's true
play.

As it was better, youth
Should strive, through acts uncouth,
Toward making, than repose on aught found
made :
So, better, age, exempt
From strife, should know, than tempt Further. Thou waitedst age : wait death nor be afraid !

Enough now, if the Right
And Good and Infinite
Be named here, as thou callest thy hand
thine own,
With knowledge absolute,
Subject to no dispute
From fools that crowded youth, nor let thee feel alone.

Be there, for once and all,
Severed great minds from small,
Announced to each his station in the Past !
Was I, the world arraigned,
Were they, my soul disdained,
Right ? Let age speak the truth and give us peace at last !

Now, who shall arbitrate ?
Ten men love what I hate,
Shun what I follow, slight what I receive ;
Ten, who in ears and eyes
Match me : we all surmise,
They this thing, and I that : whom shall my soul believe ?

Not on the vulgar mass
Called "work," must sentence pass,
Things done, that took the eye and had the
price ;
O'er which, from level stand,
The low world laid its hand,
Found straightway to its mind, could value in a trice :

But all, the world's coarse thumb
And finger failed to plumb,
So passed in making up the main account ;
All instincts immature,
All purposes unsure,
That weighed not as his work, yet swelled the man's amount :

Thoughts hardly to be packed
Into a narrow act,
Fancies that broke through language and escaped ;
All I could never be,
All, men ignored in me,
This, I was worth to God, whose wheel the pitcher shaped.

Ay, note that Potter's wheel,
That metaphor ! and feel
Why time spins fast, why passive lies our clay, —
Thou, to whom fools propound,
When the wine makes its round,
"Since life fleets, all is change ; the Past gone, seize to-day !"

Fool ! All that is, at all,
Lasts ever, past recall ;
Earth changes, but thy soul and God stand
sure :
What entered into thee,
That was, is, and shall be :
Time's wheel runs back or stops : Potter and clay endure.

He fixed thee 'mid this dance
Of plastic circumstance,
This Present, thou, forsooth, would fain arrest :
Machinery just meant
To give thy soul its bent,
Try thee and turn thee forth, sufficiently impressed.

What though the earlier grooves,
Which ran the laughing loves
Around thy base, no longer pause and press ?
What though, about thy rim,
Skull-things in order grim
Grow out, in graver mood, obey the sterner stress ?

Look not thou down but up !
To uses of a cup,
The festal board, lamp's flash and trumpet's
peal,
The new wine's foaming flow,
The Master's lips aglow !
Thou, heaven's consummate cup, what needst
thou with earth's wheel ?

But I need, now as then,
Thee, God, who moulded men ;
And since, not even while the whirl was worst,
Did I — to the wheel of life
With shapes and colors rife,
Bound dizzily — mistake my end, to slake thy thirst :

So, take and use thy work :
Amend what flaws may lurk,
What strain o' the stuff, what warpings past the aim !
My times be in thy hand !
Perfect the cup as planned !
Let age approve of youth, and death complete
the same !

A DEATH IN THE DESERT

[SUPPOSED of Pamphylax the Antiochene :
It is a parchment, of my rolls the fifth,
Hath three skins glued together, is all Greek,
And goeth from Epsilon down to Mu :
Lies second in the surnamed Chosen Chest,
Stained and conserved with juice of terebith,
Covered with cloth of hair, and lettered Xi,
From Xanthus, my wife's uncle now at peace :
Mu and Epsilon stand for my own name.
I may not write it, but I make a cross
To show I wait His coming, with the rest,
And leave off here : beginneth Pamphylax.]

I said, "If one should wet his lips with wine,
And slip the broadest plantain-leaf we find,
Or else the lappet of a linen robe,
Into the water-vessel, lay it right,
And cool his forehead just above the eyes.
The while a brother, kneeling either side,
Should chafe each hand and try to make it
warm, —
He is not so far gone but he might speak."

This did not happen in the outer cave,
Nor in the secret chamber of the rock,
Where, sixty days since the decree was out,
We had him, bedded on a camel-skin,
And waited for his dying all the while ;
But in the midmost grotto : since noon's light
Reached there a little, and we would not lose
The last of what might happen on his face.

I at the head, and Xanthus at the feet,
 With Valens and the Boy, had lifted him,
 And brought him from the chamber in the depths,
 And laid him in the light where we might see :
 For certain smiles began about his mouth,
 And his lids moved, presageful of the end.

Beyond, and halfway up the mouth o' the cave,
 The Bactrian convert, having his desire,
 Kept watch, and made pretence to graze a goat
 That gave us milk, on rags of various herb,
 Plantain and quitch, the rocks' shade keeps alive :

So that if any thief or soldier passed,
 (Because the persecution was aware,)
 Yielding the goat up promptly with his life,
 Such man might pass on, joyful at a prize,
 Nor care to pry into the cool o' the cave.
 Outside was all noon and the burning blue.

"Here is wine," answered Xanthus, — dropped
 a drop ;

I stooped and placed the lap of cloth aright,
 Then chafed his right hand, and the Boy his left :
 But Valens had bethought him, and produced
 And broke a ball of nard, and made perfume.
 Only, he did — not so much wake, as — turn
 And smile a little, as a sleeper does
 If any dear one call him, touch his face —
 And smiles and loves, but will not be disturbed.

Then Xanthus said a prayer, but still he slept :
 It is the Xanthus that escaped to Rome,
 Was burned, and could not write the chronicle.

Then the Boy sprang up from his knees, and ran,

Stung by the splendor of a sudden thought,
 And fetched the seventh plate of graven lead
 Out of the secret chamber, found a place,
 Pressing with finger on the deeper dints,
 And spoke, as 't were his mouth proclaiming
 first,

"I am the Resurrection and the Life."

Whereat he opened his eyes wide at once,
 And sat up of himself, and looked at us ;
 And thenceforth nobody pronounced a word :
 Only, outside, the Bactrian cried his cry
 Like the lone desert-bird that wears the ruff,
 As signal we were safe, from time to time.

First he said, "If a friend declared to me,
 This my son Valens, this my other son,
 Were James and Peter, — nay, declared as well
 This lad was very John, — I could believe !
 — Could, for a moment, doubtlessly believe :
 So is myself withdrawn into my depths,
 The soul retreated from the perished brain
 Whence it was wont to feel and use the world
 Through these dull members, done with long ago.

Yet I myself remain ; I feel myself :
 And there is nothing lost. Let be, awhile !"

[This is the doctrine he was wont to teach,
 How divers persons witness in each man,

Three souls which make up one soul : first, to wit,

A soul of each and all the bodily parts,
 Seated therein, which works, and is what Does,
 And has the use of earth, and ends the man
 Downward : but, tending upward for advice,
 Grows into, and again is grown into
 By the next soul, which, seated in the brain,
 Useth the first with its collected use,
 And feeleth, thinketh, willeth, — is what
 Knows :

Which, duly tending upward in its turn,
 Grows into, and again is grown into
 By the last soul, that uses both the first,
 Subsisting whether they assist or no,
 And, constituting man's self, is what Is —
 And leans upon the former, makes it play,
 As that played off the first : and, tending up,
 Holds, is upheld by, God, and ends the man
 Upward in that dread point of intercourse,
 Nor needs a place, for it returns to Him.
 What Does, what Knows, what Is ; three souls,
 one man.

I give the glossa as Theotypas.]

And then, "A stick, once fire from end to
 end ;

Now, ashes save the tip that holds a spark !
 Yet, blow the spark, it runs back, spreads it-
 self

A little where the fire was : thus I urge
 The soul that served me, till it task once more
 What ashes of my brain have kept their shape,
 And these make effort on the last o' the flesh,
 Trying to taste again the truth of things" —
 (He smiled) — "their very superficial truth ;
 As that ye are my sons, that it is long
 Since James and Peter had release by death,
 And I am only he, your brother John,
 Who saw and heard, and could remember all.
 Remember all ! It is not much to say.
 What if the truth broke on me from above
 As once and oftentimes ? Such might hap again :
 Doubtlessly He might stand in presence here,
 With head wool-white, eyes flame, and feet like brass,

The sword and the seven stars, as I have seen —
 I who now shudder only and surmise
 'How did your brother bear that sight and
 live ?'

"If I live yet, it is for good, more love
 Through me to men : be naught but ashes here
 That keep awhile my semblance, who was John, —

Still, when they scatter, there is left on earth
 No one alive who knew (consider this !) — Saw with his eyes and handled with his hands

That which was from the first, the Word of Life.

How will it be when none more saith 'I saw' ?

"Such ever was love's way : to rise, it stoops.
 Since I, whom Christ's mouth taught, was bid
 den teach,

I went, for many years, about the world,
 Saying 'It was so ; so I heard and saw,'

Speaking as the case asked : and men believed.
 Afterward came the message to myself
 In Patmos isle ; I was not bidden teach,
 But simply listen, take a book and write,
 Nor set down other than the given word,
 With nothing left to my arbitrament
 To choose or change : I wrote, and men believed.

Then, for my time grew brief, no message
 more,

No call to write again, I found a way,
 And, reasoning from my knowledge, merely taught

Men should, for love's sake, in love's strength
 believe ;

Or I would pen a letter to a friend
 And urge the same as friend, nor less nor
 more :

Friends said I reasoned rightly, and believed.
 But at the last, why, I seemed left alive
 Like a sea-jelly weak on Patmos strand,
 To tell dry sea-beach gazers how I fared
 When there was mid-sea, and the mighty
 things ;

Left to repeat, ' I saw, I heard, I knew, '
 And go all over the old ground again,
 With Antichrist already in the world,
 And many Antichrists, who answered prompt,
 ' Am I not Jasper as thyself art John ?
 Nay, young, whereas through age thou mayest forget :

Wherefore, explain, or how shall we believe ? '
 I never thought to call down fire on such,
 Or, as in wonderful and early days,
 Pick up the scorpion, tread the serpent dumb ;
 But patient stated much of the Lord's life
 Forgotten or misdelivered, and let it work :
 Since much that at the first, in deed and word,
 Lay simply and sufficiently exposed,
 Had grown (or else my soul was grown to
 match,

Fed through such years, familiar with such
 light,

Guarded and guided still to see and speak)
 Of new significance and fresh result ;
 What first were guessed as points, I now knew
 stars,

And named them in the Gospel I have writ.
 For men said, ' It is getting long ago :
 Where is the promise of his coming ? ' — asked These young ones in their strength, as loth to wait,

Of me who, when their sires were born, was old.
 I, for I loved them, answered, joyfully,
 Since I was there, and helpful in my age ;
 And, in the main, I think such men believed.
 Finally, thus endeavoring, I fell sick,
 Ye brought me here, and I supposed the end,
 And went to sleep with one thought that, at
 least,

Though the whole earth should lie in wicked-
 ness.

We had the truth, might leave the rest to God.
 Yet now I wake in such decrepitude
 As I had slidden down and fallen afar,
 Past even the presence of my former self,
 Grasping the while for stay at facts which snap,
 Till I am found away from my own world,

Feeling for foothold through a blank profound,
 Along with unborn people in strange lands,
 Who say — I hear said or conceive they say —
 ' Was John at all, and did he say he saw ?
 Assure us, ere we ask what he might see ! '

" And how shall I assure them ? Can they share

— They, who have flesh, a veil of youth and
 strength

About each spirit, that needs must bide its time,
 Living and learning still as years assist
 Which wear the thickness thin, and let man
 see —

With me who hardly am withheld at all,
 But shudderingly, scarce a shred between,
 Lie bare to the universal prick of light ?
 Is it for nothing we grow old and weak,
 We whom God loves ? When pain ends, gain ends too.

To me, that story — ay, that Life and Death
 Of which I wrote ' it was ' — to me, it is ;
 — Is, here and now : I apprehend naught else.
 Is not God now i' the world his power first
 made ?

Is not his love at issue still with sin,
 Visibly when a wrong is done on earth ?
 Love, wrong, and pain, what see I else around ?
 Yea, and the Resurrection and Uprise
 To the right hand of the throne — what is it
 beside,

When such truth, breaking bounds, o'erfloods
 my soul,

And, as I saw the sin and death, even so
 See I the need yet transiency of both,
 The good and glory consummated thence ?
 I saw the power ; I see the Love, once weak,
 Resume the Power : and in this word ' I see, '
 Lo, there is recognized the Spirit of both
 That moving o'er the spirit of man, unblinds
 His eye and bids him look. These are, I see ;
 But ye, the children, his beloved ones too,
 Ye need, — as I should use an optic glass
 I wondered at erewhile, somewhere i' the world,
 It had been given a crafty smith to make ;
 A tube, he turned on objects brought too close,
 Lying confusedly insubordinate

For the unassisted eye to master once :
 Look through his tube, at distance now they lay,
 Become succinct, distinct, so small, so clear !
 Just thus, ye needs must apprehend what truth
 I see, reduced to plain historic fact,
 Diminished into clearness, proved a point
 And far away : ye would withdraw your sense
 From out eternity, strain it upon time,
 Then stand before that fact, that Life and Death,

Stay there at gaze, till it dispart, dispread,
 As though a star should open out, all sides,
 Grow the world on you, as it is my world.

" For life, with all it yields of joy and woe,
 And hope and fear, — believe the aged
 friend, —

Is just our chance o' the prize of learning love,
 How love might be, hath been indeed, and is ;
 And that we hold thenceforth to the uttermost
 Such prize despite the envy of the world,

And, having gained truth, keep truth: that is all.

But see the double way wherein we are led,
How the soul learns diversely from the flesh!
With flesh, that hath so little time to stay,
And yields mere basement for the soul's em-
prise,

Expect prompt teaching. Helpful was the light,
And warmth was cherishing and food was
choice

To every man's flesh, thousand years ago,
As now to yours and mine; the body sprang
At once to the height, and stayed: but the soul, — no!

Since sages who, this noontide, meditate
In Rome or Athens, may desery some point
Of the eternal power, hid yestereve;
And, as thereby the power's whole mass extends,

So much extends the æther floating o'er
The love that tops the might, the Christ in God.
Then, as new lessons shall be learned in these Till earth's work stop and useless time run out,
So duly, daily, needs provision be
For keeping the soul's prowess possible,
Building new barriers as the old decay,
Saving us from evasion of life's proof,
Putting the question ever, 'Does God love,
And will ye hold that truth against the world?'
Ye know there needs no second proof with good
Gained for our flesh from any earthly source:
We might go freezing, ages, — give us fire,
Thereafter we judge fire at its full worth,
And guard it safe through every chance, ye
know!

That fable of Prometheus and his theft,
How mortals gained Jove's fiery flower, grows
old

(I have been used to hear the pagans own)
And out of mind; but fire, howe'er its birth,
Here is it, precious to the sophist now
Who laughs the myth of Æschylus to scorn,
As precious to those satyrs of his play,
Who touched it in gay wonder at the thing.
While were it so with the soul, — this gift of
truth

Once grasped, were this our soul's gain safe, and
sure

To prosper as the body's gain is wont, —
Why, man's probation would conclude, his
earth

Crumble; for he both reasons and decides,
Weighs first, then chooses: will he give up fire
For gold or purple once he knows its worth?
Could he give Christ up were his worth as plain?

Therefore, I say, to test man, the proofs shift,
Nor may he grasp that fact like other fact,
And straightway in his life acknowledge it,
As, say, the indubitable bliss of fire.

Sigh ye, 'It had been easier once than now'?

To give you answer I am left alive;
Look at me who was present from the first!
Ye know what things I saw; then came a test,
My first, befitting me who so had seen:

'Forsake the Christ thou sawest transfigured,
him

Who trod the sea and brought the dead to life?

What should wring this from thee! — ye laugh and ask.

What wrung it? Even a torchlight and a noise,

The sudden Roman faces, violent hands,
And fear of what the Jews might do! Just that,
And it is written, 'I forsook and fled:'
There was my trial, and it ended thus.

Ay, but my soul had gained its truth, could grow:

Another year or two, — what little child,
What tender woman that had seen no least
Of all my sights, but barely heard them told,
Who did not clasp the cross with a light laugh,
Or wrap the burning robe round, thanking God?
Well, was truth safe forever, then? Not so.
Already had begun the silent work
Whereby truth, deadened of its absolute blaze,
Might need love's eye to pierce the o'erstretched
doubt.

Teachers were busy, whispering 'All is true
As the aged ones report: but youth can reach Where age gropes dimly, weak with stir and
strain,

And the full doctrine slumbers till to-day.'
Thus, what the Roman's lowered spear was
found,

A bar to me who touched and handled truth,
Now proved the glozing of some new shrewd
tongue,

This Ebion, this Cerinthus or their mates,
Till imminent was the outcry 'Save our Christ!'

Whereon I stated much of the Lord's life
Forgotten or misdelivered, and let it work.
Such work done, as it will be, what comes
next?

What do I hear say, or conceive men say,
'Was John at all, and did he say he saw?'
Assure us, ere we ask what he might see!'

"Is this indeed a burden for late days,
And may I help to bear it with you all,
Using my weakness which becomes your
strength?"

For if a babe were born inside this grot,
Grew to a boy here, heard us praise the sun,
Yet had but yon sole glimmer in light's place, —
One loving him and wishful he should learn,
Would much rejoice himself was blinded first Month by month here, so made to understand
How eyes, born darkling, apprehend amiss:
I think I could explain to such a child
There was more glow outside than gleams he caught,

Ay, nor need urge 'I saw it, so believe!'

It is a heavy burden you shall bear
In latter days, new lands, or old grown strange,
Left without me, which must be very soon.
What is the doubt, my brothers? Quick with
it!

I see you stand conversing, each new face,
Either in fields, of yellow summer eves,
On islets yet unnamed amid the sea;
Or pace for shelter 'neath a portico
Out of the crowd in some enormous town
Where now the larks sing in a solitude;
Or muse upon blank heaps of stone and sand

Idly conjectured to be Ephesus :
And no one asks his fellow any more
'Where is the promise of his coming?' but
'Was he revealed in any of his lives,
As Power, as Love, as Influencing Soul?'

"Quick, for time presses, tell the whole mind
out,

And let us ask and answer and be saved !
My book speaks on, because it cannot pass ;
One listens quietly, nor scoffs but pleads,
'Here is a tale of things done ages since ;
What truth was ever told the second day ?
Wonders, that would prove doctrine, go for
naught.

Remains the doctrine, love ; well, we must love,
And what we love most, power and love in one,
Let us acknowledge on the record here,
Accepting these in Christ : must Christ then be ?
Has he been ? Did not we ourselves make him ?
Our mind receives but what it holds, no more.
First of the love, then ; we acknowledge
Christ —

A proof we comprehend his love, a proof
We had such love already in ourselves,
Knew first what else we should not recognize.
'Tis mere projection from man's inmost mind,
And, what he loves, thus falls reflected back,
Becomes accounted somewhat out of him ;
He throws it up in air, it drops down earth's,
With shape, name, story added, man's old way.
How prove you Christ came otherwise at least ?
Next try the power : he made and rules the
world :

Certes there is a world once made, now ruled,
Unless things have been ever as we see.
Our sires declared a charioteer's yoked steeds
Brought the sun up the east and down the west,
Which only of itself now rises, sets,
As if a hand impelled it and a will, — Thus they long thought, they who had will and
hands :

But the new question's whisper is distinct,
Wherefore must all force needs be like ourselves ?

We have the hands, the will ; what made and drives

The sun is force, is law, is named, not known,
While will and love we do know ; marks of
these,

Eye-witnesses attest, so books declare —
As that, to punish or reward our race,
The sun at undue times arose or set
Or else stood still : what do not men affirm ?
But earth requires as urgently reward
Or punishment to-day as years ago,
And none expects the sun will interpose :
Therefore it was mere passion and mistake,
Or erring zeal for right, which changed the
truth.

Go back, far, farther, to the birth of things ;
Ever the will, the intelligence, the love,
Man's ! — which he gives, supposing he but finds,

As late he gave head, body, hands and feet,
To help these in what forms he called his gods.
First, Jove's brow, Juno's eyes were swept
away,

But Jove's wrath, Juno's pride continued long ;
As last, will, power, and love discarded these,
So law in turn discards power, love, and will.
What proveth God is otherwise at least ?
All else, projection from the mind of man !'

"Nay, do not give me wine, for I am strong,
But place my gospel where I put my hands.

"I say that man was made to grow, not stop ;
That help, he needed once, and needs no more,
Having grown but an inch by, is withdrawn :
For he hath new needs, and new helps to these.
This imports solely, man should mount on each
New height in view ; the help whereby he
mounts,

The ladder-rung his foot has left, may fall,
Since all things suffer change save God the
Truth.

Man apprehends him newly at each stage
Whereat earth's ladder drops, its service done ;
And nothing shall prove twice what once was proved.

You stick a garden-plot with ordered twigs
To show inside lie germs of herbs unborn,
And check the careless step would spoil their birth ;

But when herbs wave, the guardian twigs may
go,

Since should ye doubt of virtues, question kinds,
It is no longer for old twigs ye look,
Which proved once underneath lay store of seed,

But to the herb's self, by what light ye boast,
For what fruit's signs are. This book's fruit is plain,

Nor miracles need prove it any more.
Doth the fruit show ? Then miracles bade
'ware

At first of root and stem, saved both till now
From trampling ox, rough boar and wanton goat.

What ? Was man made a wheelwork to wind
up,

And be discharged, and straight wound up anew ?

No ! — grown, his growth lasts ; taught, he ne'er forgets :

May learn a thousand things, not twice the
same.

"This might be pagan teaching : now hear
mine.

"I say, that as the babe, you feed awhile,
Becomes a boy and fit to feed himself,
So, minds at first must be spoon-fed with truth :
When they can eat, babe's nurture is withdrawn.

I fed the babe whether it would or no :
I bid the boy or feed himself or starve.
I cried once, 'That ye may believe in Christ,
Behold this blind man shall receive his sight !'
I cry now, 'Urgest thou, for I am shrewd
And smile at stories how John's word could cure —

Repeat that miracle and take my faith ?'
I say, that miracle was duly wrought

When, save for it, no faith was possible.
Whether a change were wrought i' the shows
o' the world,
Whether the change came from our minds which see

Of shows o' the world so much as and no more Than God wills for his purpose, — (what do I
See now, suppose you, there where you see rock
Round us ?) — I know not ; such was the effect,
So faith grew, making void more miracles
Because too much : they would compel, not help.

I say, the acknowledgment of God in Christ
Accepted by thy reason, solves for thee
All questions in the earth and out of it,
And has so far advanced thee to be wise.
Wouldst thou unprove this to re-prove the proved ?

In life's mere minute, with power to use that
proof,
Leave knowledge and revert to how it sprung ?
Thou hast it ; use it and forthwith, or die !

" For I say, this is death and the sole death,
When a man's loss comes to him from his
gain,

Darkness from light, from knowledge ignorance,
And lack of love from love made manifest ;
A lamp's death when, replete with oil, it
chokes ;

A stomach's when, surcharged with food, it starves.

With ignorance was surety of a cure.
When man, appalled at nature, questioned first,
' What if there lurk a might behind this might ?'
He needed satisfaction God could give,
And did give, as ye have the written word :
But when he finds might still redouble might,
Yet asks, ' Since all is might, what use of will ?'
— Will, the one source of might, — he being
man

With a man's will and a man's might, to teach
In little how the two combine in large, —
That man has turned round on himself and
stands,
Which in the course of nature is, to die.

" And when man questioned, ' What if there be love

Behind the will and might, as real as they ?' —
He needed satisfaction God could give,
And did give, as ye have the written word :
But when, beholding that love everywhere,
He reasons, ' Since such love is everywhere,
And since ourselves can love and would be loved,
We ourselves make the love, and Christ was
not.' —

How shall ye help this man who knows him-
self,

That he must love and would be loved again,
Yet, owning his own love that proveth Christ,
Rejecteth Christ through very need of him ?
The lamp o'erswims with oil, the stomach flags
Loaded with nurture, and that man's soul dies.

" If he rejoin, ' But this was all the while
A trick ; the fault was, first of all, in thee,
Thy story of the places, names and dates,

Where, when and how the ultimate truth had
rise,

— Thy prior truth, at last discovered none,
Whence now the second suffers detriment.
What good of giving knowledge if, because
O' the manner of the gift, its profit fail ?
And why refuse what modicum of help
Had stopped the after-doubt, impossible
I' the face of truth — truth absolute, uniform ?
Why must I hit of this and miss of that,
Distinguish just as I be weak or strong,
And not ask of thee and have answer prompt,
Was this once, was it not once ? — then and
now

And evermore, plain truth from man to man.
Is John's procedure just the heathen bard's ?
Put question of his famous play again
How for the ephemerals' sake, Jove's fire was flicked,

And carried in a cane and brought to earth :
*The fact is in the fable, cry the wise,
Mortals obtained the boon, so much is fact,
Though fire be spirit and produced on earth.*
As with the Titan's, so now with thy tale :
Why breed in us perplexity, mistake,
Nor tell the whole truth in the proper words ?'

" I answer, Have ye yet to argue out
The very primal thesis, plainest law,
— Man is not God but hath God's end to serve,
A master to obey, a course to take,
Somewhat to cast off, somewhat to become ?
Grant this, then man must pass from old to
new,

From vain to real, from mistake to fact,
From what once seemed good, to what now proves best.

How could man have progression otherwise ?
Before the point was mooted ' What is God ?'
No savage man inquired ' What am myself ?'
Much less replied, ' First, last, and best of
things.'

Man takes that title now if he believes
Might can exist with neither will nor love,
In God's case — what he names now Nature's
Law —

While in himself he recognizes love
No less than might and will : and rightly takes.
Since if man prove the sole existent thing
Where these combine, whatever their degree,
However weak the might or will or love,
So they be found there, put in evidence, —
He is as surely higher in the scale
Than any might with neither love nor will,
As life, apparent in the poorest midge, (When the faint dust-speck flits, ye guess its wing.)

Is marvellous beyond dead Atlas' self —
Given to the nobler nidge for resting-place !
Thus, man proves best and highest — God, in fine,

And thus the victory leads but to defeat,
The gain to loss, best rise to the worst fall,
His life becomes impossible, which is death.

" But if, appealing thence, he cower, avouch
He is mere man, and in humility
Neither may know God nor mistake himself.

I point to the immediate consequence
And say, by such confession straight he falls
Into man's place, a thing nor God nor beast,
Made to know that he can know and not more :
Lower than God who knows all and can all,
Higher than beasts which know and can so far
As each beast's limit, perfect to an end,
Nor conscious that they know, nor craving
more ;

While man knows partly but conceives beside,
Creeps ever on from fancies to the fact,
And in this striving, this converting air
Into a solid he may grasp and use,
Finds progress, man's distinctive mark alone,
Not God's, and not the beasts' : God is, they
are,

Man partly is and wholly hopes to be.
Such progress could no more attend his soul
Were all it struggles after found at first
And guesses changed to knowledge absolute,
Than motion wait his body, were all else
Than it the solid earth on every side,
Where now through space he moves from rest
to rest.

Man, therefore, thus conditioned, must expect
He could not, what he knows now, know at
first ;

What he considers that he knows to-day,
Come but to-morrow, he will find misknown ;
Getting increase of knowledge, since he learns
Because he lives, which is to be a man,
Set to instruct himself by his past self :
First, like the brute, obliged by facts to learn,
Next, as man may, obliged by his own mind,
Bent, habit, nature, knowledge turned to law.
God's gift was that man should conceive of
truth

And yearn to gain it, catching at mistake,
As midway help till he reach fact indeed.
The statuary ere he mould a shape
Boasts a like gift, the shape's idea, and next
The aspiration to produce the same ;
So, taking clay, he calls his shape thereout,
Cries ever ' Now I have the thing I see : '
Yet all the while goes changing what was
wrought,

From falsehood like the truth, to truth itself.
How were it had he cried, ' I see no face,
No breast, no feet i' the ineffectual clay ' ?
Rather commend him that he clapped his hands,
And laughed ' It is my shape and lives again ! '
Enjoyed the falsehood, touched it on to truth,
Until yourselves applaud the flesh indeed
In what is still flesh-imitating clay.
Right in you, right in him, such way be man's !
God only makes the live shape at a jet.
Will ye renounce this pact of creatureship ?
The pattern on the Mount subsists no more,
Seemed awhile, then returned to nothingness ;
But copies, Moses strove to make thereby,
Serve still and are replaced as time requires :
By these, make newest vessels, reach the type !
If ye demur, this judgment on your head,
Never to reach the ultimate, angels' law,
Indulging every instinct of the soul
There where law, life, joy, impulse are one
thing !

" Such is the burden of the latest time.
I have survived to hear it with my ears,
Answer it with my lips : does this suffice ?
For if there be a further woe than such,
Wherein my brothers struggling need a hand,
So long as any pulse is left in mine,
May I be absent even longer yet,
Plucking the blind ones back from the abyss,
' Though I should tarry a new hundred years ! "

But he was dead : 't was about noon, the day
Somewhat declining : we five buried him
That eve, and then, dividing, went five ways,
And I, disguised, returned to Ephesus.

By this, the cave's mouth must be filled with sand.

Valens is lost, I know not of his trace ;
The Bactrian was but a wild childish man,
And could not write nor speak, but only loved :
So, lest the memory of this go quite,
Seeing that I to-morrow fight the beasts,
I tell the same to Phœbas, whom believe !
For many look again to find that face,
Beloved John's to whom I ministered,
Somewhere in life about the world ; they err :
Either mistaking what was darkly spoke
At ending of his book, as he relates,
Or misconceiving somewhat of this speech
Scattered from mouth to mouth, as I suppose.
Believe ye will not see him any more
About the world with his divine regard !
For all was as I say, and now the man
Lies as he lay once, breast to breast with God.

[Cerinthus read and mused ; one added this :

" If Christ, as thou affirmest, be of men
Mere man, the first and best but nothing
more, —
Account him, for reward of what he was,
Now and forever, wretchedest of all.
For see ; himself conceived of life as love,
Conceived of love as what must enter in,
Fill up, make one with his each soul he loved :
Thus much for man's joy, all men's joy for him.
Well, he is gone, thou sayest, to fit reward.
But by this time are many souls set free,
And very many still retained alive :
Nay, should his coming be delayed awhile,
Say, ten years longer (twelve years, some compute).
See if, for every finger of thy hands,
There be not found, that day the world shall
end,
Hundreds of souls, each holding by Christ's
word
That he will grow incorporate with all,
With me as Pamphylax, with him as John,
Groom for each bride ! Can a mere man do
this ?
Yet Christ saith, this he lived and died to do.
Call Christ, then, the illimitable God,
Or lost ! "

But 't was Cerinthus that is lost.]

CALIBAN UPON SETEBOS ;

OR, NATURAL THEOLOGY IN THE ISLAND

"Thou thoughtest that I was altogether such an one as thyself."

[WILL sprawl, now that the heat of day is best, Flat on his belly in the pit's much mire, With elbows wide, fists clenched to prop his chin.

And, while he kicks both feet in the cool slush, And feels about his spine small eft-things course, Run in and out each arm, and make him laugh : And while above his head a pompion-plant, Coating the cave-top as a brow its eye, Creeps down to touch and tickle hair and beard, And now a flower drops with a bee inside, And now a fruit to snap at, catch and crunch, — He looks out o'er yon sea which sunbeams cross And recross till they weave a spider-web, (Meshes of fire, some great fish breaks at times,) And talks to his own self, howe'er he please, Touching that other, whom his dam called God. Because to talk about Him, vexes — ha, Could He but know ! and time to vex is now, When talk is safer than in winter-time. Moreover Prosper and Miranda sleep In confidence he drudges at their task, And it is good to cheat the pair, and gibe, Letting the rank tongue blossom into speech.]

Setebos, Setebos, and Setebos !

'Thinketh, He dwelleth i' the cold o' the moon.

'Thinketh He made it, with the sun to match, But not the stars ; the stars came otherwise ; Only made clouds, winds, meteors, such as that : Also this isle, what lives and grows thereon, And snaky sea which rounds and ends the same.

'Thinketh, it came of being ill at ease : He hated that He cannot change His cold, Nor cure its ache. 'Hath spied an icy fish That longed to 'scape the rock-stream where she lived,

And thaw herself within the lukewarm brine O' the lazy sea her stream thrusts far amid, A crystal spike 'twixt two warm walls of wave ; Only, she ever sickened, found repulse At the other kind of water, not her life, (Green-dense and dim-delicious, bred o' the sun.) Flounced back from bliss she was not born to breathe,

And in her old bounds buried her despair, Hating and loving warmth alike : so He.

'Thinketh, He made thereat the sun, this isle, Trees and the fowls here, beast and creeping thing.

Yon otter, sleek-wet, black, lithe as a leech ; Yon auk, one fire-eye in a ball of foam, That floats and feeds ; a certain badger brown He hath watched hunt with that slant white-wedge eye

By moonlight ; and the pie with the long tongue That pricks deep into oakwarts for a worm, And says a plain word when she finds her prize,

But will not eat the ants ; the ants themselves That build a wall of seeds and settled stalks About their hole — He made all these and more, Made all we see, and us, in spite : how else ? He could not, Himself, make a second self To be His mate ; as well have made Himself : He would not make what He mislikes or slights. An eyesore to Him, or not worth His pains : But did, in envy, listlessness or sport, Make what Himself would fain, in a manner, be —

Weaker in most points, stronger in a few, Worthy, and yet mere playthings all the while, Things He admires and mocks too, — that is it. Because, so brave, so better though they be, It nothing skills if He begin to plague. Look now, I melt a gourd-fruit into mash, Add honeycomb and pods, I have perceived, Which bite like finches when they bill and kiss, —

Then, when froth rises bladdery, drink up all, Quick, quick, till maggots scamper through my brain ;

Last, throw me on my back i' the seeded thyme, And wanton, wishing I were born a bird. Put case, unable to be what I wish, I yet could make a live bird out of clay : Would not I take clay, pinch my Caliban Able to fly ? — for, there, see, he hath wings, And great comb like the hoopoe's to admire, And there, a sting to do his foes offence, There, and I will that he begin to live, Fly to yon rock-top, nip me off the horns Of grigs high up that make the merry din, Saucy through their veined wings, and mind me not.

In which feat, if his leg snapped, brittle clay, And he lay stupid-like, — why, I should laugh ; And if he, spying me, should fall to weep, Beseech me to be good, repair his wrong, Bid his poor leg smart less or grow again, — Well, as the chance were, this might take or else

Not take my fancy : I might hear his cry, And give the manikin three sound legs for one, Or pluck the other off, leave him like an egg, And lessoned he was mine and merely clay. Were this no pleasure, lying in the thyme, Drinking the mash, with brain become alive, Making and marring clay at will ? So He.

'Thinketh, such shows nor right nor wrong in Him,

Nor kind, nor cruel : He is strong and Lord. 'Am strong myself compared to yonder crabs That march now from the mountain to the sea ;

'Let twenty pass, and stone the twenty-first, Loving not, hating not, just choosing so. 'Say, the first straggler that boasts purple spots Shall join the file, one pincer twisted off ; 'Say, this bruised fellow shall receive a worm, And two worms he whose nippers end in red ; As it likes me each time, I do : so He.

Well then, 'supposeth He is good i' the main. Pleasable if His mind and ways were guessed, But rougher than His handiwork, be sure !

Oh, He hath made things worthier than Himself,
 And envieth that, so helped, such things do more Than He who made them! What consoles but this?
 That they, unless through Him, do naught at all,
 And must submit: what other use in things?
 'Hath cut a pipe of pithless elder-joint
 That, blown through, gives exact the scream o' the jay
 When from her wing you twitch the feathers blue:
 Sound this, and little birds that hate the jay
 Flock within stone's throw, glad their foe is hurt:
 Put case such pipe could prattle and boast forsooth,
 "I catch the birds, I am the crafty thing,
 I make the cry my maker cannot make
 With his great round mouth; he must blow through mine!"
 Would not I smash it with my foot? So He.

But wherefore rough, why cold and ill at ease?
 Aha, that is a question! Ask, for that,
 What knows, — the something over Setebos
 That made Him, or He, may be, found and fought,
 Worsted, drove off and did to nothing, perchance.

There may be something quiet o'er His head,
 Out of His reach, that feels nor joy nor grief,
 Since both derive from weakness in some way.
 I joy because the quails come; would not joy
 Could I bring quails here when I have a mind:
 This Quiet, all it hath a mind to, doth.
 'Esteemeth stars the outposts of its couch,
 But never spends much thought nor care that way.

It may look up, work up, — the worse for those
 It works on! 'Careth but for Setebos
 The many-handed as a cuttle-fish,
 Who, making Himself feared through what He does,

Looks up, first, and perceives he cannot soar
 To what is quiet and hath happy life;
 Next looks down here, and out of very spite
 Makes this a bauble-world to ape yon real,
 These good things to match those as hips do grapes.

'Tis solace making baubles, ay, and sport.
 Himself peeped late, eyed Prosper at his books
 Careless and lofty, lord now of the isle:
 Vexed, 'stitched a book of broad leaves, arrow-shaped,

Wrote thereon, he knows what, prodigious words;

Has peeled a wand and called it by a name;
 Weareth at whiles for an enchanter's robe
 The eyed skin of a supple oncelot;
 And hath an ounce sleeker than youngling mole,
 A four-legged serpent he makes cower and couch,

Now snarl, now hold its breath and mind his eye,
 And saith she is Miranda and my wife:

'Keeps for his Ariel a tall pouch-bill crane
 He bids go wade for fish and straight disgorge;
 Also a sea-beast, lumpish, which he snared,
 Blinded the eyes of, and brought somewhat tame,

And split its toe-webs, and now pens the drudge
 In a hole o' the rock and calls him Caliban;
 A bitter heart that bides its time and bites.
 'Plays thus at being Prosper in a way,
 Taketh his mirth with make-believes: so He.

His dam held that the Quiet made all things
 Which Setebos vexed only: 'holds not so.
 Who made them weak, meant weakness He might vex.

Had He meant other, while His hand was in,
 Why not make horny eyes no thorn could prick,
 Or plate my scalp with bone against the snow,
 Or overscale my flesh 'neath joint and joint,
 Like an orc's armor? Ay, — so spoil His sport!
 He is the One now: only He doth all.

'Saith, He may like, perchance, what profits Him.

Ay, himself loves what does him good; but why?

'Gets good no otherwise. This blinded beast
 Loves whoso places flesh-meat on his nose,
 But, had he eyes, would want no help, but hate
 Or love, just as it liked him: He hath eyes.

Also it pleaseth Setebos to work,
 Use all His hands, and exercise much craft,
 By no means for the love of what is worked.
 'Tasteth, himself, no finer good i' the world
 When all goes right, in this safe summer-time,
 And he wants little, hungers, aches not much,
 Than trying what to do with wit and strength.

'Falls to make something: 'piled yon pile of turfs,

And squared and stuck there squares of soft white chalk,

And, with a fish-tooth, scratched a moon on each,

And set up endwise certain spikes of tree,
 And crowned the whole with a sloth's skull a-top,

Found dead i' the woods, too hard for one to kill.

No use at all i' the work, for work's sole sake;
 'Shall some day knock it down again: so He.

'Saith He is terrible: watch His feats in proof!
 One hurricane will spoil six good months' hope.

He hath a spite against me, that I know,
 Just as He favors Prosper, who knows why?

So it is, all the same, as well I find.
 'Wove wattles half the winter, fenced them firm

With stone and stake to stop she-tortoises
 Crawling to lay their eggs here: well, one wave,

Feeling the foot of Him upon its neck,
 Gaped as a snake does, lolled out its large tongue,

And licked the whole labor flat: so much for spite.

'Saw a ball flame down late (yonder it lies)
 Where, half an hour before, I slept i' the shade:

Often they scatter sparkles: there is force!

'Dug up a newt He may have envied once
And turned to stone, shut up inside a stone.
Please Him and hinder this? — What Prosper does?

Aha, if He would tell me how! Not He!
There is the sport: discover how or die!
All need not die, for of the things o' the isle
Some flee afar, some dive, some run up trees;
Those at His mercy, — why, they please Him
most

When . . . when . . . well, never try the same way twice!

Repeat what act has pleased, He may grow
wroth.

You must not know His ways, and play Him off,
Sure of the issue. 'Doth the like himself:

'Spareth a squirrel that it nothing fears
But steals the nut from underneath my thumb,
And when I threat, bites stoutly in defence:

'Spareth an urchin that contrariwise,
Curls up into a ball, pretending death

For fright at my approach: the two ways please.
But what would move my choler more than this,

That either creature counted on its life
To-morrow and next day and all days to come,

Saying, forsooth, in the inmost of its heart,
"Because he did so yesterday with me,

And otherwise with such another brute,
So must he do henceforth and always." — Ay?

Would teach the reasoning couple what "must"
means!

'Doth as he likes, or wherefore Lord? So He.

'Conceiveth all things will continue thus,
And we shall have to live in fear of Him
So long as He lives, keeps His strength: no
change,

If He have done His best, make no new world
To please Him more, so leave off watching
this, —

If He surprise not even the Quiet's self
Some strange day, — or, suppose, grow into it
As grubs grow butterflies: else, here we are,
And there is He, and nowhere help at all.

'Believeth with the life, the pain shall stop.
His dam held different, that after death
He both plagued enemies and feasted friends:
Idly! He doth His worst in this our life,
Giving just respite lest we die through pain,
Saving last pain for worst, — with which, an
end.

Meanwhile, the best way to escape His ire
Is, not to seem too happy. 'Sees, himself,
Yonder two flies, with purple films and pink,
Bask on the pompion-bell above: kills both.
'Sees two black painful beetles roll their ball
On head and tail as if to save their lives:
Moves them the stick away they strive to clear.

Even so, 'would have Him misconceive, suppose
This Caliban strives hard and ails no less,
And always, above all else, envies Him;
Wherefore he mainly dances on dark nights,
Moans in the sun, gets under holes to laugh,
And never speaks his mind save housed as now:
Outside, 'groans, curses. If He caught me here,

O'erheard this speech, and asked "What chucklest at?"

'Would, to appease Him, cut a finger off,
Or of my three kid yearlings burn the best,
Or let the toothsome apples rot on tree,
Or push my tame beast for the ore to taste:
While myself lit a fire, and made a song
And sung it, "*What I hate, be consecrate
To celebrate Thee and Thy state, no mate
For Thee; what see for envy in poor me?*"
Hoping the while, since evils sometimes mend,
Warts rub away and sores are cured with slime,
That some strange day, will either the Quiet catch

And conquer Setebos, or likelier He
Decrepit may doze, doze, as good as die.

[What, what? A curtain o'er the world at
once!

Crickets stop hissing; not a bird — or, yes,
There sends His raven that has told Him all!
It was fool's play, this prattling! Ha! The wind

Shoulders the pillared dust, death's house o'
the move,

And fast invading fires begin! White blaze —
A tree's head snaps — and there, there, there,
there, there,

His thunder follows! Fool to gibe at Him!
Lo! 'Lieth flat and loveth Setebos!

'Maketh his teeth meet through his upper lip,
Will let those quails fly, will not eat this month
One little mess of whelks, so he may 'scape!]

CONFESSIONS

WHAT is he buzzing in my ears?

"Now that I come to die,
Do I view the world as a vale of tears?"
Ah, reverend sir, not I!

What I viewed there once, what I view again
Where the physic bottles stand
On the table's edge, — is a suburb lane,
With a wall to my bedside hand.

That lane sloped, much as the bottles do,
From a house you could descry
O'er the garden-wall: is the curtain blue
Or green to a healthy eye?

To mine, it serves for the old June weather
Blue above lane and wall;
And that farthest bottle labelled "Ether"
Is the house o'ertopping all.

At a terrace, somewhere near the stopper,
There watched for me, one June,
A girl: I know, sir, it 's improper,
My poor mind 's out of tune.

Only, there was a way . . . you crept
Close by the side, to dodge
Eyes in the house, two eyes except:
They styled their house "The Lodge."

What right had a lonnger up their lane ?
 But, by creeping very close,
 With the good wall's help, — their eyes might strain
 And stretch themselves to Oes,

Yet never catch her and me together,
 As she left the attic, there,
 By the rim of the bottle labelled "Ether,"
 And stole from stair to stair,

And stood by the rose-wreathed gate. Alas,
 We loved, sir — used to meet :
 How sad and bad and mad it was —
 But then, how it was sweet !

MAY AND DEATH

Among Browning's companions in boyhood were three Silverthornes, cousins on his mother's side. The name of Charles in the poem stands for the more familiar Jim, and it was in remembrance of him, the eldest and most talented of the three, that this poem was written.
 First published in The Keepsake, 1857.

I WISH that when you died last May,
 Charles, there had died along with you
 Three parts of spring's delightful things ;
 Ay, and, for me, the fourth part too.

A foolish thought, and worse, perhaps !
 There must be many a pair of friends
 Who, arm in arm, deserve the warm
 Moon-births and the long evening-ends.

So, for their sake, be May still May !
 Let their new time, as mine of old,
 Do all it did for me : I bid
 Sweet sights and sounds throng manifold.

Only, one little sight, one plant,
 Woods have in May, that starts up green
 Save a sole streak which, so to speak,
 Is spring's blood, spilt its leaves between, —

That, they might spare ; a certain wood
 Might miss the plant ; their loss were small :
 But I, — whene'er the leaf grows there,
 Its drop comes from my heart, that's all.

DEAF AND DUMB

A GROUP BY WOOLNER

ONLY the prism's obstruction shows aright
 The secret of a sunbeam, breaks its light
 Into the jewelled bow from blankest white ;
 So may a glory from defect arise :
 Only by Deafness may the vexed Love weak
 Its insuppressible sense on brow and cheek,
 Only by Dumbness adequately speak
 As favored mouth could never, through the eyes.

PROSPICE

Written in the autumn following Mrs. Browning's death. The closing lines intensify the association.

FEAR death ? — to feel the fog in my throat,
 The mist in my face,
 When the snows begin, and the blasts denote
 I am nearing the place,
 The power of the night, the press of the storm,
 The post of the foe ;
 Where he stands, the Arch Fear in a visible
 form,

Yet the strong man must go :
 For the journey is done and the summit attained,

And the barriers fall,
 Though a battle's to fight ere the guerdon be gained,

The reward of it all.
 I was ever a fighter, so — one fight more,
 The best and the last !

I would hate that death bandaged my eyes, and forbore,

And bade me creep past.
 No ! let me taste the whole of it, fare like my peers

The heroes of old,
 Bear the brunt, in a minute pay glad life's arrears

Of pain, darkness and cold.
 For sudden the worst turns the best to the brave,

The black minute's at end,
 And the elements' rage, the fiend-voices that rave,

Shall dwindle, shall blend,
 Shall change, shall become first a peace out of pain,

Then a light, then thy breast,
 O thou soul of my soul ! I shall clasp thee
 again,

And with God be the rest !

EURYDICE TO ORPHEUS

A PICTURE BY LEIGHTON

First published, without metrical divisions, in the Royal Academy Catalogue, 1864.

BUT give them me, the mouth, the eyes, the
 brow !

Let them once more absorb me ! One look
 now

Will lap me round forever, not to pass
 Out of its light, though darkness lie beyond :
 Hold me but safe again within the bond

Of one immortal look ! All woe that was,
 Forgotten, and all terror that may be,
 Defied, — no past is mine, no future : look at
 me !

YOUTH AND ART

It once might have been, once only :

We lodged in a street together,
You, a sparrow on the housetop lonely,
I, a lone she-bird of his feather.

Your trade was with sticks and clay,
You thumbed, cheested, patted and polished,
Then laughed "They will see some day
Smith made, and Gibson demolished."

My business was song, song, song ;
I chirped, cheeped, trilled and twittered,
" Kate Brown 's on the boards ere long,
And Grisi's existence embittered ! "

I earned no more by a warble
Than you by a sketch in plaster ;
You wanted a piece of marble,
I needed a music-master.

We studied hard in our styles,
Chipped each at a crust like Hindoos,
For air, looked out on the tiles,
For fun, watched each other's windows.

You lounged, like a boy of the South,
Cap and blouse — nay, a bit of beard too ;
Or you got it, rubbing your mouth
With fingers the clay adhered to.

And I — soon managed to find
Weak points in the flower-fence facing,
Was forced to put up a blind
And be safe in my corset-lacing.

No harm ! It was not my fault
If you never turned your eye's tail up
As I shook upon E in alt.,
Or ran the chromatic scale up :

For spring bade the sparrows pair,
And the boys and girls gave guesses,
And stalls in our street looked rare
With bulrush and watercresses.

Why did not you pinch a flower
In a pellet of clay and fling it ?
Why did not I put a power
Of thanks in a look, or sing it ?

I did look, sharp as a lynx,
(And yet the memory rankles,)
When models arrived, some minx
Tripped up-stairs, she and her ankles.

But I think I gave you as good !
" That foreign fellow, — who can know
How she pays, in a playful mood,
For his tuning her that piano ? "

Could you say so, and never say,
" Suppose we join hands and fortunes,
And I fetch her from over the way,
Her, piano, and long tunes and short tunes " ?

No, no : you would not be rash,
Nor I rasher and something over :
You 've to settle yet Gibson's hash,
And Grisi yet lives in clover.

But you meet the Prince at the Board,
I 'm queen myself at bals-paré,
I 've married a rich old lord,
And you 're dubbed knight and an R. A.

Each life unfulfilled, you see ;
It hangs still, patchy and scrappy :
We have not sighed deep, laughed free,
Starved, feasted, despaired, — been happy

And nobody calls you a dunce,
And people suppose me clever :
This could but have happened once,
And we missed it, lost it forever.

A FACE

If one could have that little head of hers
Painted upon a background of pale gold,
Such as the Tuscan's early art prefers !
No shade encroaching on the matchless mould
Of those two lips, which should be opening soft
In the pure profile ; not as when she laughs,
For that spoils all : but rather as if aloft
Yon hyacinth, she loves so, leaned its staff's
Burden of honey-colored buds to kiss
And capture 'twixt the lips apart for this.
Then her lithe neck, three fingers might sur-
round,

How it should waver on the pale gold ground
Up to the fruit-shaped, perfect chin it lifts !
I know, Correggio loves to mass, in rifts
Of heaven, his angel faces, orb on orb
Breaking its outline, burning shades absorb :
But these are only massed there, I should think,
Waiting to see some wonder momentarily
Grow out, stand full, fade slow against the sky (That 's the pale ground you 'd see this sweet face by),

All heaven, meanwhile, condensed into one eye
Which fears to lose the wonder, should it wink.

A LIKENESS

SOME people hang portraits up
In a room where they dine or sup :
And the wife clinks tea-things under,
And her cousin, he stirs his cup,
Asks, " Who was the lady, I wonder ? "
" 'T is a daub John bought at a sale,"
Quoth the wife, — looks black as thunder.
" What a shade beneath her nose !
Snuff-taking, I suppose," —
Adds the cousin, while John's corns ail.

Or else, there 's no wife in the case,
But the portrait 's queen of the place,
Alone 'mid the other spoils
Of youth, — masks, gloves and foils,
And pipe-sticks, rose, cherry-tree, jasmine,
And the long whip, the tandem-lasher.

And the cast from a fist ("not, alas! mine,
But my master's, the Tipton Slasher"),
And the cards where pistol-balls mark ace,
And a satin shoe uses for cigar-case,
And the chamois-horns ("shot in the Chablais"),

And prints — Rarey drumming on Cruiser,
And Sayers, our champion, the bruiser,
And the little edition of Rabelais:
Where a friend, with both hands in his pockets,
May saunter up close to examine it,
And remark a good deal of Jane Lamb in it,
"But the eyes are half out of their sockets;
That hair's not so bad, where the gloss is,
But they've made the girl's nose a proboscis:
Jane Lamb, that we danced with at Vichy!
What, is not she Jane? Then, who is she?"

All that I own is a print,
An etching, a mezzotint;
"T is a study, a fancy, a fiction,
Yet a fact (take my conviction)
Because it has more than a hint
Of a certain face, I never Saw elsewhere touch or trace of
In women I've seen the face of:
Just an etching, and, so far, clever.

I keep my prints, an imbroglio,
Fifty in one portfolio.
When somebody tries my claret,
We turn round chairs to the fire,
Chirp over days in a garret,
Chuckle o'er increase of salary,
Taste the good fruits of our leisure,
Talk about pencil and lyre,
And the National Portrait Gallery:
Then I exhibit my treasure.
After we've turned over twenty,
And the debt of wonder my crony owes
Is paid to my Marc Antonios,
He stops me — "Festina lente!
What's that sweet thing there, the etching?"
How my waistcoat-strings want stretching,
How my cheeks grow red as tomatoes,
How my heart leaps! But hearts, after leaps, ache.

"By the by, you must take, for a keepsake,
That other, you praised, of Volpato's."
The fool! would he try a flight further and
say —
He never saw, never before to-day,
What was able to take his breath away,
A face to lose youth for, to occupy age
With the dream of, meet death with, — why,
I'll not engage
But that, half in a rapture and half in a rage,
I should toss him the thing's self — "T is only
a duplicate,
A thing of no value! Take it, I supplicate!"

MR. SLUDGE, "THE MEDIUM"

Mr. D. D. Home, an American spiritualist, attracted much attention in the circle in which
Mr. and Mrs. Browning lived in Florence.

Now, don't, sir! Don't expose me! Just this
once!

This was the first and only time, I'll swear, —
Look at me, — see, I kneel, — the only time,
I swear, I ever cheated, — yes, by the soul
Of Her who hears — (your sainted mother, sir!)
All, except this last accident, was truth —
This little kind of slip! — and even this,
It was your own wine, sir, the good champagne,
(I took it for Catawba, you're so kind,) —
Which put the folly in my head!

"Get up?"

You still inflict on me that terrible face?
You show no mercy? — Not for Her dear sake,
The sainted spirit's, whose soft breath even
now
Blows on my cheek — (don't you feel something,
sir?)
You'll tell?

Go tell, then! Who the devil cares
What such a rowdy chooses to

Aie — aie — aie!

Please, sir! your thumbs are through my windpipe, sir!
Ch—ch!

Well, sir, I hope you've done it now!
Oh Lord! I little thought, sir, yesterday,
When your departed mother spoke those words
Of peace through me, and moved you, sir, so
much,
You gave me — (very kind it was of you)
These shirt-studs — (better take them back
again,
Please, sir) — yes, little did I think so soon
A trifle of trick, all through a glass too much
Of his own champagne, would change my best of friends
Into an angry gentleman!

Though, 't was wrong.

I don't contest the point; your anger's just:
Whatever put such folly in my head,
I know 't was wicked of me. There's a thick
Dusk undeveloped spirit (I've observed)
Owes me a grudge — a negro's, I should say,
Or else an Irish emigrant's; yourself
Explained the case so well last Sunday, sir,
When we had summoned Franklin to clear up
A point about those shares i' the telegraph:
Ay, and he swore . . . or might it be Tom Paine? . . .

Thumping the table close by where I crouched,
He'd do me soon a mischief: that's come
true!

Why, now your face clears! I was sure it would!

Then, this one time . . . don't take your hand
away,

Through yours I surely kiss your mother's
hand . . .

You'll promise to forgive me? — or, at least,
Tell nobody of this? Consider, sir!
What harm can mercy do? Would but the shade

Of the venerable dead — one just vouchsafe

A rap or tip! What bit of paper 's here?
 Suppose we take a pencil, let her write,
 Make the least sign, she urges on her child
 Forgiveness? There now! Eh? Oh! 'Twas
 your foot,
 And not a natural creak, sir?

Answer, then!

Once, twice, thrice . . . see, I'm waiting to say "thrice!"

All to no use? No sort of hope for me?
 It's all to post to Greeley's newspaper?

What? If I told you all about the tricks?
 Upon my soul! — the whole truth, and naught
 else.

And how there 's been some falsehood — for your part,

Will you engage to pay my passage out,
 And hold your tongue until I'm safe on board?
 England 's the place, not Boston — no offence!
 I see what makes you hesitate: don't fear!
 I mean to change my trade and cheat no more,
 Yes, this time really it's upon my soul!
 Be my salvation! — under Heaven, of course.
 I'll tell some queer things. Sixty V's must do.
 A trifle, though, to start with! We'll refer
 The question to this table?

How you're changed!

Then split the difference; thirty more, we'll say.
 Ay, but you leave my presents! Else I'll swear

'Twas all through those: you wanted yours
 again,

So, picked a quarrel with me, to get them
 back!

Tread on a worm, it turns, sir! If I turn,
 Your fault! 'Tis you 'll have forced me!
 Who 's obliged

To give up life yet try no self-defence?
 At all events, I'll run the risk. Eh?

Done!

May I sit, sir? This dear old table, now!

Please, sir, a parting eggnog and cigar!

I've been so happy with you! Nice stuffed chairs,

And sympathetic sideboards; what an end
 To all the instructive evenings! (It's alight.)
 Well, nothing lasts, as Bacon came and said.
 Here goes, — but keep your temper, or I'll scream!

Fol-lol-the-rido-liddle-iddle-ol!

You see, sir, it's your own fault more than
 mine;

It's all your fault, you curious gentlefolk!

You're prigs, — excuse me, — like to look so spry,

So clever, while you cling by half a claw

To the perch whereon you puff yourselves at roost,

Such piece of self-conceit as serves for perch

Because you chose it, so it must be safe.

Oh, otherwise you're sharp enough! You spy Who slips, who slides, who holds by help of
 wing,

Wanting real foothold, — who can't keep up
 right

On the other perch, your neighbor chose, not
 you:

There 's no outwitting you respecting him!

For instance, men love money — that, you
 know —

And what men do to gain it: well, suppose
 A poor lad, say a help's son in your house,
 Listening at keyholes, hears the company
 Talk grand of dollars, V-notes, and so forth,
 How hard they are to get, how good to hold,
 How much they buy, — if, suddenly, in pops
 he —

"I've got a V-note!" — what do you say to
 him?

What's your first word which follows your last kick?

"Where did you steal it, rascal?" That 's because

He finds you, fain would fool you, off your perch,

Not on the special piece of nonsense, sir.

Elected your parade-ground: let him try Lies to the end of the list, — "He picked it
 up,

His cousin died and left it him by will,
 The President flung it to him, riding by,
 An actress trucked it for a curl of his hair,
 He dreamed of luck and found his shoe enriched,

He dug up clay, and out of clay made gold" —
 How would you treat such possibilities!

Would not you, prompt, investigate the case
 With cowhide? "Lies, lies, lies," you'd shout:
 and why?

Which of the stories might not prove mere
 truth?

This last, perhaps, that clay was turned to coin!

Let 's see, now, give him me to speak for him!
 How many of your rare philosophers,
 In plaguy books I've had to dip into,
 Believed gold could be made thus, saw it
 made,

And made it? Oh, with such philosophers You're on your best behavior! While the lad —

With him, in a trice, you settle likelihoods,
 Nor doubt a moment how he got his prize:
 In his case, you hear, judge and execute,
 All in a breath: so would most men of sense.

But let the same lad hear you talk as grand
 At the same keyhole, you and company,
 Of signs and wonders, the invisible world;
 How wisdom scouts our vulgar unbelief
 More than our vulgarest credulity;
 How good men have desired to see a ghost,
 What Johnson used to say, what Wesley did,
 Mother Goose thought, and fiddle-diddle-dee: —

If he break in with, "Sir, I saw a ghost!"
 Ah, the ways change! He finds you perched and prim;

It's a conceit of yours that ghosts may be:
 There's no talk now of cowhide. "Tell it out!
 Don't fear us! Take your time and recollect!

Sit down first: try a glass of wine, my boy!
And, David, (is not that your Christian name?)
Of all things, should this happen twice—it
may —
Be sure, while fresh in mind, you let us
know!"

Does the boy blunder, blurt out this, blab that,
Break down in the other, as beginners will?
All's candor, all's considerateness—"No
haste!"

Pause and collect yourself! We understand!
That's the bad memory, or the natural shock,
Or the unexplained phenomena!"

Egad,
The boy takes heart of grace; finds, never
fear,

The readiest way to ope your own heart wide,
Show — what I call your peacock-perch, pet
post
To strut, and spread the tail, and squawk
upon!

"Just as you thought, much as you might expect!"

There be more things in heaven and earth,
Horatio," . . .

And so on. Shall not David take the hint,
Grow bolder, stroke you down at quickened
rate?

If he ruffle a feather, it's "Gently, patiently!
Manifestations are so weak at first!
Doubting, moreover, kills them, cuts all short,
Cures with a vengeance!"

There, sir, that's your style!
You and your boy — such pains bestowed on
him,

Or any headpiece of the average worth,
To teach, say, Greek, would perfect him apace,
Make him a Person ("Porson?" thank you,
sir!)

Much more, proficient in the art of lies.
You never leave the lesson! Fire alight, Catch you permitting it to die! You've
friends;

There's no withholding knowledge, — least from those

Apt to look elsewhere for their souls' supply:
Why should not you parade your lawful prize?

Who finds a picture, digs a medal up,
Hits on a first edition, — he henceforth

Gives it his name, grows notable: how much
more,

Who ferrets out a "medium"? "David's
yours,

You highly-favored man? Then, pity souls
Less privileged! Allow us share your luck!"

So, David holds the circle, rules the roost,
Narrates the vision, peeps in the glass ball,
Sets-to the spirit-writing, hears the raps,
As the case may be.

Now mark! To be precise —
Though I say, "lies" all these, at this first stage,

'Tis just for science' sake: I call such grubs
By the name of what they'll turn to, dragonflies.

Strictly it's what good people style untruth;
But yet, so far, not quite the full-grown thing:
It's fancying, fable-making, nonsense-work —
What never meant to be so very bad —
The knack of story-telling, brightening up
Each dull old bit of fact that drops its shine.
One does see somewhat when one shuts one's
eyes,

If only spots and streaks; tables do tip
In the oddest way of themselves: and pens,
good Lord,

Who knows if you drive them or they drive
you?

'Tis but a foot in the water and out again;
Not that duck-under which decides your dive.
Note this, for it's important: listen why.

I'll prove, you push on David till he dives
And ends the shivering. Here's your circle,
now:

Two-thirds of them, with heads like you their host,

Turn up their eyes, and cry, as you expect,
"Lord, who'd have thought it!" But there's always one

Looks wise, compassionately smiles, submits,
"Of your veracity no kind of doubt,
But — do you feel so certain of that boy's?

Really, I wonder! I confess myself
More chary of my faith!" That's galling,
sir!

What, he the investigator, he the sage,
When all's done? Then, you just have shut
your eyes,

Opened your mouth, and gulped down David
whole.

You! Terrible were such catastrophe!
So, evidence is redoubled, doubled again,
And doubled besides; once more, "He heard,
we heard,

You and they heard, your mother and your wife,

Your children and the stranger in your gates:
Did they or did they not?" So much for
him,

The black sheep, guest without the wedding-
garb,

The doubting Thomas! Now's your turn to crow:

"He's kind to think you such a fool: Sludge cheats?

Leave you alone to take precautions!"

Straight

The rest join chorus. Thomas stands abashed,
Sips silent some such beverage as this,

Considers if it be harder, shutting eyes
And gulping David in good fellowship,
Than going elsewhere, getting, in exchange,

With no egg-nog to lubricate the food,
Some just as tough a morsel. Over the way,
Holds Captain Sparks his court: is it better
there?

Have not you hunting-stories, scalping scenes,
And Mexican War exploits to swallow plump
If you'd be free o' the stove-side, rockingchair,

And trio of affable daughters?

Doubt succumbs !

Victory ! All your circle's yours again !
 Out of the clubbing of submissive wits,
 David's performance rounds, each chink gets patched,
 Every protrusion of a point's filed fine,
 All's fit to set a-rolling round the world,
 And then return to David finally,
 Lies seven feet thick about his first half-inch.
 Here's a choice birth o' the supernatural,
 Poor David's pledged to ! You've employed no tool
 That law exclaims at, save the devil's own,
 Yet screwed him into henceforth gulling you
 To the top o' your bent, — all out of one half-
 lie !

You hold, if there's one half or a hundredth
 part

Of a lie, that's his fault, — his be the penalty !
 I dare say ! You'd prove firmer in his place ?
 You'd find the courage, — that first flurry
 over,

That mild bit of romancing-work at end, —
 To interpose with " It gets serious, this ;
 Must stop here. Sir, I saw no ghost at all.
 Inform your friends I made . . . well, fools
 of them,

And found you ready made. I've lived in clover

These three weeks : take it out in kicks of
 me ! "

I doubt it. Ask your conscience ! Let me
 know,

Twelve months hence, with how few embellishments

You've told almighty Boston of this passage
 Of arms between us, your first taste o' the foil
 From Sludge who could not fence, sir ! Sludge, your boy !

I lied, sir, — there ! I got up from my gorge
 On offal in the gutter, and preferred
 Your canvas-backs : I took their carver's size,
 Measured his modicum of intelligence,
 Ticked him on the cockles of his heart
 With a raven feather, and next week found myself

Sweet and clean, dining daintily, dizen'd
 smart,

Set on a stool buttressed by ladies' knees,
 Every soft smiler calling me her pet,
 Encouraging my story to uncoil
 And creep out from its hole, inch after inch,
 " How last night, I no sooner snug in bed, Tucked up, just as they left me, — than came raps !

While a light whisk'd " . . . " Shaped somewhat like a star ? "

" Well, like some sort of stars, ma'am. " — " So we thought !

And any voice ? Not yet ? Try hard, next
 time,

If you can't hear a voice ; we think you may ;
 At least, the Pennsylvanian ' mediums ' did. " Oh, next time come the voice ! " Just as we hoped ! "

Are not the hoppers proud now, pleased, profuse
 O' the natural acknowledgment ?

Of course !

So, off we push, illy-oh-yo, trim the boat,
 On we sweep with a cataract ahead,
 We're midway to the Horse-shoe : stop, who can.

The dance of bubbles gay about our prow !
 Experiences become worth waiting for,
 Spirits now speak up, tell their inmost mind,
 And compliment the " medium " properly,
 Concern themselves about his Sunday coat,
 See rings on his hand with pleasure. Ask yourself

How you'd receive a course of treats like these !
 Why, take the quietest hack and stall him up,
 Cram him with corn a month, then out with
 him

Among his mates on a bright April morn,
 With the turf to tread ; see if you find or no
 A caper in him, if he bucks or bolts !
 Much more a youth whose fancies sprout as rank

As toadstool-clump from melon-bed. 'T is soon,

" Sirrah, you spirit, come, go, fetch and carry,
 Read, write, rap, rub-a-dub, and hang your-
 self ! "

I'm spared all further trouble ; all's arranged ;
 Your circle does my business ; I may rave
 Like an epileptic dervish in the books,
 Foam, fling myself flat, rend my clothes to shreds ;

No matter : lovers, friends and countrymen
 Will lay down spiritual laws, read wrong things
 right

By the rule o' reverse. If Francis Verulam
 Styles himself Bacon, spells the name beside
 With a y and a k, says he drew breath in York,
 Gave up the ghost in Wales when Cromwell reigned,

(As, sir, we somewhat fear he was apt to say,
 Before I found the useful book that knows) — Why, what harm's done ? The circle smiles
 apace,

" It was not Bacon, after all, you see !
 We understand ; the trick's but natural :
 Such spirits' individuality
 Is hard to put in evidence : they incline
 To gibe and jeer, these undeveloped sorts.
 You see, their world's much like a jail broke loose,

While this of ours remains shut, bolted, barred,
 With a single window to it. Sludge, our friend,
 Serves as this window, whether thin or thick,
 Or stained or stainless ; he's the medium-pane
 Through which, to see us and be seen, they peep :

They crowd each other, hustle for a chance,
 Tread on their neighbor's kibes, play tricks
 enough !

Does Bacon, tired of waiting, swerve aside ?
 Up in his place jumps Barnum — " I'm your
 man,

I'll answer you for Bacon ! " Try once more ! "

Or else it's — " What's a ' medium ' ? He's a means,

Good, bad, indifferent, still the only means
 Spirits can speak by ; he may misconceive.

Stutter and stammer, — he's their Sludge and drudge,
Take him or leave him; they must hold their peace,

Or else, put up with having knowledge strained
To half-expression through his ignorance.

Suppose, the spirit Beethoven wants to shed
New music he's brimful of; why, he turns
The handle of this organ, grinds with Sludge,
And what he poured in at the mouth o' the mill

As a Thirty-third Sonata, (fancy now!)
Comes from the hopper as bran-new Sludge,
naught else,

The Shakers' Hymn in G, with a natural F,
Or the 'Stars and Stripes' set to consecutive fourths."

Sir, where's the scrape you did not help me through,

You that are wise? And for the fools, the folk

Who came to see, — the guests, (observe that word!)

Pray do you find guests criticise your wine,
Your furniture, your grammar, or your nose?
Then, why your "medium"? What's the difference?

Prove your madeira red-ink and gamboge, —
Your Sludge a cheat — then, somebody's a goose

For vaunting both as genuine. "Guests!"
Don't fear!

They'll make a wry face, nor too much of that,

And leave you in your glory.

"No, sometimes
They doubt and say as much!" Ay, doubt they do!

And what's the consequence? "Of course they doubt" —

(You triumph) — "that explains the hitch at once!"

Doubt posed our 'medium,' puddled his pure mind;

He gave them back their rubbish: pitch chaff in,

Could flour come out o' the honest mill?" So, prompt

Applaud the faithful: cases flock in point,
"How, when a mocker willed a 'medium' once

Should name a spirit James whose name was George,

'James,' cried the 'medium,' — 't'was the test of truth!"

In short, a hit proves much, a miss proves more.
Does this convince? The better: does it fail?

Time for the double-shotted broadside, then —
The grand means, last resource. Look black and big!

"You style us idiots, therefore — why stop short?

Accomplices in rascality: this we hear
In our own house, from our invited guest
